to serve beer and wine, accordingly as persons might prefer one to the other. With respect to what had fallen from the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, he did not think that the Committee had yet reached that part of the Bill to which the hon. Member's remarks applied, but he could not accede to the doctrine that the licensing portion of the Bill should be separated from the police portion. If reference were made to the Beer Act, it would be found that the dealing with these two matters together was according to precedent; and if the House of Lords made any alteration in the police portion of the Measure, the House of Commons, though it would not accept the Bill so altered, as it was technically a revenue Bill, yet, if it approved of the alteration, might send up to the Lords another Bill embodying the Amendment. He had omitted from the Stamp Duties Bill the clause respecting Sir J. Barnard's Act, because it had no relation to revenue.

MR. CAYLEY inquired whether the right hon. Gentleman had any objection to the insertion of the words, "or malt liquors?"

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that, individually he did not object to the insertion of the words, but he thought them unnecessary.

MR. HARDY said, that as he understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he made it a condition to the obtaining of the licence that the house should be a refreshment-house for the sale of food, and this he considered would occasion great difficulty as regarded the definition.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought they had limited refreshment-houses to a certain class. He wished to know if he were right in that respect? He hoped that the Bill would be reprinted as amended, so that they might be better able to judge the effect of the Amendments, and to introduce such verbal Amendments as should carry out the intentions of both sides.

MR. BRADY asked if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not interfere with the beer licence regulations in any way? Suppose, for instance, a man who had a beer licence, and was obliged, in conformity with it, to close his place at eleven o'clock, took out a licence to keep a refreshment-shop, would he have a diversity of regulations applying to the two branches of business, carried on in the same premises?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that persons might at present take out a wine licence or a beer licence, but they would not be exactly in the same position, and it would be desirable that the position of a person taking out either should be distinctly defined.

MR. PALK said, he did not know whether he should be in order by at once moving his proviso.

MR. HENLEY remarked that the clause previous to that which the hon. Member wished to move an Amendment was not yet disposed of.

MR. HARDY said, he considered that it was almost impossible to lay down by any rule what refreshments should be supplied as particularly connected with wine drinking.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was intended to place the houses for the sale of the wine on precisely the same footing as houses for the sale of beer. Both would close at the same time.

MR. PALK said, he would then move the insertion of the following proviso at the end of the clause :—

“Provided always, that in any borough, not being a corporate borough, or in any rural district, the consent in writing of two justices of the peace for the said county be first obtained, and that the said justices in their several districts shall have the power of summarily dealing with any licence so obtained, in cases where conviction before a bench of justices shall have taken place, or where card-playing or gambling has been proved to have taken place, or where persons of notoriously dishonest character, or where trampers are known habitually to frequent.”

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to know if they were finally passing the clause, or if it were intended to amend it before they passed the Bill? He thought it was intended to confine the licence to a certain class, but the clause did not carry out that assurance. He hoped that a proper definition of the parties who might obtain a licence under the Bill would be given in the clause.

MR. SPOONER said, he rose on a point of order. The proviso was at present the subject under discussion, and it was incompetent to make any alteration in the clause, it having been agreed that no further Amendments would be made.

THE CHAIRMAN confirmed the hon. Member's statement.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was a very fair subject for consideration, what phraseology would convey to the magistrates a fair and intelligible indication of what Parliament meant by an eating-house. The simplest mode of making it understood might be the words “bond fide eating-house,” but the phrase bond fide had lately been so damaged and battered in reference to the construction of another Act of Parliament that it was the very last definition he should care to employ. Unless there could be some stringent and effective, yet at the same time intelligible, definition of an eating-house, the result would be that every beerhouse would take a wine licence. It was not, however, intended to create new drinking-houses, but to facilitate the granting of wine licences to eating-houses. He should be glad to receive any suggestion or assistance in regard to the language of the clause. With regard to the proviso moved by the hon. Member (Mr. Palk), he thought it was unsuited to the structure of the Bill, because it brought together inconveniently what was divided in the Bill, and what ought to be divided—namely, the preventive provisions, which were intended to obstruct the improper issue of licences, and the penal provisions which followed the abuse of licences. With regard to the penal provisions, he thought that some of the objects which the hon. Gentleman had in view would be attained by certain Amendments of which he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had given notice. For example, in the 12th clause, he proposed to enlarge the grounds of veto by the magistrate in such a way as to enable him to include the disqualification of a person by a prior conviction in another place. With regard to the first part of the proviso, which provided that in rural districts the consent in writing of two justices of the peace for the county should be first obtained, the great objection to it was, that when applied to for that consent, the magistrate would not know upon what grounds to give it. That appeared to him a conclusive objection to a provision of that kind, unless they laid down definite grounds for the magistrate to go upon.

MR. NEWDEGATE observed, that the objections which had been raised to the Bill on that (the Opposition) side of the House were of a fair and forcible character. He had applied to the chief constable of the county which he had the honour to represent, to know what would be the effect of the Bill; and that gentleman, who was an officer of considerable ability and experience, assured him that it would with an increase of disorder, entail the necessity of an increase of force. They might rely that they could never get over the age of vesting the granting of the hands of authorities in those who would be responsible for the conduct of such houses. A striking instance of that disorder was the case of the beerhouses. They ran with beerhouses so it was with these winehouses. He said, with the right hon. Gentleman, such a proviso as was now proposed, the Committee would state on what grounds they refused their consent, and that to be unfit.

He said, his object had been attained to a great extent. It was to call the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the difference which existed between the towns and rural districts.

In small towns in the county the refreshment-houses were almost inaccessible, want of proper roads, and it was that the Bill should provide for the population in those places the same protection as was given to the population of large towns. He therefore, rest satisfied if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would propose his attention to these two points.

He said, his attention to these two points, the propriety of empowering magistrates to inquire into the character of the houses for licences and of providing for the granting of a licence, by summary proceedings in the event of any irregularity.

He said to.

(Wine Licences not to be granted to Refreshment-houses under a certain annual Value).

He said, he would propose to amend the clause, "which shall not have been twelve months previously licensed for such licence." It was that a refreshment-house should not be a house for refreshment, and that object might be gained by requiring licences to houses which had not been twelve months. His objection was that refreshment shops being opened for the sale of wine.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought the Amendment proposed was ineffectual and vexatious. He said, refreshment-houses which had been established for twelve months, he thought which had no objection; and, on the other hand, to be vexatious to a house for a year to sell wine before for a licence.

Amendment proposed.
Clause agreed to.
Clause 7 struck out.
Clause 9 (By Act shall be granted) shall be granted.
MR. P. W. MANNING asked whether as to refreshment-houses, would the Government legislate as to licensed keepers, they would be liable with regard to refreshment-houses.

THE CHANCELLOR observed that the clause was peculiar and antiquated, and that it was not to import a new system the clause was agreed to.

Clause agreed to and 11.

Clause 12 (Necessary for a Wine Licence) to be given to the House to be given to the object to the grant to be stated).

THE CHANCELLOR said, he proposed to propose the jurisdiction of the Commissioners of the Excise.

MR. AYRTON proposed a motion for the proposition most unreasonable, entirely in the hands of the Police, who were not in any way connected with the peace. The introduction of a new system which he viewed suggested was from the clause of the Metropolitan system of just repealed to the counties of Middlesex in which the same footing. If the Chancellor's positions were would be most of the Exchequer in having reference to the Commissioners of the Police was to prevent the issuing of licences to improper persons. He would suggest that, although notice might be given to the police, the licence ought to issue from the judicial authorities who exercised their functions nearest to the spot where the applicant resided.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, his object was to secure knowledge on the part of the person exercising jurisdiction, and in the Metropolis the only persons who had the requisite knowledge were the police. He thought that the stipendiary magistrates might have the power of granting licences if care was taken that they had full knowledge of the matter. His first Amendment, however, and which alone was now before the Committee, had reference simply to giving notice of applications for licences.

MR. AYRTON said, he had no objection to notice being given to the magistrates as well as to the police, but as the first Amendment would lay the foundation for a number of others, all framed for the same purpose, he insisted that notice should be given to the justices also.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, nearly all the jurisdiction in matters of this kind had already gone from the magistrates in the districts round the Metropolis to the police, who were considered to have the best knowledge of parties applying for licences.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought they might duplicate the notices, and he would therefore move the insertion of the following words:—"To the chief clerk of the Commissioners of Police and to the magistrate of the police-court nearest to such refreshment-house."

MR. AYRTON said, that the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not sufficient. Notice should be given to the divisional clerk of the justices. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) totally misapprehended the subject. The supervision of that branch of the law which related to licences, was in the hands of justices of the peace, and the police had nothing whatever to do with it. They had an officer who was called the clerk to the divisional justices. The right hon. Gentleman was always anxious to set up the police and to put down the justices, and he now manifestly wished to carry out that principle. The police magistrates were in the hands of the police themselves, and were not their masters, but their servants. That was not a state of things to be encouraged, and he hoped the Metropolis would be put on an equal footing with the rest of the country.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the hon. Member was quite wrong in his supposition. It was not a proper description to call them police magistrates. They were stipendiary magistrates, and exercised greater jurisdiction than ordinary justices, having the power to do that which was required to be done by two justices.

MR. HARDY said, it had always been thought desirable to keep the police magistrates apart from the licensing system. The licensing justices also were in the habit of going to look at houses for which licences were asked, and thus judging for themselves upon the question of licensing. This was a duty which the police magistrates would neither have time nor disposition to perform. He thought it was a sound principle that the police magistrates should not grant licences; and that the justices of the whole kingdom, including the Metropolis, should be upon the same footing in reference to this matter. The county justices licensed slaughter-houses and public-houses, and he thought that they should also grant the licences now in question. The magistrates of Middlesex were a body of independent gentlemen, and the fairness of their decisions had never been questioned.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that the Metropolis was divided into certain divisions, of which magistrates were appointed to take charge. These divisional magistrates had a clerk regularly appointed, and no doubt that was the proper person to whom those notices should be given, in common with the clerks of the ordinary magistrates.

MR. PULLER said, the discussion was not whether the power should be given to the police magistrates or the Commissioners of police, but to the county magistrates.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER admitted, that on the whole a Commissioner of Police was not the fittest person to entrust with the granting of licences, and that they ought to combine the knowledge of the police with the responsibility of the magistrates. It was on that ground that he proposed that the notices should be given both to the Commissioners of Police and to Metropolitan police magistrates. The Middlesex magistrates had very little to do with the administration of justice, whereas the Metropolitan police magistrates were constantly engaged in that work, and were also in constant communication with the police. The Metropolitan police magistrates, therefore, were better prepared than the Middlesex magistrates to exercise the duty of granting licences.

MR. JOHN LOCKE contended that the justices of Middlesex performed precisely the same duties as the justices of other counties, with the exception that they paid an assistant judge to preside in lieu of a chairman, and that in Surrey, which included Lambeth and Southwark, and in Kent there was not even that difference. He had a great objection to give judicial power to the Commissioners of Police, and he did not believe that hon. Members would be ready to extend it to the corresponding officer in counties—namely, the chief constable. He hoped hon. Gentlemen opposite would unite with him in his endeavour to prevent the Metropolis from being treated in a manner different from that in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to treat the rest of the country.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, that he thought the most important matter was that, as he read the Act, there was to be no power whatever of appeal from the judgment of one police magistrate, or two justices of the peace, delivered behind the backs of the parties interested. Such an arbitrary power should not be given. Provided an appeal were allowed, he thought it immaterial whether the power of licensing should be given to the commissioners of police, the police magistrates, or the justices. In Dublin the people were generally better satisfied with the decision of the stipendiary than of the ordinary magistrates.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was anxious that the clause should be clearly understood. The Government had abandoned the intention of giving the commissioner of police power to prevent the issue of the licences. And the main reason for entrusting that authority to the Metropolitan magistrates was that it was agreed on all sides that upon the police dependence would have to be placed for knowledge of the parties applying. The Metropolitan police magistrates were in constant and habitual communication with the police; but that was not the case with the Middlesex magistrates, who only occasionally discharged the duties of visiting justices.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. HENLEY said, the Amendment of the Chancellor of the Exchequer provided that a man charged should be heard, but it did not provide that he should have notice of the charge preferred against him, or that he should be brought face to face with his accuser. That was a defect, and threw upon the magistrates a most onerous duty, which they ought not to be saddled with. Why were they to treat the magistrates of Middlesex differently to the magistrates in the other parts of the country? It was said that the reason was that they were not in communication with the police. Now, how were the police magistrates to communicate with the police? Were the police to go and whisper to the magistrates that they had seen a "social evil" enter a man's house, and therefore a licence should be refused. If that were the sort of thing, he did not care to whom the power of deciding was intrusted, because he, for one, should be very sorry to have anything to do with the matter; but if there was to be a regular hearing and a judicial decision, he thought that no sufficient reason had been assigned for withholding from the magistrates of the County of Middlesex the power which was to be given to those of the City of London, and of every other city, borough, and county in the kingdom. The Amendments both to this and the subsequent clause required further consideration.

MR. AYRTON said, that in order fairly to raise the question, he would move the insertion in the clause of words requiring a copy of the requisition for a licence to be forwarded to the "clerk of the justices of the special sessional division of the Metropolis within which such refreshment-house is situated."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER suggested, as it was getting late (five minutes before twelve o'clock), and there was no chance of the Committee getting through this clause to-night, that it and the succeeding one should be postponed, and they should proceed with the consideration of the other sections of the Bill.

MR. LIDDELL said, he wished to call attention to the fact that this clause as it stood gave the magistrates no power to inquire into the character or antecedents of a person applying for a licence.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that that defect would be remedied by the Amendments of which he had given notice.

MR. HUNT moved that the Chairman be ordered to report progress.

SIR WILLIAM MILES said, he trusted that the hon. Gentleman would not persist in his Motion. If the two clauses were postponed, why should they not at that early hour (ten minutes to twelve o'clock) proceed with the Bill? Did the hon. Gentleman wish to stop all the practical business of the House?

MR. HUNT said, he had no desire to obstruct business. So many alterations had been made in Committee that he thought progress would be promoted by reporting progress and getting the Bill reprinted. He would, however, withdraw his Motion.

Motion by leave withdrawn.

The further consideration of Clauses 12 and 13 was then postponed.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, it was not desirable to proceed with other clauses till the question of the jurisdiction of the magistrate had been settled by the 12th and 13th clauses.

SIR WILLIAM MILES said, he hoped the Committee would proceed with the 14th clause. He had an objection to the last part of it. He moved the omission of the latter part of the clause, and to substitute for it "and a copy of such list and register shall be forwarded to the clerk of the Lord Mayor of the City of London, at the Mansion House of the said City, or to the chief clerk of the magistrate of the Metropolitan police-court, or to the clerk to the justices of the Court of Petty Sessions of the city, place, or county where such licence shall be granted, and where such house shall be situate, at Lady Day and Michaelmas in each succeeding year." Reference to the magistrate of the Metropolitan police-court must, however, stand over till the 12th clause had been settled.

MR. AYRTON remarked that it had not been decided that the magistrates should have the jurisdiction referred to. The Amendment would, therefore, have to be postponed with the clause.

LORD LOVAINE observed that he saw no difficulty in the clause.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, it was time the debate was adjourned. The hon. Baronet who was so indignant at the proposition had only come into the House about two hours ago. He protested against the hon. Baronet thus turning patriot at the expense of those Members who had been there all night without refreshment.

SIR WILLIAM MILES said, he was happy to say that he had had refreshment, but he had been present at the discussion of nearly all the clauses.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, this was a high compliment to the hon. Baronet, as it showed that as soon as he left the House he was missed. However, as they seemed to have got into a chatting humour, perhaps they had better report progress.

The House resumed.

Committee report progress; to sit again on Monday next.

FISHERIES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration read.

MR. CAIRD moved to introduce words into the 12th clause which would make its provisions applicable to owners of fisheries as well as to the public generally.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 12, line 10, after the word present to insert the words "or by this Act."

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE stated that the Bill, as drawn, was highly favourable to the operative classes, among whom, in large manufacturing towns, angling clubs were largely in process of formation. It was absurd, however, to suppose that any proprietor would put lime into his waters to destroy his own fish.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 37; Noes 37; and the numbers being equal, Mr. Speaker stated, that, as the House was unable to form a judgment upon the propriety of the proposed Amendment, he should best perform his duty by leaving the Bill in the form in which the Committee had reported it to the House; and accordingly he declared himself with the Noes.

The House resumed.

Bill to be read 3^o To-morrow.

House adjourned at a Quarter before One o'clock.

CENTRAL AMERICA.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he wished to put a Question to his noble

Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, of which he had given him private notice—namely, Whether his noble Friend had any objection to inform their Lordships in what state of progress the important negotiations with the Central States of America were at present? These negotiations were not of so much importance as regarded the relations between those States themselves and Great Britain as they were in respect of the settlement of the long-vexed question of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty, which would probably be affected by them. These negotiations were commenced by the late Government and continued by the present. When the late Government went out of office there were three questions under consideration. First, the settlement of the boundary; secondly, the cession of the Mosquito Protectorate to Nicaragua; and, thirdly, the cession of the Bay Islands to the Honduras, on conditions which would ensure the safety of the subjects of Her Majesty resident in those islands. He should like to know the progress which the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had made in settling these questions—for he had seen in a newspaper a statement to the effect that the Bay Islands had been ceded to the Honduras. If that were so, and if the cession had taken place on the conditions first laid down by Lord Clarendon, and afterwards by himself (the Earl of Malmesbury), he thought it would be a subject of great congratulation; those conditions being a complete and entire recognition of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty by the United States, and the entire security of Her Majesty's Government in those islands from any interference on the part of the United States or any other Power whatever. He should like to know whether the negotiations were in such a position as that the Government were able to produce the correspondence relating to them.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, that the questions which his noble Friend had asked related to matters of very great importance, not only as affecting our relations with the States of Central America, but also with respect to the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty. He would remind the noble Earl, as he had alluded to the negotiations under the late Government, that before that Government left office, the Clarendon-Dallas Treaty had fallen to the ground in consequence of a difficulty raised by the Secretary of the United States. Afterwards negotiations were resumed and Sir William Ouseley was sent out to Central America. In reply to another Question asked by his noble Friend he had to state that his noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs had continued the negotiations; and a Treaty had been concluded by which the Bay Islands were ceded to the Honduras. That treaty had been received in this country and ratified by Her Majesty. His noble Friend (the Earl of Malmesbury) had adverted to the conditions on which the negotiations for that cession had formerly been conducted, and which had been laid down by Lord Clarendon. These conditions had been considerably modified; but stipulations had been made which would, he thought, secure the safety of Her Majesty's subjects in the Bay Islands: and, moreover, a condition had been inserted that those islands should not be ceded by the Honduras to any other Power. The stipulations Treaty with Nicaragua had also been agreed upon, but, so far as Her Majesty's Government knew, it had not yet been ratified by the Congress of Nicaragua, nor had it been ratified by Her Majesty. When it should have been so ratified the ratifications would be exchanged; but until the entire matter was completed he could not produce the correspondence.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that the answer of his noble Friend was satisfactory so far as it went; but as regarded the Treaty for the Cession of the Bay Islands to the Honduras, everything must depend on the terms upon which the Cession had taken place. His noble Friend had not answered one of the questions which he had put to him. He wished to know whether the United States recognized completely, fully, and fairly the spirit of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty?

LORD WODEHOUSE said, that the Clarendon-Dallas Treaty was at an end, and there was no other treaty between this country and the United States but the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY observed, that Her Majesty's late Government had declared to the Government of the United States that an indispensable condition of the cession of the Bay Islands to the Honduras, was the recognition by the United States, without further dispute, of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty. If that condition had not been preserved, the object of the late Government had not been obtained.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY (OTTOMAN EMPIRE).—PETITION.

LORD STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE:

The paper, my Lords, I now have with me is the Petition of which I gave notice several days ago. It was placed in my hands by persons of high respectability, animated by the best intentions, and having in view a most laudable object. On this account I readily undertook to present it to your Lordships. The gentlemen, with whose request I have thus complied, are the committee of an association formed in the general interest of Christianity, taken in its purest acceptation, with the hope of softening religious asperities and promoting the great ends of Christian benevolence. This Society is known by the name of the Evangelical Alliance. The immediate object of their petition is not so much to bring forward any special complaints as to draw your Lordships' attention to the state of Protestantism in some parts of the Sultan's dominions, and to obtain, with your Lordships' countenance, a more effectual security for those who have exposed themselves to danger by an open profession of its principles.

With your Lordships' permission, I propose to offer a brief statement of some leading circumstances, which relate to the growth and present condition of Protestantism in Turkey. The Protestants in that country may be divided into two principal classes—namely, those who are the subjects of Powers in amity with the Sultan, and those who owe allegiance to the Sultan himself. The former, with few exceptions, are natives of Germany, Sweden, Holland, Switzerland, and Her Majesty's dominions. They reside in Turkey under the acknowledged authority of their respective Sovereigns, represented in most cases by Ministers accredited to the Porte. They are protected by treaties actually in force, and they have no reason to fear molestation on account of their religious faith. The latter are natives of Turkey, subjects of the Porte, converted to Protestantism from other forms of worship, which have the misfortune to be tinged with error either in whole or in part. It is for this class of Protestants that I have to solicit the attention and sympathy of the House.

If we look, in the first instance, to their origin and progress, we shall not greatly err if we assign a considerable share of both to the circulation of the Holy Scriptures. Some thirty or forty years have elapsed since the Bible Society, as it is popularly called, succeeded in first introducing into the Sultan's dominions those translations of the sacred volume which have since been diffused through many parts of Turkey, both in Europe and Asia. The light was not offered in vain, and many, no doubt, have found their way, by its aid, to the fountain-head of truth.

In proportion as knowledge was obtained, the superstitious errors and gross abuses which had crept into the established form of worship throughout the East, became apparent, to reflecting and conscientious minds. That smallest of seeds, which is capable of a mighty growth, began to take root and spread; nor has it ceased to work its way through all the obstacles opposed to it by an alarmed priesthood and a fanatic population. The persecution which often attended that progress served only to stimulate the zeal of the converts. Their cry of distress was heard in other countries, and missionaries, summoned by its appeal, hastened from distant lands to their relief. Whatever merit may be due to those devoted auxiliaries, the greater share of it belongs to the United States. Whether we look to the funds, which their religious societies have so liberally supplied, or to the agents by whom those funds have been administered, it is impossible not to recognize in the amount of the former and in the conduct and character of the latter, what is calculated to do the highest honour to our transatlantic descendants. Other nations, and our own in particular, have laboured in the same cause, but the American missionaries stand almost alone in the extent of their personal exertions and the results which they have obtained. In the union of zeal, perseverance, and discretion they are unrivalled.

Your Lordships may possibly listen with interest to some particulars illustrative of their success, and affording a summary view of the present condition of Protestantism in Turkey. I have found them in a printed report, bearing the date of 1859, and published under the sanction of a respectable society. It appears from this statement that 45 churches have been founded; that above 1,500 members are in full communion; that those who attend public worship on the Sabbath may be averaged at more than 4,000; and that the Protestant community, as legally enrolled, comprises from 6,000 to 7,000 souls. Sixty-three ordained American missionaries, 67 female missionaries, 74 native preachers, and 178 native assistants, la-hour in the same field. Their stations and out-stations, scattered principally through Syria, Asia Minor, Armenia, and Bulgaria, amount to more than 100. The free schools attached to them exceed the number of 150, and 4,000 scholars, 900 of whom are females, avail themselves of the instruction they afford. In addition to these schools, there are seven higher seminaries, having 150 male and female students. The expenditure of the American Board for the collective missions amounted in the year to more than £28,000, and the aid from England to upwards of 2,300. Nearly 70,000 volumes and 20,000 tracts proceeded from the Protestant press at Constantinople in the same year.

It cannot be denied that, considering the shortness of the time, these facts are indications of no small zeal and of no small progress in that good work to which the missionaries have devoted their labours and their lives; but justice requires that, while assigning to them the praise which they have so fully earned, we should not withhold the expression of our gratitude from the Sultan, whose powerful authority has impressed a character of strength and permanency on the results of their exertion. If your Lordships will bear in mind the peculiar circumstances which surround a Turkish Sovereign, and limit the range of his ideas, you cannot fail to admire that soundness of judgment and generosity of feeling which has been so remarkably displayed by the reigning Sultan in all his dealings with the Christians. To him the Protestants, in particular, are indebted for the great Charter which recognizes them as a separate religious community, and gives them the enjoyment of privileges equal to those conceded in earlier times to the Greek, the Latin, the Armenian, and the Jew. From him they derive that free exercise of their religious creed, that security from molestation on the score of religion, which the Imperial Proclamation of 1856, the celebrated Hatti-Humayoun, has solemnly and permanently assured to every class of his subjects, without exception. I was myself a witness of the difficulties which His Majesty had to encounter in yielding to the entreaties of this country; and of all the incidents in my long diplomatic career, there is not one to which I look back with so much pleasure and surprise as to his gracious approval of that concession which, in carrying out the views of our Government, I had so long and so earnestly recommended.

My Lords, I willingly believe that the Turkish ministers have fairly accepted their Sovereign's injunctions to give effect to the great principle of religious freedom. It can hardly, indeed, be otherwise, when we bear in mind that the Sultan's Proclamation was solemnly recorded in the same treaty of peace which guaranteed the independence and integrity of his dominions. But the Porte is not remarkable for the vigour and constancy of its proceedings. Though the Sultan's authority is irresistible, his Government has all the weakness which belongs to the individuals who compose it. The remains of religious prejudice with some, indifference or personal interest with others, impede the course of justice, and, but too often, produce those delays which amount to a denial of it. In the provinces, at more or less distance from Constantinople, seceders, whether from the Greek or the Latin Church, or from any other established form of worship, are exposed to insult and ill-treatment from the populace, and to acts of persecution emanating from ecclesiastical authority. Converts to Protestantism have less to apprehend from the Turkish Governor than from the Christian Bishop, except when the Pasha or the Cadi, acting under the influence of the Prelate, or swayed by some foreign Consul of kindred orthodoxy, neglects the instructions of his Government, and connives at illegalities which he ought to repress and punish. It may also happen, more particularly in the case of any conversion from Islamism, that the fear of local troubles—of a riot or a murder—may induce the magistrate to temporise at the expense of the convert, and deter even the Porte itself from redeeming its pledges in his favour with a prompt and determined hand.

My Lords, it is the more important on this very account that the influence of a Government like that of Great Britain, friendly to the Sultan, and sympathetic with the objects of his enlightened policy, should be steadily and vigorously exerted on behalf of the Protestants in Turkey. The natural tendencies to a lax application of that policy require to be counteracted by a vigilant impulsion of a friendly Power. Every act of persecution left without redress, every infringement of the Sultan's charter allowed to pass with impunity, must necessarily have the effect of encouraging persecution and deterring those, who are awake to the love of truth, from avowing that purer doctrine which in their consciences they believe.

I do not, my Lords, intend to insinuate any reproach against Her Majesty's Government for remissness in this respect. I have no reason to suppose that the head of the Foreign Office, either under the present or under the late Administration, has shown any want of vigour in supporting the cause of religious freedom in Turkey. The difficulty of supporting it with equal effect at all times is, no doubt, considerable. Individuals who secede from long-established forms of worship and modes of faith are unavoidably exposed to the malice of those whom their new profession condemns, and their own inconsiderate zeal may possibly at times betray them into acts of provocation and offence. Your Lordships will, however, remember that, while it may be said of these Eastern converts to Protestantism that "suffering is the badge of their tribe," they are legally entitled to the full benefit of the Sultan's charter, and that it is the bounden duty of a Government which has placed them by solemn enactments on a level with other Churches, to enforce on all its subjects, and more particularly on its official agents, the execution of every measure required for their protection. The right and the obligation may both be admitted, nor, indeed, are they open to dispute; but it may still be asked, on what ground we can justly interfere on behalf of converts who are subject to the Sultan's laws, and resident in countries which acknowledge his rule. My Lords, it is not necessary for me to affirm that we have any express right by treaty to interfere on their behalf; but I appeal with confidence to the admitted practice of other Powers, to the solemn obligations incurred by the Sultan in presence of all Europe, and to the vast debt of gratitude which his whole empire has contracted towards this country, whose sympathies operate so powerfully in favour of Protestantism. In calling upon him to carry out his promises, we manifest the sincerity of our friendship and a becoming regard for his honour and authority; we encourage his perseverance in a course of enlightened humanity, which accords with his own interests; and, at the same time, we not only satisfy the requirements of a great moral duty, but strengthen the foundations a policy which virtually ministers to our own advantage, identified, as it is, with the general advantage of Europe.

Such being the case, my Lords, I lay this Petition on your Lordships' table without further explanation, and confidently hope that its value will not be determined in your Lordships' judgment by the weakness of its advocate, but rather by the intrinsic importance of the object to which its prayer is more immediately addressed. The terms of that prayer are:—"That your Right Honourable House will be pleased to sustain Her Majesty's Government in their efforts to cause Religious Liberty to be maintained, and the Protestant Churches to be really and fully protected in the exercise of their just rights, throughout the whole of the Ottoman Empire."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had at first thought that this Petition had emanated from certain subjects of the Sultan in reference to disputes between themselves and the Turkish Government, in which case it would have been a serious question whether their Lordships could receive the document. It now however appeared that it was a Petition from British subjects, praying that the good offices of Her Majesty's Government might be exercised in making representations to the Government of Turkey for the protection of Protestants generally in the Sultan's dominions: and that being so there would be no impropriety in entertaining it.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY expressed his thanks to the noble Viscount for the great interest he had taken in this question of religious toleration in Turkey, and thought, whether they considered the interests of religion generally or the unexampled triumphs of which they had proof that Christianity had achieved in Turkey, the noble Viscount was entitled to the deep gratitude of every friend of religious liberty throughout the world. It was impossible not to sympathize with the noble Viscount in the high terms with which he had spoken of the liberality of the Sultan, or to over-estimate the labours of those Societies to which the noble Viscount had alluded. Notwithstanding the immense difficulties that existed in Turkey it was most gratifying to observe the progress which Christianity had made in the dominions of the Sultan. But the noble Viscount had omitted all mention of the most effectual means to which this progress must be attributed—namely, his own unceasing exertions in the cause, which have been crowned by a degree of success which could hardly have been otherwise attained.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, that although he had no reason to offer anything on bo-half of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the Petition just presented, because the noble Viscount had been kind enough to state—what was, indeed, perfectly just—that the Foreign Office had never been slack where its exertions could be usefully employed in aid of the Christian subjects of the Sultan, yet he could not refrain from making one or two remarks. Certainly no one was better qualified than the noble Viscount to bring this subject under their Lordships' consideration. Everbody who had paid the least attention to foreign affairs was well aware that during the whole time the noble Viscount represented this country at Constantinople his great influence was continuously and unsparingly used on behalf of all classes of Christians throughout the Turkish dominions. He might also add that everybody knew the exertions of the noble Viscount to that end had been happily attended with considerable success. The noble Viscount had paid a just tribute to the benevolent intentions of the present Sultan. Persons in this country could scarcely understand to what an extent the Sultan had to contend against the prejudices of his people in the measures he had recently taken. Those measures had announced complete religious liberty to Christians all over the Sultan's dominions—a proceeding that was regarded by many of the most highly-placed Turks as inconsistent with their creed and position. Under such circumstances to have proclaimed, and to some extent also carried out, those principles, reflected great honour upon the Sovereign of Turkey. But, unfortunately, in that country, more, perhaps, than any other, the measures that were formally announced were not always put fully into operation or completely carried out. The Christians might, indeed, have been placed almost on a footing of nominal equality with the rest of their fellow subjects; yet, undoubtedly, they were exposed to oppression in various parts of the Sultan's dominions. Some cases of persecution had been brought under the notice of Her Majesty's Government, and the complaints had been accordingly brought to the knowledge of the Ottoman Government. They had received satisfactory assurances that orders would be given by the Porte to its different governors in the Pachalics where these grievances had occurred; and he trusted that those orders would be carried into effect. Indeed they had every reason to believe that it was of high rank and that they were what was most that these come very great numbers the Mussulmans, Christian subjects of jealousy existed in Christian Churches and scenes constantly little credit to those who took lamentable religion prevailed at Jerusalem there existed among them very great jealousies to Protestants a Greek priest, who had been persecuted to the spite of the assistance they were obliged to part of the court cases had occurred this exemplified a very peculiar kind of government had to the principles of toleration which the which he believed anxious of giving effect ever, assure His Majesty's Government to interfere with Turkey—because allowance for the Sultan, and not to reign, except in cases—were disposed of his Government as a cure to Protestant freedom as were Christian denominations Her Majesty's Government variably assured of the Turkish Government carrying out of into as the Porte was representations of all that had the hardest case out any efficient plan ought to take care that took they did not obedience of the Sultan, ing to improve the empire they should also prevent by the means the realization of the prosperity.

LORD BROUGHAM hoped he should receive from his noble Friend some satisfactory information as to the steps which had been taken to put down, as far as we had authority to put down, but at all events to make our Consuls aid the Turkish Government in punishing, instead of interfering to protect, the British subjects guilty of those outrages which lately were committed so scandalously in one of the mosques in Egypt, in a spirit of mere wantonness. If these outrages had been committed in consequence of a perverted religious enthusiasm, that would have offered no sort of defence, but it would have been comparatively an extenuation of the offence. But according to the information he had on the subject, the outrage in question arose from the mere wantonness of English travellers in that country. He hoped and trusted, therefore, not only that our Consul did not interfere to protect the offenders from the law and the police of the country to which they had rendered themselves amenable, but that he had rather encouraged the authorities in executing the laws against them. Nothing could possibly tend more entirely to frustrate all the good that had been done by religious societies here, and by his noble Friend the noble Viscount when he filled that office, which he filled—and which by common consent he most ably filled—in the East, for the promotion of the Christian religion, and the propagation of the Gospel in those parts—nothing could tend more completely to render inoperative all that had been done, and to make progress, so to speak, retrograde, than such outrages committed, he was sorry and ashamed to say, by British subjects. The only course that should be taken in such cases was to instruct our Consul, not only not to interpose, which he was not likely to do, in favour of those who were guilty of these outrages, but show his zeal to bring them to justice, and encourage the Ottoman Government in executing their own laws against them.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, he entirely agreed with his noble and learned Friend that it was the duty of the British Consuls not merely not to give encouragement to those who were guilty of outrages so gross as that to which reference had been made, but that they should do all in their power to bring such persons to condign punishment. The circumstances of that most disgraceful proceeding—for it could be characterised by no other term—were perfectly well known; but, in justification of our Consul, he might state that he was entirely ignorant of the transaction until the parties were beyond the reach of justice; and he would say that the conduct of the Viceroy of Egypt and of the Egyptian authorities, did them the highest credit, and it was satisfactory to find that the progress of religious toleration in that country had rendered such an occurrence comparatively harmless. The individuals in question had interrupted in a most unseemly manner religious ceremonies which were proceeding in one of the principal mosques on a solemn occasion; but instead of tearing them to pieces on the spot, which would have been the case a few years ago, the people allowed the officers of police to quietly remove the offenders. Her Majesty's Government had taken measures to discover the perpetrators of this outrage, and they had given directions to the Consuls, that on the future occurrence of any such cases, they should take immediate measures to bring the offenders to justice.

LORD BROUGHAM hoped his noble Friend (Lord Wodehouse) would not be charged, in consequence of adopting such steps, with favouring the Mahomedan religion, as he himself and others had been charged with favouring the Popish religion because they objected in the East London case to decide a question of ecclesiastical discipline by the mob in the streets, which they had protested against, without saying one word as to which party was right or which was wrong.

LORD CRANWORTH thought, while pressing on the Porte the protection of our own countrymen, entertaining religious opinions totally at variance with those of the Sultan, it was extremely important his Government should understand that the blame imputed was not attributed so much to the Mahomedan as to the Christian subjects of His Majesty.

Petition to lie on the Table.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS JURISDICTION BILL.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD CRANWORTH, in moving the Second reading of the Bill, stated that it was founded on the Report of a Commission issued in the year 1832, when his noble and learned Friend opposite (Lord Brougham) occupied the woolsack. That Commission recommended the abolition of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction on two subjects—defamation and brawling, and to render persons charged with those offences amenable to the common law courts; and his noble and learned Friend five years ago introduced a Bill to carry the recommendations of the Commission into effect, so far as regarded defamation. That Bill, however, was confined to England; it did not extend to Ireland; and one object of the present Bill was to extend the provisions of that very useful Act to the sister kingdom. With regard to brawling there was no very exact definition of that offence that satisfied his own mind. According to the 6th of Edward VI. it consisted in making a riotous disturbance in any church or churchyard; and the punishment to be inflicted for the first offence was, that the party guilty was to be prohibited ingressu ecclesie—a punishment, he feared, not very likely to deter those who were guilty of such an offence from its repetition—the punishment for the second offence was that the party guilty should lose one of his ears; but there might be those who had lost both ears, having been punished in this way more than once, and then they were to be branded in the face. This Bill, which had been introduced in the Commons and by them sent up to their Lordships, made the offence a civil one, and enabled the civil authorities to deal with it.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

LORD BROUGHAM said, that the Bill to which his noble and learned Friend had alluded, was the production of his hon. and learned Friend, Dr. Phillimore, than whom no one could be better fitted to legislate on this subject, from great experience in the Ecclesiastical Courts, and who had most ably performed his duty by carrying the Bill through the other House of Parliament. His noble and learned Friend had done perfectly right in extending its provisions to Ireland.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER said, he rose to oppose the Bill, and in the first place to complain that it had been introduced into the other House without the slightest explanation of its provisions or its grounds. He understood the noble and learned Lord (Lord Cranworth) to say that the object of the Bill was to carry out the recommendations of the Ecclesiastical Courts Commission of 1832; and it was true that that Commission recommended the extinction of the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts over laymen; but he wished his noble and learned Friend had stated more fully and more satisfactorily the recommendation of the Commissioners. It might be inferred from the statement of the noble and learned Lord that the recommendation of the Commissioners was simpliciter to get rid of the jurisdiction over the laity on these subjects of the Ecclesiastical Courts; but his noble and learned Friend must forgive him for reminding him that this recommendation was accompanied with a condition that with respect to the laity there should be given, in lieu of the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court, an indictment by which a person found guilty was to be liable to imprisonment; and he thought it would have been more satisfactory if that recommendation or some equivalent had been adopted in the present Bill—they ought not to remove the present remedy without some substitute. But he must frankly say that it had been his misfortune never to be able to see the reason for the recommendation so far as concerned the laity. It ought not to be expected, and could not be expected, that the Church would forego her right and her duty to tell the laity what was their duty; and, although it was a very disagreeable thing, when they departed from that duty in any important particular, to visit them with the censure of that Church. He was not desirous that these censures should be backed by any temporal penalties. The censures of the Church were intended pro salute animæ—were intended to operate not on the body but on the soul. He did not coincide with the definition given by the noble Lord of “brawling.” Violent and indecent behaviour did not constitute “brawling.” Brawling was the interruption by words only of Divine service, and acts of irreverence in the course of the prayers of the Church. That was a very grave offence—it was a sin of a very high nature when wilfully and especially if premeditatedly done. The State at present gave the Church the power of pronouncing its own censure, which, in the first instance, was an admonition not to repeat the offence. If that was not effectual, and the party was contumacious, then they went on even to excommunication. It was true that that sentence of excommunication was followed up by an act of the temporal Legislature, which imposed grave punishment. He for one deeply regretted that any such punishment attended such excommunication—it weakened rather than strengthened the Church's authority. The punishment was six months' imprisonment. They ought, indeed, to be glad that the Legislature in the time of George III. had introduced a change and an amelioration in the term of imprisonment as formerly carried out; and he could wish that the Legislature of Queen Victoria would go further and relieve the Church altogether from the scandal of being practically prevented, in the present state of society, from exercising its proper spiritual powers by having the temporal penalty of imprisonment appointed to enforce them. They did not wish to be assisted in their jurisdiction by any penalties imposed by the State; they wished only to tell sinners that they were sinners, and to exhort them to repentance; and if they refused to repent, then to tell them further that they cease to be members of the Church of Christ, and must not be permitted to join in the communion of the faithful. He was astonished that the Commission of 1832 should have gravely proposed to give up that jurisdiction, though he wished it were totally freed from all temporal penalties. He had said that the sentence had been actually inflicted by the Ecclesiastical Courts in one recent instance, and that it had had a beneficial effect; and he must remind their Lordships that the ecclesiastical jurisdiction which was to be removed if this Bill passed was the only means by which it had hitherto been found possible to reach any one of the offenders connected with the riots in St. George's-in-the-East. That offender was not of the lowest class. He was known and summoned, and proceedings having been taken in the Ecclesiastical Court, the sentence was that he should be admonished not to offend again, and should pay a sum nomine expensarum—the costs of the proceedings. This sentence was passed on the 17th April, and by a coincidence which it is difficult to believe merely accidental, on the 19th the present Bill, abolishing all such jurisdiction for the future, was laid on the table of the House of Commons, but with absolute silence as to any of its objects, and it had been now introduced into their Lordships' House without any statement of the provisions of the Bill, or of the reasons which had made it necessary. He doubted, indeed, whether the noble and learned Lord had even once read the Bill he now wished their Lordships to read a second time. When he considered that the existing law to which he had adverted was the only one that could reach these and similar riots in St. George's-in-the-East in a spirit of law, justice, and religion, it was monstrous to be now told that such a remedy was to be removed. He did not agree that the Church should be relieved of the duty of visiting sin with censure; and if the offender said, "I do not care for that," of telling him that he should no longer be allowed to be a member of the Church. They had no right to say that the Church should not proceed in her own courts to exercise purely spiritual jurisdiction. It had been stated that this Bill provided that the offender might be brought before the magistrate; but in truth there was no such provision.

LORD CRANWORTH: Before a justice of the peace.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER: That statement made him the more confident that the noble and learned Lord had not read his Bill; and he wished that he would do them the kindness of looking at it. Such a provision was just what he wanted. The statute of Mary enabled any one to bring such an offender before a justice of the peace, having first apprehended him upon the spot; and why this statute had not been had recourse to in reference to the scandalous proceedings in St. George's-in-the-East it was not for him to say. To him this was utterly unintelligible, particularly as they had heard that the Government functionaries were desirous to use all their means to put an end to such proceedings. By the present Bill the offender might be "convicted before two justices of the peace;" but how could they proceed under such a clause against the persons who were committing these riots? for they were of such a class that it was not known who they were, and therefore they could not be summoned. There were hundreds—he believed thousands—of children who were employed every Sunday night, in all sorts of riot, and insult, and outrage. The summoning of such parties was a mockery. Some few persons, indeed, who were supposed to be known, had been summoned, and then it turned out that they were not known. Why had the statute to which he had referred not been brought into operation? and why had not the police been told that they had authority and power, and therefore the duty to apprehend those who were guilty of those disturbances of Divine service? This was distinctly the law of the land, but that law had not been once, as he believed, called into action. They were told that nothing could be done, and certainly for ten months nothing had been done; the consequence was that atheism and riot was the normal condition of a large district of the Metropolis. Could this go on with impunity, and would not the principle be enlarged so as to extend beyond religion, to law, to justice, and possibly to Parliament itself? The tendency of such a state of things was to destroy all law; they ought to put down these riots, and they must do it unless they would have the law in this country become a mockery. But those who from their official position were bound to endeavour to suppress these disturbances had found it consistent with their duty to decline doing so. He thought that it was very unfortunate that there should be any attempt to frame new laws until the effect of the old ones had been fairly tried; and he lamented that the law of the Church had not been put in force in reference to ornaments placed in this church—a question with which he believed the law was perfectly able to deal. The clergyman was not bound to provide vestments—they were to be provided for him by the churchwardens. But the main thing which seemed to attach to this individual was the introducing of strange ornaments into the church; a cross was placed on the altar, and flowers and other things were introduced in various parts of the church. Whether these things were right or not he would not himself undertake to say, but the law of the Church was clear that the clergyman had no right to put the ornaments there. He spoke not lightly upon this subject, for he had not only had a legal opinion upon the matter, which fully justified his own, but he had written to that distinguished man the Judge of the Court of Arches, and therefore the highest appellate authority before whom the question could go, and that very learned person fully confirmed the view which he (the Bishop of Exeter) had taken. Some things were prescribed, and some things were used without prescription; but a clergyman had no right to introduce any new ornaments; the ornaments as he had said, were entirely under the control of the churchwardens, and that control carried with it a duty. There were special ornaments which it was the duty of the churchwardens to place in the church, and to see that they were used even on the Lord's table. It was not, however, for them to introduce any novelty—and much less had any one else the power to do it—without the authority of the Consistorial Court, given by means of a faculty. That faculty costs a sum of £7 or £10 to obtain it, and, therefore, the practice was where all parties agreed, such as in the having a curtain, or any other trifling matters, to dispense with a faculty; but when the peace and comfort and decency and religion itself, of a district were at stake, he must say that the persons who obtruded these things ought to be told that they were exceeding their legal powers. It was, indeed, very possible that when these things had been once placed in the church they could not be removed without a faculty, however illegal they may have been in the beginning; but upon that he gave no opinion, though, as to the right of the churchwardens to have charge of the ornaments in the first instance, he had, as he had said, the sanction of the highest authority. If the clergyman in question had been called to an account, and threatened with an ecclesiastical commission against him in the first instance—he was sure his right reverend Brother would forgive him for the suggestion—he would have been brought to his senses, and the country would have been spared a great deal of the scandal which had arisen. On the other hand he must repeat that he lamented deeply that nothing had been done to stop the parties who had been guilty of those riots. He would refrain from entering further into this painful subject, but he could not express in too strong terms his sense of the duty which existed of putting down these enormities of which all were so much ashamed. Under these circumstances he would move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, their Lordships would, perhaps, excuse him for making a few remarks upon this question. He had not been in the slightest degree aware that this Bill had any connection with those unfortunate outrages which had disgraced a portion of his diocese; whether there was or not the slightest connection between the introduction of this measure into the other House of Parliament and those outrages he was not prepared to say. He thought, however, that it would have been well if the heads of the Church had been made aware that this Bill was passing through the other House of Parliament, as they would then have had time to examine it. He, and he believed his right rev. Brethren, had not seen the Bill until that day, and therefore he had no doubt that the noble and learned Lord would have no objection to let several matters in the Bill stand over for consideration until they went into Committee. What his right rev. Brother (the Bishop of Exeter) had said in reference to the Ecclesiastical Courts generally was so important that it could not be discussed without consideration. He hoped that he should be allowed to say a few words in reference to those unfortunate circumstances which had been referred to. He thanked his right rev. Brother for having pointed out the real state of the law on the matter, and he would only say that the words which his right rev. Brother had used were well worthy of attention, and from his known knowledge of the law and his experience in carrying it out, he hoped that those words would have the desired effect with those whom they wished to bring under obedience to the law. His right rev. Brother had pointed out that no change could be made in the arrangements of the church except with the sanction of the Ordinary. In times of peace, however, the Ordinary was generally willing to allow innocent changes to take place; and no doubt in many churches of this Metropolis, no evil being anticipated, during the time of his revered predecessor, many such changes were allowed. For his own part he did not think it would have been becoming in him to introduce a new state of things at once, and to insist that every one of the clergy of his diocese should return to the exact arrangement in their churches which existed at the time of consecration unless it could be proved that every alteration had been made by virtue of a faculty. Among other churches in which alterations had been made was this unfortunate church of St. George's-in-the-East, and until it became absolutely necessary to regard it as an exceptional case he was willing that this church should be treated like any other of the diocese, and that the changes should be allowed to continue. But when he perceived that there was a disposition to carry these changes further, then, as his right rev. Brother had pointed out, it was his duty, and he did, in fact, send his officer to inspect the church and report to him as to certain changes which had taken place within the week preceding his visit; and finding that these changes had been made without the authority of any faculty, he gave orders, under his hand and seal, that those things that had been put up should be summarily removed by the proper officers. That order was carried into effect. Unfortunately, the execution of the law in the Ecclesiastical Courts was a slow process. His right rev. Brother had pointed out that his duty was to take some proceedings as regarded what occurred on last Easter Sunday, when certain flowers and other decorations were placed upon the Communion table. He was glad to tell his right rev. Brother that he had taken such proceedings. Owing, however, to the ecclesiastical law being so slow, an offence might be committed in August, and every one might be aware of it by reports in the public newspapers, and it might even undergo investigation in other courts of justice; yet, though no effort might be omitted and the proceedings carried on with all possible rapidity and with no inconsiderable expense to bring the offenders to justice, August might be succeeded by Christmas, Christmas by May, and May might be verging into June, without the public being in possession of the fact that any proceedings whatever had been instituted. Now, he could illustrate this by stating what had taken place in reference to St. Georges-in-the-East in the Ecclesiastical Court. Proceedings had been taken against a person, who, he believed, was one of the first of the offenders in point of time; the offence was committed not later than September; and yet it was not until very recently that this case had been adjudicated. But slow as these Courts were, slow as venerable, he had no doubt that when their vengeance did come down on a victim, it was a matter not to be trifled with. People were in the habit of thinking that these Courts might be trifled with, but the most hardened offender would not feel indifferent when he came to pay his lawyer's bill. As to their spiritual power, all right-minded men would be ashamed to be put in the position of not being allowed to enter their church: but the enormous expenses were perhaps more regarded in this day, the costs of the lawyers, the pecuniary penalties which might be imposed nomine expensarum, and the imprisonment which would follow unless the fine were paid, constituted a very heavy punishment. On the contrary the 40s. penalty imposed by this Bill would be nothing to a rich man in case he were foolish and weak enough to take part in these disturbances, and he thought it absolutely necessary to consider in Committee whether the proposed penalty was sufficiently severe. One other matter to which his right rev. Brother had called attention was of the deepest importance, namely, that this Bill, professing to embody the recommendations of the Report of the Commissioners omitted this most important point, that it should apply only to lay persons; and he thought that it would therefore be necessary to insert the words, "any person not being a clerk in holy orders." Brawling embraced a variety of offences, and it often happened that the only mode of bringing a clergyman to justice was to charge him with the offence of brawling; and in some instances of brawling the sentence might be a suspension for three years. It therefore followed that it would be ridiculous that for such an offence a clergyman should be brought before a magistrate, instead of before an Ecclesiastical Court, and that he should be fined 40s., instead of being suspended for three years; in addition to inserting the words he had mentioned, in reference to clergymen, he thought it would also be necessary to consider whether the penalty proposed was sufficiently severe as regarded laymen.

LORD CRANWORTH said, the last thing he could have apprehended was that the Bill would be charged with giving rise to the riotous and disgraceful proceedings in St. George's-in-the-East; he could likewise assure his right rev. Friends that the measure had not been framed with any intention of screening the low rabble who were guilty of such misconduct. He had been informed that the Bill was, in fact, framed at the end of last Session, but that it was too late then to introduce it. He might further add that his hon. Friend who had brought the Bill forward in the other House had communicated with leading men on both sides of the House, who expressed their entire approbation; and therefore, though his hon. Friend stated fairly and candidly what the Bill was, as there was no opposition it did not lie in his power to create a discussion. Whether the penalty proposed by the Bill was or was not sufficient was not a matter affecting the principle of the Bill; that was a detail to be discussed and settled in Committee. The principle of the Bill raised this question, whether the Ecclesiastical Courts, possessed as they were in some cases, and frightfully powerful in others, by punishing persons incidentally by enormous costs—whether the Ecclesiastical Courts maintained a satisfactory jurisdiction and mode of operation; or whether a more simple course was not desirable of dealing with what was really a civil offence before civil tribunals. The right rev. Prelate who had moved that the second reading of the Bill be deferred for six months could not feel more strongly than himself the necessity of preventing offences caused by the introduction of practices at variance with the ancient usages of the Church; and he remembered being associated with the right rev. Prelate on a memorable occasion, and going with him in opinion as to what were the ornamenta—he used the Latin word, because it expressed not merely "ornaments," but "furniture"—what were the ornamenta of the church—and they were agreed that no ornamenta were allowable, or at all events advisable, but those which were sanctioned by Act of Parliament or the canons. What he now asked of their Lordships was that they should give the Bill a second reading; and he would, in that case, engage not to move the Committee till Tuesday week, in order to give the right rev. Prelates a full opportunity of considering the measure, and he would be ready to listen to any suggestion from them with the most respectful attention.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER said, that after the explanation of the noble and learned Lord, he would withdraw his Amendment.

LORD EBURY remarked that if, as had been observed, the Ecclesiastical Courts were slow in their operation there was one thing that was much slower, and that was the amendment of the law. This matter had been under discussion in Parliament as long as he could remember. The riots had been carried on in St. George's-in-the-East a long time, and no remedy had been applied. In presenting some petitions on the subject a short time ago, he suggested that the law should be looked into, and he hoped that means would be discovered for removing the scandal which was now doing immeasurable injury to the Church.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that as it seemed to be understood that the Bill was to be read a second time he refrained from saying a single word on its merits; but he could not refrain from directing attention to the state of the administration of the ecclesiastical law. According to the law, as it stood at present, it was a great hardship that the whole costs of a prosecution, instituted by a Bishop for the good of the Church, should fall upon the Prelate, who acted in the matter only in obedience to the law.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn. Original Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Tuesday, the 22nd inst.

THE INDIGO DISTURBANCES, BENGAL. QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether any and what steps had been taken by the Government of India for bringing the subject of the repeal of the Regulation XIX. of 1810 of the Bengal Code, and the Regulation VII. of 1817 of the Madras Code, under the consideration of the Legislative Council of India as directed by the Despatch of Lord Stanley, dated the 24th day of February, 1859? He also wished to know whether there would be any objection to the production of the Correspondence which has taken place between the Cultivators of Indigo and the Government in relation to the recent disturbances in Bengal?

SIR CHARLES WOOD, in reply to the first question of the hon. Member said, he observed that Notice of the Motion had been given for the production of the papers relating to the subject of the repeal of the XIX. Regulation of the Bengal Code, to which he had no objection, and they would give all the information on the subject.

In answer to the last question, he could only say he should have no objection to produce the Correspondence if he were in possession of it, but at present only a portion had reached him.

THE MADRAS IRRIGATION COMPANY. QUESTION.

MR. SMOLLETT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, with reference to a Letter from the India Office addressed to the Manchester Cotton Association, and dated the 16th day of April, 1860, stating that the proposals of the Madras Irrigation and Canal Company for constructing works of irrigation, drainage, and navigation in the Province of Orissa are under the serious consideration of Her Majesty's Government, Whether such serious consideration applies to that portion of the scheme which involves the guarantee of a minimum dividend to the Shareholders of this Company upon the whole or any portion of their Stock?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, "the serious consideration of Her Majesty's Government" did not apply to that portion of the scheme which involved a guarantee of a minimum dividend. The Government were not prepared to give that guarantee.

FORGERY OF TRADE MARKS.

QUESTION.

MR. BASS said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, as no Clause in reference to the Forgery of Trade Marks has been introduced in the Bill for Consolidating and Amending the Law of Forgery, he will at the earliest opportunity, introduce the Measure he has prepared on that question?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, a measure upon the subject would be introduced shortly, or at least as speedily as the state of public business would permit.

LUNATICS IN SCOTLAND.

QUESTION.

MR. E. ELLICE (St. Andrews) said, he rose to ask the Lord-Advocate, Whether he intends at an early period to propose a Bill for establishing greater uniformity in the interpretation of the Law of Scotland as regards the definition of Lunacy; for removing doubts as to the obligation of Counties to provide accommodation for Lunatics; and for giving to the Commissioners in Lunacy extended powers with regard to the custody of Pauper Lunatics?

THE LORD-ADVOCATE said, it was his intention to introduce a Bill to remedy some of the defects which were found to exist in former Lunacy Acts, and he hoped soon to lay it on the Table of the House.

MR. G. W. HOPE said, he rose to say a few words of explanation with reference to a statement he had made when moving for the production of the Civil Service Examination Papers a few nights previously. On that occasion he had said that in the case of the particular candidate of whose rejection he complained, there had been but one single mistake in his spelling. He had since been informed that there was more than one mistake. He had also stated that he was unacquainted with the names of the Commissioners. He had now ascertained that two of them were Sir Edward Ryan and Sir John Lefevre, and he might say that if there were any gentlemen whom he would entrust with the duties of such a position with confidence, those were the two he would select.

COURSE OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI said, he wished to ask what course the Government intend to pursue with respect to the Orders on the Paper?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had already announced that it was proposed to proceed with the Wine Licences Bill on Monday, and should that not occupy the whole of the evening—he would proceed with Sir John Barnard's Act Repeal Bill.

On the Motion for the Adjournment of the House till Monday,

CAPTAIN GRANT'S MILITARY COOKING INVENTIONS.—OBSERVATIONS:

COLONEL LINDSAY said, he rose to draw the attention of the House to the system of cooking in the army invented by Captain Grant, and to ask the Secretary of State for War, if he intends to recommend that some remuneration shall be given to Captain Grant for the great services he has rendered in improving and economising the system. The hon. and gallant Gentleman observed that before those improvements were introduced the only means employed for cooking soldiers' dinners were boilers, and if the men desired to have their food baked they had to take it to an oven in the town where they happened to be, and to pay for it out of their own pockets. A Board, presided over by Colonel Franklin at Woolwich, in 1856, by whom the subject was investigated, had borne conclusive testimony to the immense saving in fuel from the use of Captain Grant's apparatus; and a subsequent inquiry, conducted by Lieutenant-Colonel

Mr. G. W. Hope

Travers, R.A., had also established its value in that respect. There was at present no allowance of fuel for cooking in barracks; but the winter allowance of fuel per week was 346lbs. and the summer 188lbs. per mess; of which it was the custom to devote one-third to cooking. The expense of cooking at the present moment varied from $\frac{1}{2}d.$ per man per week to $5d.$ per man per week. But this last was an excessive charge. It occurred at St. George's Barracks, and was caused by the apparatus of cooking by gas, which for military reasons ought to be discontinued. The system which only cost a halfpenny per day per man was that of Captain Grant. The Army Sanitary Commission, of which the right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary for War was president, entered very minutely into this question, and while it stated that there were then no means for cooking the soldiers' rations but by boiling, recommended that the means should be furnished the soldiers of having their rations cooked by baking, stewing, and frying. Now, these facilities had been afforded them by the apparatus of Captain Grant. The attention of that officer was first directed to this subject, in consequence of the dreadful reports that were received from the army in the Crimea during the Russian war. Being permitted to make experiments at Aldershot, he fitted up a kitchen there for 1,000 men. His plan was so successful that he was allowed to extend his apparatus to the whole of that encampment, and at this moment it was in use throughout the whole of the encampment. It had also been adopted at Woolwich, Shorncliffe, the Curragh, and Canterbury. It had been in full operation for 60,000 men, and the cost had been at the rate of $\frac{1}{2}d.$ per man per week. The amount of fuel consumed by it was 5lb. per man per week, while under the old system the consumption was no less than 37-8lb. per man per day. The saving effected to the country by Captain Grant's apparatus on 1,000 men was, in round numbers, no less than £300 a year, and to the 1,000 men £275 a year, making £575. Captain Grant in his apparatus had simply adopted the principle of four flues, radiating towards a common centre, and communicating with a chimney; and the greater the draught produced in that chimney the greater the heat. The apparatus had also been applied to field cooking, with great success. Captain Grant had likewise invented a system of cooking on the march, which had been extensively tried at Woolwich, and pronounced successful; and the Government had sent the apparatus out to China on a scale calculated for 5,000 men. General Peel, when Secretary of State for War, had spoken of the services rendered by Captain Grant in terms of unqualified praise. In December, 1859, Captain Grant, feeling that he had rendered great service to the army, and was entitled to some consideration from the Government, brought his case under the notice of the present Secretary of State for War, by letter, in which he stated he had been engaged five years in perfecting and practically applying the apparatus, and expressed a hope—not that any Vote should be taken expressly in the Estimates—but that a remuneration to the amount of twelve weeks' saving on two-thirds of the military force might be awarded to him. Seven months afterwards he received an answer to the effect that the cooking waggons were still under experiment, and that his applications for remuneration could not be entertained. He (Colonel Lindsay) thought it was hardly considerate to send so brief a letter to Captain Grant, in which the services he had so recently performed were not even acknowledged. Captain Grant had received applications from the Russian Government to furnish them with a kitchen for 1,000 men, and similar applications from other Governments. An application had also been made from the Indian Army to have it introduced into that service. He (Colonel Lindsay) felt, under the circumstances he had stated, that Captain Grant had been a benefactor both to the public service and to the soldier, and he begged to ask the Secretary of State for War if he intended to recommend that some remuneration should be given to him for the services he had rendered.

GENERAL BUCKLEY craved the permission of the House to say a few words on this subject. He had the pleasure of knowing Captain Grant, and he could state that no remuneration whatever had been given him by the Government from first to last for all his services in the army, though his apparatus had now been in use for nearly five years; which alone showed that it had received the approbation of the authorities. He hoped, therefore, that the right hon. Secretary for War, who had already done so much for the good of the army, would take this matter into consideration, and he was quite willing to leave it in his hands.

MR. CAVE said, if he also might be allowed to interpose for a moment between the question and answer he would gladly add his testimony to the great practical utility of Captain Grant's invention. He had had an opportunity of seeing it in operation in the North West London Reformatory, of which Captain Grant had long been an active supporter. So simple was the apparatus that the half-taught boys, with the assistance of an ordinary smith, were able to construct it; and so great the economy, that in the article of bread alone, the saving for an establishment of a little over 100 amounted, as compared with the price previously paid to the baker, to 30s. a week, and the saving in fuel, comparing it with an ordinary range of equal capacity, was upwards of twenty-five tons of coals a year. It was quite proper that a charitable institution should avail itself of Captain Grant's gratuitous services; but it was neither creditable, nor, he might say, politic that a country like England should accept such services without acknowledgment. He thought the principle which seemed to regulate proceedings in such cases a somewhat extraordinary one. If a man invented a method of blowing a whole regiment to atoms, he was amply rewarded, and covered with distinction; but if he merely contrived a means of keeping them alive, he was not thought entitled to distinction or reward by the Government of the country.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE.—QUESTION.

MR. LINDSAY asked the President of the Board of Trade when Her Majesty's Government intend to introduce measures to carry into effect the recommendations of the Harbours of Refuge Commission? He would trouble the House with only a few words in explanation. Three years ago the question of shipwrecks absorbed considerable attention, and it was proved that on an average, a million and a half of property and 780 lives were annually sacrificed by shipwreck. Last year, indeed, the loss of property and life greatly exceeded the losses of any former years, as many as 1545 lives having been lost. This annual sacrifice of property and life had at length startled Parliament, and in 1858 a Committee was appointed to see if any remedy could be devised. In the following Session the Committee was reappointed, and they came to the unanimous conclusion that it was necessary to establish harbours of refuge all along the coast, and they further recommended that a Royal Commission should be appointed to determine on the sites of those harbours. He had the honour to be appointed one of the Royal Commissioners. He only accepted the office on the understanding that the Government would do all in their power to carry out the recommendations of the Commissioners; and it was due to the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Pakington) to say that he had shown the greatest anxiety and interest on this subject, and that he had omitted no opportunity to press on the House the recommendations of the Committee and Commission. The Commissioners recommended the erection of certain harbours on the coast of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the sum of money which they estimated would be necessary for the purpose was £2,360,000. That might appear a large sum; but both the House knew when they appointed a Committee, and the Government when they appointed the Commission, that the harbours could not be erected for a smaller sum than that which he had named. He feared, however, that his question would now be met with the answer that they had no funds. It was known from the beginning that those funds would be wanted; and if there was no intention to carry out the recommendations of the Commissioners, then it was a waste of the public money and of their own time to appoint them. The Commissioners recommended that the expense should be extended over a period of ten years, and that a vote of £250,000 should be taken for the purpose annually. Considering the importance of the object in view they thought this was not a large sum for the House to vote; and even in the present state of the finances—though he must say those finances had got into a state which even to him, who had generally supported the Government, was really alarming—and the expenses of the country were growing at such a rate as to be still more alarming—still he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer might be able to spare £250,000 for the important object of saving life, and the large amount of property annually sacrificed. If that could not be done then he hoped facilities would be afforded for the local authorities to raise the money by loan. It was not probable that such a system would result in loss to the country. He found that from 1817 to 1850 the advances Commissioners to put in a gain to the Government being the difference which the money would interest at which it therefore, he should answer to this question.

MORTAR VESSELS

QU

MR. W. EWART asked the Secretary to the Admiralty the measures adopted for the strict system of inspection being built, Gunboats built on contract by subject, he said, with to this country, as those gunboats, from water, were admiralty fence of our coast. what sort of inspection over the construction that were now said had occasion to see Russian Government inspected by a Russian on inquiry that so vessel that not a screw the vessel without the

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON asked the Secretary for the purpose of as the Admiralty what injury by decay which in Her Majesty's Motor boats; whether it is workmanship and fast discovered; and what Admiralty have taken in consequence of the vessels? But before he should express a hope Gentleman the President

Trade would give a satisfactory answer to the appeal which had been addressed to him by the hon. Member for Sunderland on the subject of the construction of harbours of refuge. He coincided in every word that had fallen from his hon. Friend with respect to the immense importance, for the protection of life and property, of establishing better harbours of refuge than those which we at present possessed along our coast; and he trusted that no considerations of economy would deter Her Majesty's Government from carrying out the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners in that matter. He should also say that he hoped his noble Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty would be able to offer to the House a satisfactory explanation as to the intention of the Admiralty to carry out the warrant relative to the medical officers of the navy. He had upon a former occasion mentioned that a statement had reached him to the effect that an assistant surgeon had been unable to obtain a cabin on board the Queen, although there were four cabins vacant, one of which had been given to the band master, and the rest appropriated to stores and other purposes comparatively unimportant. His noble Friend had told him that there was no truth in that statement; but he (Sir John Pakington) had still some reason to doubt whether his noble Friend himself might not have been misinformed upon that subject. He would next proceed to put to his noble Friend the Questions of which he had given notice with respect to the state of our gunboats and mortar vessels. For several weeks past, and almost every day, the public journals had been full of statements with regard to the decay of those vessels; and not only that, but very serious allegations had been repeatedly made with respect to the conduct of the contractors who had undertaken the building of that portion of our naval force. Considering the publicity that had been given to the matter, he hoped his noble Friend would consider that the best course for him to take in that matter would be to tell the truth. He did not, of course, mean to imply any doubt of the veracity of his noble Friend, but he trusted that his noble Friend would candidly lay before the House the whole of the facts with regard to the state of those vessels, and that he would, at the same time, inform them whether there was any fair ground for casting these serious imputations on the contractors. His (Sir John Pakington's) attention was called to the state of those gunboats in the year 1858; and he, in consequence, felt it his duty to subject to an inspection the boats hauled up on the slips at Haslar. It was then found that a certain amount of the elm planking had decayed; but the decay did not appear to extend any further. The Admiralty gave orders to have the defects made good, and we had every reason to suppose that these vessels had been placed in a sound condition. But they were now told that instead of a few decayed elm planks the whole framework of those vessels was rotten; and within the last few days it had been stated in the newspapers that four of Her Majesty's mortar vessels had been recently examined and found so thoroughly rotten that the Admiralty had no choice but to break them up. That was not, however, the worst part of the case. They were informed, through the same channels, that the workmanship of those vessels was very defective; and he was sorry to have to add that there were charges of what must be called dishonest work—charges to the effect that the bolting of the vessels had been such that they could not go to sea with safety. These were most serious statements, and the time had come when they ought to know what were the real facts of the case. He had not, as far as he was at present informed, the slightest intention of imputing any blame to the Board of Admiralty of the period when the vessels were built; nor, indeed, had he any information which would justify him in imputing any serious blame to the contractors. Great allowance must be made for the haste with which those vessels were necessarily constructed. The contracts were taken up by houses of undoubted reputation, and there appeared to have been no suspicion at the time that they had not been faithfully carried out. But the statement which had recently been made deeply affected the public service, and had an important bearing upon the question how far they could resort to the contract system in the building of ships for the Royal Navy without endangering the public interests. Under these circumstances it was only fair to the contractors that the whole truth should be made known. He begged, therefore, to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what is the real extent of injury by decay which has been discovered in Her Majesty's mortar vessels and gunboats; whether it is true that improper workmanship and fastenings have also been discovered; and what steps the Board of Admiralty have taken, or intend to take, in consequence of the present state of those vessels?

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: Before the noble Lord answers the Questions, it will be only fair if he would state whether it is true that any officers connected with the Royal Dockyards from time to time visited, superintended, and gave their opinion as to the efficiency of these vessels.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: Sir, I need scarcely say that I will follow the advice of my right hon. Friend opposite, and state the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, with regard to these gunboats, as far as it is known to us at the Admiralty. The first duty I have to discharge upon this occasion is to allay the anxiety which has been created by the apprehension that the whole of the gunboats and mortar-boats now in the Royal Navy are rotten and unfit for sea. Up to the present time we have evidence that a certain number have been more or less decayed, and measures either have been taken or are being taken for their repair. I will state the number of those which have been repaired; but I am not at present able to give the House a correct Estimate of the cost of the repairs, because the accounts have not yet been sent in. The noble Lord the Member for Cockermouth (Lord Naas) has, however, moved for a Return which will show the expense of building each of these contract gunboats, and the expense of repairing them, which will give a fair idea of the decay that has taken place in them. It must be remembered that when ship-builders were invited to enter into contracts for the construction of those gunboats and mortar-vessels the country was very anxious that they should be ready for the campaign which was to open in the ensuing spring; and it is only fair to the contractors that I should state that some of them candidly and distinctly informed the Admiralty that they had no seasoned timber on hand, and that no seasoned timber could then be procured. I have myself seen a letter addressed to one of them, in which the Admiralty, after they had learnt from him that he had no seasoned timber, desired him to go on building with that which he had. So that, as regards the timber, I am bound to observe that, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, there is a great deal to be said on behalf of the contractors. But when we come to the question of short bolts,

Sir John Pakington

I must say that that is a fraud of a most abominable nature, inasmuch as it is manifest that a vessel fastened in that manner going to sea and meeting with bad weather might go to the bottom with all her crew. The House will easily understand, therefore, that the Admiralty make a great distinction between those two defects, of unseasoned timber and short bolts; and I have to state that we are now taking legal advice for the purpose of ascertaining whether it would be desirable that we should take further proceedings in respect to this case of defective bolting. I will now proceed to inform the House what is the number of boats that have been repaired, and what is their present state. Besides a great number of those boats which are now on foreign service we have in the yards twenty-three that were found in a partial state of decay, and that have since been completely repaired, and are now perfectly efficient; and we have now six boats in hand. There remain to be examined sixteen of those hauled up on Haslar slip; the condition of which has not been ascertained. There are forty in the steam reserve. We have no reason to suppose that those forty which are afloat show any serious signs of decay; but I cannot positively state to the House whether or not they will require repairs. I do not think that is a matter which need alarm the public any more than the condition of the sixteen which have not yet been examined on the Haslar slip, but which may be found defective. With regard, however, to those that are afloat, I am rather more hopeful that they will not require such extensive repairs as some persons seem to suppose. With regard to the mortar-vessels, undoubtedly those which have been examined have been found extremely defective. The right hon. Baronet is quite correct in stating that two of those at Chatham have been broken up, in consequence of their timber and planks having been found one mass of decay. But with regard to two others which I find it stated in the newspapers to-day are in a similar condition, we have not yet received any report at the Admiralty. I should state also that some of the boats built in the Government yards have been found defective and that eleven of them also have had to undergo considerable repairs. I now wish to say a few words with respect to the question of inspection. Undoubtedly it is advisable that there should be a very careful inspection by Admiralty officers of all vessels that are being built by contract, and as a general rule the Admiralty always appoint a superior officer, who acts as an inspector in every yard where those vessels are being constructed. One officer, however, does the duty of inspector in a yard where several vessels are built, and hence it is that it is desirable on the score of economy that we should have as many vessels as possible constructed in one yard. We have at this moment twenty-four vessels being built by contract and we have seventeen inspectors attached to the yards in which the works are carried on; but as there are two or more vessels being constructed in some of the yards there is none of them without a Government inspector. This question of inspection, however, is one involved in some difficulty. Private shipbuilders are usually only invited at some period of public emergency to contract for the supply of vessels for the Royal Navy, and at such a time we are at full work in the Royal dockyards, where men are employed during extra hours and on task jobs; and it then becomes a matter of great importance that in the dockyards themselves the most vigilant superintendence should be exercised by the inspectors. The consequence is that it is more than usually difficult at such times to find inspectors for overlooking the work done in private establishments. We are at this moment, however, most careful that an efficient system of supervision should take place with regard to all vessels being built by contract; and we have a variety of checks against abuses in that matter. We have not only an inspector in each yard, but we send down officers periodically to examine and to report how the work is being performed; and the vessels afterwards undergo a survey when they are delivered up to the Admiralty; and this they have to go through before the contractors receive the certificate that entitles them to payment. We thus take every possible precaution against bad workmanship and bad material. While I am upon this subject I will appeal to my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Chatham (Sir F. Smith) whether he does not think that the Admiralty have shown great anxiety to arrive at the truth in those cases in which we had any reason to suspect that fraud had been practised by contractors.

The only other Question I have to answer is that which has been put to me by the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of Dublin, with regard to the position of surgeons in the navy. I have to inform the hon. Baronet that surgeons are now about to receive a new uniform of a more ornamental character than their present dress. The reasons for the delay which has taken place in that matter are that we have felt it necessary that all the non-executive officers in a ship should have a uniform distinct from that of the executive officers, and that we did not wish to decide what should be the uniform of the first of these classes until the House of Commons had agreed to grant the sums necessary for improving their general condition, which has now been accomplished. With regard to cabins, I cannot hold out the least hope that the Admiralty will give the surgeons a better class. We are anxious that proper cabins should be provided for surgeons, and also for the assistant-surgeons, but we cannot place them in the same position in that case as captains. My right hon. Friend opposite has stated that, according to the information which he received, a cabin was refused to an assistant surgeon on board the Queen, while that accommodation was afforded to the bandmaster and other inferior officers. Captain Hillyard, however, who commands that vessel, has informed me that he gave every cabin he could for the use of the assistant-surgeons, and that at last one of them wished to turn him out of his own steward's berth, as it was called. He refused to accede to that demand, and that is the only foundation for the story to which my right hon. Friend has alluded.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Are we to understand that it is the intention of the Admiralty to prosecute contractors in all cases in which there are reasonable grounds for suspecting them of fraud?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: We are taking legal opinions for the purpose of ascertaining how far we have the power of instituting such proceedings.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, it must be satisfactory to know that the contractors who built the gunboats had frankly told the Government they could not procure any but unseasoned timber. The question then arose whether the Government were to blame for accepting the unseasoned timber. For his own part, he acquitted them of all blame. Considering the emergency that had arisen, they were perfectly right in accepting unseasoned timber when they could not get seasoned timber, though it was no doubt a pity they had not exercised the foresight of getting the right sort of timber beforehand. But he should like to learn from the noble Lord who were the contractors who employed short bolts, and who had thus shown themselves ready to expose the lives of every man on board their ships to the most imminent peril. He wished to know who it was that had resorted to that fraud in building the Caroline gunboat. The name of such a man ought to be made known to that House, and he was sure they would all feel that no punishment could be half severe enough for men who would so risk the lives of British officers and British seamen. He wanted to know their names that very night, that the House might judge of their conduct. He should like to know also who were the inspectors; whether there were any, and who appointed them. Why had the Admiralty not sent and examined every one of the gunboats one by one? Why had not the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty, who it was understood was to do wonders with the navy, ascertained the actual state of the sixteen boats at the Haslar slip? He said that he "hoped" things were not so bad as had been supposed. Why, good God Almighty! he ought to know whether it was so or not. We had plenty of men at Portsmouth and Plymouth, and if not, let us send down a junior Lord of the Admiralty to see that the inspectors do their duty. There ought, at all events, to be a regular system of inspection. But there was another point to which he wished to revert. The gunboats built by contractors were not the only boats which were complained of; the Government had built a certain number of boats under the direction of their own officers, and in their own yards. Had those boats been satisfactorily constructed or not? It was well known that they were as bad as bad could be. The nation ought not to be trifled with any longer, and he hoped that the contractors, whoever they might be, and the persons under whose directions the inferior gunboats built in the Government yards were constructed, ought to be brought to book. The inquiry would be a very difficult one. Would they get those who built the boats to speak the truth, and say what sort of timber these boats were really built of? At all events, no one could doubt that there ought to be an inquiry, and that it ought to be a very searching one. The noble Lord says he will speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth:—but will others do it? If a Commission was appointed to investigate the matter, he hoped they would not be contented with the mere statement of witnesses before them, but that they would go down and personally inspect every one of the defective gunboats. We were spending millions of money annually on the navy, and it was really disgraceful to find that the work was so deficient as it had turned out to be. Why, he was told that the stern of the Princess Royal, the very vessel which his noble and gallant Friend (Lord C. Paget) himself commanded, had been recently taken to pieces, and had been found to have been originally constructed of very unsound timber. Every one of the line-of-battle ships which were now being converted from sailing vessels into screw steam-ships were being converted, as he was informed, with green and unseasoned timber. It was all very well for the Admiralty to say that they had no seasoned timber. His simple reply to that was the inquiry—Why had they not? They have had plenty of money for it. His hon. Friend on the opposite side (Mr. Bentinck) had pointed out to the House that there was not a sufficient quantity of well-seasoned timber for two years kept in the dockyards? Why was that? Surely it could not be said that they had not money enough voted by Parliament. If they were converting all our ships of war into screw steamers with unseasoned timber, as he was informed they were, no sooner should we have finished the conversion of them than we should have to begin again with the first and repair them. He could tell the House that as long as such carelessness was suffered in the mode of doing the work, it would be quite a delusion to suppose that our Naval Estimates would ever be reduced. He did not say that it was not necessary to convert the line-of-battle ships to steamers; on the contrary, it was absolutely necessary, for, in the present juncture of affairs, and when the whole system of naval warfare had undergone a change consequent upon the introduction of steam, it became more than ever necessary that we should use every available means which science afforded to strengthen our navy, and place it in such a condition that we should maintain our naval supremacy. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, the other night, said, that the state of Europe was such as to make the boldest man quake and the wisest men tremble. He was neither the boldest or the wisest man, yet he both quaked and trembled, and therefore it was that he was most anxious to take every opportunity of warning the Government of the danger we incurred in neglecting the navy. He hoped the hon. Member would insist either on a Committee or a Commission.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE said, that some of the gunboats which were inspected at Haslar slip were quite rotten, and in an absolutely dangerous condition.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: What I said was, some of them required very small repairs.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE could only say, that two years ago when he happened to be at Haslar, and examined the gunboats, he poked the end of his umbrella through the bottom of some of them, and he could not well understand how they could require very small repairs after that. The noble Lord would probably bear in mind that, not only a great many Members of Parliament, but a great many officers and naval authorities were entirely against the system of hauling up vessels on dry slips and exposing them to all the influences of the weather. He believed that the best thing in the world for ships was to keep them afloat, and he should be very glad to see a comparison instituted between those that were kept afloat and those that were laid up in reserve. There was no doubt that a great deal of the decay was owing to the boats having been originally built of unsound timber; and he thought himself, that so far as the Royal Arsenal went, they should supply seasoned timber to the builders, and for that purpose keep a good supply themselves. It had been mentioned that two of the mortar boats at Chatham were so rotten that it was very doubtful indeed whether they ought to be repaired or not. He hoped that the Admiralty would not throw good money after bad, but that if the boats were found to be very defective they would be broken up at once.

MR. BENTINCK said, that his hon. and gallant Friend had made a statement that he could not possibly believe to be correct—that the Admiralty, from want of seasoned timber, had been compelled to convert line-of-battle ships with unseasoned timber. They really ought to hear whether there was any foundation for that statement or not. He could not himself believe that such had been the case; but the statement was one of such importance, and was calculated to create so much alarm throughout the country, that they ought to have a full, fair, and satisfactory explanation upon the matter. A great deal had been said with respect to the condition of the gunboats at Haslar. It was stated, two years ago, that the rotten state of these vessels was owing to their being hauled up on slips and kept dry, instead of being kept afloat. Why there was no carpenter's boy commonly conversant with the subject, who could not have told them what the result would be. The simple fact was, that ships which were hauled up invariably became rotten. No less than seventy gunboats had been hauled up into a position in which they could not be got at, and the cost of the operation was £70,000. Everybody who knew anything about the matter, knew that they must rot; and he had no doubt whatever that when they came to be examined, the sixteen remaining gunboats would be found to be in the same state. No doubt a system of inspection was very good; but it required the closest and constant observation on the part of the inspectors, to detect frauds of the description which had been adverted to on the present occasion. Short bolts might be put in without the knowledge of the contractor himself; and it was very easy for a shipwright to cut the bolt in two, put in the two heads, and clinch them. It might be done in five minutes, when the inspector's back was turned; and therefore it would be necessary that the inspector should see every one put in. The rot in timber, after it had begun, showed itself in a moment; but it was impossible to say that timber was in a perfectly sound state, and would not rot, without examining it in the heart of the wood, in which the rot commenced and extended outwards. He had seen a vessel which appeared perfectly sound, and when the wood was opened no unsoundness appeared for several weeks. As, however, the wood dried by exposure to the atmosphere, the rot in the heart of the wood became perceptible. It was impossible that any system could prevent the occurrence of rot to the frame of vessels; but he believed it was false economy not to have a sufficient number of inspectors to watch every large vessel during the whole time it was being built.

COSTS OF PROSECUTIONS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HOWES said, he rose to call attention to the Report of the Commission on the Costs of Prosecutions; and to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill, or take any other steps, in relation to the subject of the said Report? In the year 1851 powers were given to the Home Secretary to promulgate new forms for the allowance of these costs, and that power had been exercised so stringently that, though theoretically the cost of prosecutions were defrayed by the Treasury, in fact at least 16 per cent fell on the counties. The Treasury had also assumed the power of defining the items of which the costs of prosecutions should consist. This led to a constant antagonism between the counties and the Treasury, to say nothing of a large amount of delay and uncertainty.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the subject had been under the careful consideration of the Home Office and the Treasury; but, as yet no conclusion had been arrived at, and he was unable, therefore, at present to promise any Bill on the subject.

MORTAR VESSELS AND GUNBOATS.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH, reverting to the matter of the gunboats, said, he certainly could not yield to the appeal made to him by the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty, not to press his Motion for a Select Committee to inquire into this subject. All that had fallen from the noble Lord and other Members made him more anxious that this Committee should be appointed. He had no desire to attach blame to anybody—it was in perfect ignorance as to where the blame lay that he wished for an inquiry. It might be with the Government—though he did not believe it; it might be with the contractors, or it might be with the inspectors; but the House ought to know who was to blame. No doubt there was a great deficiency of seasoned timber, and he quite agreed with the gallant Officer opposite that on an emergency it was better to have gunboats built of unseasoned timber than no gunboats at all; but the House ought to know what sort of designs had been given out; whether proper specifications had been drawn up; whether they had been complied with; whether the terms of the contract would inflict penalties on the contractors for their shortcomings, and whether the inspectors had done their duty. He believed that the whole matter hinged on this question of inspection. The Admiralty might say that it was difficult to get inspectors; but they might be got if they were properly paid. The Secretary of the Admiralty, he had no doubt, would do his best to probe the matter to the bottom; but everybody who knew what a public department was would acknowledge that a Committee of the House of Commons could perform the duty much more effectually. The Government should ascertain where the fault lay, and should then visit the real offenders. They ought to find out the inspectors by whom these vessels were passed, and take steps to punish them if they deserve it.

MR. WHITBREAD was understood to say that the Admiralty had no objection to furnish a return of the cost of the gunboats, but it was right that the House should know the exact position of this question. The Admiralty had referred the matter to their legal advisers. There was not the least intention on their part to screen any contractor who had been guilty of these practices complained of; but the question which remained for the decision of their legal advisers was whether, having had inspectors to overlook the construction, and having received these vessels, they now had the power to institute legal proceedings against the contractors. It would be singular to have legal proceedings going forward and a Committee sitting at the same time; and the course he would suggest, therefore, was that the subject should be deferred until that day week to ascertain the exact position in which the Admiralty stood. They would then be able to acquaint the House whether they intended to take legal proceedings, and, if not, it would of course be in the power of the House to appoint a Committee if it thought fit to do so. The same answer applied to the proposal of the gallant Admiral, that the names of the contractors should be published. Pending legal proceedings it was not right to do so; but hereafter, if the House thought it necessary that the names of these contractors should be given, it would be in their power to call for them. As to the best mode of keeping gunboats, whether afloat or hauled up high and dry, it was not yet settled by the authorities which of the two modes was the better. Recently a gunboat which had been kept afloat for a number of years was examined and found to be as defective as any of those which were kept ashore. As to the question respecting the timber in the Government yards, he was not aware that there was any foundation for the statement that the Government were now using unseasoned timber there.

MR. WARRE said, that as soon as this discussion went forth to the world every one who had had a contract for the construction of these gunboats would more or less become an object of observation or suspicion. It would therefore be only right that the Admiralty should publish as soon as possible a list of vessels which had been honestly and truly built. While proceedings were taken against the guilty it was due to those with whose vessels no fault had been found that their conduct should be vindicated. The iniquity of driving these short bolts could not be portrayed in too strong characters. In his opinion it was an offence little short of wilful murder to send a ship to sea so constructed that she would probably go to pieces, and it displayed an amount of wickedness for which no punishment that the law could inflict would be too great. With regard to harbours of refuge, he wished to express his earnest hope that the question would be seriously entertained by the Government. The expenditure necessary might be spread over a series of years; but no one could hear of the casualties which took place every year on the shores of the United Kingdom, so many of which casualties might be averted if there were a harbour to run to, without feeling that the question was one of national importance. The four harbours most strongly recommended by the Commission on this subject were one on the north coast of Scotland, another on the east coast of England, a third on the north coast of Cornwall, and a fourth on the west coast of Ireland. Others might be wanted, but as everything could not be done at once the Government might take these four first, and it would be well to set about them immediately.

THE FOREIGN OFFICE.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he would beg to ask the Chief Commissioner of Works, Whether it is true that it is in contemplation to expend between £20,000 and £30,000 on temporary buildings for the Foreign Office at or near to No. 8, Spring Gardens, and whether the Clerk of the Parliaments has in consequence received notice to quit that house; also, whether it is the intention of the Chief Commissioner to carry out the proposal announced by Lord John Manners when

Chief Commissioner of Works—namely, to cause the plan of the architect and the estimates for the re-building of the Foreign Office to be exhibited in the Library, for the inspection of Members of the House of Commons, before any proceeding is taken or any money is expended? He protested against any expenditure under this head being reserved for No. 7 set of Votes, for he believed that had the vote for cleansing the Serpentine been proposed earlier in the Session the House would never have sanctioned it. It would be remembered that Mr. Gilbert Scott had been selected as the Gothic architect for the construction of a new Foreign Office. The noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) had pronounced strongly against the Gothic style, but Mr. Scott had, nevertheless, he believed, been continued as architect. Under these circumstances he thought the House ought to have an opportunity of seeing what was proposed to be done before any money was laid out.

MR. COWPER said, that some temporary accommodation must be found for the Foreign Departments during the time occupied in pulling down the existing Foreign Office and building up the new one; and a plan was under consideration by which the house occupied by the Clerk of the Parliaments would be used in conjunction with other houses for that purpose. Information on the subject had been communicated to the Clerk of the Parliaments but beyond that step nothing had as yet been decided. He could not think that a charge of this sort should be put into No. 1 Miscellaneous Estimates, instead of into No. 7. The ordinary expenditure that occurred every year was put in No. 1, and the things that would not occur again were put in another Estimate, in order that the two classes of expenditure might be separately considered. With respect to the style of architecture to be adopted for the new Foreign Office, he would remind the hon. Gentleman, that in the debate of last year the First Lord of the Treasury told the House, that before requiring any sum to be voted he would take care that the plan of the proposed building and the Estimates should be submitted to the House; and it was unnecessary to say that that promise would be fulfilled. He would rather not enter into any statement respecting the precise sum requisite to make the temporary buildings suitable for the purposes intended, because it must necessarily be a rough estimate.

COLLISIONS AT SEA.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the state of the Law with regard to Collisions at Sea, so far as Foreign Vessels are concerned, and to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to urge on the Governments of other Countries the expediency of establishing some international rule for assimilating the liability of Ship-owners in cases of Collision, at home and abroad. The subject was one of great importance to the mercantile marine of this country, especially now that our foreign trade was increasing so rapidly. The question involved principles of international law, and was one on which there was great diversity among the different systems of law recognized by the principal commercial nations of Europe, as well as the United States. By the law of France if a vessel belonging to that country damaged one belonging to another nation, the owner, by abandoning his ship, might save himself from further consequences. A similar rule prevailed in Holland, Sardinia, and other countries of Europe; while the law of the United States of America bore more analogy to that of England. The liability of the British shipowner was fixed and defined by the Merchant Shipping Act; but, while that liability was limited in the case of collision between two British vessels, the limitation did not apply when a collision took place between a British ship and a foreign ship. It was only just that all parties should be placed upon the same footing, and therefore he felt it to be his duty to call the attention of the Government to the subject. He trusted the Government would see the necessity of coming to some international arrangement upon the subject, with which an Act of Parliament was necessarily incompetent to deal.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that communications had already passed between the Board of Trade and the Foreign Office in reference to the subject to which the hon. and learned Gentleman had called attention. The Government were quite alive to the importance of this proposal, and were very desirous that some international arrangement should be entered into for assimilating the laws of the different countries, so that a British ship in a foreign country might receive a similar treatment in that country to a ship of that country.

and that we should in turn reciprocate that protection to ships of other countries. It was desirable, in fact, that some arrangement should be made by which each country would give national treatment to the ships of the other. That matter was under consideration by the Foreign Office, and so far as the Board of Trade was concerned, they would give their best attention to it.

He would also beg to reply to a question of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay), who had inquired whether the Government intended to introduce a measure to carry into effect the recommendations of the Harbours of Refuge Commission. Of course there could be no difference of opinion respecting the desirableness of having harbours of refuge upon the coasts of this country, and especially upon the eastern coast, which was passed by a much greater number of merchant vessels, because every one must be struck with the loss of life and property that annually took place at sea. The question was, as regarded harbours of refuge, from what source were the necessary funds to be obtained? The Royal Commission and the Committee of the House were not of the same opinion as to the source from which the funds were to be derived. The Committee considered that a portion of the expenditure should be derived from tolls levied on merchant vessels passing those harbours. The Commission recommended that the expenditure should be met by Votes in Parliament, and by the expenditure of the public money. He did not find on inquiry that the shipowners and insurers valued those harbours of refuge sufficiently to be willing to take upon themselves any considerable portion of the charge; and with regard to a large expenditure of public money, it was a matter on which he was not at liberty to speak; it was a question for the consideration of the Treasury, rather than for the Department with which he was connected. The Government were fully impressed with the importance of these harbours of refuge; but no decision had been come to as to whether any plan could be laid before Parliament with the view of carrying out that part of the recommendation of the Commissioners. With regard to the question as to whether the Government were ready to do anything to facilitate the construction of harbours of refuge, and the improvement of such harbours as now exist, he begged to say, that instructions had been given to prepare a Bill to effect that object; and when the state of public business would permit he should state the provisions of that measure to the House. It was a Bill that he thought would materially assist the object in view, though certainly it would not go to the full extent of all the recommendations of the Commissioners. It was proposed to introduce a provision to give facilities for obtaining powers to make improvements without the necessity in each particular case of parties incurring the expense of coming to the House for a special Act of Parliament. The Government were quite alive to the importance of the whole question, and the hon. Member for Sunderland would admit with him that it was a matter that could not be undertaken without more consideration, involving, as it would, a large grant of public money.

FRENCH FORTIFICATIONS AT ST. PIERRE.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HALIBURTON said, pursuant to notice, he rose to call the attention of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the state of the French Fortifications at St. Pierre. He said it would be in the recollection of the noble Lord that he (Mr. Haliburton) stated on a former occasion that there were two small islands in the Straits of Belleisle, lying between Newfoundland and the Labrador coast, which having been taken from the French had been restored by treaty with certain fisheries annexed thereto; upon the conditions expressed in the treaty of 1763 they were to erect no buildings but for fishery purposes, were to keep only 50 soldiers for purposes of police, and, above all, were to erect no fortifications. Fortifications had, however, been erected there; and on the former occasion he asked whether his Lordship's attention had been called to that fact, and whether any steps had been taken, either by application from the Governor of Newfoundland or from the Government of this country, to the French Government, to restrain the erection of fortifications at St. Pierre. Unless some step of the kind were taken, in the event of a war these fortifications would be found extremely inconvenient. The island was so situated as to command the whole of the navigation of the Straits of Belleisle and the coast of Labrador; and a cruiser there might at any time intercept the navigation of the St. Lawrence. He had reason to know that in violation of the treaty a French squadron was kept there, and that the place had been converted from a fishing into a naval station. There were several French men-of-war there; he had himself seen those ships at Cape Breton, where they affected to wait for the mails, and whence they took back large quantities of coal to St. Pierre, in the meantime taking charts and soundings of all the coast. They had at the present moment 30,000 sailors there. It was really a matter of deep importance, because the island in question was out of the way. There was no human being to resort to it but those French fishermen and those men-of-war. It had no value except for its political importance and its command of the navigation. That a French squadron was there was a fact within his own knowledge. He had himself seen two ships at a time at Cape Breton; the French flag was constantly flying in that harbour, and that of Her Majesty was to be seen on a small fortification. Many of the inhabitants of the island were Frenchmen; he had nothing to say against them; they were mild and peaceable people, and well-disposed towards Her Majesty's Government; but they were Frenchmen; France was their fatherland; they spoke the same language and were influenced by the unity which was promoted by a common form of religion; they were, in fact, dangerous neighbours to have in that peculiar locality. The answer which the noble Lord gave him arose, he thought, from a misconception of what he had stated. His question applied to fortifications; the answer of the noble Lord was that certain questions had been referred to the law officers relative to the erection of certain buildings on the island in question. He (Mr. Haliburton) did not complain of the erection of any buildings; it was the setting up of batteries and guns, it was the making it a very dangerous point of which he complained. The few English fishermen who had at times frequented the place, seeing those batteries and asking the meaning of them, were told with a shrug, "Oh, this is the morning gun battery, and that is the evening gun battery; and they have been placed there by the Emperor." They make no secret of it at all. It did not become him to question any opinion that might be given by men so distinguished as the law officers of the Crown, but he might be permitted to question the form in which the proposition had been laid before them. In this country it was most difficult to obtain minute information of distant places like that to which he was now referring. Our colonial Governors did not send the minute information that was communicated to the French and American Governments by their officers. He had, therefore, been obliged to send to Washington for a document deposited in the Treasury Department there in order to obtain information which he could not procure in this country. That document he had received, and he certainly regarded it as a very extraordinary thing that more minute and reliable information could be obtained with reference to British North America from Washington than could be found in England. The person by whom the document was written was appointed by the American Government Consul-General for all British North America. Clothed with that authority he went to the Colonies, and was everywhere received with respect and cordiality. The Custom House Offices were thrown open to him; he visited every port and every headland and creek along the coast, and reported everything with great minuteness to the Secretary of the Treasury at Washington. The Report extended to about 1,000 pages, and was full of valuable information, both with respect to the fishing grounds and to the commerce of the country. It was just such a Report as our Colonial Governors should be compelled to send to this country. To his surprise he found in the document drawn up by this official—Mr. Andrews—the copy of a Report of a Committee of the National Assembly of France on the deep-sea fisheries, in which they had a French opinion of that question, expressed by the Minister of Commerce and Marine. In this Report there occurred the following passage:—

“There was a time when France possessed all the principal fishing grounds in Nova Scotia, Cape Breton, Prince Edward’s Island, and Newfoundland. But the treaties of 1713, of 1763, of 1783, and finally of 1814, had reduced our possessions in those quarters to the two islets of St. Pierre and Miquilon—that is to say, to two sterile rocks—destitute of all resources, and on which we are forbidden to raise any fortifications. These treaties reserve to us the right of fishing along the coast of Newfoundland, but only at determined points and distances. We are only permitted to establish ourselves on the northern part of Newfoundland during a few months of the year, without constructing any permanent habitations. The country is uncultivated and savage.”

It would scarcely be credited after this that, instead of limiting themselves to the permissive rights belonging to them under the treaties, the French had assumed an arrogant demeanour towards the rest of the inhabitants, that they were laying claim to a great part of Newfoundland, and that they were driving out the inhabitants, the descendants of Irish families, who were obliged to quit their houses or have them burnt about their ears. They had presumed actually to hold courts-martial upon English fishermen, punishing them by taking away their nets, and committing other irregularities. In a letter which he had received from Cape Breton he was informed that fishing vessels putting into the harbour under stress of weather were fired on by the French and driven out to sea in a severe storm—fired on, it would be observed, from our own territory. This was a matter of the deepest importance. There were no fewer than 30,000 sailors there belonging to France, and, as there were 90,000 sailors inscribed on the books of France, it followed that one-third of the men from which the French navy could be manned were to be found in that distant territory. On this report of the French Minister, Mr. Andrews observed:—

“It will be seen that the cod caught and dried by the French will be introduced into the principal markets of the United States, with a bounty of two dollars per quintal, which is nearly equal to the value of our own fish. It must not be overlooked either that besides this excessive bounty on fish there is another of ten dollars for every man engaged in the fisheries, and a further bounty of 20f. per quintal metrique on cod oil, and an almost total exemption of duty on their salt.”

The views he had formerly expressed to the House on this subject had been published in the Colonies, and he had received many letters thanking him for bringing it under the notice of Parliament and of the Government, and begging him to press it still further upon their attention. Mr. Andrews passed a high eulogy upon the sailors of British North America, which, as it might be gratifying to the noble Lord and furnish useful hints in their future legislation for the Colonies, he should like to read to the House. He had himself lived on the borders of the great Republic, without, however, acquiring the disposition of its citizens to boast, of which disposition he wished to leave those gentlemen in exclusive possession. Mr. Andrews said:—

“England possesses no nursery for seamen at all equal to her North American colonial trade. Besides training her own hardy sons to the dangers and hardships of the sea, that trade fosters and raises up from among her active, well built, enduring, and intelligent subjects in the northern colonies as fine seamen as ever trod a deck, afraid of no danger, and perfectly fitted to sustain any reasonable amount of cold, hardship, and fatigue. The vigour of their frames, their sound constitutions, and the habit of facing severe cold, violent gales, and stormy seas in a high northern latitude, aided by quick perceptions and ready intelligence, eminently qualify them to navigate her ships to any quarter of the world, either to uphold the honour of their country in fighting her battles upon the seas, or, better still, to extend and enlarge her commerce to every part of the habitable globe. To her colonial seamen England may well look with honest pride."

It was natural that a citizen of the United States should put himself at the head of all creation. They said that "The English whipped all the world, and they whipped the English." So Mr. Andrews went on:—

"Save our own citizens they have few equals, and none others are their superiors. Whether in war or in peace these British North American sailors, cradled on a stormy deep," &c.

The rest of the sentence he need not read to the House. They had heard much of the protection of the Colonies by this country. Our North American colonists were told that they were a great encumbrance and that it cost a great deal to protect them. If the Government wished to protect our Colonies, let them protect their fisheries, for they were the mainstay of these Colonies. People at home had talked so much of protecting the Colonies that, like other people who told marvellous stories, they began to believe it themselves. It was an amiable delusion; but let them, at all events, protect the North American fisheries. He trusted that the noble Lord would not allow the French, contrary to the stipulations of treaties, to erect fortifications at St. Pierre, when the people of the Colonies, at a great expenditure of blood and treasure, would try to drive them out; and drive them out they certainly would. He also wished to ask the noble Lord whether there would be any objection to lay upon the Table of the House Copies of all Questions submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown with regard to the French Fortifications of St. Pierre?

LORD LOVAINE asked whether the noble Lord could state the general position of the negotiations relative to the Fisheries Convention of Newfoundland?

CASE OF MR. SPITZ-GOLDSTEIN.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. ROEBUCK, in rising to call the attention of the House to the case of Mr.

Spitz-Goldstein, said that during the Indian outbreak the English Government and the East India Company bought some horses in Candia. They treated with various persons for this purpose, and the British Consul at Aleppo, Mr. Skene, applied to Mr. Spitz-Goldstein, a Turkish subject, to buy some horses and camels for service in India, at the same time acknowledging the services he had rendered to the Allied Army in the Black Sea. Mr. Spitz-Goldstein accepted the offer, and on the 8th of June, 1858, Mr. Skene wrote to say he was glad he had undertaken the affair and that the matter might now be considered as settled. Mr. Spitz-Goldstein accordingly bought a number of camels and horses. A change of Government at home meanwhile took place, and while he was waiting for the officers to come and receive the animals he was told that the whole matter was referred from Aleppo to Bagdad, that he had no claim upon the British Government, and that the British Consul had transcended his powers. Now, he wished to know whether the Government were prepared to stand upon their power as a Government and do nothing for Mr. Spitz-Goldstein, or whether they would consent to refer the matter to arbitration, and say what claim, if any, this gentleman had upon the Government. Mr. Spitz-Goldstein was a Turkish subject, unsupported by powerful connections, and the Government had the power to be unjust, but he appealed to the noble Lord to submit the matter to arbitration. He wished therefore to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will consent to submit that case to the decision of an arbitrator to be chosen by the Government?

FORAGE CONTRACT IN IRELAND.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to the case of the Contractors for the supply of Forage to the Troops quartered in the counties of Dublin and Kildare. The case of these contractors was one of great hardship and severity. In the month of May, 1859, those contractors entered into an engagement to supply the horses of the troops with hay at £3 10s. per ton, which seemed at that time a fair price, the usual price of hay in Ireland averaging from £2 10s. per ton to £3 10s.; but in consequence of the unfavourable state of the weather during the summer of 1859 the price of hay in Ireland rose to £5 or £6 per ton, and in November last it reached the extraordinary price of £7 10s. The contractors went on supplying the troops at a daily loss of £70, and they had actually lost by the contract no less a sum than £9,000. He was fully aware of the danger which might result from not compelling persons to stand by their contracts, and if this were an ordinary case, he should not have asked the Government to do anything in the matter. He found that in the year 1846 the Government did compensate certain contractors for losses which they unavoidably sustained. The present case was one which could not be construed into a precedent. If the Government enforced the contract strictly, it would inevitably ruin these contractors. He trusted he had shown that the circumstances of this case were not of an ordinary nature. The contractors might have thrown up the contract, as the bonds were not actually signed, but they preferred executing it and trusting to the mercy of Her Majesty's Government to compensate them for the great loss which they would sustain, and they followed that course the more freely as they had been given to understand by the Commissary-General that their case would be taken into consideration.

THE REFORM BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. EDWIN JAMES : Sir, there is a feeling in the country that there is no sincere desire on the part of the Government to proceed with the Bill for the Amendment of the Representation of the People ; and I do not wonder at it, for appearances are certainly a little against them. Parliament met on the 24th of January, and I think as early as the 25th the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) and myself, both suggested to the Government that any delay in the introduction of the Reform Bill might be subject to misconstruction. The noble Lord the Member for the City of London then announced that he would introduce the Bill on the 20th of February. He was again asked on both sides of the House on the subject ; and then he said he would postpone the Bill from the 20th of February to the 1st of March, which he said was an auspicious day for the introduction of such a measure. The Bill was introduced by the noble Lord on the 1st of March, in a speech which did not give him much trouble to make :—indeed, it could not well have been otherwise, for there was not much to say upon the Bill on the table. The noble Lord made a short and able statement—not a longer statement than it would take a country gentleman to make in introducing a Bill for the diversion of a footpath. The second reading was agreed to on the 3rd of May, and the Committee on the Bill is postponed to the 4th of June ; and yet we find that Her Majesty's Government are constantly bringing in Bills to which this great and important question is to give place. We find the Highways Bill constantly set down among the Orders of the Day, and the repeal of Sir John Barnard's Act constantly taking the place of this great measure—we find a Bill called in mockery the City of London Corporation Reform Bill, which is an official curiosity—we find all these Bills taking the place of the Bill introduced by Her Majesty's Government for reforming the representation of the people. I think, therefore, I am justified in asking the noble Lord whether he sincerely means to proceed with the Bill in Committee on the 4th of June, in order that Members may be able to apply themselves to the details of the Bill, so as to make it a great measure worthy of the House and the country. I beg to put the following question to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs :—Whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed continuously with the Reform Bill, the consideration of which in Committee has been postponed till the 4th June, so as to afford to the other Branch of the Legislature the opportunity of passing into Law that Bill during the present Session ?

Mr. Pollard-Urquhart

CHABLAIS AND FAUCIGNY.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is now able to give any assurance that no French Troops will be moved into the Provinces of Chablais and Faucigny until the question of the dispositions to be adopted as to those neutralised Provinces shall be finally determined upon by diplomatic consultation and agreement ? He did not wish to make any attack upon the noble Lord, for he acknowledged the difficulty of his position, and whoever had occupied that position would have found himself surrounded by the same difficulties :—but he wished to point out that if France were allowed to occupy those provinces before any settlement took place she would not law her troops afterwards; and therefore desired the British Government to their proceedings intelligible at this of the matter. He thought it would ter for Switzerland that they should saw from the matter at once than that should be drawn into a proceeding would be delusive from the begin-

He would just remind the noble Lord M. Thouvenel had said in one of his speeches that, in case of the annexation avoy to France these provinces would ven to Switzerland, and he (Mr. Grif- only expressed the feeling of this try in the matter when he asked the e Lord whether he could give any as- sance that that arrangement would be iced out, and that France would not be wed to occupy those provinces.

THE IRISH REFORM BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he rose ask the noble Lord the Secretary for Fgn Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government will agree to introduce provisions applicable to Ireland into the Representation of the People Bill for England and Wales? He said the noble Lord ought to el indebted to the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone for giving him an opportunity of disavowing the charge of insincerity which was made, not only against the noble Lord, but generally against the House of Commons. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone had made one of the most damaging speeches against the Reform Bill which had yet been delivered. He had done a great service by calling attention to facts and figures, and he had also given notice of his intention to move the insertion of a clause which would confer the franchise upon lodgers, and the omission of the provision which made the payment of poor-rates a condition precedent to the exercise of the franchise. It was said that nobody wanted this Bill, and that if a vote by Ballot were taken upon it, only two Members would be found to support it—the noble Lord and his backer, the hon. Member for Birmingham. He wanted to know how they were sure that if it were put to the Ballot there would be two votes in favour of it at all. They were all accused of being insincere, and he confessed himself guilty of that very soft impeachment. But if there were no sincerity about passing the English Reform Bill, there was no insincerity about the Irish Reform Bill. The Chief Secretary for Ireland, in reply to a question, had stated that he would not take up the Irish Reform Bill until the English Reform Bill was passed through Committee. He, therefore, asked the noble Lord last night, whether he would postpone going into Committee on the English Reform Bill until after the second reading of the Irish Bill; or, if he would not do that, whether he would incorporate the Irish in the English Bill. The noble Lord took no notice of the second branch of this question, and as he could obtain no answer to a question put in a very quiet and modest form, he thought he was justified in using the privilege of a Friday night to draw the distinct attention of the noble Lord to it. It was not a new idea, because so long since as December last he had written to the Chief Secretary suggesting uniform legislation for the two countries, and the omission of the provision which required payment of poor-rates as a condition precedent to the enjoyment of the franchise. He knew how injuriously that provision operated in Ireland, and he believed it was found even more injurious in England. He had long been of opinion that it was better to have a bad law for Ireland incorporated in the same Bill for England than to have it exclusively applicable to Ireland, because a bad law which affected England would soon be changed, but if it only affected Ireland there was not the same certainty of a speedy alteration. The country imputed insincerity to the House of Commons, but what was the sincerity on the part of the country itself? The whole of the petitions for and against and about reform did not bear 90,000 signatures, and only 9,711 signatures were in favour of the Representation of the People Bill. The signatures in favour of the Representation of the People Bills were only two—that was to say, in favour of all the three Bills of the Government. There were only 23,670 signatures to petitions in favour of Reform from England, while there were 27,620 signatures to petitions from Ireland. He saw a right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Whiteside) shaking his very learned head at that statement, and he knew that the right hon. Gentleman meant to say that the people of Ireland cared nothing at all about Reform. Well, he was inclined to agree with the right hon. Gentleman, for he had lately visited his own constituents, and found they were very well satisfied with their present representatives; but still it appeared from their petitions that the people of Ireland cared more about Reform than the people of England. The noble Lord said yesterday that until he had consulted the Cabinet he could not tell whether there would be any Scotch or Irish Reform Bill at all, and there seemed so much uncertainty that they might perhaps safely make up their minds there would be no Irish or Scotch Bill. He did not deny that a Reform Bill was wanted; but, if there was to be legislation for England, for the reason he had given, he thought Ireland ought to be included. There were important principles in the English Bill which Irish Members had a right to discuss. The Irish Members had taken very little part in the discussions hitherto, lest it should be said, "Why do you intrude? There will be time enough for you when we come to the Irish Bill." But if the Bill was to be deferred to the Greek calends there would be no opportunity to discuss the important principle of the franchise being based on population alone, which was acknowledged in the English Bill, and was of vital interest to the Irish people. The English Bill also conferred the elective franchise upon the principle of clear yearly value or rent, whilst the Irish Bill was based upon poor law rating. Where there was a will there was always a way; and the noble Lord, if so inclined, could easily have clauses applicable to Ireland introduced into the English Bill. An hon. Member who had supplied the House with some statistics had informed them that the English Reform Bill had already occupied them seven tiresome nights, upon which about eighty speeches had been delivered, so that it might be truly said of it:—

"Seven nights, nine times nine, Did it dwindle, peak, and pine;"

and very small it had shrunk. He might continue the quotation—

"Though the Bill may not be lost, Yet it shall be tempest tost."

All kinds of complimentary epithets had been applied to the measure. It had been compared to a bread-pill, which would do neither good nor harm; and the hon. Member for Birmingham had expressed a hope that it would not prove to be like a Spanish repast, at which there was very little of meat, but a great deal of table cloth. It appeared to him (Mr. Scully) that that exactly described the character of the noble Lord's scheme. In the meantime it had stopped the way of a great deal of useful legislation. More important measures, such as the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill and the Transfer of Land Bill, which the Attorney General had fifteen times placed on the paper without finding an opportunity to proceed with it, ought not to be delayed for a Bill which no one believed would be passed in the end. India and China, too, were waiting for them, and as yet nothing had been done for Ireland. He should recommend the noble Lord to withdraw his Reform Bill, and re-introduce it in a better form next Session. Some people said that if the Bill were thrown over, then they would see what sort of a measure would be demanded. For his own part, he should like to have the country roused to demand a good Bill. He did not wish to see a repetition of the old scenes at Nottingham and Bristol, but he should be glad to see a more earnest feeling excited in the minds of the people upon this subject. The Reform Bill was started as an express train, and all the other traffic had been shunted to let it pass; but, after all, it had turned out to be a mere Parliamentary train, going at the slowest possible pace; and, therefore, the best thing that could be done would be to shunt the express and get on the useful trains, in the progress of which the country was interested. Let the noble Lord throw the blame upon that House, upon him, if he pleased; but let him cease to obstruct legislation with this measure, which no one expected would be passed.

MR. O'BRIEN rose to appeal to the Government not to go into Committee on the English Reform Bill until the Irish and Scotch Reform Bills had been considered. He ventured to ask some Member of the Government the course they meant to take with reference to each of the Reform Bills.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: The hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Mr. Haliburton) on a former occasion called my attention to the question of the fortifications at St. Pierre, and I am very sorry that the answer which I then gave was not satisfactory to him, because I can now do little more than repeat what was the substance of that answer. In the year 1856—I think in the month of January—an order was sent to the Governor of Newfoundland, directing him to inquire what were the fortifications which the French were erecting upon the island of St. Pierre. In the month of April following the Governor replied, and stated that there were fortifications commanding the entrance to the harbour—namely, a battery, mounting four 84-pound guns and two 42-pound guns, commanding the roadstead, and another battery at the entrance, commanding the south-east passage and mounting eight 42-pounders; that there was also a third battery, and a barrack capable of holding between 300 and 400 men. The whole of this Report was submitted to the law officers of the Crown, who were asked, not as to any particular fortification, but whether that state of things was conformable to the treaty or was at variance with it. The hon. and learned Gentleman has stated very truly that from 1713 to 1814, with respect to fortifications at St. Pierre, the answer of the law officers of the Crown was, that the fortifications mentioned by the Governor of Newfoundland did not amount to an infraction of those various treaties. The hon. and learned Gentleman asks me to produce the question submitted to the law officers and their answer; but to do so would be quite contrary to the rule which has always been acted upon in these cases. It is not considered right to produce the opinions given by the law officers of the Crown. I believe that practice to be founded upon very good reasons, and, therefore, I cannot comply with the request of the hon. and learned Gentleman. The subject of the fisheries is an entirely different one. The hon. and learned Gentleman states, and, I dare say, very truly, that there are 30,000 Frenchmen engaged in these fisheries. It is, as he says, the practice of France, and he might have added also of the United States of America, to give large bounties to promote their fisheries; and that is done, I believe, rather with a view to the training of a large number of seamen, than to any commercial profits which arise from the prosecution of those fisheries. That is a matter of policy with regard to trade, not relating to treaties at all, with respect to which it would not, at this moment, be convenient to enter into a discussion. Of course, the hon. and learned Gentleman can, if he thinks fit, upon some future occasion find fault with the policy according to which, some years ago, the giving of bounties was discontinued by the Government of this country.

The noble Lord opposite (Lord Lovaine) asked me a question with respect to the convention concerning the fishery off Newfoundland. That is a matter of very great importance. The negotiations have lasted a considerable time; but I hope that they are now approaching a termination. Captain Dunlop, who was sent to Paris to assist in conducting them, has returned to England, and has had an interview with my noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies. I am told that the explanations which he gave were satisfactory to the noble Duke, and that he is about to return to Paris with the hope of bringing the negotiations to a satisfactory conclusion. The opinion of the Commissioners has been that it was not necessary to have any new treaty upon the subject, but that the treaties at present existing, with proper interpretations and proper measures for carrying them into effect, would suffice for the regulation of the fisheries of the two countries. I need not, therefore, enter any further into that matter; but I hope that we shall soon be able to announce the conclusion of these negotiations.

The question of my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield will be answered by the Secretary of the Treasury, to which department the subject properly belongs.

To go on with foreign affairs, the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Darby Griffith) asked me whether we had any assurance that no French troops should be marched into the districts of Chablais and Faucigny. I think I have, upon former occasions, stated to this House that the French Government entirely refuse to enter into any engagement upon that point. They have stated that they should not send any troops into the neutralized districts of Savoy until the Vote of the Parliament of Sardinia had completed the Treaty of the 24th of March, and entitled them, as they conceive, to the possession of Savoy; but after that time they would enter into no engagement whatever. I think the hon. Gentleman is so far right that any prospect of making a difference in the arrangements after the French troops should have occupied the provinces would be very much governed by that event. I did not understand at first what it was the hon. Gentleman proposed that we should do. I did not give any assurance to the House that has not been fulfilled. I stated to the House the arrangement which the Government wished to see carried into effect; but I did not state that we felt sure of attaining our object. The hon. Member thinks we ought to withdraw from all further negotiation in the circumstances to which he refers. That is certainly a matter for very grave consideration, and I will not at present give any engagement to the House on the subject. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone has asked me a question with regard to the Reform Bill. That hon. and learned Gentleman has shown great candour in admitting that the Government have given some ground for the charge of insincerity which has been made against them. I will be equally candid with respect to his conduct. I think the hon. and learned Gentleman has given considerable ground for the impression that he is neither favourable to this Reform Bill nor willing to give it a fair consideration. The 1st of March was not a very late period of the Session for bringing forward such a measure. But the hon. and learned Member supposes we have postponed it to the Highways Bill, the London Corporation Bill, and other measures. That is a total misapprehension on his part, arising, I think, from his want of experience as to the proceedings of this House. If I had said that, instead of the Highways Bill coming on, we propose to go into Committee on the Reform Bill this evening, being a notice evening, I think the Members of this House generally, and with reason, would have said that the measure was far too important to be left to the chance of being taken at 9 or 10 o'clock at night, and that it ought to stand as the first thing for some day on which Orders of the Day have the precedence. Many measures of great importance and likewise of great urgency have been introduced into this House by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in connection with the financial arrangements of the year; and everybody knows that nothing can be more inconvenient than to have fiscal questions and matters touching duties of Customs or Excise postponed till a late day, thereby keeping all the trade of the country in suspense. Therefore it appeared to me that there was good reason for not bringing on the Reform Bill till the decision of the House had been taken on the principal portions of the Budget. To enable my right hon. Friend to proceed with those measures—one of which certainly did not progress at a very rapid rate in Committee last night—I fixed the Committee on the Reform Bill for the 4th of June. It is our intention then to bring it on. Of course, with regard to days we must be a good deal dependent on what may be the pleasure of the House, because on Notice nights, as the hon. and learned Gentleman must be aware, we cannot take the Committee on a Government Bill without the consent of those hon. Members who properly have the precedence. But as much time as to give us for sure. MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he had never thought and he had never stated that the noble Lord was insincere in that matter. What he had said was, that there was an impression in the country that the Government were not sincere in their mode of dealing with the question.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he protested against the term inconsistency being applied to his conduct. He had never charged the Bill with being revolutionary.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL had not said that the hon. and learned Gentleman had made such a charge. He by no means intended to refer to the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MEASUREMENT OF GAS.—QUESTION.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury when the Copies of Correspondence, which was moved for on the 30th March and 23rd April last, in reference to the Measurement of Gas Act, 22 & 23 Vict., c. 66, will be laid on the Table of the House, and, also, when the Models of Gasholders required by the same Act will be deposited at the Exchequer, according to promise? The officials of the Treasury, who ought to be first to give effect to the intentions of the House, seemed to direct their whole attention to the best methods of preventing the Act coming into operation. The country was in a state of doubt and uncertainty with regard to the gas measures. For instance, Sheffield had sent up some gas-meters to the Treasury with a view of having them stamped, but the parties were told that her Majesty's officers had not had time to carry out the provisions of the Act, and that there were no gasholders deposited.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: I am sorry that I should be separated by so long an interval from my questioners, but it is an accident over which I have no control. I regret not to be able to give an entirely satisfactory answer to the question of the gallant Officer opposite (Colonel Lindsay) with regard to Captain Grant's inventions. Nobody can attach greater importance to the question of cooking in the army than I do, and the Commission over which I presided gave great attention to the subject, as may be seen from the Report. Captain Grant, no doubt, has proposed a great improvement in the system, but his is only one of many inventions which have been laid before the Government as means of enabling the soldier to bake as well as boil his food with a great saving of fuel. I have not the least wish to detract from the merits of Captain Grant's apparatus; but I believe that where it has been long in use—at the London Tavern, for instance, and other places—it is not approved, and it is gradually falling into disuse. When it was first introduced into the army it was undoubtedly the best apparatus, and effected the largest economy of fuel. But it has its drawbacks. It is a large apparatus. As long as you have 500 men to cook for it cooks with great economy; but for every 100 men you have under that number the cost of fuel per man is proportionately increased. In fact, it requires always to be used at its full extent. It has also this disadvantage, that it cooks unequally; the meat which is close to the fire gets too much cooked and has to be removed, while that which is farthest off has to be brought near; and there are great complaints from the men that in shifting the pieces they get their shoes burned by standing on the hot plates, and their clothes injured by the fire. There are other apparatus at Woolwich, which have the disadvantage of being more costly and more complicated, but with which there is a great economy of fuel. The old boilers reset on Captain Galton's plan are those which effect the greatest economy of fuel. The following figures, I think, will give the House some idea of the relative economy of the different apparatus. The old barrack boilers unaltered cost, for 100 men, from 16oz. to 18oz. of fuel per man, for 300 men from 16oz. to 18oz., and for 500 from 16oz. to 18oz. Captain Grant's apparatus cost, for 100 men 32oz. per man, for 300 men 16oz., and for 500 men 12oz. and a fraction. This is with the boilers alone. With the ovens the cost runs 40oz., 18oz., and 14oz. respectively. The complicated apparatus at Woolwich of which I spoke costs for 100 men 20oz., 800 men 12oz., and for 500 men 8oz. per man. With the boilers reset on Captain Galton's plan the cost is only 4oz. of fuel per man, whether for 100, 300, or 500 men. For the ovens the cost is 4oz. per man for 100 men, 2oz. for 300 men, and so on. The difference is so great that I think the Government would not be justified in adopting Captain Grant's as the universal apparatus. The late Secretary for War offered Captain Grant a royalty of £35 for every apparatus to be set up. This, however, he refused. I proposed to him to take £500 as a compensation for the trouble which he had incurred—and I must say that he has devoted great pains and labour to the matter; he was the first person to turn his attention to it, and to lead others to take it up. He accepted my offer, but simply as a compensation for the expense and trouble at which he has been, and not as a recognition of the merits of his invention. As regards the field apparatus, the Select Committee were ordered to turn their attention to that, and apparently it was the only apparatus they did inspect. They highly approved it, and I believe the Commander in Chief was greatly pleased with what he saw of it. We have sent out a set for 5,000 men to China, and we have sent another set to Aldershot, so that its merits will be fully tested. At the same time we have thought it fair to place it in competition with another field apparatus, invented by the late M. Soyer. I shall be glad to do anything agreeable to Captain Grant, who has devoted a great deal of time to this subject; but as guardian of the public purse in military matters, while other inventions have been brought forward to compete with his, and some of them successfully, it would be difficult to give a reward to him, and not to the others.

With regard to the case to which my hon. Friend the Member for Westmeath (Mr. Pollard-Urquhart) directed our attention, the case is, no doubt, one of considerable hardship. The price of hay rose, and having lost considerably by their contract, the contractors applied to the Government for some compensation. They did not apply for any compensation for their oats contract, by which I conclude it was profitable to them. It is a remarkable thing, however, that throughout Ireland, where we have many contractors who must have suffered in common from the increased price of the commodity, these were the only contractors who applied to us for compensation. Clearly, if Government allows it to be understood that in dealings of this sort with persons engaged in trade and commerce they are not to be bound by the bargains made, because it may turn out to be less remunerative than the contractors anticipated, it would be impossible to insure that the contracts would be fulfilled. Suppose the reverse had happened, that there had been a most extraordinary produce of grass, and hay had fallen £1 or £2 per ton, I very much doubt whether these parties would have given the Government the benefit of the reduction. Under the circumstances, however much I lament the position of these gentlemen—and I think their position rather a hard one—I do not see how, consistently with my duty, I could do otherwise than hold them bound by the contract into which they originally entered.

INSURRECTION IN SICILY.

QUESTION.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, that before asking the Question of which he had given notice, he wished to explain why he put it in the fewest possible words. It had been suggested to him that if he put this question he might be asked why he did not rather put a question with respect to the recruiting that was going on in Ireland for the troops of the Pope. His answer was a very simple one—that recruiting was so perfectly illegal that he could only suppose the reason why the Government did not interfere to put a stop to it was that, while other countries were sending the sweepings of their gaols to reinforce the cutthroats of Perugia, they might allow the example to be followed in Ireland. But the Sicilian insurrection was an entirely different affair. The Sicilians were really fighting for a noble cause, which, as far as possible, should be untainted by any illegality. If the Government were disposed to treat the recruiting for the Pope in Ireland with contempt, they could not so treat the expedition to Sicily of General Garibaldi. Once let him penetrate into the interior of that island, and the contest would become a very serious one indeed. It was true that the great towns of Sicily lying on the seaboard would be in the power of the Neapolitan Government so long as they could keep the sea; but it must not be forgotten that there were large parts of that country most admirably adapted for guerilla troops. Even in the most fertile districts the villages stood almost always on rocky eminences; they were built with narrow streets; and altogether they were of that character that a mere handful of men could defend them against better troops than could be sent against them by the King of Naples. If this turned out a long struggle, the attention of Europe would be drawn very much to the subscription which was getting up in this country. Not that he believed that subscription would ever amount to any sum that would be a very considerable assistance to the Sicilian cause; but it would be so considerable as at least to attract attention; and if there was anything illegal in it, he thought it wise and proper that the Government should declare it to be so. Our position with regard to Sicily was a very peculiar one—for two reasons. In the first place, not only in France, but over the whole Continent, we were suspected of having views of our own with regard to Sicily. Now, although our temporary occupation of it might be of immense advantage to the island—although it would soon recover its prosperity, and become again the granary of the Mediterranean—yet he was perfectly sure that before five years passed the English rule would become unpopular, and the country would become the greatest possible burden and nuisance to us. There was another reason why we should disavow all connivance with illegal assistance given to the Sicilians. It seemed to him that the true and wise course for this country to take, as the head of the constitutional Governments in Europe, was to strive that the principle of national boundaries should be respected, and that every nation should settle its quarrels within its own territory. They might be certain that the Liberal cause in all countries was steadily gaining ground, and, if they only prevented one despotic Power from assisting another despot, before long the Liberal party would be able to completely crush their oppressors. His object in asking the question of which he had given notice was most friendly to the Sicilians. He wished success to their revolt. He wished it might spread into the mainland, and before long overwhelm the King and Government in utter destruction. Still, he hoped he had made it clear that the Government should do nothing to support the insurrection, and that English subjects, as individuals, should do nothing illegal to promote it. He begged to ask Mr. Solicitor General whether his attention has been drawn to an Advertisement which appeared in The Times of Wednesday, the 9th of May, announcing that a Subscription had been opened in London in aid of the Sicilians; and whether Persons in this Country who contributed to the Fund which it was proposed to raise would render themselves liable to any legal proceedings?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he hoped he should not be considered wanting in respect to the House, or to the hon. Gentleman, if he confined himself to giving a precise answer to a precise question, and abstained from following the somewhat discursive strain of observation, in which the hon. Gentleman had considered it right to indulge. He had therefore to state that his attention had been called to the advertisement, by the Notice of the hon. Gentleman's Question. He had a copy of that advertisement before him; he had read it, and, as he thought the hon. Member had not stated the substance of it, his observations would be rendered more intelligible, if he referred to it more particularly. The advertisement solicited subscriptions in aid of the Sicilians, and requested that the sums, which persons in this country might be disposed to give, should be paid into the hands of certain persons living in this country, whose names were published; and the proposal, was that the subscriptions, so paid into the hands of those persons, here, should, as money, be transmitted to Genoa, to be there disposed of by a committee, stated to be presided over by General Garibaldi. The Question was, whether the subscribing of money in this country, by paying it into the hands of foreigners or others, living here, with the purpose and object described by the advertisement, infringed any rule of common law, or was an offence against any prohibitory statute? Now, it appeared to him that, so long as what was done was kept within the bounds of a mere subscription in this country, such as this advertisement described, no law of this country would be violated. The only statute in any way bearing on a case of this description was, the 59th George III., commonly called the Foreign Enlistment Act. It prohibited two things—the enlisting of soldiers, and fitting out or equipping vessels of war for service, under or against, foreign Governments. It did not in any way touch subscriptions. As far as he was able to form an opinion, any man who thought proper might put his hand into his pocket, take out his money, and put it into the hands of another, on the faith of its going to Genoa, to be disposed of by General Garibaldi; without violating either the common, or statute, law of the country.

RECALL OF SIR CHARLES TREVELYAN. QUESTION.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he had given notice of an important Question, the answer to which would be looked to with interest throughout the whole of India; it was to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether it be true that he has recalled Sir Charles Trevelyan from the Governorship of Madras. He might be permitted to express a deep interest in this question, because he was personally acquainted with the state of the Madras Presidency. Six or seven years ago, under a former Government, he had the honour of detailing to the House what were his observations with regard to a state of things that ought never to have existed—a most chaotic state of things—Government abdicating its first functions in providing for the security of life and property, grinding the ryots by the most oppressive taxation, and compelling the cultivators to pay 50 per cent—one-half of their gross produce—following in the track, but with more than the severity, of the Native Governments that preceded them. On the other hand, there was a province where, in the short reign of one year, through the personal influence of the Governor, the population was reconciled to the Government it before hated; in which an assessment was equitably carried out; and land for the first time, contrary to all the traditions of the old East India Company, principally through the influence of Sir Charles Trevelyan, had been sold in fee simple to anybody who wished to purchase it. This was but a small portion of the benefits which the right hon. Gentleman had conferred upon the country; and it was with the very deepest regret, with feelings of astonishment and great pain, that he now said that the right hon. Gentleman had committed acts which cut him off, if he might so speak, in the middle of his most beneficent career. It was only that evening he understood that Sir Charles Trevelyan had for certain been recalled from Madras, and that his successor had been appointed. The ground upon which that recall was based was, he believed, the Minute which Sir Charles Trevelyan had written in reference to the financial statement which Mr. Wilson had laid before the Legislative Council at Calcutta; and he must say that, having read both, he fully agreed in the general principles which in the Minute were laid down, and regarded Sir Charles Trevelyan as being justified in taking the decisive step which he had adopted if he were in a position to prove that no further taxation was required in India. In saying he was justified, he might, perhaps, be employing language which was somewhat too strong; but he should endeavour to assign a good reason that, however, as it might, Sir Charles Trevelyan, who when the taxes in question were projected had been engaged in a tour of inspection of his Presidency, immediately stopped short in his progress, returned to Madras, and penned that able Minute the publication of which was the cause of his recall. Now the House, he felt assured, would not, when they became thoroughly acquainted with the principles which were laid down in that document, and the manner in which Sir Charles Trevelyan therein considered the proposals of Mr. Wilson, fail to perceive that its author had displayed a very large knowledge of the subject with which he dealt, of the principles of taxation, and of the condition of the country; and that it was desirable the Legislative Council should have seen, and been able, if possible, to refute his arguments before they resorted to so heavy an increase of taxation as that which was contemplated. In his Minute Sir Charles Trevelyan contended that that increased taxation was unnecessary, that the military expenditure in India was far greater than was requisite; at the same time he declared that, after the experience of years, he looked to the simple method of cutting down her expenditure as the best mode of removing the financial difficulties by which India was beset. Entertaining those opinions, and believing that great danger would result from the contemplated increase of taxation, he felt that he could not do otherwise than place upon record his disapproval of a policy which he was unable to avert. He understood that the motive which had induced Sir Charles Trevelyan to make public his Minute was the fear that unless he did so he should be unable to stop this increased taxation. His friends in India remonstrated with him, and told him that he would offend the Government here: his reply was that his views were fixed, that he thought the proposed scheme would be ruinous; and he sacrificed himself for the good of India. Such were the heroic motives which had caused Sir Charles Trevelyan, to his own prejudice, to take the course which he had adopted; and when full information on the subject had been laid before the House they would, he was convinced, see that there were good grounds for entertaining the opinion that no additional taxation was required in India, and that its expenditure might very well be cut down to the amount at which it stood in 1857. He could not, under these circumstances, help regretting the hasty step in recalling Sir Charles Trevelyan which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India had deemed it to be his duty to take. Let hon. Members for a moment call to mind who Sir Charles Trevelyan really was. It had been stated that he knew nothing of India; but those who made that statement must be ignorant of his career. He had lived in India among the last of those great men who had won for us an empire which we seemed determined to lose. He had, under the auspices of Lord William Bentinck, become familiar with the policy of that eminent statesman, one of whose main features was to avoid increasing taxation, and to cut down the expenditure to correspond with the income of the country. Sir Charles Trevelyan, having served his Sovereign in India for a period of nearly twenty years, and having earned for himself the friendship of its foremost men, returned to England, where, instead of enjoying a life of otium cum dignitate, he entered into the service of the Treasury, and did much towards the adoption of the system which had made our public accounts a model for the imitation of foreign nations. In that position he remained until the sagacious eye of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley) marked him out for the Governorship of Madras—an act which was, perhaps, one of the brightest of the noble Lord's intelligent administration of Indian affairs. In his new capacity Sir Charles Trevelyan united with the most exact knowledge of details, views the profoundest and most comprehensive, and in one short year showed himself capable of mastering difficulties by which many statesmen had been perplexed, standing out in distinguished contrast to those by whom he had been preceded. This was the Gentleman the Secretary for India had thought proper to recall: these were the grounds on which he had done so. Sir Charles Trevelyan was opposed to the enormous military expenditure in India; his opinion was that they should make the expenditure and the income meet, and he believed that in two years it might be done. Sir Charles Trevelyan had been intimately acquainted with India for a quarter of a century, was a high authority in the Treasury at home, and master of its system of accounts; he had been in intimate communication with all the statesmen of the present generation; this was the man who said he could make the expenditure and revenue of India meet in two years. Was that a man to recall? Why, the Government ought rather to send for him to Calcutta, to the fountain head of authority in India, and, if Mr. Wilson could not answer his arguments, let his plans be carried out. If increased taxation in India was not only unnecessary, but deeply prejudicial to their empire, there was reason to pause, and not decide on the instant, as the Secretary for India had done. He should have paused to hear what was doing in India, and give all who were equally interested in its government time to confer together on the differing views placed before them. The recall of the Governor of Madras bore out the views of the hon. Member for Birmingham, that the centralization of the Government of India was carried too far. He did not share the hon. Gentleman's extreme opinions on its decentralization, but no doubt some degree of it was necessary. The Secretary of India also approved of decentralizing the power of the Government to a certain extent. But the right hon. Gentleman only gave them a mass of words, never a single act. India could no longer bear this "hope deferred" that "made the heart sick;" they must have action; they must have decentralization immediately carried out, or what men of ability would they get to be minor Governors in India? There was the form, but not the substance of a Legislative Assembly; the Governors were tied so that they could not move hand or foot; and none but inferior men, willing to pocket their £12,000 a year without carrying into effect the plans they knew to be right, would accept such a post. These were the only men they would get under the present system; or if they did get able men they would be likely to kick over the traces. It was not Sir Charles Trevelyan who was to blame for this; the home system was imperfect, and the recent change had done nothing to remove the defects of the Government of India. But Sir Charles Trevelyan did not stand alone among the high officials in India in denouncing Mr. Wilson's Budget. If Sir Charles Trevelyan said he could govern the whole South of India without the troops the Government forced on him, why not let him do it? If he could do with £500,000 less than had before been considered necessary for the Government of Madras, and still pay a quota into the Imperial Treasury, common sense would say—let him do it. The public did not want to hear of the quarrels of officials; it did not care whether Sir Charles Trevelyan published his Minute prematurely or not. The question was, did it show a way out of the difficulties? Was it right or not? Did Indian stockholders and Indian railway shareholders wish to see the revenues of India spent on a large military force, or go into their own pockets as dividends and legitimate profits of enterprise? The people of England wished to see India well governed; they cared nothing for the red-tapist reasons for dismissing one of the best men the Government had had in India for a quarter of a century because he had—injudiciously, he thought—sent his Minute to the newspapers before the Secretary for India received it. But were the opinions it contained only those of Sir Charles Trevelyan? The Commander-in-Chief of the Forces fully agreed with him. Another gentleman, a thorough official, who had served thirty years in India, and now held the position of Member of the Council of Madras, in endorsing the Governor's Minute as to the danger of carrying out the views of the Central Government, said if an income tax was to be introduced into India it would be politically wise to try it first in the part of India that afforded the greatest facility for the experiment; they would thus avoid the danger of raising a flame of discontent throughout the whole of the Empire; he stated also that, unless they were content with such a military force as the Treasury could maintain, their difficulties would not cease. This was the opinion of one of the ablest civilians in India, Mr. Maltby. He supported the views of Sir Charles Trevelyan. He would ask, therefore, if it was true that Sir Charles had been recalled, and that his successor had been appointed? He understood he was to be Sir Henry Ward, the present Governor of Ceylon. If that were true, the Government intended to send another Colonial Governor to India. He warned the House that the last Colonial Governor sent to India was not a success. Though an able man, Lord Harris was not a success in India; he was an admirable man, but not fit for the post. A Colonial Governor must be an exceptional character if he succeeded in India; and now the right hon. Gentleman was going to send them another. When he before addressed the House on a similar subject he had compared the whole of the south of India to a hive of bees that the Government would not permit to make honey. They would have enriched the Government; by its absurd management it seemed determined they should not do so. The system of Government had denuded the province even of silver spoons; the foolish and infamous system of the Government had reduced the whole of that unhappy country either to beggary or emigration. They had now got a man who had restored confidence to the people and increased the revenue by half a million. He had had the courage to do what Lord Harris had only written about. When Lord Harris was sent there his intentions were good; and he wrote the most admirable Minutes in the world on what ought to be done, but what, unfortunately, he never attempted to do; or, if he did, there was a feebleness in the attempt, to which the state of the Government of India proved a successful obstruction. It was the system of Indian centralization that prevented Lord Harris from carrying out his intentions. Now they had a gentleman with energy enough to break through its trammels, and do what ought to have been done by the Government at home. Here was a man of sufficient energy and powerful intellect to accomplish the undertaking and they refused to back him up! It was but seldom a citizen was found who had shown such distinguished talents as Sir Charles Trevelyan, and who to enormous experience of detail added such wide and comprehensive views; every year of such a man's life ought to be treasured up, and now in the fulness of his years—for he was of ripe age—his services, which were so precious to the State, ought not to be wasted in deference to any red-tapist notions of the Secretary of State for India. If it were true that he had been recalled and that the right hon. Gentleman was about to leave India, his memory would be treasured by those he left behind; and he would receive such a greeting from his friends in England, as would make him rejoice that he had only quitted Indian soil to return with still greater honours; for either in the capacity of Governor General, or Secretary of State for India, he would not fail to distinguish himself as highly as any of his predecessors.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: I certainly was not prepared by the notice of a simple Question as to whether Sir Charles Trevelyan has been recalled from the Governorship of Madras, for the earnest declamation of my hon. Friend, in which he has raised questions of very considerable importance. Through those questions I shall not attempt to follow him, because the recall of Sir Charles Trevelyan does not depend in any way in the opinion which he chose to profess—and professed most ably—but simply on the fact of his publishing that opinion most improperly, most unnecessarily, and as we think most dangerously for the welfare of India. While, however, I abstain on this occasion from going into any other question than the simple grounds of the recall of Sir Charles Trevelyan, it will be necessary for me to refer to one or two points which my hon. Friend has stated most inaccurately, and with great injustice, to a nobleman who lately occupied an important position in India. My hon. Friend says Lord Harris only issued Minutes for the reduction of the land tax, but effected no reductions; and that Sir Charles Trevelyan on going out accomplished in one year what his predecessors had for a long period failed in doing. Any Gentleman who hears me, I am sure, must see that Sir Charles Trevelyan, who only entered on the government of Madras for the first time a year ago, has not had time, and could not possibly have had time, to effect reductions of the land assessments. Those reductions were carried into effect years ago by Lord Harris, acting by my instructions; the results had shown themselves before Lord Harris quitted Madras, and the same good results have continued to manifest themselves during the rule of Sir Charles Trevelyan. I am not going to enter into an eulogium on Lord Harris, whose character as an able administrator was established by his Government of Trinidad, neither do I wish to say anything derogatory to Sir Charles Trevelyan; who is an old friend of mine; but I can not allow such accusations as those that have been made by the hon. Gentleman without any foundation to go forth uncontradicted. The hon. Gentleman talks now of the abominations of the moturpha tax, of the licence tax, and others of that description; but it is not a year ago since he himself recommended the more extended application of the moturpha tax, and upheld the very system which he now so strongly condemns. The hon. Gentleman having pointed out certain things which ought not to be done, recommended the House, on that occasion, "To have recourse to forms of taxation which would not offend the Oriental mind in Southern India," he said, "There was the moturpha, a collection of small taxes. No doubt some of those were bad ones, but there were some of them that were not. Again, why not adopt a tax which has existed in every country in the world—namely, a poll tax? " When the hon. Gentleman now talks of a tax which ought not to be imposed because it presses on the population of India, what on earth am I to understand by his recommending a poll tax, which must reach and press on every man, woman, and child in the country? His views on taxation vary so strangely, and seem to be so very loose, that I really hope the House will not be led away by his eloquent declamation to adopt his statement as matter of authority.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR explained, that his arguments had only been intended to apply to the house tax.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: I do not think this is the proper time for entering into any discussion on the merits of the scheme of taxation proposed for India; and I have already said that the grounds for recalling Sir Charles Trevelyan are quite independent of his opinion on the question of finance. But I shall certainly be surprised if the House does not agree with me that in the measure which Her Majesty's Government have taken with regret—and by no one with greater regret than myself for I have always entertained the greatest, the highest regard for Sir Charles Trevelyan—the grounds on which we have acted are such as to justify us in the opinion of the House and the country, and to free us from the reproach which has been cast upon us of having acted in the spirit of red-tapists. In order that the House may clearly understand the question, it will be requisite for me to give a few details. It may be remembered that the financial condition of India exhibited for last year a deficit of £13,000,000, and for the present year of £9,500,000. With a view to meet this deficiency, the Government of India last year proposed a licence tax, which was very soon modified into a quasi income tax and also a tax on tobacco. The Governors of the different provinces of India, including the Presidency of Madras, were all invited to send to the Government of India their opinions on the subject of taxation, and in the autumn Sir Charles Trevelyan stated broadly and distinctly the views which he entertained against the imposition of these taxes; and his opinion not only that no additional taxation was necessary, but that the expenditure might be reduced within the limits of the revenue. The hon. Member has asked why we do not do what Sir Charles Trevelyan recommends. There is

mitted to Madras. On the 4th of March an open telegram was sent to Calcutta indicating the opinions of the Governor of Madras against the financial scheme, and asking for time. On the 9th of March a confidential letter was sent to Madras, stating the views of the Central Government and objecting to the use of an open telegram, on the ground that it was not right that communications between one Government and another on such a subject should be known to the public. On the 17th of March a letter was sent to the Central Government, acknowledging the receipt of that letter, and stating that though the Government of Madras saw no objection to an open telegram they had in consequence of the letter of the 9th sent a telegram in cipher. On the 21st of March a telegram was sent from Calcutta informing the Madras Government that a Bill would be introduced on the 24th of the month, and would be referred to a Committee, who probably would not report for five weeks from that time. From the 20th to the 26th of March the opinions of Sir Charles Trevelyan and the Members of his Council were recorded in Minutes, and the publication did not take place of course till after the 26th. I place these dates before the House to show that at the time Sir Charles Trevelyan's Minute was made and published he knew that in the opinion of the Government of India it was not for the public advantage to give these views to the world, and that he also knew that ample time would be afforded for any remonstrance which he might choose to address to them on the subject. I quite admit that the Minute of Sir Charles Trevelyan is a most able production. It contains forcible arguments against the views contained in Mr. Wilson's speech; and if it had been made on the other side of the House in answer to views expressed upon these benches, I do not know that a better answer could have been given than is contained in the Minute. But whether it is a document which ought to be published to the world is quite another matter. It was forwarded to the Supreme Government of India; it was sent to the Madras Member of the Legislative Council, who was desired to move that it should be printed. No doubt it would have formed a remarkable speech if made in the Legislative Council by the Madras Member; and if the majority of the Council had thought it prudent to publish the speech, it was in their discretion to have done so. The Madras Member of the Legislative Assembly is not a mere delegate, and, of course, is free to exercise his own discretion as to the course which he thinks best calculated to promote the interests of India. But Sir Charles Trevelyan published this Minute without the knowledge, without the concurrence, and, I am justified in saying, against the opinion of the other Civil Members of his Government. To their utter surprise, those Gentlemen saw his Minute and theirs in a public newspaper of Madras. At first it was supposed that the documents must have got into circulation through misconduct or negligence on the part of some of the clerks of the Council. Inquiry was instituted; no such misfeasance could be discovered; and, application having been made to the Private Secretary of Sir Charles Trevelyan, he admitted that he was responsible for the publication. In a recorded Minute Sir Charles Trevelyan most honourably avowed and justified his act. "I take the earliest opportunity of stating," he says, "that, acting upon my sole responsibility, I freely distributed copies of the Minutes of the Members of the Government upon Mr. Wilson's financial statement, with a view to secure for them the greatest publicity." The Supreme Government of India, as I have said, were in possession of the views of the Madras Government upon this portion of the financial scheme. That is also stated by Sir Charles Trevelyan in the same Minute. "All three taxes proposed by Mr. Wilson," he declares, "had previously formed the subject of correspondence with the Supreme Government, and we had made earnest representations against them." He had been told that ample time would be afforded him for making any remonstrance; and, no doubt, he was perfectly justified in remonstrating. Indeed, it was his duty to state his views to the Government of India for their consideration before they came to any final decision. But he went further, and took a step which in his position in any country, but above all in India, seems to me utterly indefensible. He appealed to the people of India against the measures of the Supreme Government. He avows this distinctly. "The key-stone of the budget," he says, "was English public opinion in India and in England." And again, "This mistaken state of public opinion had to be corrected in order to influence the budget, and I therefore accepted Mr. Wilson's challenge to public discussion, and disregarded the subsequent injunction to secrecy." Mr. Wilson challenged the fullest public discussion in the Legislative Assembly; but he stated that he thought it undesirable that the Government of India should be engaged in public discussion with one of its subordinate Governments; and I confess I shall be surprised if my hon. Friend thinks it was a seemly act, or one calculated to maintain the authority of the Indian Government, or the character of any Government at all, that the Governor of Madras, the head of a subordinate Presidency, should invite opposition to the measures of the Supreme Government, and should constitute himself the leader of the Opposition. It would be impossible to maintain the authority of any Government if such conduct were allowed. I think of late years we have seen mischief enough from insubordination in India to induce us to prevent it from extending further, if it be possible to stop it. We have had a mutiny in the Native army, and of the Local European army; we now have the mutiny of one Government against another; and, much as I regret the person upon whom this decision falls, much as I regret the loss of Sir Charles Trevelyan's services, I think we should have been wanting in our duty if we had for one moment hesitated to take the most prompt notice of an act so insubordinate and so dangerous to our rule in India—if, in short, we had left Sir Charles Trevelyan in his position. To have sent him a severe reprimand, which no man of honour could have received without throwing up his office, would, I think, have been a shabby course. The responsibility rested upon us, and it seems to me that it was more just, and, in point of fact, more kind to Sir Charles Trevelyan, at once to recall him. The question was brought before the Government, and the Government decided that it was their painful but imperative duty to recall Sir Charles Trevelyan from the Government of Madras. It was necessary to support the authority of the Supreme Government, and no other course was open to us but to deprive Sir Charles Trevelyan of his office. I cannot sit down without saying that in much which my hon. Friend has said respecting Sir Charles Trevelyan's personal merits I entirely concur. He is a very old personal friend of mine. I have acted with him for many years in office; and I may say that in the course of a long public life I never had a more painful duty than that which I performed yesterday in recalling him. A more honest,

there are other matters to come before it; but possibly the strong interest I have taken in Indian affairs for many years, and the real importance of the question, will be a sufficient excuse for delaying the House for a few minutes. I think the question that has been introduced to the House by the hon. Member for Poole is of a somewhat painful character, and places the House in considerable difficulty. I quite understand the pain which must have been experienced by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India in taking the step which he has felt it his duty to take. We should all view the question dispassionately, and I hope, if there be a discussion, that it will be conducted with the greatest moderation. The finance of India is a question of almost transcendent importance;—it is a question of greater importance than the House has hitherto been able to realize. The state of the finances of India is a state, I was going to say, of absolute chaos, utterly disreputable to the past Governments of India, and presenting great difficulties to every one engaged in the attempt to restore it to a sound condition. We have more than 1,000 civil servants in India, and we have frequently heard it said in the House that there is no service in the world which so abounds with able men as the civil service of India. I never gave a flat contradiction to that statement, though I never for one moment believed it. If we required any proof to show that there is no truth in it, it is furnished by the fact that the noble Lord the Member for Lynn (Lord Stanley) could not find anybody amongst the 1,000 able men in India who understood his multiplication table so far as to be able to conduct the finances of the country, and the present Secretary of State for India sent out Mr. Wilson to undertake that which no man in the civil service of India was found competent to undertake. I would be the very last person to say a word against Mr. Wilson in connection with this matter. I know no man better acquainted with matters of finance and taxation as they are found in this country, and I never have known a man possessing such capabilities for persistent laborious work as Mr. Wilson always exhibited in this country. I am sure he went out to India with the honest intention of devoting all the powers of his mind and body to effect the great object which the Government has committed to his care. The right hon. Gentleman, the Secretary for India, has characterized the speech of Mr. Wilson, in the Council at Calcutta, as an able performance. I have read it with attention, and have studied it with the greatest care; I also examined the details of his Budget, and have given such consideration as I am able to it. I do not deny the ability of it at all. I think there is a great deal of courage—approaching almost to rashness—in some of the propositions he has made; but I should be disposed to find fault with it, because it went on the principle of balancing the income and expenditure by increasing the income by the imposition of new taxes, instead of reducing the expenditure, which we all must feel is enormous, and which I believe most of us think is, to a considerable degree, unnecessary. I shall refer to one only of his propositions—that for the imposition of an income tax throughout all parts of India. So far as I can learn, the general opinion seems to be that that tax is not practicable, and that it will be impossible throughout the whole of India to levy that tax. I do not say that it will be impossible to levy it throughout Lower Bengal. That may be so or not; if it be so, the attempt to impose such an unusual tax on the whole population of India, without reference to the different conditions of different portions of that vast country, is a very perilous undertaking. I must not be understood as making any charge against Mr. Wilson, because I think a man sent out to India under the difficult circumstances in which he went there, having as it were to elicit order from chaos, should be judged with the utmost fairness; and no kind of prejudice or hostility should induce any one to look with an unfavourable eye on any one of his propositions. So much with regard to Mr. Wilson. Not long ago a Governor was sent out to Madras, after many years of previous experience of Indian affairs, and, judging from his former career in India and at home, probably no man could have been found in this kingdom more competent to go out as the Governor of an Indian Presidency, or whose appointment would be likely to do more credit to the judgment of the Secretary of State. During his short reign at Madras I believe Sir Charles Trevelyan has conducted his Government in a manner which has done more to heal the wounds that previously existed among its population, and to bring that population to regard the English rule with favourable feelings, than any Indian governor since the time of Lord

William Bentinck. He would seem to have been of opinion that the projects of Mr. Wilson and the Calcutta Government were not applicable to the whole of India; if he made any exception it would probably be of Lower Bengal; but as for the 30,000,000 of people whom he governs, he is distinctly and clearly of opinion that the proposition is not a wise one, and that it may be attended with consequences disastrous to the peace of the country. He says it is not necessary for the Government at Calcutta to raise new taxes in India, and he strongly recommends that the military expenditure should be reduced, chiefly by a large diminution of the Native army. The House knows that when the mutiny was afloat everybody who had paid attention to the subject said that all that mischief had arisen from our maintaining an enormous Native military force; but, although at that time there was a very penitent feeling in this House, throughout the country, and in the press, no sooner is the mutiny suppressed than we find the Native army growing to higher dimensions, and the patronage and expenditure connected with the establishment and maintenance of that army on a much larger scale, than at any former period. I can understand Sir Charles Trevelyan saying that any proposition to raise new taxes in India is a very dangerous experiment. We have heard of "the ignorant impatience of taxation" in this country; but in India it is an experiment a hundred times more perilous to introduce new descriptions of taxes, and to add to the already overburdened condition of the great bulk of the population. This is the simple case. Sir Charles Trevelyan believed—I may say what the conclusion is to which I have arrived—that the course about to be taken by the Government of Calcutta was a course full of danger to the peace of the country, and absolutely unnecessary for the purpose of restoring a balance in the finances of the empire; and he, with a courage and a determination which I greatly admire, wrote—I confine myself to the exact words I am using—a Minute which is a most able argument against the proposition of the Calcutta Government, and in favour of the other principle which is explained in that Minute. We have before us the two schemes—one of the Calcutta Government, and one of the Governor of Madras; and the question to-night is not whether the House shall uphold the one or the other; but judging from the course of the Calcutta Government and that of the Government of Madras, I hold that Sir Charles Trevelyan, in his views on this question, has shown himself to be much more of a statesman than those who have announced this new scheme in Calcutta. There is another question, which, after all, is the point, and that is the course which Sir Charles Trevelyan has taken in publishing this despatch. There are cases in which the publication of a despatch, although officially wrong and contrary to official etiquette, may still, after all, looking at the matter from a high point of view, be perfectly justifiable. The House will recollect that Lord Ellenborough, when in office as President of the India Board, wrote a despatch which obtained great celebrity, enouncing great principles, and written in powerful and unmistakeable language. He was blamed very much at the time for the course he took in permitting that despatch to be published, and the consequence of that blame was that he retired from the Government, and Lord Derby had no longer the benefit of his services. I approved that despatch, believing it, though it was condemned by some over-fastidious people, to be of great public advantage, though it might be open to the condemnation of those who think that an adherence to official etiquette is of more consequence than a great public service. In this case you have two bodies in opposition—the Government of Calcutta and the Governor of Madras. Sir Charles Trevelyan sees a great emergency, and he takes a step, I admit, altogether unofficial, in publishing this despatch; but I think I understand the feeling under which he acted, and see some excuse for his conduct. The Calcutta Government itself has served the Secretary of State for India very much in the same way. In a couple of years we have had two Secretaries of State for India who could not get an answer to a despatch from Calcutta. Sir Charles Trevelyan, acting with a similar spirit of independence, has shown that he was not bound absolutely by the orders of the superior Government at Calcutta. But I think the recall which the right hon. Gentleman (Sir C. Wood) states that he has now decided upon is not without justification. I have not risen for the purpose of blaming that course. I see all the difficulty, and, if you like, even the danger of the course which Sir Charles Trevelyan has taken—at the same time, I believe he has been actuated by this motive,—that he knew if he had sent the despatch to Calcutta nothing more would have been heard of it; and that if he had sent it to the Secretary of State at home it would have been thought—I would not say a piece of impertinence—but I think it would not have had much weight as against the united opinion of the Government of Calcutta. Sir Charles Trevelyan believed the project of the Calcutta Government to be a perilous experiment, and he determined, at all hazards, to invoke what he could of the public opinion of India against it, although he knew that course of action on his part must result, as it has resulted, in his being recalled from the high office he has filled with such distinguished ability. I have some reason to believe—at least to suspect—that before the recall of Sir Charles Trevelyan reaches India he will have resigned his office. I believe he will see that the issuing of that Minute must be incompatible with the retention of his office. Holding these views, I am unable to join the hon. Member for Poole in any language of condemnation which he may have used with reference to the course taken by the Secretary of State for India. But still I am not sure that the right hon. Gentleman might not have taken some other course than that which he has taken; though no doubt he says that had he issued a reprimand it would have been more humiliating to Sir Charles Trevelyan than the fact of his recall. I am in this difficulty. I must say that I think there is no Governor in India at all to be compared with Sir Charles Trevelyan for the services he has performed to the Presidency under his control. I regret more than I can express that a state of things has arisen that justifies, if it does not render necessary, his recall; but I wish the right hon. Gentleman had been able to discover some other course than he has seen it his duty to take, and had retained Sir Charles Trevelyan for the service of India. But there is one other point which is really the question to which I desire to allude. There is a moral to be drawn from this event. The House, or at least some Members of it, will recollect that I have on several occasions addressed it at considerable length with regard to the Government of India, and urged the House to change the whole system of that Government—to abolish the supremacy of the Government at Calcutta, to separate India into several Presidencies, to give to each Governor of a Presidency equal rank with the rest, to put each in direct communication with the Secretary of State at home, and to give to each Presidency the enormous advantage of a direct power in its own Government to watch over, to protect, and to foster the prosperity of its own population. Admit, for the sake of argument, that the propositions of the Calcutta Government are possible in Lower Bengal; we have the authority of Sir Charles Trevelyan, and not his only, but that of those associated with him in the Government, that the propositions are not practicable, are even very perilous, in the Presidency of Madras. But yet, if you pass an Act in Calcutta, it spreads over the whole of India. Bengal, in which it may be possible, is included, and Madras, in which it may be, if not impossible, at least very perilous, cannot be excluded. I argue that this is a case which proves to the House—and ought to prove to the right hon. Gentleman on the Treasury bench—that it would be far better to have five or six separate Governments in India, and that the laws to be passed should be passed by each Government for each Presidency, with reference to its own condition and its own wants. I believe we should have an infinitely better Government under that system, partly national and partly municipal, than we can ever have with one unworkable Government in Calcutta, pretending to legislate for 150,000,000 of people, comprising not less than twenty nations, speaking twenty different languages, not one of which languages, probably, is accurately known to any single Member of that Government. I said before that I have not risen to say anything in blame towards the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India. I hope the time may come when the services of Sir Charles Trevelyan may again be employed in India. I am quite sure, from all I have heard through private sources, that his withdrawal from the Government will be felt as a positive calamity by the great body of the Natives of Madras—and that is just the state of things which we ought to cultivate—which every Governor ought to aim at; and, if it be possible, every Governor who has attained such a result ought to receive the support of the Home Government in every just and practicable way. I believe that although Sir Charles Trevelyan has not proved himself by what he has done to be a judicious subordinate, yet he has proved himself to be a wise Governor of Madras; and I only hope that in the measures which the Government at Calcutta are prepared to carry out none of those calamities may follow that Sir Charles Trevelyan has anticipated. I ask the Secretary for India that he will study that Minute of Sir Charles Trevelyan's with great care; and, if he cannot adopt it, it may at least induce him to modify and greatly improve that project of legislation which is described to be so perilous, and which the Calcutta Government is about to establish all over India.

MR. BUXTON said, the House ought to know that it was not Sir Charles Trevelyan, but Mr. Wilson, who first published to the world the fact that Sir Charles Trevelyan disapproved his financial views. In a speech delivered in the Legislative Council at Calcutta, and which was published and circulated all over India, Mr. Wilson stated that men of high position in Madras were opposed to the financial scheme which he had announced. Of course, everybody knew that this could apply only to Sir Charles Trevelyan, and those associated with him in the Government, and it was natural that Sir Charles Trevelyan, after such an intimation, should have taken the liberty to express his own views in his own way. He rejoiced to hear the expression of regret for the recall of Sir Charles Trevelyan which had fallen from every speaker that night. He had in every respect shown himself to be a statesman, and had shown more energy, ability, and zeal in the public service than any official that had gone to India for the last twenty years.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he thought that the expressions of the hon. Member for Birmingham as regarded Sir Charles Trevelyan were perfectly just, and wished to know whether it was by the Indian Council in this country that Mr. Wilson's measures had been approved of and adopted. Formerly India, was represented in that House by Members of the Court of Directors; but the Members of the present Indian Council were prevented sitting in the House, and therefore they were now peculiarly called upon, and more than ever, to legislate for that country in a spirit of the utmost forbearance, and to try and ascertain the opinions of those who really represented the opinions of the people of India.

MR. LYGON said, that the question of the relations between colonial Governors and the home Government had now assumed a character of the deepest importance.

Mr. Bright

This was not the first instance in which a Colonial Governor had been dealt with by the Government. In the course of the last year, Sir George Grey, the Governor of the Cape of Good Hope, had been recalled by the late Government for an undue exercise of his authority. The present Secretary of State, however, reinstated him, stating in his despatch that though they approved the grounds on which he had been recalled and that such a repudiation of the authority of the home Government in matters of general policy could never be tolerated, yet that the home Government were unwilling to interrupt the good work which he had begun in the colony, in establishing amicable relations between the natives and the colonists, and that therefore they had determined on reinstating him. He (Mr. Lygon) was puzzled to find any distinction between the case of Sir George Grey, and that of Sir Charles Trevelyan, upon whom such high encomiums had been passed, and he could not understand why a different measure of justice should be meted out to the latter. If anything, the case against Sir George Grey was the strongest, because he acted in defiance of instructions from the Colonial Secretary; while all Sir Charles Trevelyan did was to record his dissent from the financial measures of the Calcutta Government in what was perhaps a too public manner. Supposing it to have been consistent with Imperial authority to restore Sir George Grey to his post, then Sir Charles Trevelyan must feel that a scanty measure of justice had been dealt out to him. Looking to the admirable manner in which Sir Charles Trevelyan had discharged his duties he thought that Her Majesty's Government had far better reconsider their decision; and he hoped that in future all relations between the Home and the Colonial Governments would be placed on an intelligible and satisfactory basis.

MR. VANSITTART said, he had carefully read Sir Charles Trevelyan's protest, and he could assure the House that no document could have been couched in more respectful terms. Sir Charles being responsible for the tranquillity and well-being of 30,000,000 of Her Majesty's subjects and anxious to govern them through their sympathies, and appreciating the loyalty of the Madras army and of the people, both he and his Council were very much alarmed at the tremendous taxes which Mr. Wilson proposed to impose. He did not attribute much importance to Sir les publishing his protest in the Indian als; but the protest had done a great to allay the excitement which had been ed among the Native population by Wilson's financial scheme. Sir Charles velyan could not be accused of any espect or insubordination, because his est was not directed against Her Ma-y's Viceroy, Lord Canning, but was oriously directed against that entirely orant body the Legislative Council of cutta; and they ought to be very much igned to him for such practical and sound ggestions. Though he seldom agreed th anything that fell from the hon. Mem-r for Birmingham, yet he certainly did ree with him on the present occasion at at the present moment the absence of ir Charles Trevelyan would be a great lamity at Madras. He had dealt with e enam, or rent question, in a prompt nd satisfactory manner. When he arrived ere he found 350,000 claims which had ever been looked into; and within six onths afterwards he had made arrange- nents for the adjudication of those suits n a way agreeable and satisfactory, not only to the Government, but to the rent reeholders themselves. He also appoint- ed a Commission to consider the advisa- bility of uniting the Supreme and Suddur Courts. Comparing his energy with that of the Secretary of State for India he found that though twelve months had elapsed since the Royal Commission had reported upon the organization of the In- dian army the right hon. Baronet had not yet made up his mind as to what he should do on the subject; nor had he made up his mind about the union of the Supreme and Suddur Courts. Under all the cir- cumstances, he thought Sir Charles Tre- velyan had been treated with undue se- verity and harshness—more than enough to curb his spirited devotion to the cause of his country, but which he trusted would not impair his future career.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE wished, as a personal friend of Sir Charles Trevelyan, and for other reasons, to say a few words on this subject. He did not wonder that an event of so much importance as the recall of the Governor of Madras, had provoked a question at the earliest opportunity; but for public reasons he regretted that the question had been brought forward on the Motion for the Adjournment of the House, and before any papers had been presented to the House, and in the absence of the late Secretary for India. It was hardly to be expected that such a discussion could have arisen, and those who felt a warm interest in the character of Sir Charles Trevelyan, could not but think that nothing said to-night ought to be allowed to prejudice him, before the House had the whole case before it, and was able to judge of its merits. In judging the conduct of public men, their individual characteristics must be taken into consideration; and those who knew Sir Charles Trevelyan, knew that he was not only a man of great energy and ability, but of a very warm and courageous character; and the House must be prepared to find, combined with the merits, the faults of such a character. The act to which reference had been made, was, no doubt, an unfortunate one, but as to how far it was blameable he suspended his judgment. At all events, it was consistent with that character which induced a man to sacrifice himself under all circumstances for what he considered the public good. Though he was far from saying, until he had an opportunity of seeing the papers, that the conduct of the Government, in recalling Sir Charles Trevelyan, was wrong; yet one could not help regretting that the matter had been put in such a way before the population of Madras, as to make it appear that their Governor was recalled for standing up for their interests. He thought that the House should, by and by, have an opportunity of discussing this matter, with all the papers before it.

COLONEL SYKES rose to express his very deep regret, in common with many others, at finding they were to be deprived of the services of a man of the ability and independence of character, and resolution in purpose of, Sir Charles Trevelyan, which characteristics were not common in India. Sir Charles, with chivalric devotion, had sacrificed himself to a conviction that the tranquillity of India at the present moment was at stake by a mode of taxation proposed by the Supreme Government of Calcutta, in which the Governor of Madras had had no part whatever. But this chivalric devotion was no new thing in India. At the battle of Satabuldee, near Nagpoor, a battery of the enemy was thinning the ranks of the brigade of Sepoys and a squadron of Native regular cavalry, commanded by Captain Fitzgerald. Captain Fitzgerald sent to the Brigadier to be allowed to charge the battery and the enemy's line. The disproportion of numbers was so great that the Brigadier would not allow the risk to be run. He wished to state it in default of any other Member doing so, he himself should call the attention of the House to this act, and ask for leave to introduce a Bill to amend or repeal certain of its provisions which were found to be exceedingly objectionable.

PRACTICE OF THE HOUSE.

REPORT OF RESOLUTIONS FROM COMMITTEES OF WAYS AND MEANS.

MR. BOUVERIE: Sir, I am anxious to draw attention to a question of considerable importance connected with the forms of the House which regulate the order of our business. I have observed with great surprise in the Votes that last night the House having gone into a Committee of Ways and Means, and certain Resolutions imposing licence duties upon refreshment-houses having been adopted by the Committee, those Resolutions were, contrary to the universal practice of the House, reported forthwith, and without the usual interval of at least a day. I cannot but conceive that this course of proceeding was taken entirely by inadvertence. I believe I am correct in stating that no precedent whatever can be found for the Report of Resolutions to the House immediately after their adoption in Committee of Ways and Means. I beg the House to observe this is not a mere matter of form; there is a great deal of substance in this as in many another form of the House. I must beg the House to observe that these Resolutions in Committee of Ways and Means are the first step taken towards the imposition of a tax, and we all know that in the case of certain taxes the moment the Resolutions imposing them are reported to the House the Revenue Department at once begins to make the levy. So that by reporting such Resolutions whether it is expedient to levy a tax of the kind proposed. As I said before, I cannot help thinking that these Resolutions were so reported by mistake, and I hope the House will agree with me in holding that the respect which is due to our forms renders it necessary that in reference to the future we should revert to this proceeding and perhaps declare the Report null and void; so that it may appear on our Journals that this irregularity is not to be established as a precedent.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I wish to make a few remarks on the subject to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred, and which is certainly one of the most important which can possibly engage the attention of the House. It is one of the gravest possible questions. It is unnecessary for me to dilate at all on the value of the forms of the House, which have been devised by the experience of our predecessors for the welfare of the public. It may sometimes be a question whether some of these forms may not be insisted on too closely, and whether they may not be unnecessarily multiplied; although I believe that all those in this House who are most experienced in the conduct of public affairs are of opinion that we should approach the revision of them with the utmost caution. But there is one point upon which it is impossible there can be two opinions, and that is, that when a question of taxation is concerned it is incumbent on the House to observe with the greatest nicety, and even reverence, the forms which have been devised to prevent any rash decision on a subject which may involve the most vital interests of the country. It always has been the rule in all questions of Supply and Ways and Means, where the House has come to a decision in Committee, that decision should not be reported on the same day. If there were no formal Standing Order to that effect, the spirit of all our Standing Orders goes to that effect; but we have among our Rules one which positively directs that "Any Report of Resolutions from the Committees of Supply and Ways and Means, is ordered to be received on a future day." I believe there is no precedent upon our Journals of a contrary course having been taken; and I think no one has given any consideration who will agree with me that such a regulation was never used. I recollect a case, and I do not deceive me, in violation of Parliament men falling, the Captain again sent to the Brigadier, and the reply was "At his peril if he disobeys." "At my peril be it then," said Fitzgerald; and putting his squadron to the gallop, carried the guns, saved the brigade of infantry, and was made a C.B. for his successful disobedience! Nor would any Englishman forget Nelson at the battle of Copenhagen who could not see the signal of recall with his blind eye, and who was made a Peer for his successful disobedience! If he understood his right hon. Friend right, Sir Charles Trevelyan was challenged by Mr. Wilson as to the merits of the two systems, that of reduction without taxation, or that of keeping up those large establishments in India with taxation. Under these circumstances, how was Sir Charles Trevelyan to blame for coming forward and saying "these are my convictions, let them be tested by the public as between us two." He trusted that, after discussion had taken place on this subject, they would find Sir Charles Trevelyan's character come out with that degree of éclat that should ensure to him the continuance of that respect which his distinguished services had hitherto associated with his name.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I think the character of this discussion cannot be otherwise than satisfactory to Sir Charles Trevelyan and his best friends, because all who have spoken have borne testimony to his great merits and abilities, to the honesty and integrity of his mind, and to the firmness with which he performs what he considers his duty, regardless of any consequences that may arise to himself. I entirely concur in all those opinions. It is impossible for any man who has had the advantage of knowing him both personally and officially not to be deeply impressed with his merits as a public servant. But, at the same time, there are occasions when all personal considerations must yield to a sense of public duty on the part of those who are responsible for the conduct of public affairs. Certainly, the decision the Government has been compelled to come to was one of a very painful nature; because Sir Charles Trevelyan is a public servant who has discharged with eminent success important duties to his country, and whose continuance in this appointment would have been most desirable to the Government, and most advantageous, no doubt, to the public interests. But on the other hand, an act of insubordination and of the violation of official duties has been committed with the notion that to prevent by any means the execution of those plans would be a great advantage to the country that, as the hon. Member for Poole freely avowed, he voluntarily, and with his eyes open, sacrificed his official situation in order to accomplish what he thought a public good—although it was a course, as I think, calculated to produce the greatest possible public evil. I, as one of those who concurred in the decision, should have felt that I was shrinking from my public duty if I had not acquiesced in the recall of Sir Charles Trevelyan. Now, if that recall was to take place at all, it was important that it should take place at once. It has been suggested in the course of this discussion that the Government might have sent a reprimand to Sir Charles Trevelyan. But in order that this reprimand should have had any effect in counteracting the bad consequences of the publication, the reprimand must have been made as public in India as the offence of which it was a censure. And if that had been the case I would put it to any man whether, under such circumstances, Sir Charles Trevelyan, as a man of honour, could have continued to hold his situation if a severe reprimand, explaining especially the evils that his act was calculated to produce, had been published all over India, and his authority, therefore, entirely destroyed for any useful purpose. Painful as the decision was, it was one which I hold the Government had no option but to take; and though it was painful and undoubtedly conveyed a strong censure upon one public act of Sir Charles Trevelyan's, yet Sir Charles Trevelyan has merits too inherent in his character to be overclouded and overshadowed by this single act. And I concur with those who hope that Sir Charles Trevelyan may, in his future career, be useful to the public service, and do honour to himself as well as service to his country. I must pay a tribute of acknowledgment to the hon. Member for Birmingham for the temperate manner in which he addressed the House on this question. I must, however, also say, if my hon. Friend the Member for Poole will allow me to do so, that the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham formed a very advantageous contrast to that which he (Mr. Danby Seymour) delivered. The hon. Gentleman on the opposite side (Mr. Lygon) attempted to draw a parallel between the case of Sir Charles Trevelyan and that of Sir George Grey. But the two cases are essentially and fundamentally different. What was the offence of Sir George Grey, and what was the offence of those gallant officers to whom my hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Sykes) adverted? Their offence was disobedience of orders issued by a superior authority. The Secretary of State for the time being felt it his duty to recall Sir George Grey. But that disobedience of orders did not entail any danger to the colony under his command—it was, on the contrary, if I recollect aright, a measure of over energy for the defence of the colony. That was totally different from the conduct of Sir Charles Trevelyan, who, by the publication he had made, tended to disorganize, to disturb, and to distract the internal peace and security of India, and to endanger the authority of the Government in that vast and extensive part of Her Majesty's dominions. Therefore the two cases are wholly different. No one will think, on reflection, that Her Majesty's Government had any other course to pursue than to recall Sir Charles Trevelyan. On the other hand, I am quite sure that no one will impute to Sir Charles Trevelyan anything but an exaggerated belief in his own opinions, and a recklessness of consequences which I feel was a great fault in a person occupying so responsible a situation, but a fault which, nevertheless, does not detract in any degree from those eminent qualities which every one who knows Sir Charles Trevelyan must acknowledge he possesses.

MR. LAING said, in answer to the Question put to him four hours ago by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, he believed that a short statement to the facts of the case would put the subject in a very different light before the House. In 1857 the British Consul at Aleppo received an intimation from our Ambassador at Constantinople that the Government contemplated making considerable purchases of horses, mules, and camels, in that district, and that officers were about to be despatched from England for that purpose. The Consul communicated with Mr. Spitz-Goldstein, and that gentleman made an arrangement with an agent to purchase a large number of horses, mules, and camels, on commission. Shortly after, the Government altered their views, and there was no necessity for any purchase. Mr. Goldstein then sent in a claim for £68,000 being the amount of his loss upon the purchase of from 8,000 to 10,000 horses, camels, and mules. The Consul at Aleppo had no authority whatever to enter into any contract, and he had only informed Mr. Spitz-Goldstein of the intention of the Government, in order that that person might do something in the way of a private speculation for his own advantage. That was the state of things in the autumn of last year; and at that time, to use a phrase which had almost become classical on these occasions, "from certain information" which had reached the Treasury, it was resolved that a Commission, consisting of a Secretary of Legation and an Assistant-Commissary general, two highly respectable and competent gentlemen, should proceed to Aleppo to make inquiries into the case. The result of the investigation was to bring to light a more astounding transaction in the history of horse-dealing than had ever come to his (Mr. Laing's) knowledge. It was established on the most incontrovertible evidence that not a single animal out of the whole number had a real and bona fide existence. The manner in which that transaction was effected might be interesting to hon. Gentlemen who approved of the provisions of Sir John Barnard's Act. It appeared that there was a sort of Horse-Exchange in Aleppo, similar to the Stock Exchange of this country, with the sole difference that, whereas in the latter people speculated in what were technically known as "bulls and bears," in the former horses and camels were bought and sold; and the whole of the transaction now before the House was effected by the simple process of time bargains. From the Report of the Commissioners it would appear that Mr. Spitz-Goldstein's agent, for the purpose of establishing his principal's claim on Her Majesty's Government, effected a series of simulated purchases of horses, with persons in a low condition of life; that fictitious receipts and contracts were entered upon the register of the American Consulate, and legalized copies were furnished to Mr. Spitz-Goldstein, on payment of the usual fees. The evidence in support of this statement was very voluminous, and of a thoroughly unimpeachable character, and included that of the Consul of Aleppo, who said that no purchase could have been effected without his knowledge, that no such purchase was effected, and that the whole nature of his communications with Mr. Spitz-Goldstein had been to put him up to a good speculation, and not to enter into any contract. The Vice-Consul also said that no purchase was made, and can-

PRACTICE OF THE HOUSE.

REPORT OF RESOLUTIONS FROM COMMITTEES OF WAYS AND MEANS.

MR. BOUVERIE: Sir, I am anxious to draw attention to a question of considerable importance connected with the forms of the House which regulate the order of our business. I have observed with great surprise in the Votes that last night the House having gone into a Committee of Ways and Means, and certain Resolutions imposing licence duties upon refreshment-houses having been adopted by the Committee, those Resolutions were, contrary to the universal practice of the House, reported forthwith, and without the usual interval of at least a day. I cannot but conceive that this course of proceeding was taken entirely by inadvertence. I believe I am correct in stating that no precedent whatever can be found for the Report of Resolutions to the House immediately after their adoption in Committee of Ways and Means. I beg the House to observe this is not a mere matter of form; there is a great deal of substance in this as in many another form of the House. I must beg the House to observe that these Resolutions in Committee of Ways and Means are the first step taken towards the imposition of a tax, and we all know that in the case of certain taxes the moment the Resolutions imposing them are reported to the House the Revenue Department at once begins to make the levy. So that by reporting such Resolutions to the House forthwith—immediately upon their passing the Committee—no opportunity is afforded to the House, or to those hon. Members who were absent from the Committee—of reconsidering the matter, and finally determining whether it is expedient to levy a tax of the kind proposed. As I said before, I cannot help thinking that these Resolutions were so reported by mistake, and I hope the House will agree with me in holding that the respect which is due to our forms renders it necessary that in reference to the future we should revert to this proceeding and perhaps declare the Report null and void; so that it may appear on our Journals that this irregularity is not to be established as a precedent.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I wish to make a few remarks on the subject to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred, and which is certainly one of the most important which can possibly engage the attention of the House. It is one of the gravest possible questions. It is unnecessary for me to dilate at all on the value of the forms of the House, which have been devised by the experience of our predecessors for the welfare of the public. It may sometimes be a question whether some of these forms may not be insisted on too closely, and whether they may not be unnecessarily multiplied; although I believe that all those in this House who are most experienced in the conduct of public affairs are of opinion that we should approach the revision of them with the utmost caution. But there is one point upon which it is impossible there can be two opinions, and that is, that when a question of taxation is concerned it is incumbent on the House to observe with the greatest nicety, and even reverence, the forms which have been devised to prevent any rash decision on a subject which may involve the most vital interests of the country. It always has been the rule in all questions of Supply and Ways and Means, where the House has come to a decision in Committee, that decision should not be reported on the same day. If there were no formal Standing Order to that effect, the spirit of all our Standing Orders goes to that effect; but we have among our Rules one which positively directs that "Any Report of Resolutions from the Committees of Supply and Ways and Means, is ordered to be received on a future day." I believe there is no precedent upon our Journals of a contrary course having been taken; and I think every Gentleman who has given any consideration to the subject will agree with me that a more prudent regulation was never adopted by this House. I recollect a case, if my memory does not deceive me, in which even the prorogation of Parliament was postponed one day in order that a Resolution agreed to in Committee of Ways and Means that the Government were rather unexpectedly called upon to enter into should be duly reported. I was aware of the circumstance to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred, and it was my intention to have asked the House to consider it this evening; but in consequence of the interesting, though rather various nature of the business that has engaged us, I thought that on the whole it would be better to delay the matter till Monday, which was the first Government day after the thing complained of happened, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer should ask us again to go into Committee on the Wine Licences Bill. I should have been unwilling on that occasion to make any observations which might have conveyed any censure even by implication upon any Member of this House, whether on the Treasury bench or elsewhere, and the only reason why I should have brought forward this very grave subject would have been that the House should take steps to prevent the course which was followed last evening from being hereafter quoted against us as a precedent; because there probably might be circumstances in which, with such a precedent, public business might be hurried through in a manner which would have a very injurious effect upon even the public fortunes. But, as the right hon. Gentleman has brought forward the subject, it is impossible for me to pass it over in silence. I agree with him that it is not sufficient that the Government should express their opinion that the course taken last evening was an inadvertence, and should not be drawn into a precedent:—I think we ought to have some record of the opinion of the House itself upon the point, because an expression of opinion on the part of the Government, however satisfactory to us, would not at all influence our successors, and upon our Journals this very dangerous precedent would appear without any countervailing record. I think, moreover, that where there is no doubt that a mistake has been committed merely from inadvertence it is more suitable to the dignity of the House and more agreeable to all of us that the remedial course should be undertaken by the Government themselves. I do not at all wish to take the matter into my own hands, and I dare say the right hon. Gentleman who, with his knowledge of the forms of the House, has properly introduced the question is equally averse to undertaking it; but if the noble Lord, the leader of the House, would on Monday take some steps in the matter, I think it would be satisfactory to the House. I think that it should be recorded that the proceedings of last evening, so far as they relate to the Resolution adopted in Committee of Ways and Means, are null and void, and that care should be taken that in future such Resolutions should be duly and properly reported to the House.

MR. MASSEY, the Chairman of Committees of Ways and Means, said, if there was any irregularity in our proceedings last evening, I am bound to say that I am primarily responsible for it. It will be fresh in the recollection of the House that last evening there were on the paper two Orders of the Day, one preceding the other. The Order for a Committee of Ways and Means stood first, and in that Committee there appeared upon the paper a notice of the intention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to move certain Resolutions imposing a duty upon wine licences. The next Order was the Wine Licences Bill. It was necessary, in order to pass that Bill through Committee, that the preliminary Resolutions imposing a duty upon wine licences should, in the first instance, be adopted in a Committee of Ways and Means. The Committee of Ways and Means sat, and the Resolutions, which were discussed at considerable length, were framed by the Committee after more than one division. After they were passed, and after I vacated the Chair, I asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as is the usual course, upon what day he proposed that the Resolutions should be reported. I do not at all wish to convey to the House that the right hon. Gentleman expressed a desire that the usage and practice of the House should be departed from; but I understood him to intimate that it would be convenient if the Resolutions could be promptly reported, in order that they might be inserted as clauses in the Wine Licences Bill, which stood next upon the list of Orders of the Day. I said—not having at the moment any opportunity of consulting the Journals or the authorities of the House—that upon principle, and with reference to the practice of the House in cases of emergency, I saw no objection to that course. I was aware that there was no Standing Order against it, and therefore I thought, if circumstances existed which rendered it desirable to depart from the ordinary practice of the House, that the House was the master of its own proceedings. But at the same time I did say that the Motion was one which I could not make on the steps of the Speaker's chair in the usual manner, and that the Minister who desired to have it made should himself state his wish to the House, and I did intimate—not, I think, to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster—that in my opinion, if any hon. Gentleman objected to the course proposed to be taken, it should not be insisted upon. I considered that with that precaution there could be no objection to the immediate reporting of the Resolutions adopted in Committee of Ways and Means, with a view to their insertion as clauses in the Bill which stood as the next Order of the Day. It is not for me to say whether it is incumbent upon the House to suffer no departure whatever, under any circumstances which may arise, from its ordinary practice. My own private opinion is, that for the House to impose such a restriction upon itself would be to create an unnecessary impediment to the despatch of public business; and not having any opportunity of consulting the Journals or the authorities of the House, I certainly did, upon principle, and with regard to the practice in the case of ordinary Bills, which are sometimes passed through their several stages without the usual intervals, intimate my belief that if the House consented, upon the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to the prompt reporting of the Resolutions passed in the Committee of Ways and Means, there could be no objection to that course being taken. However, I am free to say that if I had had an opportunity of consulting the Journals, and if I had found that they were entirely destitute of precedents, I should not have advised such a step to be taken. But at the same time I trust the House will not assent to the extreme measure of declaring the proceedings of last evening null and void. They are not null and void; they are perfectly valid. In the absence of any Standing Order prescribing a particular mode of procedure, it is competent for the House to vary its own practice. Putting it as high as you please, this is merely a matter of practice. The practice of the House is departed from when a sufficient emergency arises; nay, the Standing Orders of the House themselves are suspended for the purpose of facilitating public business; and therefore to say that the proceedings of last evening are null and void is to make an assertion contrary to the rules and the practice of the House. They may have been inexpedient; the emergency may not have been sufficient; but, in the absence of any Standing Order bearing upon the point, it is not competent for the House to say that they are null and void. I contend, without fear of contradiction, that, however inexpedient it may have been for the House to depart from its ordinary practice in this particular instance, the prompt reporting of the Resolutions of the Committee of Ways and Means was perfectly regular and in accordance with our Standing Orders, and that the action taken upon that Report cannot be impeached. I am prepared to admit having had an opportunity of consulting the authorities of the House and of examining the Journals, though not very carefully, and not having found an instance of a similar departure from the ordinary practice of the House, that the course taken last evening should not be drawn into a precedent; but, at the same time, I confidently maintain that it is perfectly valid and cannot be impeached.

MR. CARDWELL: I do not propose to enter at present into any argument as to what ought to be done on a future occasion, because I think that should be deliberately considered by the House. But I rise to express, on the part of the Government, their concurrence with my hon. Friend who has just sat down, with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock, and with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, that adherence to the Orders and Rules of proceeding in all matters of Supply and Ways and Means is much to be desired, and ought very carefully to be observed. In the Book which contains the Rules and Orders of Proceeding, at page 94, I find it stated that any Report of Resolutions from Committee of Supply or Committee of Ways and Means is ordered to be received on a future day. Everybody is aware that that is not only the usual, but the uniform practice. My hon. Friend who has just sat down has correctly stated what occurred last evening. When the Committee was concluded, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was asked what day the Resolutions should be reported. A suggestion was passed down that if he thought proper it might be reported immediately. On the spur of the moment, feeling the convenience of putting the clause in the Bill as soon as possible, he adopted that suggestion, but he called attention to the circumstance; so that there was no concealment. Therefore, at the moment, there was no practical inconvenience in the departure from the rule; but I quite agree that it is unfortunate there should be any departure from an established rule of that kind. Having so stated my opinion, the House will see that it is far from the desire of the Government that this departure should be drawn into a precedent or occur again. I am extremely sorry that this discussion should have arisen after my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had left the House; but before he left I had a conversation with him, in which I expressed my own opinion with regard to the irregularity, and he stated to me he entirely agreed with me, and he would consider whether on Monday he should not take the course which the right hon. Gentleman opposite has suggested—namely, make a statement to the House on the subject at the commencement of business.

MR. SPEAKER:—I wish to address the House on the subject of the order of their proceedings last night, which has just been brought under discussion. There is no doubt whatever about the correctness of the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman of the force of the rule which he has mentioned, that no Resolution should be reported to the House on the same day that it has been passed in the Committee. I think that, whether our Standing Order actually extends to that point or not, there is no doubt that the practice and the spirit of the Standing Order does so extend, and ought to have the same force in our proceedings. When I returned to the House, after an absence of some time, the Chairman reported to me in the usual way that the Committee had come to certain Resolutions, and that it should be reported forthwith. I did not put the Question. I said to the Chairman "What can the Resolution be which should make it fitting to report it forthwith?" I was in fact discussing that point with the Chairman when the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer rose and moved that the Report should be received forthwith. I understood that the matter had been previously spoken of in the House, and I imagined that the House was aware what was to be done, and that it was done by general consent. I did not feel that it became me when a Resolution was proposed to the House to decline to put it. No observation was made, and no objection was raised, on either side. I put the Motion to the House that the Report should be received forthwith; and as it passed, the Report was accordingly received. But I must express my opinion that the course was irregular; and I think that it will be better for the general conduct of business that we should not pass by this irregularity with simple observation, but that on a future occasion and on the earliest occasion—I see no objection myself to this evening—it should be corrected.

MR. HENNESSY, referring to some observations which had been made by the Solicitor General at an earlier period of the evening, said that there was a case reported in 2 Bingham, page 13, which established the principle that it was illegal to raise loans in this country to carry on war against a sovereign who was in amity with England.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT:—I am sure, Sir, that the whole House listened with great attention to the observations which you addressed to us with regard to the irregularity of our proceedings last night; and I took particular notice that, among other matters, you suggested that it was competent to us to amend that irregularity without further notice this evening.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Not until this Motion has been disposed of.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT:—Quite true, and I am not about to conclude with any proposition; but after the highest authority in the House has suggested to us that an irregularity has been committed in our proceedings, and that it is competent to us without further notice to amend it to-night, I think that it is a duty incumbent upon those who lead the House not to allow it to separate this evening without the correction of that irregularity. The leader of the House and the Gentlemen around him will advise as to the mode of proceeding proper to be adopted, and will, no doubt, consult the highest authority in the House upon the subject; but I do think that, after such an intimation from the Chair, it would not be becoming for us to separate without the irregularity being corrected.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON:—If the House will permit me, it will, perhaps, be better that I should make a single observation with regard to the irregularity committed last evening. I quite admit the propriety of your suggestion, Sir, that some proceeding should be adopted to mark that it was an irregularity, and to prevent any similar irregularity occurring in future. At the same time I think that in what we do no blame ought to be imputed to any persons who were parties to that irregularity, because no blame properly attaches to any of them. It was an inadvertence, and as such it ought to be treated. I think that the best course would be for the House to allow us till Monday to consider what will be the best course to adopt; and I will undertake on that day to propose something that will attain the object which we have in view.

Motion agreed to.

ARMY (PENSIONS FOR WOUNDS).

ADDRESS MOVED.

COLONEL NORTH, in rising to move that an humble Address should be presented to Her Majesty, praying that she would be graciously pleased to reconsider the Warrant granting Pensions and Allowances to Officers of the Land forces, limited to Wounds and Injuries received in Action, disclaimed any intention of impugning the manner in which the Secretary of State for War had carried out the warrant; and said that his only object was to extend the powers of the right hon. Gentleman in regard to the granting of pensions to wounded officers. The warrant was dated the 13th of June, 1857, and contained eleven clauses. At that late hour he would only refer to two or three clauses, and particularize one or two cases bearing upon each. The first clause to which he would call attention was that which permitted the recommendation for a pension of an officer who had lost a limb or an eye, or had totally lost the use of a limb, or had sustained a severe injury in action equal to the loss of a limb. The officer whose case he would mention with reference to this clause served with that gallant band of heroes which was commanded by the late Sir Henry Havelock. At the outbreak of the mutiny in India he found himself in command of the light company of his regiment, and was sent to keep open the communication between Allahabad and Benares—a duty which he performed with the greatest success. When Mr. Moore, a magistrato of the district, was murdered, he proceeded with only forty men to the scene of the murder, defeated a body of 1,500 rebels, and destroyed the village. He afterwards escorted a battery of artillery a distance of 150 miles, and then joined the force under the command of Sir Henry Havelock, and assisted in the relief of the Residency of Lucknow, during which operation he prevented the rebels from carrying off a gun which they were most anxious to secure. In that service he was wounded in the elbow. It was a day or two before the wound could be attended to, and the amputation was at last performed in a house in Lucknow through which shot and shell were falling at the time. The operation was performed with an instrument so blunted by use that hospital gangrene ensued, and on his arrival in England he was obliged to undergo another amputation of the arm. Nor was that all, for after the greatest suffering, he had had within the last six weeks or two months to undergo the same operation for the third time. That officer—like the others he had alluded to—with a modesty that did him great honour, had requested that his name might not be made public. The commander of his regiment had recommended him to the favour of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief as a young officer who had charge of the light company for a period of two years, and had commanded it in six actions, in each of which he had acquitted himself with a quickness and intelligence deserving of the highest praise. Wishing to obtain further compensation for having to undergo all the suffering incident to so protracted a cure, that officer made an application to the War Department. The answer he received from the Secretary of State was, that the pension awarded to officers sustaining injuries in action only commenced one year after the date of their wounds; and that, as the applicant had had awarded to him the utmost amount to which he was eligible under the regulations in consideration of the wound he had received on the 25th of September, 1857, the Secretary of State for War was precluded from complying with his application. It must have been very painful for a man of his right hon. Friend's kindly feelings to write such a letter as that to so meritorious an officer. The next case he had to mention was that of a young officer who distinguished himself very much in the attack on the Redan, and was severely wounded on the 8th of September, 1855.

The wound was followed by partial paralysis, but he was able to rejoin his regiment in the following year. He was examined by a medical board at Gibraltar, who reported that his wound was equal to the loss of a limb, and he received a pension. He came home to England, and was again examined by a medical board, who reported that his wound was nearly, but not quite, equal to the loss of a limb. On that report his pension was taken away from him, and he was told that he must go on half-pay before he would be allowed a pension. But to go on half-pay would be to deprive himself of all prospect of professional advancement. He was at present the second captain in his regiment; if he were on half-pay, and supposing he ever got back again on full pay, he must go to the bottom of the list. The last case he would mention was that of an officer who was shot in the thigh at the battle of Inkermann. A medical board reported in his case that his wound was nearly equal to the loss of a limb; that his leg had been shortened four inches, and that he was incapacitated from performing the duties of an officer of infantry. He applied for a pension, and the answer he thought went far to prove that the notorious Shylock must at one time have been War Minister, and that the forms he instituted kept their place to the present day. The reply stated that Mr. Secretary Herbert was prepared to recommend him for a pension of £70 a year for two years, from the date of his retirement on half-pay, and on his expressing his willingness to refund six out of the eighteen months' gratuity he had already received. This, he thought, was Shylock's pound of flesh without the penalty of the one drop of blood. He could scarcely believe that this application had come under the notice of the Secretary of State, for, with his kind heart, he never could have directed such an answer to be written. It certainly never could be the desire of Parliament or the people that such bargains as this should be made with men who were ready at any moment to sacrifice their lives for their country. He had spoken to many officers on this subject, some of whom had themselves been wounded—the Duke of Richmond, for instance—who all agreed that the working of this warrant was most unjust. All he wished was that the Secretary of State should have the power of dealing with distressing cases, such as these he had quoted, and in order to secure responsibility, he told that warrants are not Acts of Parliament; and that they can be altered by the Secretary of State and the Commander-in-Chief; but if I am to adopt proposals such as that now submitted in deference to the feeling of this House, what becomes of the authority of the Commander-in-Chief? He has not been consulted; his opinion has not been taken; and I, as a civilian, should have altered a regulation without going to the military authorities for their opinion at all. In all cases of this description you must have rules laid down by which those in authority are to be guided, and those rules must be founded on some intelligible principle. I take the case of the very gallant officer mentioned by my hon. and gallant Friend, and who underwent three amputations of his arm. He has done eminent service—his service is not to be rewarded by the amount of pension for wounds—pensions are not given in compensation for the suffering or amount of pain that may have been endured, but for the disability consequent on the loss of a limb, or equivalent to the loss of a limb. An officer cannot receive the pension unless he goes on half-pay, because the fact of his being on full pay shows that he is able to follow his profession. In this particular case the officer received, and most justly received, at the hands of the Commander-in-Chief promotion to a company in another regiment without purchase. The question is simply whether under the peculiar circumstances of the loss of a limb, aggravated in his instance by the increased personal suffering of three different amputations, you can apply a different principle to this particular case; not that I undervalue suffering, but the principle being that you compensate not for suffering, but for disability consequent upon suffering. The gallant Officer asks how I could make such a bargain, awarding two years' pension if the officer gave back six months' gratuity. I am bound while the warrant exists to act upon it. I have no power to depart from it. Either a year's gratuity may be given or, in an aggravated case, 18 months' gratuity; but, if that be followed by a pension, the gratuity must be confined to a year's gratuity, and six months of that gratuity must be refunded. The other case mentioned by the hon. and gallant Officer is one, I am ashamed to say, I am unacquainted with. But on the whole of this subject let me say that it is impossible for me, on a Motion made in this House, to give at once an opinion as to what should be done. I am bound to consult others—I am bound to let others have the full weight of their authority. I am against giving an unlimited authority or enlarged powers to an official in the situation I hold. I have no objection to take the responsibility of these decisions, but you will not find two Secretaries of State whose decisions are the same. I find in a particular case unlimited discretion given as to the giving of pensions to the widows of general officers. I am very much perplexed as to the amount of those pensions. I have tried to frame a rule that should be followed; but here is the result. I looked back to the decisions of several Secretaries of State, and find that they have never been guided by the same rule. One said, "Such and such a general officer's widow was born in a high rank in society; her requirements, therefore, are greater;" and she would be awarded a pension on a higher scale than another general officer's widow, who had not been so high-born. I have not acted on that rule. I thought the sole rule should be not the rank of the lady but the rank of the deceased husband—military, not social rank. There are numberless decisions, however, proceeding on exactly the contrary principle; and I also find pensions given to ladies without children larger than those given to widows with a numerous family to support. And what is the consequence? Why, nobody knows on what principle you act; one person is refused, and another in a similar position has her claims allowed—and such different treatment is imputed to partiality. It is dangerous then, I say, to give great discretionary powers without strict rules being laid down as to how the discretion should be exercised. There is undoubtedly a disposition to give all you can, but in dealing with a large department and a large profession that is impossible. I do not think large discretionary powers would work well; yet I quite admit that there are points in the warrant that might be improved. But as to what we should do, and to what extent we should go, I must consult others before forming or giving an opinion. I trust, after what I have said, the gallant Officer will not press the Motion to a division, or I shall be obliged, from the duty I owe to myself and the service, to resist it.

MR. DEEDES said, that the Motion was merely for a recommendation of the reconsideration of a warrant which was the cause of cases being treated with undue severity. As that was the only object, and as the right hon. Gentleman had admitted that the warrant was not perfect, he thought it would be better that the Motion should be withdrawn, and the matter left in the hands of the Government.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he could not agree with the recommendation of the hon. Gentleman, and he considered the explanation of the Secretary of War most unsatisfactory. A great deal of injustice was done by the present system. If, therefore, the hon. and gallant Member went to a division he should vote with him.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I hope the hon. and gallant Gentleman will take the advice which has been given him by an hon. Gentleman on his own side of the House, and withdraw his Motion, resting satisfied with the assurance which he has received from my right hon. Friend near me, that he will communicate with the officers of those departments concerned in this question, and endeavour to find out whether the existing regulations may not be improved, in reference to the particular points under our notice. For my own part I confess that I should, even if this Motion were carried, feel very much at a loss how to act upon it, inasmuch as I was unable to understand from the hon. and gallant Gentleman what the special matters are in reference to which he wishes the existing state of things to be altered, and to what extent that alteration, if we agree to make it, should be carried. I myself have had some experience in this question, and I may state that when I was at the War Office I found it extremely difficult to frame regulations which should include every case which ought to be included, and to exclude those with respect to which allowances ought not to be made. The temper of the House itself, I may add, interposes no small obstacles in the way of dealing satisfactorily with the subject. At one time it is disposed to make the most liberal grants of every sort and kind, while at another time a different mood comes on, and it complains of the great expense which is incurred, and urges the Government to limit the amount laid out in the shape of grants and pensions. This has happened, for instance, in the case of pensions for wounds; for, when first the warrant with regard to them was established, the pension allowed increased with the promotion of the recipient, so that the pension granted to a lieutenant became augmented as he reached the ranks of captain or major. Subsequently the House relapsed into a more economical frame of mind; that regulation was altered, and the pension continued to be of the same amount as that which was originally conferred. The House will, I think, under these circumstances, perceive that it is hardly dealing fairly with a Government to make such alterations as are now proposed without specifying more particularly in what those alterations are actually to consist. I trust, therefore, that hon. Members will be disposed—seeing that they give my right hon. Friend credit for being anxious to adopt as far as possible the existing regulations to meet the claims preferred by officers in consequence of the wounds which they may receive—to look upon it as the wisest course to pursue to allow my right hon. Friend to take the matter into consideration in conjunction with the officers of the several Departments interested in the subject—receiving also any suggestions which the hon. and gallant General opposite might wish to make to him in private with all the attention which they deserve. That being done, my right hon. Friend would then on a future occasion be in a position to state to the House what, upon full consideration, and with a due regard to public economy, he would be able to effect in the matter. A more satisfactory result would, in my opinion, by that means be brought about than by the adoption of an Address which points to no specific objects.

COLONEL NORTH, in reply, said that when he brought the subject under the consideration of the House four years ago, a promise was made that the warrant should be reconsidered. As, however, nothing had since been effected in that direction, he felt it to be his duty to persevere in his Motion.

Resolved,

“That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to reconsider the Warrant granting Pensions and Allowances to Officers of the Land Forces, limited to Wounds and Injuries received in Action.”

THAMES EMBANKMENT.

COMMITTEE.

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON proposed that—Sir Joseph Paxton, Lord John Manners, Mr. Cowper, Sir John Pakington, Mr. Alderman Cubitt, Sir John Shelley, Mr. Stirling, Mr. Tite, Lord Robert Montagu, Mr. Walter, Sir Morton Peto, Mr. Philippa, Mr. Roupell, Mr. Yorke, and Mr. Beamish —be appointed Members of the said Committee.

LORD FERMOY thought the Metropolis was not fairly represented on the Committee, and moved that the name of Sir James Duke be substituted for that of Alderman Cubitt.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member could not suggest the insertion of another name on the Committee without due notice.

LORD FERMOY would move that the name of Alderman Cubitt be omitted.

MR. CONINGHAM thought it quite necessary that the Metropolis should be fully represented.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON hoped that the name of Alderman Cubitt would be retained.

MR. CUBITT begged, on the part of his absent relative, to say that Alderman Cubitt was by no means disposed to encourage an unnecessary expenditure of the public money.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE moved that the debate be now adjourned.

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON was astonished that any person should object to retaining the name of Alderman Cubitt on the Committee. If the advice of the noble Lord were taken, they would have eight Metropolitan Members on the Committee, and he should like to know what respect would be paid to a Report emanating from such a Committee?

MR. JOHN LOCKE complained that the inhabitants of London, upon whom it was plainly intimated that, if this plan for embanking the Thames were carried out, the expense would mainly fall, were by no means adequately represented, although the Committee was largely composed of contractors, engineers, and others, whose interest it was to promote expensive undertakings.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON referred to the names of four or five Gentleman intimately connected with the Metropolis, for the purpose of showing that its claims had been very fully considered in the formation of the Committee. Considering that the functions of that Committee were only to inquire as to the practicability of the embankment, he did not think there were grounds for any serious opposition to its appointment.

MR. AYRTON said, it was perfectly understood that the Committee was only to be appointed for the amusement of its Members, and therefore the nomination of individual Members was of no consequence whatever. No practical results were to follow.

Motion by leave withdrawn.

Question put and agreed to; Power to send for persons, papers, and records. Five to be the quorum.

House adjourned at half after One o'clock, till Monday next.

ITALY.—EXPEDITION AGAINST NAPLES. QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he had privately given notice to his noble Friend the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs of his intention to put a Question with respect to the unopposed departure from the port of Genoa of a certain armed expedition, which was notoriously of an offensive character, and was supposed to be destined for the Neapolitan shores. It was not his intention at present to say a word as to the policy of Her Majesty's Government; he merely wished to ask whether his noble Friend would lay upon the table of the House any despatches, either from Sir James Hudson or from our Consul at Genoa, giving an account of the manner in which the expedition was permitted to sail. He was quite ready to accept as conclusive what was stated by the Foreign Secretary in the other House of Parliament—namely, that Her Majesty's Government had distinctly remonstrated with the Government of Sardinia on this subject, declaring that any interference by way of support, or any complicity on the part of the Sardinian Government, would naturally lay them open to the suspicion of having acted in direct violation of international obligations. He merely asked the question for the sake of the information it might elicit, because if the intelligence received this morning was confirmed it was notorious that the expedition had failed of exciting insurrection in the Neapolitan territories. Unfortunately, everything connected with Sicily exposed us to a most unjust prejudice in many parts of the Continent, and direct attacks had been made in foreign newspapers against Her Majesty's Consul at Genoa for assisting in the departure of the expedition. He (the Marquess of Normanby) knew the English Consul at the port, and felt sure that the rumour was unfounded; but it would conduce to the public convenience if the Government would lay upon the table any papers which had been received on this subject. His object was to take the surest and most complete mode of disproving the accusations which had been made against Her Majesty's diplomatic agents in that part of the world for acts of which he believed them to be perfectly incapable.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, that if his noble Friend would move for copies of or extracts from the despatches from our Consul at Genoa there would be no objection to produce them; but that no despatches had been received from Sir James Hudson on the subject. He need hardly say that there was no foundation for the rumour alluded to by his noble Friend. But his noble Friend seemed to think, from the statement of the Foreign Secretary the other evening, that a remonstrance had been addressed to the Sardinian Government respecting this very expedition. What had really taken place, however, and what the Foreign Secretary had stated, was that some months ago, when there was a rumour of a similar expedition, Her Majesty's Government had remonstrated with the Government of Sardinia on the subject.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he would at once move for the production of the papers. The noble Marquess then moved an Address for Copies of or Extracts from any Despatches of Her Majesty's Consul at Genoa relating to the Departure of a Military and Naval Expedition from the Port of Genoa for the Dominions of the King of the Two Sicilies.

Motion agreed to.

CONTRACT GUNBOATS.

RETURN MOVED FOR.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE moved for, Return of all the Vessels or Gunboats below 1,000 Tons Burden built by Contract since the Year 1852, with the Names and Residences of the Contractors of each

Marquess of Normanby

Vessel; showing at the same Time the Year of their Construction, the Price contracted for, together with their present Condition as to Sea-worthiness. The noble Earl said he was induced to make this Motion in consequence of the reports which had been for some time current, and which were now thoroughly believed, that a number of the small vessels built within the last four or five years by contractors, under the sanction of the Crown, had turned out to be in such a decayed condition that they were not supposed to be fit for any service whatever until they had undergone a thorough repair. These rumours had naturally produced in the country a feeling of indignation; because it was felt that there was something, either on the part of the Government or on the part of the contractors, or perhaps on the part of both, owing to which a large sum of money had been lost to the country, and the hope and belief which had been entertained that the defences of the country were daily strengthening and improving had been at once destroyed. This was a matter for very grave consideration. He was bound to say that the present Government were not implicated in this matter, as the contracts were made before they came into office, and he had no doubt the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty was as anxious as he was himself to remedy so great a grievance. The contractors, no doubt, undertook to perform that of which they had notice in the document called a "specification of work," which he had not moved for, but which would, if the present Return were granted, as it would be necessary in fairly judging of the state of the case; and he intended, on a future occasion, to move for it. From what had fallen from one of the Ministers in "another place," he understood it was well known to the Government that there was in the merchant builders' yard at the time the contracts were entered into no timber of good quality, but only such as was usually termed unseasoned, and only fit for temporary purposes. If it turned out that the contractors made the agreement with a clear engagement to perform the very best work at the very best prices, and that the specification contained those words which involved the very best description of construction, with the most expensive materials, and the best price, and if the Government were then aware that the timber was unfit for use, then he must say that, the Government were more in fault than the contractors: because, if it had been thought necessary to run up a number of vessels for temporary use, it would have been easy to draw up specifications which would have allowed of vessels being built for temporary purposes at a moderate cost. If, on the other hand, the contractors made an agreement, and stated that they were quite prepared to build ships with the best materials and the best work, then they were the parties to be censured. But with regard to the Government, he wanted to know where the responsibility rested, in order that he might lay his hand on the right person. He knew that the responsibility of the Government, as a general matter, was very attainable; that is, the Government was responsible, and if not acceptable to the country, would speedily cease to be a Government. He knew also that the Board of Admiralty was responsible for naval matters. Yet, as it happened in this case, there was not what was wanted, knowledge in combination with responsibility. There could be no real responsibility where there was no knowledge. While a civilian was at the head of the Admiralty, there was a difficulty in dealing with questions connected with management of the naval resources of the country. But in this case this did not apply, for he apprehended that the real party responsible was the Surveyor of the Navy. Now the Surveyor of the Navy, since it had been discovered that these boats had rotted, had changed his name, and become "Controller" of the Navy. What he (the Earl of Hardwicke) wanted to know was, whether the Controller was responsible for what had taken place? That functionary was bred a seaman, and was a highly respectable officer; and he was placed in the position of Surveyor of the Navy, for which situation a person should be selected who was brought up from his earliest life, as an apprentice in the building yard, to the use of the adze. But at present all the Surveyor could say was, that as he had not been educated to the business of a shipwright, he knew nothing of the details of construction, and could only refer to those under him in order to ascertain whether the work had been done agreeably to the specification. Formerly they had for Surveyors of the Navy responsible officers—men who had served their apprenticeship and gone through the various grades of the shipwright business. Those men looked to promotion to the Surveyorship of the Navy just as an eminent lawyer looked to becoming Lord Chancellor. Sir

James Graham, in his wisdom, when First Lord, abolished the system, and appointed a gentleman who, however distinguished in other matters, was utterly incapable as a Surveyor. The powerful Whig jobbery of the day introduced Sir William Symonds as surveyor. He was an excellent officer and able man, but he was quite ignorant of shipbuilding, and in his new office proved quite a failure. He was succeeded by Sir Baldwin Walker, who was an able naval officer and an excellent administrator, but was no more fit for Surveyor than he (the Earl of Hardwicke) was. He knew nothing whatever of construction, he had never been educated to it; yet he was the only person whom the Admiralty had to make responsible for these vessels. It would not be difficult to find men who were thoroughly fitted for the office. He knew he might be told that there was a Board of Construction. He knew very well what a Board of Construction was, and what a Board of Admiralty was also. There was a First Lord of the Admiralty at the head of the one, and a Surveyor of the Navy at the head of the other, and neither of them had been educated to the profession which he had undertaken. Those men who were responsible had no professional knowledge, and those who had professional knowledge were irresponsible. The case of these gunboats was one of so flagrant a character, and it was important that the fullest information should be obtained on the subject, that he hoped the House would grant him these Returns. If they did, he would promise to follow the matter up with the view of bringing before them the exact state of facts with reference to the boats themselves, and also the responsible persons connected with these transactions. The subject would at any time have been an important one, but it was more especially so now when we were building by contract on so large a scale. No less than £1,000,000 was to be expended on four iron vessels for which a contract had been entered into. These vessels were to cost £250,000 each. Under these circumstances he was sure their Lordships would agree with him that it was their duty to do all that could be done in the way of precaution for the future. With regard to those gunboats which were the subject of his remarks, he was told that a few of them had been examined and found in a very decayed state, and that two or three were broken up; but from the information he had received—which he hoped might not be accurate—he was led to believe that the whole of them were more or less worthless. He was told that the whole sixteen which had been hauled up at the slip at Portsmouth were rotten, and that the condition of the remainder was such that those which were to be repaired would cost as much for repairs as the cost of their original construction. There was not only the question of unseasoned timber, but also that of the fastenings. Their Lordships had no doubt heard that in some cases there was no thorough fastening, but that while a bolt-head appeared at each side there was no union in the centre. This was even a more important matter to the seaman than the other. A seaman might not perhaps care so much about being obliged to be at sea for a few months in a vessel of which the timber was not sound; but what must be his feelings if he learned that he was aboard one which had not proper fastenings? He trusted their Lordships would grant him Returns which might be the means of bringing home to the proper parties acts which he could not designate by any other term than criminal. There was the more necessity for the supervision of Parliament, where they had rascally contractors on one side and an irresponsible Surveyor on the other.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: There can be no objection to give the information which the noble Earl desires, and which, indeed, has already been moved for and ordered in the other House of Parliament. One part of the information sought for in the Return would be difficult to obtain immediately—namely, the present state of all those boats with respect to sea-worthiness. We have at present no fewer than 162 gunboats, and to be able to give an account of their sea-worthiness we should be obliged to have them all brought into dock, stripped, and examined. That cannot be done with regard to the whole of them, as your Lordships will see when I state how they are distributed. There are 53, divided into three divisions in different ports, at home; at Haslar, 45; in commission at Pembroke and elsewhere, 8; in China, 24; North America, 3; Mediterranean, 3; South-east Coast of America, 2; connected with the Coastguard, 14; in course of construction, 10;—making a total of 162. When the present Board of Admiralty came into office we heard a great deal about the gunboats, particularly those at Haslar, and we thought it our duty to have them inspected. They were inspected, and certainly a considerable amount of decay was found in them.

The Earl of Hardwicke

I believe, indeed, their defective state had been discovered some months before, and at the time of our inspection workmen were already engaged in repairing them. More hands were put on, and during the whole of the summer there were 100 men employed. Of the 45 gunboats at Haslar 23 have been thoroughly repaired; 6 more are in hand; so that 29 are either repaired or in a state of progress. We have been told that it was a mistake to keep the gunboats out of the water; but some of those afloat are quite as much decayed at those at Haslar. The one class does not seem to be more exempt from decay than the other. With regard to those in commission we have heard no complaint. We have had gunboats constantly at work in China and with our Coastguard, and, as far as we know, they have been, and are, perfectly efficient. So that the matter is not quite so serious as some people suppose; nor is it correct to say that no reliance whatever can be placed upon any of the gunboats. I admit, however, that great blame rests somewhere for the mode in which many of these vessels were constructed. But we must look back to the circumstances which then existed. We commenced the Russian war with no gunboats. We were then engaged in repairing ships and replacing sailing by steam vessels. Your Lordships may be aware that in the private builders' yards there is at any moment but a small stock of timber, and therefore when this pressure arose the builders had great difficulty in obtaining timber. Under these circumstances the Government offered not only the contract price, but also a bonus for each gunboat that was completed within a certain time; so that the builders had the advantage not only of the contract, but also of the bonus. This however was not much to their profit, because the shipwrights in the Thames, being bound by no engagements, demanded an increase of wages; and this, combined with the rise of the price of timber, had been so seriously to the disadvantage of the contractors, that it is reported that some of them had been ruined by their contracts. As regards what took place in 1854-55 I speak quite independently; I am in no way responsible for what the Government did then; but I have inquired into what occurred, and I have been told that in many of these yards there were two inspectors—a chief inspector, and a leading man under him—to watch the progress of the work. They were, however, working day and night; it was during the winter, in many cases snow was upon the ground; and thus under this pressure opportunities were offered to dishonest workmen to commit the fraud which has been referred to by cutting off the bolts. What makes that offence more flagrant is that the copper was supplied to the contractors in long lengths by the Admiralty to be cut up for bolts as it was required by the builders. So far as we have gone we have found only two or three vessels in which this iniquitous fraud has been committed, and I do not attribute it to the contractors, but to some of the workmen who may have been introduced into the yards under the pressure of the period. That question of the bolts was brought under the notice of the Admiralty only about two months ago, since which time I have instituted inquiries with a view to taking such legal proceedings as may raise the whole question, and, if possible, secure the punishment of the guilty parties. What the noble Earl said about the Surveyor of the Navy is not applicable to this case. At that time great exertions were being made in our dockyards to fit out vessels rapidly; there were a number of vessels to be built, and contracts and specifications to be drawn up, and the Surveyor of the Navy, as he was then called, could not himself visit the private yards and inspect the works which were going on there. He was much more usefully employed in overlooking the great works which were going on in our dockyards. All he could do was to employ the best men he could get as inspectors. With the advice and concurrence of the superintendents of the different yards he took the best leading men and workmen, and sent them to the different contractors' yards to inspect the work which was going on there. That I believe is the system which has always prevailed, and I know no better one which could be adopted. If you are building a house you must trust to the clerk of the works, and if he chooses to connect himself with the contractor and permit him to put in bad timber, you are quite helpless until you find it out some time afterwards. In the same manner, in the case of building a ship, if the man or men whom you appoint as inspectors enter into connivance with the builders—I do not say that that was the case in this instance—but, if they do, I do not see what resource you have or by what means you can protect yourselves. The noble Earl complains that the Surveyor of the Navy is not a practical shipwright. That question has been discussed over and over again. We have had shipbuilders as Surveyors of the Navy, and naval men have complained of them, that though they could build a ship they knew nothing about fitting it, and that the vessels which they constructed were not suited to go to sea. In the last arrangement which has been made the Admiralty took this course. They appointed a practical shipbuilder to attend to the construction of the vessel, a practical engineer to look after the machinery, and a naval man to act with them and to give them advice. So far as I can learn—although, of course, great improvements may still be made, and I think naval architecture is making very rapid progress—the ships which have been built under this system are very satisfactory. The Channel fleet has, as your Lordships are aware, been at sea in one or two gales, and it has been tried, although not very seriously, yet enough to enable naval officers to judge of the qualities of the ships of which it is composed. As soon as it arrived in port I wrote to the captain of each vessel, and asked him to tell me what he thought of her and of her behaviour while she had been under his command, and what, if any, improvements he could suggest in her build. Upon the whole, the Reports which I have received in reply are most satisfactory and do great credit to the builders of these vessels, because they show that they are very efficient ships and have, so far as they have been tried, behaved very well. Therefore, I think, in opposition to the view of the noble Earl, that the system which we have got is, upon the whole, a good system. The reason for changing the title of the Surveyor of the Navy to that of "Controller of the Navy" is to show that he is not actually a shipbuilder, but that he is to overlook the other two departments, and to bring the practical knowledge of a seaman to the technical information of the shipbuilder and the scientific information of the engineer, and by the combination of the three to give to naval men the assurance that they will have placed under their command the best ships that can be constructed. It is impossible that any of these officers should give to the dockyards the practical inspection which is necessary, and, therefore, I had intended to connect with the department of the Controller an officer who should visit the dockyards, see what is going on and communicate with the Admiralty more readily than can be done under the existing system. The reason why I have yet made no such appointment is, that a Commission on Dockyards has been moved for in "another place," and I thought that it would be better and more respectful to Parliament to wait for its Report than at once to carry out my own idea. It has been said that many of these gunboats were constructed of green wood. That, however, is not the worst, for in many cases not only was the wood which was used green, but the sap was not properly removed from it. That was a much greater fault, because it was hardly to be expected that in private yards there should be a proper supply of seasoned timber; but the material which was used might in all cases have been properly prepared for use. In order to prevent similar occurrences in future, we have laid down a rule that when any builder applies to the Board of Admiralty for a contract for building ships, the Board shall send a person to visit his yard to see what stock of timber and what slip accommodation he has got. By watching carefully the quantity of timber they keep in store, and by giving the contracts to those builders who keep the largest quantity of suitable timber, the Admiralty hope to secure the use of proper materials in the construction of their vessels. The iron-coated vessels which are now being built are not vessels in which the question of seasoned timber materially enters; that used is chiefly foreign wood, and is used internally for strengthening the sides of the ship, and in no part is in contact with the water. With regard to the gunboats at Haslar, after consulting the other members of the Board, I am inclined to believe that vessels built some time ago, and which had not yet been launched, would be found now to be sound and well-seasoned. There were thirty or forty of those gunboats; and it was now intended to have them of a somewhat better class than those which we now possessed, so that they might be enabled to take a part in our colonial service, and save the expense of employing larger vessels. Reverting, however, to the quality of the timber used in the dockyards, I would remark that the foreign oak and teak, being brought from a distance, was all well seasoned, and the Admiralty were using that more and more every year. It was obvious that of English oak there was not a sufficient quantity in the market to meet the requirements of the dockyards,

but for some purposes they were obliged to use it. Considering the rate at which they were building last year, it must be obvious that our stock of timber was limited in comparison with the demands upon it, and efforts were therefore being made to obtain timber from all parts of the world. Last year there were added to our efficient navy, by launching new vessels or by the conversion of sailing into steam vessels, 17 ships of the line, 9 frigates, 3 corvettes, and 7 sloops, which would form almost a fleet of themselves. If the Admiralty went on building at that rate, it would be impossible for them to obtain the quantity of well-seasoned timber that would be required. But as regards our present operations, we are putting vessels on the frames rather to season them than to launch them with the rapidity that we have lately done. My Lords, I know of no other point to which I need now advert. I have stated why we cannot give the information now asked for with respect to every gunboat, but only as to those of them that have been examined. But in the statement which will be produced the words "not examined" will be entered against those vessels which have not undergone inspection. One-half of the mortar-boats are built of iron. As to the wooden mortar-boats, we have not yet gone over the whole of them, and are not, therefore, able to state what is their condition.

THE MARQUESS OF TOWNSHEND deprecated the existing system, in conducting which no one appeared to be responsible. It was melancholy to think that men could be found who would, instead of driving copper bolts into the wood, put them into their pockets. If there was anything that could make a seaman tremble it would be a suspicion of the unseaworthy condition of his vessel, and that it was rotten and would not hold together. The inquiry should be gone into most thoroughly; and if the service was to be liable to these dreadful frauds it would be better that they should use the old trenails instead of copper bolts. As regarded unseasoned wood, they ought to have an adequate supply for our enormous navy, and if oak could not be had in sufficient quantities, supplies of teak—which was a good heavy wood—could be obtained. Something, however, must be done to prevent a recurrence of what had taken place, and somebody must be made responsible.

THE EARL OF SHREWSBURY AND TALBOT made a few remarks, which were inaudible.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, there was a Board of Construction in former years, but it did not exist now. The members of the Board of Admiralty used to take part in the construction of ships; but that system was not found at all to work well, and it was then determined to make the Surveyor responsible for giving advice in such matters. At present, when the Board thought more line-of-battle ships or other vessels were required, they sent to the Surveyor, who called in the practical men under him to prepare the lines; and then his advice, together with the plans, was submitted for the approval of the Board.

Motion agreed to; Returns ordered.

ROAD THROUGH HYDE PARK.

PETITION.

THE EARL OF DUCIE presented a Petition praying that Measures may speedily be taken for establishing a Means of Communication between the Districts lying to the North and South of Hyde Park. The noble Earl said that although the subject was of considerable importance, he felt he should be hardly justified in bringing it before their Lordships were it not that unless the subject were laid before Parliament it would not receive the attention it deserved. The grievance of which the petitioners complained was, that the Park, from Park Lane on the east and Kensington Church on the west, lay like a barrier to any communication between the north and the south, except during the hours of daylight. It was not the first time that the question had been brought before Parliament, for in 1855 a Committee of the other House sat on Metropolitan communications, and reported favourably on the plan, placing it in the first class of Metropolitan communications which they recommended for adoption. Mr. Pennethorne, the architect, who gave evidence before the Committee, said that Hyde Park presented an impassable barrier between two important districts and enormous populations. And now, in view of the great increase that had taken place in the traffic on both sides of the Park, both north and south—in view of the establishment of the new Horticultural Museum, the Great Exhibition of 1862, and the daily increasing popularity of the South Kensington Museum—the improvement became still more imperative. The petitioners specially abstained from suggesting any particular plan, regarding that function as one properly belonging to the Governmental Department, which had charge of such matters. They were anxious, however, that, whatever was done, the sanctity of Rotten-row should be preserved, and that nothing should be done to interfere with that ride. Every plan that he had yet heard suggested included a tunnel under Rotten-row. It was, moreover, not desirable to make a public road in too close vicinity to Kensington Gardens.

LORD EBURY thought something must be done soon to improve the communication throughout the Metropolis, or the transit of traffic would become impossible. He was a Member of the Committee to which the noble Earl had alluded on Metropolitan communications. Various plans were produced before them to make a communication from the north to the south of Hyde Park, which were perfectly feasible, without interfering with the road to which the noble Earl alluded. At the same time, he must say there was another communication quite as necessary through St. James's Park, so as to relieve the traffic by Charing Cross to Westminster Bridge. Lord Llanover, when at the head of the Board of Works, projected a road through the Park, which, if it had been adopted, would have obviated the difficulty. It might be carried into effect without interfering with the Gardens, and would greatly relieve the traffic, the extent of which it was almost impossible to exaggerate. Looking at the map, he must say the road through Hyde Park had become absolutely necessary; and he hoped the Board of Works would lose no time in carrying out the recommendation of the Committee of 1855.

LORD LLANOVER said, that during the time he held the office of First Commissioner of Works, he necessarily gave great attention to the subject of the thoroughfares of the Metropolis, and he found that there was scarcely a main street that had a thoroughfare capable of allowing the constantly increasing traffic to pass without impediment. But though that inconvenience existed and though it was most desirable that it should be obviated, still as Member for one of the Metropolitan boroughs, he had become aware of the great difficulties in the way of effecting any material improvement; and for this reason—the other House had declared that they would not grant money for Metropolitan improvements, and that any funds required for that purpose must be raised by means of local taxes levied on the Metropolis. Now, he thought, that would be a very fair principle if the Metropolis were on the same footing with the other large cities and towns of the kingdom. But the Metropolis was an exceptional case. In almost every other city in the empire there were some collateral advantages that accrued to the municipality of the particular city or borough; they had the power of raising rates by taxes on coal and other articles brought into their towns or ports. It was true that the same power existed in the Metropolis; but there was very small portion of it—the City—that alone had the power of levying these taxes, and having that power the civic authorities expended the large sums of money arising therefrom over the comparatively small area which constituted the City. Therefore, when any great improvement was to be made outside the City it was necessary to provide the funds by a local rate. There had been a great desire for many years to improve the southern end of Park Lane, but their Lordships would be surprised when he told them that to carry out that improvement—to take down the houses from Piccadilly to a house opposite Holderness House—would require nearly £100,000. Now, it was impossible to levy such a sum as this by local rates; and his opinion had long been, and still was, that when any reform of the Corporation of London took place it was absolutely necessary that the taxes now levied by the Corporation in the shape of coal and corn duties and other taxes should be expended for the benefit of the whole Metropolis, and not for the City alone. A Bill had been introduced into the other House of Parliament for the reform of the Corporation of London, but he was not aware that it touched on the coal and corn dues levied by the Corporation. He hoped, however, that when it came up to their Lordships' House the suggestion he now made would not be forgotten by their Lordships. He was quite sure that if the large funds possessed by the Corporation—he did not speak of their private property, but of their power of taxation—were placed in the hands of some authority for the general benefit of the Metropolis and the public, the improvements becoming more urgently required from day to day might be speedily accomplished without any material addition to the local rates.

THE EARL OF FOWIS said, that if we had to wait until a new Board were constituted to administer the coal duties before we could have a communication from north to south through Hyde Park, he was afraid we should have to wait a very long time. But as he understood, the present question related not so much to Metropolitan communication generally as to the best mode of carrying out an improved communication through one of the Royal Parks. When certain improvements were carried out in the neighbourhood of Kensington Palace, he thought the proposed improvement might have been effected had the road been made less of a private road, and with a little more expenditure of money.

Petition to lie on the Table.

SELLING AND HAWKING GOODS ON SUNDAY BILL.

COMMITTEE (ON RE-COMMITMENT.)

Order for going into Committee (on Re-commitment) read.

LORD TEYNHAM implored their Lordships not to proceed with this cruel Bill, especially as, in his opinion, the existing law was sufficient for all proper purposes. Their Lordships should wait, and see how far public and private efforts could succeed in putting down needless Sunday trading, before they extended the stringency of the Act now in force. He held in his hand a petition from a person residing in Bricklane, St. Luke's, which stated that this Bill contained many anomalous and inconsistent provisions, which if carried into effect would operate with great hardship and oppression upon thousands of small shopkeepers, and was likely to cause great dissatisfaction. He would also call their Lordships' attention to some evidence which had been taken upon this subject before the Committee of their Lordships' House on Sunday Trading in 1850. A gentleman who had been examined stated that he was associated with some gentlemen who earnestly desired to get rid of the abuse of Sunday trading, but they found that they could not enforce the law of Charles II. because their hearts gave way in consequence of the amount of misery consequent upon the levying of fines. He recommended that they should not apply for an Act, nor try to bring the cases within the existing law, but that they should set about discouraging Sunday trading in other ways. Another gentleman connected with the Society stated that Bartholomew fair had been put down not by an Act of Parliament but by the Lord Mayor and other civic authorities discouraging it. The witness stated that by a report which he presented to the Corporation, he induced the Lord Mayor not to go in state to open the fair, and not to let ground for booths, wild-beast shows, and other exhibitions, and that when he (witness) went there in 1850 there were scarcely more persons congregated than on ordinary days. Sir Richard Mayne, the Commissioner of Police, who was also examined before their Lordships' Committee said that Sunday trading in the Metropolis was decreasing, and in some of the poorest districts, and this he attributed to the increasing morality of the people. He also said that the working classes had associated themselves together for the purpose of inducing their employers to pay their wages on Friday, or at an earlier hour on Saturday, and that in some instances they had accomplished that object; and he thought it would be better to postpone legislation until the success of these and similar efforts had been fully ascertained. The witness further added that there were many poor persons who did not know on Sunday morning what they would be able to get to eat on Sunday night, and that it would be manifestly hard upon them, in the event of their getting money for food, to prevent their purchasing it because it was Sunday. Looking to the great improvement which had taken place, it would be better, the same officer added, to leave the stricter observance of the day solely to the influence of public feeling, believing that compulsion was more likely to aggravate the evil. He (Lord Teynham), in conclusion, expressed his own conviction that if proper efforts were made a great deal of the unnecessary Sunday trading would cease, but that this result should be brought about by voluntary means, and not by the high hand of the law.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that on a former occasion the principle of the Bill was fully discussed, and upon a division, at the instance of the noble Lord, was adopted by a majority. Under these circumstances, he felt he ought to do no more on the present occasion than move that the House should resolve itself into Committee.

House in Committee.

Clause 1 (Penalties for selling, offering, or exposing for Sale).

On the suggestion of Lord PORTMAN the clause was altered so as to render the offender liable to conviction "before a police magistrate or any two justices of the peace."

LORD TEYNHAM objected to the clause on several grounds. The noble and learned Lord appeared to have but an imperfect knowledge of his own Bill. The clause permitted the sale of fish, meat, fruit, and poultry on Sundays under certain restrictions; but it did not permit the sale of vegetables at all. Now, if the Bill omitted from its list of exceptions any article which was material for supplying the necessities of the people on Sunday the want of such article must be endured by them until Parliament met again. There were hundreds of thousands of horses and cows kept in an unnatural state in London, and those animals wanted great attention; but to sell any article of food necessary for these animals on a Sunday would be criminal under this Bill. Another objection was that the Bill was confined to the Metropolitan districts, the City of London, and the liberties thereof; whilst they had evidence that this objectionable trading was carried on in Liverpool, Birmingham, and other places. He believed that it was a sound principle of legislation that, as far as possible, they should legislate for the whole country, and not pass a law for this or that town, when the facts were exactly the same in other places. This objection was more particularly forcible when the matter in hand was connected with the law of God; for then it was essential that the people should not be told that it was wrong to buy vegetables in London on Sunday, but that it was not wrong to do the same thing in Liverpool or Birmingham. There was one further objection to the clause; and that was the fine was to be any sum not exceeding 20s., nor less than 5s. He would remind their Lordships that in the Report to the other House of Parliament it appeared that out of four cases adjudicated on at Southampton it was necessary in two of them to levy distress warrants to enforce 5s. penalties. The clause would bear upon the poorest of the poor in London, and in nine cases out of ten of fines it would be necessary to issue distress warrants to seize the humble goods of these people. On these grounds he would, with all his heart, say "not content" to this clause.

LORD CHELMSFORD thought the noble Lord had hardly dealt fairly with him, for he seemed to attribute to him a desire to oppress the poor trader. He (Lord Chelmsford) had endeavoured to explain to their Lordships when he moved the second reading that it was a Bill, not of restraint and oppression, but a Bill of liberty, enabling persons who were compelled to trade on Sunday contrary to their inclinations to have the opportunity of observing that day properly, by compelling their neighbours to refrain from trading on that day — a course which was no more than they ought to adopt without any compulsion of law. It had not escaped his mind that it might be wrong not to except vegetables; but the answer made to him was that if he did give way in reference to that exception the grocers would require a similar exception in their favour. The noble Lord had not experienced the difficulty that there was in dealing with the various interests to be affected by the Bill. The noble Lord complained that this Bill applied only to the Metropolis. But he could state that in all the great towns, with the exception of Birmingham, there was no Sunday trading to any extent, as the Act of Charles II. was found quite sufficient in other places to suppress it. Sunday trading therefore being mainly confined to the Metropolis, which thus offered a bad example to the provincial cities, that was a reason why legislation should, at first at all events, be confined to the district where the evil was most rife and a remedy most demanded. He hoped no heat or animosity would be engendered by a Bill which he had introduced with no other view than to relieve the thousands of tradesmen, who had petitioned in its favour, and which would enable them to employ their Sundays in a way consonant with their wishes. If it were the pleasure of the Committee he should not have the least objection to except vegetables from the operation of the Act; but he had been informed that if he did so it would give rise to other claims for exemption.

EARL GRANVILLE could not understand why the Metropolis should be subjected to two different, and not always consistent laws on Sunday trading, while all the rest of the country was only under one law. He was also at a loss to understand how it happened that the Act of Charles II. was not sufficient to put down Sunday trading in London, while it was found quite sufficient in all the rest of England.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, a noble and learned Lord behind him had suggested a Clause to Repeal the Act of Charles II., so far as the Metropolis was concerned. With regard to Birmingham, he was happy to state, on the authority of a magistrate there, that the number of shops opened on Sunday in that town had been reduced from 400 or 500 shops to not more than forty. This was done under the provisions of Charles II.'s Act; but it was obvious that this Act could be more easily enforced in provincial towns than in large and populous towns like the Metropolis, where the traders defied the law.

LORD TEYNHAM observed that, considering the number of people who in London derived a livelihood from selling and hawking on Sundays, there would, in certain poor localities, be not a house, and hardly a room, in which there would not be a distress warrant for the recovery of penalties inflicted by this Act.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMANS was at a loss to know how the same reformation could not be wrought in London, as there appeared to have been wrought in Birmingham, and which appeared to be due either to a strict enforcement of Charles II.'s Act, or to the force of public opinion.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that public opinion had, no doubt, operated in certain provincial towns to check Sunday trading; but in London no public opinion on the subject existed.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 (Penalties for delivering Meat, Fish, and Poultry).

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, there was an inconsistency in this clause, when referred to the Clause of Exceptions. It appeared that a Christian could not buy meat after 9 o'clock on Sunday morning, while a Jew was allowed to buy it up to 10 o'clock. He wanted an explanation of the difference of this treatment between Jews and Christians.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, the explanation was very simple. The Jews used only that meat that was killed by persons of their own persuasion. As those persons could not kill the meat on their Sabbath, and as the Jews who bought it lived, many of them, in quite a different part of the town from those who sold it, representations had been made to him, by most respectable persons of the Jewish persuasion, that if the time for buying the meat was restricted to 9 o'clock in the morning, it would be simply impossible for them to buy it at all. They had suggested that the time should be extended to 11 o'clock; but he thought that was too late; and, as a compromise, he proposed 10 o'clock.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, it appeared, then, that more consideration was shown to the convenience of the rich Jew than to the poor Christian. The hour was extended to suit the Jew; but a working man who had but one room for all pur-poor, must either buy his meat on the Saturday night, and keep it all night in his one hot and crowded room, among the tools he worked with, and the rags he wore; or he must rise at an early hour on the Sunday morning, and buy it before 9 in the morning, or they must go without food for the day. Besides, it appeared that a gentleman was allowed to buy a newspaper up to 10 o'clock; why should a poor man be forced to buy his meat before 9? Surely a rich man could want his newspaper better than the poor man could want his dinner? He thought this was an unfortunate Bill; and the most unfortunate thing about it was, that it emanated from their Lordships' House.

THE EARL OF EGLINTON thought that the maintenance of a difference in the hours would have the appearance of being harsh, and would be found inconvenient if the Bill should pass. He believed it would be better to fix the hour for all things at 10 o'clock.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, if their Lordships were in favour of uniformity, he would rather fix the limit at 9 than 10, which he thought would be too near the hours of Morning Service.

LORD GRANVILLE approved of the general limitation to 10 o'clock.

Amendment made; the word "ten" inserted instead of "nine."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 (Provisions as to distinct and separate Offences).

LORD TEYNHAM said, he objected to the amount of the penalties that might be inflicted under this and the following clause; such an accumulation of fines would ruin thousands of persons selling on a Sunday.

LORD CHELMSFORD observed, that the persons alluded to could prevent their ruin by abstaining from an infraction of the Act.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 (Provisions as to distinct and separate offences).

LORD WODEHOUSE asked what was the object of putting down the street cries of oranges, &c. which were still permitted to be sold.

LORD CHELMSFORD: The reason was, that there were a great many people in London who revered the Sabbath, and that in many parts of the town these cries were felt to be an intolerable nuisance.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, he hoped he might be included in the number of those who respected the Sabbath; but what he wanted to know was, when they allowed the sale of these articles, why they prevented the cries?

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE said, perhaps, he might give the result of his fifteen years' experience as a clergyman in London on this subject. He could assure their Lordships that those cries were a great nuisance in the neighbourhood of churches; and he had often been obliged, during the administration of the Lord's Supper, to send out the officer to put a stop to the cries in his neighbourhood.

Clause agreed to.

Clause inserted, providing that the term of imprisonment for the first offence, in case of the nonpayment of the fine, should not exceed one calendar month.

Clause 6 (certain cases to which this Act does not apply).

LORD WODEHOUSE suggested that tobacco should be allowed to be sold on Sunday. A pipe of good tobacco was a wholesome refreshment to a poor man.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that tobacco was just one of those articles which a man might easily procure on Saturday.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY feared there would be great difficulty in dealing with certain branches of Sunday trading. If they permitted newspapers, for instance, how were they to deal with periodicals?

LORD CHELMSFORD defended the exemption. It had been his desire to steer a middle course between those who thought that no Sunday trading should be allowed at all and those who objected to any interference with it.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY submitted that the police should have greater powers to enforce the Bill.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, the original Bill had given the police authority to seize articles exposed for sale; but, in conformity with the suggestions of noble Lords who thought that that would be a dangerous power, he had now much modified the measure. If those who wished to enforce the observance of Sunday (whom he believed to be a majority of the retail traders of the Metropolis) requested the police to lay an information, it would be their duty to do so.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR thought the clause as it stood would not prove objectionable. From the numerous petitions he had presented, he inferred that there were hundreds and hundreds of very respectable persons who were most anxious to keep the Lord's Day, but who found it impossible so long as rival tradesmen refused to close their shops.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 7 and 8 agreed to.

Clause 9 (Appropriation of Penalties), LORD CRANWORTH proposed the addition of words to repeal the penalties of the statute of Charles II., as far as regards all offences prohibited by the present Bill.

After a few words from Lords WODEHOUSE and BELPER,

LORD CRANWORTH withdrew the Amendment, stating his intention to bring it up on the Report, which was fixed for Tuesday next.

LORD TEYNHAM gave notice that on the third reading he should take the sense of the House by moving an Amendment against the Bill.

Other Amendments made.

The Report to be received on Tuesday, the 22nd instant.

BANKRUPT LAW (SCOTLAND) AMENDMENT BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order.)

LORD CHELMSFORD moved to leave out certain words in the clause empowering the Bankrupt Court in Scotland to recall sequestration under certain circumstances. The noble and learned Lord said he had no desire to shelter the fraudulent individuals against whom the Bill was directed, but in dealing with a subject like this they ought to be very cautious not to violate general principles of the law of the land. His noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor) proposed to give the Bankrupt Court a discretionary power of recalling sequestration in cases where, after due inquiry, it appeared that the great bulk of the insolvent's liabilities were to traders in England and Ireland. The object of that provision was to oblige the debtor to come and render an account in the country where the majority of his creditors resided. The power was discretionary: but the bare fact of its being given in the Act would be taken as a direction to the Judge. Under those circumstances, it was desirable that the clause should not have a retrospective effect. He did not object to its prospective operation; but he was anxious that it should not apply to persons who—fraudulent though they might be—were only availing themselves of what was the existing law. He should move the omission of the words "has been or" which preceded the word shall; and this change would effect what he desired without in any way interfering with the prospective operation of the measure.

Amendment moved in page 1, line 9, to leave out ("has been or.")

THE LORD CHANCELLOR opposed the Amendment. He did not think that as it stood, it could cause any violation of those principles which he was as anxious to maintain as his noble and learned Friend or any other noble and learned Lord could be.

STATUTE CRIMINAL LAW CONSOLIDATION BILLS.

OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON BILL.—THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 3^a.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH said, he should oppose the third reading. The second clause dealt with the crime of murder, and he wished a proviso to be introduced into that clause that should meet the crime of wholesale murder arising out of the premeditated miscreancy of men who placed obstructions upon railways and thereby caused fearful loss of life. The 36th Clause provided that in cases where an individual was run over by a hackney carriage the driver should be subjected to the penalties of misdemeanour, but drivers of private carriages were exempted from that punishment. The Act gave no sufficient protection to the public against the fatal results of careless and reckless driving. In the last two years it appeared by the Returns that 134 persons had been killed, and 1,827 maimed and injured, in the Metropolis alone, by being knocked down and run over. The present state of the law was utterly ineffectual to repress the evil. Few persons could bring an action against the individual causing the injury; and there was no public prosecutor to put the law in motion. The deaths were generally found to be "accidental" by the coroners' juries, but the word was quite conventional; it was ridiculous to suppose that all the 134 victims were killed by accident. What was required to repress such recklessness was a power of immediately arresting the offender and awarding an immediate and personal punishment, not a paltry fine of 40s. In one of Moliere's plays, a doctor asked how a certain patient was, "He is dead," was the reply. "Impossible! He was not to die till Thursday." "Nevertheless, he died on Tuesday, after taking the remedy prescribed." To which the doctor returned. "Enough! I am satisfied. If the formalities of medicine were gone through, all was right." It appeared to him in this case, that if the formalities of law were observed, that was all that was looked for. It was the duty of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to deal with this question, but it had not received his attention. In the case of persons poisoned, the body was exhumed, and the Home Secretary directed a post mortem examination: but in the case of these 134 deaths and 1827 injuries he had directed nothing to be done. Probably the Home Secretary was too much engaged on the Reform Bill or the paper duty to attend to a matter that so seriously affected the lives and properties of the public. Believing that such offences as he had described required to be treated with something more than a mere legal formality, he must withhold his assent from that portion of the Bill.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON agreed that the offence, in reference to railways which had been alluded to by the noble Marquess should be repressed by the strong arm of the law; yet still he thought that it would be hardly possible to deal with that offence as with a case of murder. The Bill proposed the punishment of penal servitude for life, and he thought that would give sufficient protection to persons travelling by railway. As to injuries by running over persons in the street, the penalty might be two years' imprisonment, and that was a severe punishment.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH: What, for killing a man?

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON: But surely there was a difference between killing a man by running over him and killing him by murder; as also there was a distinction between both these cases and that of putting obstructions upon a railway. It appeared to him that the Bill would meet very many cases which occurred. He did not think there was anything to justify the strong censure which had been passed upon the Home Secretary.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY observed, that the Bill would deprive magistrates acting singly of some of the jurisdiction which they now exercised, at least in Ireland. The Court of Petty Sessions for most purposes, except in the cases specially provided for, was constituted by one magistrate, who might thus deal with cases of common assault, and award punishment. But by the 44th clause of this Bill two justices would be required to exercise summary jurisdiction in cases of common assault, or even to take informations for the purpose of sending offences for trial.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that these Bills for the consolidation of the criminal law of the country were presented in their present mature state as the result of the labours of successive Governments, whether Liberal or Conservative, for nearly thirty years, and if they now became law a great object would be accomplished. The objections raised by the noble Marquess were those which he had replied to before. Such acts as the noble Marquess described, if done maliciously, with intent to kill, would still be murder, and if done negligently with fatal consequences they would be manslaughter; it was, therefore, unnecessary to define them in this Bill. In reply to the suggestions of the noble Earl (the Earl of Clancarty), he would say that the Members of the Commission had taken the greatest care to discriminate between those cases where one justice only was required and the case which required two. He believed it would be found that the limits of the administration of the law by justices were satisfactorily defined.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH thought that if a public prosecutor were appointed a good deal of mischief might be prevented.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 3^a accordingly.

Amendments made.

Bill passed and sent to the Commons.

The other six Bills having for the object the consolidation of the statute criminal law were also severally read 3^a, passed, and sent to the Commons.

PROTEST AGAINST THE PASSING OF OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON BILL.

Dissentient,—

1. Because by the 33rd Clause of the Bill it is provided that placing wood, stone, or other thing on a railway, with intent to endanger the safety of passengers, shall be punishable on conviction merely with penal servitude for life, and the refusal to admit on Motion words "that should death ensue it shall be adjudged to be murder," seems unreasonable. The plea of objection to this, that the law is sufficient, seems to me to have no force, for, by the second clause of the Bill, it legislates for the crime of murder in these terms, "Whosoever shall be convicted of murder shall suffer death as a felon," which is a practical admission of its necessity in the 33rd clause. Thus the refusal to amend the 33rd Clause as suggested stands in the light of a delusion if not a snare; the more so as the Bill was introduced to the House as a compendium to consolidate and amend all existing provisions of offences against the person, and to embrace all desirable improvements. Thus the clause confuses what the Bill proposes to simplify. It appears to me that the offence which is the subject-matter of the 33rd clause must also of necessity result in the murder, not of one person only, but of many.

2. Because, by the 36th Clause of the Bill, the penalty of a misdemeanour is to be incurred by the drivers of all public carriages who shall by wanton or furious driving or racing, maim or injure any person, while the rejection of the provision to extend the same to the driving of all carriages whatsoever is an unreasonable reserve, made on the plea that, by common law, sufficient redress may be had.

This appears to be a conclusion inapplicable, as redress for such like injury should not be confined to pecuniary compensation; but even for that there is no public officer, called a Public Prosecutor, to initiate such proceedings for poor, or needy, or ignorant persons aggrieved.

But the public wrong should be vindicated also, where death or injury is inflicted by wanton or furious driving. That it is not so the returns before the House of 134 persons killed, and 1,827 persons maimed during the last 26 months within the Metropolis, too plainly show. It appears to me to be a dereliction of duty on the part of the Secretary of State for the Home Department that, with the means of obtaining the information contained in these Returns, no amendment of the law has been proposed to Parliament to restrain and diminish the recurrence of such offences. The present provisions in the Metropolitan Police Act and the City Police Act not extending beyond the maximum of a pecuniary fine of 40*s.*—40*s.* fine for wanton and furious driving, which experience shows is impotent.

It appears to me that a provident Government would propose to legislate against the person of an offender inflicting personal injury on another, instead of making a frivolous amercement upon his purse, which can always be paid for him by another, even by a participator in the offence charged against him. WESTMEATH.

THE QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY.

QUESTION.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the House will sit on Friday next, being Her Majesty's Birthday; and if not, whether the adjournment of the House will be moved on Thursday?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, it was not usual for the House to sit on Her Majesty's Birthday.

PORTPATRICK AND DONAGHADEE HARBOURS.—QUESTION.

GENERAL UPTON said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will furnish a Statement of the amount which has been, up to this time, expended of the £20,000 voted last year for the improvement of Portpatrick Harbour; a similar statement with respect to the sum of £5,000 voted for Donaghadee; and by what time it may be expected that the improvements will be completed?

MR. LAING said, that no portion of the £20,000 for the improvement of Portpatrick Harbour had been yet expended. The tenders were only sent in a short time ago, and a tender was accepted for £19,800. The works had been commenced, and he believed the contractor bound himself to complete them in about a year, perhaps by July next, but certainly some time next year. With regard to Donaghadee, he believed about £2,500 of the sum voted had been expended. A good deal of that work was work which would proceed rather more slowly, and he was told about two years would elapse before the whole was completed.

NEWSPAPERS CONVEYANCE, &c., BILL. QUESTION.

MR. BAINES said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he intends to proceed this evening with the Order of the Day which stands on the Paper for the second Reading of the Newspapers Conveyance Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the Newspapers Conveyance Bill has not yet been printed, and has been reserved for the purpose of submitting to the House at the same time the regulations to be made by authority of the Treasury, which the adoption of such a Bill would require. But I am obliged to my hon. Friend for putting this question, because it will enable me to state what appears to be the convenient course to take with respect to the measure. The reasons on which the Bill is founded are chiefly or entirely departmental and administrative reasons; but a portion of the parties affected by it are disposed to contest those reasons, and to urge that the present system of a stamp on superficies, instead of a single stamp on weight, with the privilege of retransmission is accompanied by certain incidents which make it, on the whole, a beneficial and an economical arrangement for the public. That is an allegation which, however it may be opposed to the view of the authorities in the Post Office Department, is yet a fair subject for inquiry, and I should not like to urge the disposal of a subject of this kind without attending to such a fair allegation, which it is competent for those parties to make, and fairly within the province of the House of Commons to consider. We are, however, met by this difficulty. Sir Rowland Hill, the Secretary to the Post Office, I regret to say, has been labouring under a severe illness, and an intimation has been made to him on medical authority that it is absolutely requisite, in order to the public retaining his invaluable services, that he should have leave of absence for no less a period than six months. I think, therefore, it will be impossible for the Department to state its case on a subject of this kind in the absence of one who, I may say, has been the life and soul of all the Post Office arrangements in this country for the last twenty years. Under these circumstances, I have no alternative but to postpone that inquiry which I admit to be fairly demanded, and as it is uncertain whether or not Sir Rowland Hill may recover before the end of the Session, I think it best to drop the Bill, reserving to myself the renewal of it at a future period, after this inquiry shall have been made. I would, therefore, move that the Order of the Day for the Second Reading of the Newspapers Conveyance, &c., Bill be read for the purpose of being cancelled.

Order for Second Reading read and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

FOREIGN ENLISTMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. STEUART said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Government have turned their attention to collections of money being made, there chiefly, as well as in other parts of the Empire, for the use of the Sovereign of the Papal States; whether they believe that such may be used, or means adopted otherwise, for enlisting subjects of Her Majesty for the army of that Foreign Power; and whether, if such be illegal or irregular, Government will take measures to check any agents in the matter, or to warn those who may enter into such engagements?

MR. CARDWELL replied that, no doubt the Foreign Enlistment Act absolutely prohibited any of Her Majesty's subjects to enter the military service of a Foreign Power without Her Majesty's permission. The Government had had their attention directed to the subject which the hon. Member had just brought under his notice, and he might state that they would be prepared to take such measures as seemed to them to be necessary for the prevention of any illegal proceedings.

FAIRS AND MARKETS IN IRELAND.

QUESTION.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he would beg to ask, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill on the subject of Fairs and Markets in Ireland during the present Session?

MR. CARDWELL said, he had prepared a Bill, which he was prevented by the state of public business from introducing. If an opportunity should arise of carrying it through in the present Session, he should be glad to introduce it.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.—QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI said, he wished to know the order of business for this evening, and what will be taken up after the first and second Orders are disposed of?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, they would proceed in the first instance with the Refreshment Houses Bill and the repeal of Sir John Barnard's Act. They would afterwards be regulated by circumstances.

MR. DISRAELI said, he had no wish to be unreasonable, but if the noble Lord cannot inform the House what is to be taken up after the first and second Orders, perhaps he can say what will not be taken up. Will the Customs Acts, for example, be proceeded with or not; and if so, after what hour?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Customs Acts would not be proceeded with that night.

THE NEW BRONZE COINAGE. QUESTION.

MR. BLACK said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, when the new Bronze Penny will be ready for issue; and, if the distribution is to be made in England and Ireland by the National Banks of those Kingdoms, by what machinery the distribution will be made in Scotland?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, all the arrangements which depended upon the Mint with respect to the new coinage were in a very forward state; but there had been some delay with respect to that portion of the operation which was in the domain of art strictly so called, and they were not yet in possession of the dies. It was expected by the Master of the Mint that in a few weeks the dies would be forthcoming, and then the issue would commence immediately. The issue, however, was a somewhat serious operation, and the entire distribution of the coinage would take a very considerable time. In the first place, they would begin by issuing the coins from the Mint only, until the demand was so far established, and the public at large so far familiar with the progress of the operation, as to require a larger issue. They would then resort to the presses which were in the possession of the contractors, as well as the presses of the Mint itself. When the Mint itself became inadequate to supply as much as the public were disposed to call for, arrangements would then be made with the Bank of England, with all its country branches, the Bank of Ireland, and the principal banks in Edinburgh and Glasgow; and to those the new coin would be forwarded by the Mint, and they would become separate centres of distribution. The collection of the old coin, which would, in the main, form the material of the new coin, would go forward simultaneously with the distribution of the new coin, and for the collection of the old coin it was thought that the best plan would be not to arrange any expensive public machinery, but rather to trust to persons for bringing in the old coin, allured as they would be by some allowance in the nature of premium, by way of compensation for any charge and trouble they might be put to in collecting it. That was the whole of the arrangements that had been made.

In answer to Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that a small sum would be taken in the Estimates towards the expenses, but that was taken merely as an account, because, in point of fact, the issue as soon as it began would balance the account in favour of the public.

SAVINGS BANKS BILL.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to ask, When the Savings Banks Bill will be brought on?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER would put the Order down for Friday week, in the hope of bringing it on then.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL. QUESTION.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he wished to know, Whether the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General can tell the House when it will be asked to go into Committee on the Bankruptcy Bill?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he thought that was a very cruel question to address to him. At present, he saw no probability of being able to obtain a day for the consideration of that measure. But he had urged his noble Friend at the head of the Government to give them that day week for the purpose, and he hoped they would then be enabled to make such progress in the Committee that he would afterwards be allowed a morning sitting for its further consideration.

PRACTICE OF THE HOUSE—REPORT OF RESOLUTIONS FROM COMMITTEES OF WAYS AND MEANS.

THE WINE LICENCES BILL

IRREGULARITY, AND ORDERS THEREON.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I rise in redemption of the pledge which I gave on Friday evening, to call the attention of the House to an irregularity of proceeding which took place on Thursday. The House on that evening went into Committee of Ways and Means, and passed Resolutions affirming duties which were to form the foundation of two clauses in the Wine Licences Bill. According to the rules of the House, no clause of that kind can be put into a Bill, except it be founded upon a previous Resolution passed in Committee of Ways and Means, and afterwards reported to the House. That is the form of proceeding. Upon that occasion, there being no difference of opinion upon that preliminary step, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer appealed to the House to dispense with the usual form, and allow the Resolution to be reported at once. It was an obvious convenience; the House agreed to it—at least there was no dissent—and it was done. But upon further consideration, and the matter being pointed out by my right hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Bouverie), it struck everybody that that proceeding, however convenient for the moment, was a departure from an established usage of this House. That usage is, that Resolutions in Committee of Supply, involving grants of money, should be reported, not on the day on which the Resolutions passed in Committee, but on some subsequent day; and upon inquiry I believe it appears that, from the Revolution downwards, there is only one instance in which that rule has been departed from—namely, in the year 1797, when a measure of great urgency was passed during the mutiny at the Nore, and when the ordinary forms of both Houses of Parliament were departed from for the purpose of expediting a measure which, upon that occasion, and under those circumstances, was called for by the public interests. Now, these forms of Parliamentary usage are, no doubt, very often productive simply of delay, and are an incumbrance on our proceedings; but they are all founded upon reason and good sense. The tendency of all of them is to guard the public interests and the character of the House of Commons from those precipitate decisions, which an accidental majority might be led to by passion, fear, or haste, or any of those other impulses by which men are governed. We all know that in assemblies in other countries where those forms do not prevail decisions of great importance, involving permanent consequences, and having a most important bearing upon national interests, have been passed suddenly, and without allowing any time for consideration. The object of all our forms is to secure a reconsideration of a given matter at a subsequent period, and when a different attendance may be in the House—and so to guard the House against precipitate decisions of an accidental and momentary majority. I am sure the House will feel that it is of the utmost importance to the public interests, the national welfare, and the character of the House, that we should maintain and respect these forms. Therefore it was felt by the House that it was necessary in some manner to correct the inadvertency or irregularity that took place on Thursday evening. There are two ways in which that may be done. One method suggested was, that we might pass a Resolution that that which was done then should not establish a precedent, and that we might convert the rule, the lex consuetudinis, into a standing order. But, Sir, it was thought that merely to pass a Resolution that this should not be deemed a precedent, would not be altogether sufficient for the purpose, and that we should rather weaken than strengthen the authority of Parliamentary usage, by converting that which is, I may say, a part of the unwritten law of Parliament into a statute, as it were, by making it a Standing Order, Standing Orders being frequently dispensed with. There can be no doubt, that this House has the power to do what it did on Thursday. There can be no doubt, that what was done on Thursday was a perfectly valid act, and, if nothing was done, it would remain as it is, and no one could impeach the validity of the proceeding. At the same time, for the reasons I have stated, I think the House will be of opinion that it is better not to let the matter rest in that way. I therefore propose that we should resolve that that which was done then should be deemed null and void, and that we should order that the Resolutions passed in the Committee of Ways and Means on Thursday shall be reported to-morrow.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Or to-night.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Or, to-night, if it should be thought more convenient—all that the rule requires being that the Resolutions shall be reported on a day subsequent to that on which they were passed in the Committee of Ways and Means. I shall therefore move—that Notice should be entered in our Journals that upon Thursday last the Committee of Ways and Means had agreed to a Resolution, which, contrary to the Rules and Practice of this House, was, without urgent occasion, ordered to be reported forthwith, and was thereupon reported and agreed to by the House. I propose to put in the words, "without urgent occasion," because if any occasion should occur when the public interests require that we should depart from our ordinary rules and practice, the House may think fit to do again what was done in 1797. We have, therefore, thought it important to specify that what was done on Thursday was done without any urgent occasion. I now therefore propose to order—"That the said proceedings shall be null and void;" and thereupon, "That the Resolution passed in Committee of Ways and Means be reported," either this day or To-morrow. [Cries of "To-morrow!"] Then, I propose that it shall be reported to-morrow.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he thought that a double irregularity had been committed on Thursday last. The first was in the Motion by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the Resolution be reported forthwith. The House then went into Committee on the Wine Licences Bill, and added two clauses which were founded upon the irregular proceeding in regard to the Resolution; and these clauses were agreed to by the Committee; that was irregularity No. 2. It was most important in a constitutional point of view that hon. Members should have time to reflect on the nature of a tax, and that the country should have an interval for knowing what was going on in regard to taxation. There was no proper foundation for the insertion of those two clauses, and he wished to know whether the Government intended to have the Bill re-committed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: As I understand it, the hon. Baronet is quite correct in saying that a double irregularity has been committed, the second irregularity being in consequence of the former one. The proceeding in Committee was perfectly regular if the former proceeding had been valid; but the former proceeding having been cancelled, it follows that the subsequent proceeding in Committee in inserting the clauses was not founded on any Resolution of the House directing that they should do so. The matter will be regarded, therefore, as if it had not occurred, and these clauses will be brought up afresh in Committee, and will be then inserted. As I was the person who made the Motion that this Resolution be reported forthwith. I will state the part I had in the matter. I came down to the House and moved that the House should go into Committee of Ways and Means without having the slightest idea that any Resolution of that Committee could, without a violation of the rules and practice of the House, be reported on the same day. I had never heard of such a proceeding, and always thought it was forbidden by the rules and practice of the House. When the Resolution was in the hands of the Chairman of Ways and Means, he, as is usual, said, "When will you have it reported? Will you have it reported forthwith?" I said, "Can it be reported forthwith?" and he replied in the affirmative. I thought there had probably been some alteration in the rules and practice of the House, and assented to the Report as being more convenient to the House than waiting for any further proceeding on a future day. That was all that took place, excepting that, having received that assurance from the Chairman of Committees, I stated the point to the House, and stated that the matter was not one of emergency but of convenience. I am now in the hands of the House.

MR. WALPOLE: No doubt an irregularity has been committed which had better be taken notice of, and the only reason why I venture to rise is to express a doubt whether the noble Lord at the head of the Government has put his Motion in the best form for correcting the irregularity. No doubt the House has the power of reporting the Resolutions passed in Committee of Ways and Means forthwith. We exercised that power in 1797. I think that in taking notice of the irregularity we ought not to do it in such a manner as to imply a want of power on the part of the House to take that course in a case of emergency. I would suggest that the form of the Motion agreed to now should be "that the Report made on Thursday evening, and all the proceedings taken in consequence, shall be deemed null and void." I draw a broad distinction between saying these proceedings "are null and void," and that they are "deemed to be null and void." One implies that the House has not the power of proceeding as it did, and the other declares that the power is reserved.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: We think the object has been attained by the insertion of the words "without urgent oc-casual," implying that if there had been any urgent occasion the proceeding might have been taken by the House.

Notice taken, that upon Thursday last the Committee of Ways and Means had agreed to a Resolution which, contrary to the Rules and practice of this House, was, without urgent occasion, ordered to be reported forthwith, and was thereupon reported and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said proceedings be null and void.

Ordered, That the Resolution of the Committee of Ways and Means be reported To-morrow.

REFRESHMENT HOUSES AND WINE LICENCES BILL—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 14.

SIR WILLIAM MILES observed that several of the clauses in this Bill had been copied from the Beer Act, and the persons who sold wine in refreshment-rooms would not have to come to the magistrates for a licence. Before any person was brought up before the magistrates for conviction it would be necessary to prove that he was the identical person keeping the wine refreshment-house, which they could not do, as they would have no record of the granting of the licence. It was true that a certificate was granted by the Excise, which was sent to the magistrates to give them an opportunity of objecting; but if they did not object within thirty days the licence was granted; he therefore proposed to introduce words which would oblige the collector or supervisor of Excise to transmit to the magistrate once every calendar month a copy of the list or register of the persons licensed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought that it would be unnecessary to send a copy of the list once a month, but he had no objection to its being sent once in six months, so as to reach the magistrates a few days before the general licensing day.

MR. HENLEY observed, that it would be very desirable that there should be certain fixed days on which those licences should be issued, so that everybody might know what was going on.

Clause agreed to; also Clause 15.

Clause 16.

MR. HUNT said, that it was very inconvenient to discuss this clause until the 12th and 13th were settled; he, therefore, proposed that they should go through the remainder of the clauses pro forma, and then take the 12th and 13th.

MR. LIDDELL inquired whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended to insert the very important Amendments of which he had given notice in those clauses.

MR. HARDY said, he would propose that words should be inserted to give the police power to enter refreshment-houses which were not licensed, but which were opened between nine o'clock at night and five in the morning.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the insertion of the words "or requiring to be licensed" after the word licensed, would meet the views of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. AYRTON said, he was of opinion that it would be necessary to define any such power given to the police, so as to limit it to places of public resort.

MR. HENLEY said, that if a person opened a refreshment-house which required a licence without obtaining one, he rendered himself thereby liable to penalties other than those for abuse of licence. He doubted whether it would be right to give the police power to enter any house merely because they thought it ought to be licensed.

MR. HARDY said, that the provision would only apply to houses open between nine o'clock at night and five in the morning. All he wanted was a provision given to the police empowering them to visit such places of public resort as ought to come under supervision.

MR. HENLEY said, those houses were now neither licensed nor requiring to be licensed, such as shell-fish houses, coffee-shops, and the like. If the police had information that the refreshments were sold in those houses which would require licences, let them lay an information, and that would compel the owners to take out licences.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he wished to move an Amendment exempting houses from the visitation of the police before nine o'clock in the evening. It would be a grievous hardship upon pastry cooks and eating-house keepers, either taking out a wine licence or not, to be subjected to the visitation of policemen, especially when they closed before nine o'clock. He thought it a matter of public policy that a strong line of demarcation should be drawn between those which closed at that hour and those which did not.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Committee had, with great propriety, agreed to limit the powers of the police so that they should not visit houses which did not deal in strong liquors. But he could not see the justice of the proposal to render houses with wine licences, which were not open in the evening, exempt from those powers, when all beer-houses and public-houses were subject to the visits of the police during all hours of the day. He cherished the hope that the houses which this Bill would create would be of a more desirable character than those which now existed, but he did not think it fair to give them a chartered freedom which was not enjoyed by other public-houses.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, they were giving the police the power of domiciliary visits to an alarming extent. The result would be that when the police were wanted in the streets to take any one into custody they would not be found, and the excuse would be that they were in a refreshment-house. Or the police would exact black mail from the owners of these houses, as was well known they did now of those poor unhappy creatures who frequented the Haymarket, and of persons keeping houses in the Haymarket. There ought to be some safeguard. The police ought to have bond fide reason to believe disorderly persons were in the house before they entered. If they were allowed to walk in and out at all times, they would become perfectly odious to the whole community.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that one great inconvenience of the Amendment would be, that under it they would have a different legislation for winehouses and beerhouses. Many hon. Gentlemen did not wish to check the consumption of beer, and they would therefore object to any advantage being given to the holder of a wine licence.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the clause as it stood was taken from the Beer Act, and what he proposed was to apply to those wine licensed houses the very same restrictions, neither more nor less, than were applied under that Act. As to the police the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. E. James) had conjured up imaginary dangers.

MR. HARDY said, he was in favour of putting all houses where drinks were sold under the same restriction, but he thought it was evident from the discussion that they would soon have to consider the whole question of licences so as to have one recognized system instead of three or four. He wished to call attention to the Town Police Clauses Act, the provisions of which had been adopted in many towns, and, in his opinion, might be generally adopted with advantage. By one of those provisions publicans were liable to a penalty if they knowingly harboured, or entertained, or suffered to remain in the place where they carried on business, any constable on duty, unless for the purpose of quelling a disturbance. There was another provision which related to harbouring disorderly persons, and a third which empowered the magistrates to impose a fine of 40s. for drunkenness, and imprisonment in default of the fine being paid. Where the Act did not apply there was really no punishment for drunkenness. A fine of 5s. might be imposed, but as there were no means to recover it the offender could laugh at the Court and walk away. If no other Member volunteered, he should bring up clauses with a view to incorporate some of the provisions of this Act in the present Bill.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY agreed with the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken as to the necessity for legislating in a general way on all matters, relating to licensing. All the laws relating to the sale of wine, beer, or spirits, ought to be codified, and the Irish and English laws on the subject ought to be assimilated. He was surprised to hear that the 5s. Act was nugatory in England; in Ireland it was not nugatory, but had done more to suppress drunkenness in the streets than any other law. He thought they ought not to encourage the consumption of foreign wine at the expense of beer, and that the effect of the Bill would be to make "confusion worse confounded" in the distinction which it established between licences.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he did not wish to press his Amendment against the sense of the Committee, neither did he wish to have three separate regulations for the sale of wine, beer, and spirits.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 17.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that Clauses 17 to 22 were adopted from the Beer Act, and that Clause 23 was taken from the Licence Act.

MR. HENLEY said, that the object was to subject persons keeping night houses without licence to a penalty. If refreshment houses in which wine was not sold did not require a licence, unless when kept open at certain hours, he thought those houses should be subject to a heavy penalty if open after a certain hour.

SIR CHARLES BURRELL said, he wished to call the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the unsatisfactory way in which beershops were often conducted. He never found that the police troubled their heads about beershops unless they sold spirits, but when that was the case they were active enough. He thought if the right hon. Gentleman would take it seriously into consideration whether magistrates were to have any control in this matter, he would do a great deal of good to the country. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that the indecencies which took place in some of the out-of-the-way beerhouses ought to be well looked after.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON said, that in his opinion it was not well to impose penalties of an excessive character, because it produced an indisposition to enforce them.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he proposed to deal with the case of keeping open refreshment houses, not wine licensed houses, by striking out words which would make the 18th clause an excise clause. The hon. Baronet who had last spoken would observe that the clause before the House did not propose an ordinary penalty of £20 but a penalty of £20, which was denominated an excise penalty. There was a law which regulated this species of penalty, and which admitted of its being brought down to one-fourth.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that a general feeling prevailed throughout the country that the Beer Act had operated most disadvantageously, and yet they were proceeding to incorporate many of its clauses in the present measure. He hoped this Bill would prove the preliminary to a revision of the Beer Act.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to know how a retailer was to distinguish between foreign wine and other wine, inasmuch as when foreign wine came into this country it was often converted into a variety of forms by the admixture of spirits, and it no longer retained the distinguishing character of foreign wine. Under these circumstances, he did know how a retailer was to distinguish between one compound and another.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he understood the hon. Member for Warwickshire

(Mr. Newdegate) to say that no one would be found in that House to stand up and defend beershops, but as there were several beershops in the districts with which he was more intimately connected which were very well conducted, and were under the surveillance of the police, he did not think beerhouses were deserving of the wholesale condemnation of the censure passed upon them.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he did not deny there were some advocates of the Beer Act; but he maintained that that Act did not work well; and he was confirmed in that opinion by the Report of a Select Committee of that House which sat on the subject two years ago.

MR. SCULLY observed, that he agreed with the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), that the Bill should contain a definition of what "foreign" wine meant.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER admitted that a difficulty was involved in the explanation of the words; the question, however, was not one of definition, but rather of skill, knowledge, and taste, and likewise of medical science. Foreign wine meant all wine made out of this country, and included colonial wine; but the offence for which they were now imposing a penalty was for selling foreign wine without a proper licence. If it were really foreign wine they might be sure it would be sold as such; whereas, it was by no means equally certain that because it was sold as such it was really foreign wine.

MR. EDWIN JAMES suggested that the words "or shall sell as foreign wine" should be introduced. In an action recently brought against the London Docks, which had occupied considerable attention, it was proved that a quantity of wine sold as South African port had all been made at Whitechapel. It was therefore advisable to remove from traders the excuse that their "foreign wines" had been made at Lambeth or elsewhere.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had no objection to introduce the words "or purporting to be foreign wine."

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, to prevent confusion it would be better to have a general interpretation clause at the end of the Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER acquiesced in this suggestion.

MR. AYRTON said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would find it no easy matter to frame an interpretation clause, defining what was meant by foreign wine.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 18,

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON asked, whether the penalty of £5 referred to the same offence as that indicated in the 16th clause. If so, there was no reason why the wording of the clauses should not be the same.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the reason for wording the clause in the manner referred to was, that it was deemed more convenient to adhere to the terms of the Beer Act.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 19 and 20.

Clause 21.

MR. AYRTON said, he thought there would be considerable difficulty in dealing with the question of what was wine and what spirits. At present, foreign wine was ordered not to contain more than 40 per cent of proof spirit, but in this Bill there was no restriction, so that the article sold as foreign wine might be made to contain 50, 60, or 70 per cent of spirit, or spirits might be diluted to 30 or 40 per cent.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not think it at all necessary that there should be a clause defining what was wine and what spirit. Foreign wine was defined in the Customs Act, and he apprehended no danger of the dilution of spirits to compete with wine, as alcohol in spirit was taxed more severely than alcohol in wine.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he thought there was no difficulty. The question was, what was understood amongst the community? At present an exciseman calling for brandy would be in no danger of being served with wine, and vice versa. He thought the new law would receive the same interpretation as the old.

MR. HENLEY observed, that the whole difficulty arose from the occasional use of the word "foreign." It should either be used systematically or not at all.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he also thought the distinction was perfectly intelligible without the insertion of an interpretation clause.

MR. SCULLY said, they might get rid of the difficulty by leaving out the word "foreign."

Clause agreed to.

Clause 22.

words "foreign wine" were struck out, but that the words "British wine" were added. It did not at all follow that because they had brought British wine within the scope of the licence to sell foreign wine the same penalties would apply to both. Foreign wine was a dutiable article, but British wine was not.

MR. AYRTON said, British wine being a compound of spirits and fruit, he wanted to know where wine began and spirits ended—in other words, how English wine was to be distinguished from spirits; because now they were going to have a different law for the man who sold home-made wine and the man who sold spirits.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that no new point was raised with respect to the relations between British wine and spirits. It was quite obvious, if the hon. Gentleman were correct, that there was nothing to prevent anybody from selling spirit under the name of British wine, and he was not going to alter the law.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 23,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply to questions, explained that Clause 23 was a remedial clause, providing for the security of the buyer. In case the buyer thought he was not getting fair measure, he could require the seller to give the wine to him according to strict legal measurement.

MR. WOODD rose to suggest an alteration in the clause to remove his objections to it.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, that this was certainly the law at present in regard to licensed victuallers, and there was no novelty in it.

MR. HENLEY intimated that in his opinion the licence to sell wine by retail only applied to wine to be consumed on the premises.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied that, as he understood the clause, it would apply to wine to be consumed on or off the premises.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 24.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would propose to omit the words—

"Before the hour of four o'clock in the morning nor after eleven o'clock at night of any day in the week, nor at any time during which the houses of licensed victuallers now are or hereafter shall be required by law to be closed on any Sunday, Good Friday, Christmas Day, or any day appointed for a public fast or thanksgiving."

And to insert words the object of which was to assimilate the law with respect to wine licences with the present law respecting beerhouses, so far as regarded the various arrangements as to opening and closing in places of different populations.

Amendment proposed,

"In page 10, line 4, to leave out from the word 'House,' to the word 'Thanksgiving,' in line 9, inclusive, in order to insert the words, "at any time before the hour of five of the clock in the morning, nor after twelve of the clock at night, or of any day in the week, in the cities of London or Westminster, or within the boundaries of any of the boroughs of Marylebone, the Tower Hamlets, Lambeth, or Southwark, as defined by an Act passed in the second and third years of King William the Fourth, chapter sixty-four; nor after eleven of the clock at night within any parish or place within the bills of mortality, or within any city, cinque port, town corporate, parish, or place the population of which, according to the last Parliamentary Census, shall exceed two thousand five hundred, or within one mile, to be measured as aforesaid, from any polling place used at the last Election for any town having a like population, and returning a Member or Members to Parliament; nor after ten of the clock at night elsewhere; nor at any time during which the houses of licensed victuallers now are, or hereafter shall be, closed on any Sunday, Good Friday, or Christmas Day, or any Day appointed for a Public Fast or Thanksgiving; and no person licensed as aforesaid shall keep or have his house open as a place of public resort, or for the sale or consumption therein of any article whatever, at any time between the hours of one and four of the clock in the morning on any day whatever."

Question proposed, "That the proposed words be there inserted."

MR. SPOONER asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman meant by this clause to authorize the opening of refreshment-houses upon days on which they were closed at present. The object of the Bill, as he understood it, was to afford persons who were moving about in towns an opportunity of obtaining a glass of wine and a biscuit in houses of refreshment. Was the right hon. Gentleman going to extend to all refreshment-houses the right to do that which was at present contrary to the law of the land—namely, to follow their ordinary calling upon the Sabbath Day? He thought that such a provision would be most dangerous, and the clause itself most objectionable.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHE-

QUER said, so far as regarded the question of opening on Sundays there was no intention to alter the present law, nor to authorize the opening on Sundays of any house that was not now authorized to be opened on Sundays. The clause, as it stood, applied all the restraints to houses licensed under the Bill to sell wine by retail which were now applicable to the houses of licensed victuallers, with respect to Sundays, fasts, and thanksgiving-days. The effect of this Amendment, as far as eating-houses were concerned, would be to bring them under greater restraint than they were subject to at present with respect to Sunday trading, for now they kept open all day, but then they would be compelled to close during the same hours that the ordinary licensed victuallers closed.

MR. SPOONER asked if he was to understand the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that refreshment-houses were not now amenable to the law for opening on Sunday? Whatever might be the case in London, refreshment-houses of the kind referred to by the right hon. Gentleman did not open in country towns. They were not open in Birmingham. Persons carrying on their ordinary week-day calling on Sunday were by law liable to prosecution; but this Bill would allow the keepers of refreshment-houses to do so.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the Act of Charles II., to which the hon. Member no doubt referred, was inoperative and obsolete. It was well known that great numbers of persons, including the keepers of refreshment-houses, carried on their ordinary callings on Sundays unchallenged. By this Bill, eating-houses having licences would be placed under the same regulations with other houses that sold liquors.

MR. BAINES said, he had an Amendment to move, and, certainly, after what had just fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, the necessity for moving that Amendment did not appear to him to be lessened. If he understood the right hon. Gentleman aright, they were abandoning the law by which the sacredness of the Lord's-day was preserved. Now, that was just what he wished to make a stand against. He proposed to insert in the clause, after the word "week," the words "nor on any Sunday," the effect of which would be to prevent this new class of houses from being opened on the Lord's-day. He thought it of importance that the House should make a stand against

The effect of the Bill would be to give them encouragement to frequent refreshment-houses and places of amusement on the Lord's-day, and therefore he regarded it as an anti-domestic measure. The hon. Gentleman moved the insertion after the word "week" of the words "nor on any Sunday."

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment in line 3, to insert, after the word "week," the words "nor on any Sunday."

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would consent to alter the clause in such a manner as that the Committee might have the satisfaction of knowing that while they had acted in accordance with the right hon. Gentleman's recommendation in opening new places where persons might obtain refreshment, they were not going to open a new class of refreshment-houses on Sundays. He was opposed to the principle of the Bill, and had voted against it, but he was far from denying that it would confer many advantages upon the public. But these advantages would be more than counter-balanced if a new class of public-houses were to be opened on Sunday, and he felt persuaded that the public generally by a large majority would object to that proposition. Everybody knew that there were numbers of houses open on Sundays which were fruitful in all sorts of disorder. In the beerhouses in the country all kinds of evils were concocted. He believed that a majority of hon. Members on both sides of the House were averse to a new class of places being opened on Sundays, and therefore he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would act in accordance with their wishes.

MR. P. W. MARTIN said, there were abundance of houses already open on the Sunday, and there was no necessity for any more; but he thought the effect of the Amendment would be to compel those who merely wanted refreshment to go to the public-houses to obtain it.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he could not help thinking that if the licensed victuallers and beer-shop-keepers—in whose houses so many evils were concocted—were allowed to have their places open on Sundays, there could be no reason why a class of houses for refreshment, which were likely to be better conducted, should not be open on Sundays. If the argument was good as it affected the refreshment-houses of the lower and middle classes, it must also hold good as it regarded those places, such as the Reform Club and other clubs, where gentlemen could always obtain what they desired on Sundays. There ought to be one law for all. Again, hon. Members ought to show that these new houses would be tippling houses, and used for other purposes than for refreshment, before they rejected the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. KER SEYMER said, he felt compelled to differ from his right hon. Friend (Mr. S. Estcourt). All depended on the character which hon. Members attached to these refreshment-houses. For his own part, believing that they would promote good order and temperance, he could not object to their being opened on Sunday during the same hours that beerhouses and gin palaces were allowed to be opened. The right hon. Member had spoken as if it were wrong for working people to be away from their homes on Sunday. It was all very well for hon. Members of that House, who had ample means and opportunities of enjoyment on the other days of the week, to stay at home on Sunday, but they could not ask the 2,500,000 inhabitants of the Metropolis to do so, and if they went for a long walk they ought to have some refreshment. He should support the Motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. SCULLY said, he voted against the Bill. But if these houses were to be opened on week days, they ought to be opened on Sundays. He supposed the effect of the Amendment would be to send people to the gin palace; and, if carried, a gentleman who was in the habit of drinking his bottle of old port at his club every day in the week would not be able to obtain a supply on Sunday, but be compelled to drink spirits instead.

MR. SPOONER said, he could not see the analogy attempted to be established by the hon. Member for Westminster between these houses and clubs. The clubs came to Parliament for no licence. Gentlemen who took refreshment there took it, in fact, at their own houses. They did not require the authority of Parliament, and nobody but themselves were guilty of desecrating the Sabbath. But if licences were granted to these refreshment-houses they would have the authority of Parliament to desecrate the Sabbath, a matter which all were earnestly desirous of putting down. He could not subscribe to the doctrine of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster as to his construction of the law of Charles II., and he thought the Committee ought to exert its power and prevent these houses being opened on Sundays.

MR. BAINES said, he had only a few words to say by way of explanation—first, that it was his intention to press his Motion to a division; and, secondly, that he did not propose to alter the law of the land with regard to the opening of pastrycooks' shops and other refreshment-houses on the Sunday. The clause had reference only to those places which would be converted into wineshops under the new system; and his Amendment did not extend its application.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he wished to call attention to the existing state of the law. The Acts under which Sunday trading was at present regulated were an Act of Charles II. for England and Wales, and an Act of William III. for Ireland. By the former statute it was provided that its regulations should not extend to prohibit the dressing of meat in families, or the dressing and selling of meat and wine in inns, cook-shops, and victuallers' houses, for such as could not otherwise be provided for, nor the selling of milk before certain hours, of mackerel, and articles of that kind. The spirit and beerhouses were not to be closed except during the hours of Divine service. It was quite obvious, therefore, that if the hon. Gentleman succeeded in his Amendment, he would be altering the law, for he proposed to make it illegal for any person to go into one of the refreshment-houses and drink a glass of wine with his food. He (Mr. Locke) could hardly conceive that the Committee would come to such a conclusion as that. That was taking a Puritanical view of the Sabbath indeed. According to hon. Gentlemen who took that view, people were to get up and dress themselves, but he did not know whether they were to wash or not; as in some very strict watering places bathing machines were not allowed to go out on Sunday. In short, the country was to revert to the religious observances of the days of Oliver Cromwell. He would only add that if the hon. Member for Leeds wished to go fully into this subject, there was a Bill coming down from the Lords which would apply not only to the refreshment-houses but to the clubs also, when the whole question might be agitated, debated, and settled. He (Mr. Locke) wished to see the Sabbath observed, but he would never consent to a measure that would deprive the great bulk of the people of innocent recreation. But if there were to be a law on the subject, let it be a general law.

MR. BALL said, it was extremely unfair to fasten upon those hon. Gentlemen who wished to see the Sabbath more strictly observed the desire to abridge the comforts and happiness of the working classes. On the contrary, they had the interests of that portion of their countrymen much at heart, and were always foremost in every effort for their amelioration, whether moral or physical. The proposition before the Committee, however, was whether the country was to continue to observe the Sabbath day, or whether it was gradually and progressively to relax its efforts and do nothing whatever, either towards keeping the Sabbath or not. He should support the Motion of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, that there were great anomalies in the hon. Member's Amendment. The effect of it would be to give an entire monopoly to the licensed victuallers on Sunday by completely closing the refreshment-houses. With those motives, which the Committee well knew that the hon. Member entertained, did he think that by this means of promoting the better—or rather the "bitter"—observance of the Sabbath, that he was really diminishing its desecration? It was very well for those who lived in luxurious houses, surrounded by comforts and relaxations, to say—Stay at home on the Sunday; but it was a very different thing for the poor, toiling working millions, whom they saw abroad on that day. By whom, he would ask, were the clubs frequented? Why, to a great extent, by those who had domestic ties elsewhere. Then, what miserable, wretched hypocrisy was it to talk of desecrating the Sabbath, when they saw four-in-hand clubs going down to Greenwich to dine on the Sunday! If they wished to commit the country to such a course of asceticism, the question ought to be brought before the House in a definite manner.

MR. FELLOWES said, he fully believed there was no country in which there was less desecration of the Sabbath than in England, and that was the very reason why he supported the Amendment. He had no wish to take a puritanical view of this question. He would not dispute with the hon. and learned Member for Southwark whether these houses could or could not be kept open by law. If they could be kept open by law, all he would say was, why make the state of things worse than it was at present? If refreshment-houses were allowed to sell wine they became, of course, drinking-shops, and there was a danger, therefore, in allowing them to keep open on the Sunday. He did not agree with his hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, who said that because licensed victuallers' houses and beer-houses were open on Sunday, therefore they should open eating-houses also. If mischief to the morals of the country arose from having public-houses open on Sunday, they ought not to extend it further. He should certainly vote for the Amendment.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he should support the Amendment. He felt an important interest in this subject, which was common to all hon. Members, namely, the ground of expediency. He thought it would be inexpedient, having the spirit and beerhouses opened already on the Sunday, to extend the right of opening to refreshment-houses.

LORD JOHN MANNERS suggested an alteration in the form of the Amendment which would have the effect of making the clause more clear. The question of the due observance of Sunday had perplexed Christendom for centuries, and he regretted that this discussion should have arisen. But as it was raised, he feared they must come to some decision upon it. As to the general subject upon which the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. James) had enlarged, he cordially agreed with him, and he had no doubt that nine-tenths of the Committee were of the same opinion. It was not suggested either by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner), or by the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) that the comforts of the lower classes were to be increased or diminished; but, looking at the question practically, they could not shut their eyes to the fact that in the interest of the working classes themselves it was becoming a question of some importance whether some limit should not be put upon indiscriminate Sunday trading. Into that question he would not enter, as he believed it would shortly be referred to them from "another place." But on the comparatively small point before them he would say that he did not think a case had been made out for the extension of Sunday trading, and therefore he should vote for the Amendment.

MR. BAINES accepted the suggestion of the noble Lord.

Another Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, in line 12, after the word "elsewhere," to insert the words "nor on any Sunday."

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he wished to remove a misapprehension, as he thought it right that the country should understand about what they were dividing. One hon. Member said it was time the country should see who in that House were in favour of the desecration of Sunday, and who not, and another hon. Gentleman said it was time the country should see who were in favour of extending Sunday trading, and who not. It might go forth that those who voted against the Amendment were really promoting the desecration of the Sabbath and Sunday trading. But what was the proposition? It was not proposed to prevent the opening of refreshment-houses, nor to prevent public-houses selling wine, nor to prevent persons sending to the public-house for wine and drinking it elsewhere, so that a traveller might take a dozen of wine into a refreshment-house, and do all the mischief which the hon. Member for North Warwickshire would prevent. What was the difference in the desecration of the Sabbath between the traveller who gave money out of his pocket for wine and the traveller who found it charged in the Bill? Surely that was too paltry an issue on which to place the question. The fact was there were plenty of houses in existence already where spirits could be got on Sundays, and the question was whether people should be driven to those irregular houses, or whether a better class of establishments should be legalized. It was objected that there were already too many public-houses by far; but, on the other hand, the very same persons who made that assertion would admit upon other occasions that, notwithstanding every sort of temptation which spirit and beer-houses could hold out, there was no country in the world where the Sabbath was so well observed as England. Did not that look as if the people were intelligent beings and good Christians who could pass public-houses without making brutes of themselves? He wanted to know where was the evidence of an increasing tendency to desecrate the Sabbath. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner) could carry his memory a long way back, and he would be obliged to acknowledge that the people were more sober and decent, and that the Sabbath was better observed than formerly. There was one way in which they could induce people not to go to drinking-houses, and that was by allowing them innocent recreation. But the hon. Member belonged to a party who would stop every steamboat and shut up every railway on a Sunday. The truth was, that since people had been able to get into the country on Sunday, there had been less drunkenness in large towns than there used to be. He had not one whit less regard for the Sabbath than those who thought themselves more righteous than all the rest, but, as he had said, it was a paltry issue on which to put the question, and he should vote against the Amendment.

MR. SPOONER said, the right hon. Gentleman had charged him with being one of those who would shut up all places of innocent recreation on Sunday; but he challenged him to prove an instance in which he had ever done anything, or said anything, to justify the accusation. He knew it was a very difficult question how to regulate these things, but he believed that the more rational recreation there was, the more it would lead to the proper enjoyment of Sunday. He supported the Amendment, because, in his opinion, the clause, unamended, would add to the number of places which led to great immorality and great mischief. He voted against the second reading upon the ground that the Bill would do great injustice to vested interests. He saw the evil of public-houses being open, and he asked the Committee not to increase it, and, above all, not to give a fresh Parliamentary sanction to the desecration of the Sabbath. There was this difference between clubs and public-houses—clubs were places of private meetings, for which private individuals were alone responsible; but, if they consented to the opening of more places of public refreshment than were necessary, Parliament would be responsible, and that was a responsibility which he would not incur. He believed that in England the Sabbath was better observed than in any other country, and he wished to keep it so.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he wished to state the conclusion, not to which the Government had come, but at which they remained. It appeared that the hon. Gentleman approached the question from this point of view—that all these licensed houses were necessarily places of great immorality—places to be condemned and proscribed in themselves; and they naturally, therefore, could have them it would 1 days. if they chose in the discussion. No doubt the step they were now taking would render any further dealing with the subject more difficult. He regretted that they had departed from the recommendation of the Committee, in having three descriptions of these houses instead of one, the consequence of which would be a competition which would conduce to intemperance. There ought to be the same law for the different classes of refreshment-houses.

MR. PULLER urged that the refreshment-houses would be on a different footing to beerhouses and public-houses, inasmuch as they would not be compelled to close during the time of Divine service.

MR. BAINES said, he had no intention of taking the House by surprise in the matter. He had not given any previous notice of the Amendment, partly because he had hoped that the subject would have been taken up with a better prospect of a successful advocacy by a right hon. Gentleman opposite, and partly because he had really been somewhat bewildered by the number of Amendments which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had put on the paper so that he really did not know where to bring in this particular Amendment. He could not forget that the question had been referred to in many of the petitions which had been presented to the House, and had been made the subject of considerable discussion at public meetings throughout the country; and, under these circumstances, he felt that he would not be justified in accepting the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire by postponing the Amendment.

MR. PACKE remarked, in answer to what had fallen from the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Villiers), that it had been stated in evidence before the Committee, to which reference had so frequently been made, that the public-houses and the places of worship in the Metropolis had been visited on a Sunday evening by the police; and it had been ascertained that there had been more people in the former, than in the latter.

MR. MALINS said, he felt bound to oppose the Amendment. He saw no reason why a greater restriction should be imposed on a pastry-cook's shop, than on a public-house.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 82; Noes 117: Majority 35.

MR. AYRTON said, it seemed to him that this clause, as proposed, drew a very important distinction between the law in reference to public-houses, and that in reference to refreshment-houses. The law with regard to public-houses required that they should be closed during certain hours on Sunday; but this clause allowed refreshment houses to be kept open for eating purposes; but during those hours the sale of wine was prohibited. Such a clause as this, in his opinion, was perfectly illusory. The only possible protection which they could have against people drinking in those houses during the prohibited hours on Sunday, was by applying the law, as it was now applied to public-houses, and closing them altogether. The law should be as stringent in regard to refreshment-houses, as it was in the case of public-houses and beer-shops; and he pressed this the more upon the House, because the result of practical experience had shown that when the public-houses were kept open for a longer period on Sunday than they were at the present time, the amount of intemperance, and the number of charges against persons on Monday morning, were exactly double. They might rely upon it, that if they allowed houses to be kept open during prohibited hours on Sunday, in which the working people could assemble for the purpose of eating, drinking to a great extent would be carried on in those houses.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he could not conceive how the Chancellor of the Exchequer could seriously propose such a clause. In the eating-houses which opened in the morning, drinking was not to commence until one o'clock, and should cease at two o'clock. Refreshment might, however, be sold all day; but virtuous drinking could only be resumed at six o'clock, and finally brought to a close at ten o'clock. It was absurd to suppose that such a Resolution could be carried out.

MR. FRANK CROSSLEY said, he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would reconsider the matter, or, at least, alter the law affecting public-houses, which also sold victuals as well as drink.

MR. BENTINCK observed, that it was plain that hon. Gentlemen did not understand the object of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which was to afford the greatest encouragement to drinking of all kinds, in order to raise a revenue; and therefore it was that he encouraged the sale and consumption on Sundays of all the abominations which would be sold in refreshment shops under the name of wine. If any one would move that this measure would promote drunkenness and immorality, he (Mr. Bentinck) would support him; but without some such Motion being made, all these discussions were useless. The only question was, whether they would have more or less drunkenness; while, for his part, he had always thought that it would be a good thing to put a stop to drunkenness altogether.

MR. HARDY said, he thought that the wine licences granted to refreshment-houses ought to override all other licences, for, if those places were allowed to remain open during the whole of Sunday, it would be impossible to prevent the sale of wine.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he was under the impression that the eating-houses were to be under the same restrictions as the public-houses. If a refreshment-house with a wine licence were to be open all Sunday, an injustice, in the first place, would be done to the publican, and, in the second place, the result would be that wine selling would go on all Sunday, as it was quite ridiculous to suppose that people in the shops would leave off drinking at eleven and resume at one, or leave off at three till six o'clock. The fair way would be to make every refreshment-house with a licence subject to the same restrictions as the public-house.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the clause had been drawn in strict conformity with the terms of an analogous clause in the Beer Act; but the beer licence restrained those houses from being open at all during certain hours on Sunday. In the schedules to the present Bill it would be found that the licence for the sale of wine would place refreshment-houses on precisely the same footing as the beerhouses.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT wished to know whether it was the intention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to place these houses on the same footing as licensed houses.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said that was his intention.

MR. PULLER said, he considered there was a discrepancy between the wording of the clause and the schedule, as the schedule said that refreshment-houses might be kept open between four A.M. and one A.M., while the clause said that they should not be open for the sale of wines after eleven at night.

On the suggestion of MR. HENLEY,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER agreed to the insertion of the words

"for the sale or consumption therein of any article whatever."

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 26,

MR. FRANK CROSSLEY said, he had at first objected to the sale of wines as proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but he informed him that he had no objection to make the regulations of the new law stringent in every possible way. Experience of beershops had told him (Mr. Crossley) that the keepers of them did not care much about fines, and there was no power to take away their licences. Now, he proposed to make the clause to stand that a person holding a retail licence should be disqualified from selling wine by retail for a space of five years, if convicted of offending against the law three times, and that it should not be within the discretion of the magistrates to condone the third offence.

MR. HENLEY said, he was of opinion that the proposition required a good deal of consideration, as it would operate very harshly in the case of persons convicted of small offences. There might be long intervals, too, between the offences, and the justices would, in such cases, be placed in a very difficult position. The clause proposed to disqualify offenders from selling wine for five years. That seemed a long time, and was not in accordance with the Beer Act, which, he understood, the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended to follow. By the Beer Act the disqualification was only for two years. It was his opinion that if the clause were to be worked out in the way now proposed there would be found a great difficulty in obtaining convictions at all.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, as a general rule he thought it would be desirable to follow the Beer Act, unless an improvement could be made upon it. In some respects the Beer Act was found to be very weak, and open to improvement, and he thought it was so in this instance. He wished to make the Act as stringent as possible, and he was about himself to propose an Amendment which would give a larger discretion to the justices. Instead of the words "third offence," he proposed to substitute the words "Any such second or third offence." If the cases were very aggravated a person might thus be disqualified on the second offence. The character, and not the number, of the offences should be the point of consideration.

MR. HARDY said, he preferred the Amendment of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to that of the hon. Member for the West Riding. It was clearly shown before the Committee upstairs that there was no instance of a third conviction of a beerhouse-keeper, which would have been followed by the loss of his licence. When a man had committed two offences he always transferred his licence. The same thing would be done more easily under the present measure, and therefore he thought the magistrates should have power to take away the qualification of the man on the second offence, and thus prevent him from being able to transfer the licence.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, that the penalty for a second offence was £10, and for a third offence from £20 to £50. These were serious penalties to persons in this condition of life, and he trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would reconsider them.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON said, he must remind the hon. Member that Clause 28 diminished the severity of the penalties by enabling the magistrates to lessen them.

MR. FRANK CROSSLEY observed, he was willing to withdraw his Amendment in favour of that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. BENTINCK said, he wished to call attention to the provisions against adulteration. As they stood in the Bill, they would not touch any person who sold wine that had been adulterated by some one else. He was afraid that the effects of this law would be to make the wine sold in England worse than that the Chancellor of the Exchequer so graphically described in his statement when he introduced the Budget. The introduction of cheap wine into this country had already been tried, and failed. The South African wines had been introduced, but the bulk that had been sold was manufactured in this country. Competition, so far from making wine cheap, would make it dearer, and under no circumstances would they have for the next two or three years wine cheaper than 24s. per dozen, or perhaps more, and then, probably, not worth drinking. It was, therefore, highly desirable that provisions should be introduced into the Bill against adulteration, that if they had no great operation, would frighten the people against adulteration. At the present time there was a large stock of bad wine in the London Docks, that would not afford to pay duty, and he understood that it would be mixed with some infusion, to make it more palatable, and then it would be sold as the "Chancellor of the Exchequer's wine." Cette, in the South of France, was a great place for the manufacture of spurious wines, and at the present moment the wine agents of France were scouring the country to purchase inferior wine to manufacture like the South African for the English market. He would, therefore, move the insertion of the words, "or shall knowingly sell, or expose for sale, any wines so diluted, adulterated, or mixed, as aforesaid."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had been led by the hon. Gentleman's argument not only to the same conclusion, but almost to the choice of the same words. He thought, however, it would be advisable to adopt the wording used in the Beer Act, which was, "anyone who shall knowingly sell or offer for sale any wine so fraudulently mixed, diluted, or adulterated."

MR. BENTINCK said, he was willing to accept the alteration.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he wished to know whether the phrase "knowingly sell," implied that the seller knew the article he supplied to be adulterated.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he understood it did.

MR. BENTINCK said, he could only repeat what he had before said, that it was his conviction the only possible effect of the Bill would be to promote drunkenness for the sake of augmenting the revenue. But, as the right hon. Gentleman, in his wild career, seemed determined to sacrifice the morals of the country—as he was willing in cold blood to open the doors to immorality of this description for the sake of revenue—he should appeal to him to have regard, at all events, to the health of the community as far as it was possible. He concurred with his hon. relation in thinking that it was high time that some very stringent measures should be taken to prevent the sale of that combination of filth—he could use no other term—which would be sold under the operation of the new law. The price of good wine would no doubt henceforth be considerably raised. It was notorious that as soon as the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman was first mooted the dealers in France began to buy up all the worst description of wines, and to adulterate them for the English market; that wine when first landed in this country was bad enough, certainly—so bad that it made one shudder to think of the distressing effect it would have on any person who was rash enough to drink it. But it was comparatively pure to what it would be after it had passed through the hands of the English vendor, whose singular talent for adulteration would be exercised to the fullest extent, in order to get the largest profit out of the transaction. By the time that the villanous compound was poured down the throats of the unfortunate dupes who bought it in the refreshment-house at so much a glass it would bear no more resemblance to wine than the ink on the clerk's table. The port and sherry of the present day, bad as they were, would be nectar compared with the stuff that would be passed off as wine when the combined ingenuity of England and France was directed to its adulteration. He asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he believed that in the class of houses which sold wine in retail under the present system a drop of pure genuine wine could really be got. Well, if that was the case now, what would it be after this Bill passed? He thought there ought to be some stringent system of inspection established in order to prevent people from being poisoned with bad wine. It was generally understood that Greenwich champagne was manufactured there; but, then, it was really a very wholesome beverage. It was prepared by a skilful chemist, and the manufacturers were very careful to exclude everything from its composition which would be likely to injure the people who drank it. If they poisoned them, of course, they would lose their custom. The same prudence was not to be expected on the part of those who would prepare the wine which the refreshment-houses would supply, and it was, therefore, the duty of the right hon. Gentleman to take strong measures to check the adulteration.

MR. STEUART suggested the propriety of adopting the words of a clause in the Bill framed to provide against the adulteration of food and drink which he thought would meet the requirements of the case completely. In reference to the observations of the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. G. W. Bentinck) the Bill to which he alluded provided for the analyzation of any article of food or drink that was alleged to be adulterated.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he thought the hon. Member for West Norfolk had been somewhat unjust to the tavern-keepers of our country, who were not responsible for all the adulteration which was practised.

and water; but not, under their zeal and ardour to defend the sobriety of the people, fraudulently give an article different from that which they professed to sell. He could not agree to abandon those words, and he hoped the Committee would agree to them. He thought the hon. Member for West Norfolk had been guilty of some exaggeration, for even now all wine that was sold was not adulterated. He had the curiosity to send for 20 samples from 20 publicans, taken indiscriminately, and the result of analysis was, that in about 12 cases the wine was new and raw, but pure, and in the other seven or eight it was adulterated in various degrees, some by mixture with Cape, and some by the introduction of objectionable compounds.

MR. ROEBUCK observed that where a warranty was given that the wine was pure, and it was proved to be impure, a remedy could be obtained by simply proving the warranty, but he thought it would be very difficult to prove in any case that the person who sold adulterated wines "knew" that they were adulterated. He therefore thought it better to make the penalty turn on a warranty which could be easily proved.

MR. STEUART said, when the vendor persevered in selling an article which he had been told was adulterated, it could then be proved that he sold such article with a guilty knowledge.

MR. BENTINCK said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had charged him with indulging in a tone of exaggeration. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that he never presumed to rival him in anything. The Chancellor of the Exchequer appeared not to understand the nature and habits of the classes for whom he was legislating. As to what had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone, he confessed he was surprised to hear him say that he had imbibed some very bad wine in West Norfolk. He (Mr. Bentinck) could only say that the district which he had the honour to represent was celebrated for the peculiarly good port wine which it imported and produced. The hon. and learned Gentleman must, therefore, have been extremely unlucky in having stumbled on a bad bottle. They would always be glad to see the hon. Member, and he only wished the hon. Member had imbibed some of the principles which he was sure were current upon the occasion to which he had referred.

Clause, as amended, agreed to; as were also.

Clauses 27 to 30 inclusive.

Clause 31 postponed; Clauses 32 to 34 agreed to.

Clause 35.

MR. AYRTON asked on what grounds the Universities were exempted from the Bill if, as was contended, its effect would be to promote temperance and virtue. It was quite right in passing the Licensing Act of George IV., the object of which was to restrict the sale of liquors by the strict supervision of magistrates, to preserve the authority exercised by the heads of the Universities; but, as the Bill proceeded on the principle that the sale of wine would promote sobriety, why should not the Universities be included? If restrictions could be dispensed with in regard to the people at large, much more could they be dispensed with in the case of the educated young men who frequented the Universities. But, in fact, the House of Commons, while passing this Bill, knew very well what its character was, and did not dare to apply to places resorted to by the sons of hon. Members and persons in a similar condition of life, the principles which they were applying to the people at large.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Gentleman's devotion to his cause amounted to something sublime. His argument, however, had no basis in fact. The Act would apply to Oxford and Cambridge just as to any other place, and the simple object of the clause was to preserve from any possible effect of a statutory enactment the licensing powers now possessed by the Vice-Chancellors. Similar clauses were inserted in the Beer Act and in the Licensing Act of George IV.

MR. HARDY said, he wished to know why the Incorporated Society of Free Vintners should be excepted. The privileges possessed by that society of being able to grant licences to wine dealers without consulting the magistrates had already produced many evils. It had been proved before a Committee of that House, that under this system men of straw placed their names upon the doors of houses to which licences were granted, and then other persons used those names for the purpose of carrying on a disreputable trade. The clause also exempted the corporation of St. Albans. Was that, he wished to know, to make amends for the disfranchisement of that borough? For the purpose of bringing the vintners within the operation of the Bill, he would move as an Amendment that the exception affecting them should be omitted from the clause.

Amendment proposed, in page 15, line 21, to leave out from the word "otherwise," to the word "only," in line 24, inclusive.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he thought the proper place to deal with the privilege of the Vintners' Company would be when the London Corporation Reform Bill came on. That body possessed privileges in reference to the opening of public-houses which could not be dealt with on this occasion. The only effect of this clause would be to except the new class of wineshops from the privileges of the vintners.

MR. HARDY said, he did not see why the vintners should be on a different footing from other people, and he should therefore move the omission of the words relating to the Vintners' Company.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the exemption in favour of the corporation of St. Albans was inserted, because that body had licensing powers under ancient charters, and which were independent of the ordinary tribunal of the justices of the peace. With regard to the privilege of the free vintners, it was certainly one of a most anomalous character, and he therefore thought the suggestion of his right hon. Friend (Sir G. Lewis) should be adopted. To adopt the Amendment of the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Hardy) would be granting too much or too little; and the effect would be to leave the law in a state of ambiguity. It would be much better to deal with the matter substantively by a separate Bill, and he confessed he thought it was a matter which Parliament should deal with.

MR. P. W. MARTIN said, he thought it unfair to take away the vintner's licences without due notice.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 97; Noes 90: Majority 7.

On Question that the Clause be added to the Bill—

MR. AYRTON said, that with regard to the allegations made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that his observations had no foundation in fact, he should contend that they were well-founded. As he understood, the Vice-Chancellors of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge exercised an absolute discretion as to licensing all places for the sale of drinks of an intoxicating character; which discretionary power it was proposed, under the present Bill, to retain. If this were a good Bill, and if, as was now declared, perfect free trade in wine was the best means of encouraging temperance, why should restraints continue to be imposed at Oxford and Cambridge, which were no longer to exist in any other part of the country? It was very desirable that the House should know what authority the Vice-Chancellors really possessed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that when the Bill was about to be introduced, the Vice-Chancellor of Oxford wrote to him, and expressed his anxiety that the licensing power of the University, with respect to public-houses, should not be interfered with. He referred the matter to the Board of Inland Revenue, and they saw no objection whatever to this clause. But he certainly did not understand it would do anything more than reserve to the Vice-Chancellors the powers which they already possessed. If there was any reason for altering or modifying these powers, that question might be raised; but at present he was not aware of any sufficient grounds for interfering with them.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the real question was as to the extent of the powers which the Vice-Chancellors possessed, and which, according to the wording of the clause, were to be maintained.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, there was a great anomaly in taking away the control of the magistrates generally as to licensing, at the same time that quasi-magisterial powers of this nature were confirmed to the Vice-Chancellors of the Universities. The question, he might be permitted to say, had nothing to do with the Inland Revenue Department, notwithstanding the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman, who kept running up and down the House, the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Laing).

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the exemptions were taken almost exactly from those in the Sale of Beer and Cider Act, 1 Wm. IV., c. 64, which provided that nothing in the Act should affect the privileges of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he must again express a wish for information as to the powers reserved by the clause.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he owed an apology to the noble Lord. Upon inquiry he found that the powers of the Vice-Chancellors of the Universities were larger than he had supposed. At the same time he thought that the House could not do otherwise than give them, under this Bill, the same authority which they enjoyed under the Beer Act.

MR. AYRTON said, he was sorry to hear the Beer Act quoted as a precedent. The Beer Act was the last desperate effort of a corrupt House of Commons to pacify a people who were asking for Parliamentary Reform, and had proved a total failure. After thirty years the people were asking for Parliamentary Reform again, and they were offered free trade in wine instead. The real spirit in which the Beer Act was passed, was made more obvious by the exemption of the Universities. If the present Bill would not be injurious to the sons of the people, why should it be injurious to the sons of the wealthy at the Universities? Unless the clause was amended, so as to give to the Vice-Chancellors only the same power as was conferred upon justices of the peace, he should divide against it.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that Oxford and Cambridge were in a different position from other towns, because the discipline of the students was involved in the authority which was invested in the Vice-Chancellors for maintaining order in those places. On that account they had conferred upon them powers with regard to places of public resort and refreshment which were not needed in other towns. He hoped hon. Members would not lightly be induced to agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman to deprive the Vice-Chancellors of those powers.

MR. SPOONER said, he quite agreed with what had fallen from the noble Lord with regard to the Universities; but what did his remarks say for the Bill? He believed it to be a bad Bill. The Government said it was a good one; and yet it now appeared they were afraid to entrust its working in the University towns.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the hon. Gentleman had mistaken the tenor of the noble Lord's observations. That it was necessary that the Vice-Chancellors should have special powers for the maintenance of academic discipline, did not prove that this was a bad Bill.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU inquired whether the right hon. Gentleman intended to leave in the hands of the Mayor of St. Albans a power of which he deprived all other magistrates?

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR asked what object the Chancellor of the Exchequer could have in excepting the University towns from the operations of this Bill, if it was really a measure for the promotion of temperance and sobriety.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that although this might be a measure for the promotion of temperance and sobriety in places where the present system of licensed public-houses and beer-shops was in full force, it did not follow that it would be desirable to refuse to the Vice-Chancellors the power which they at present enjoyed with regard to that system, and which was necessary in order to maintain discipline among a body of 1,500 or 2,000 young men, who, from the period of life at which they had arrived, were peculiarly exposed to temptation. He did not wish to exclude these houses from Oxford and Cambridge, but only to leave it to the discretion of the University authorities to decide whether or not they should be introduced into those places.

MR. HENLEY said, the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman had now put the clause on an intelligible ground. He quite agreed that some discretion should be allowed to the Vice-Chancellors, but he would remind the Committee that with respect to Oxford, at least, the limits of their jurisdiction were very narrow, and the public-houses round them were not few. The practices to which hon. Members had referred were not done in the High Street, but just outside the Vice-Chancellor's circle, where the powers of the magistrates were very limited. Hitherto the magistrates and the Vice-Chancellors had got on together very well; but he feared if this Bill passed in its entirety the clause that saved the rights of the Vice-Chancellors would be mere waste paper.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH remarked, that he could see no peculiar virtue in the borough of St. Albans which entitled its magistracy to any special favour under this Bill.

MR. MACAULAY said, that the powers exercised over the town by charter or otherwise by the University of Cambridge had been made the subject of agreement between the University and the town some years ago, under the arbitration of Sir J. Pateson, which had since been turned into an Act of Parliament. If that had worked with perfect satisfaction to both parties, anything in this Bill which would disturb any part of the arrangement must be viewed both by the town and university as a very great misfortune.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that with reference to the University authorities and the commoners, the company of vinters, and that remarkable body the mayor and burgesses of the borough of St. Albans, this clause in no way enlarged any more than it diminished their authorities and rights. If hon. Members referred to the twentieth line, they would observe the expression after the words rights and privileges "as by law possessed."

MR. WALPOLE said, the award of Sir J. Patteson, as between the powers of the University and the town authorities of Cambridge, operated so satisfactorily to both parties that it ought not even inferentially to be disturbed.

Clause agreed to.

MR. AYRTON said, that no part of Her Majesty's dominions so much required a measure for promoting temperance as Scotland. One of the ostensible objects of this Bill being to check the consumption of ardent spirits, it was surprising that it had not been brought in for Scotland in the first instance rather than for England. While England, with her population of 19,000,000, consumed 12,000,000 gallons of spirits annually; Scotland, on the other hand, with a population of only 3,000,000, consumed nearly 6,000,000 gallons. Moreover, one-half of all the shops in Scotland of £20 in annual value were public-houses. The efforts of many gentlemen connected with the various religious denominations in Scotland had been devoted to the promotion of temperance; and yet, strange to say, when a legislative measure was proposed to assist that cause, Scotland was wholly excluded from its operation. The licensing system and other circumstances of Scotland were very much identical with those of England; and he would therefore move that this Bill be extended to that country.

LORD FERMOY said, he also wished to hear from the Government why they had omitted Ireland from the Bill. He advocated its extension to Ireland for a different reason from that just urged in the case of Scotland. Of late years the people of Ireland had become much more moderate in their potations, and it was only fair that they should enjoy the same chance of obtaining cheap claret as their English fellow-subjects.

MR. BLACK said, that Scotland might not have a very good name for its temperance, but it was quite impossible that its people could consume the 6,000,000 gallons of spirits which the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets had allotted to them. Much of the whisky distilled in Scotland crossed the Border into England, and some of it even reached the Continent. He saw no reason, however, why the benefits of this measure should not be extended to Scotland; but it would not be fair to include that country within its provisions now, because no notice had been given of the intention to make any proposal of that kind. Such a step ought not to be taken without allowing the people of Scotland an opportunity for its full consideration.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was usual, if Parliament accepted a Bill of that nature in principle for England, for an analogous measure to be applied to Scotland and Ireland. When this Bill was drawn he accordingly brought the subject immediately under the notice of the Irish Government, and also of his learned Friend the Lord Advocate; and he understood from the Chief Secretary and the Attorney General for Ireland that there would be little difficulty in adapting its provisions to that country. He was not sure whether they had a measure ready for that purpose, but he believed there would be no reason for delaying its introduction. The case of Scotland was rather different, because the subject there had recently been investigated by a Commission, whose report was not yet in the hands of hon. Members. True, the Scottish licensed victuallers were not of the same mind as their brethren in England, having petitioned in favour of a Bill of that kind. But the whole law of Scotland was very different from ours, and some time would have to elapse before any positive decision was come to with respect to that country.

MR. M'CANN said, the Irish Members had all through supported this Bill.—["No!"] At least, all of them who knew the people of Ireland best had done so. As an Irishman himself, he trusted the measure would be soon extended to Ireland. In fact, a great deal of trouble would be saved by putting the word "Ireland" in the Bill now, and extending its provisions at once to that country.

COLONEL DUNNE remarked that, no part of the kingdom had so generally opposed the rash and dangerous measures of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as Ireland. A general impression prevailed that this Bill would not be extended to Ireland, or it would have been much more stoutly opposed. He certainly would oppose it in every form if it were intended to apply to Ireland.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, it had at first been understood that the Bill was to extend to Ireland; and the consequence was that a considerable agitation had been got up in that country against the measure. That agitation had only ceased on an intimation being given that Ireland was not to be comprehended within the Bill, and it would amount almost to a breach of faith to set aside that understanding.

MR. M'CANN said, that he had heard of no such agitation as the hon. Member for Dublin had mentioned. He believed the feeling of the people of Ireland to be in favour of this measure, and he moved that the word "Ireland" be omitted from the clause.

MR. BLACKBURN said, the law in Scotland was so different from that of England with respect to licences that the utmost confusion would result from extending the Bill at once to Scotland. There was no desire on the part of the Scotch Members to oppose its extension to Scotland, but that could not be done by merely striking out the word "Scotland."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS observed, that the whole Bill had been framed with reference to England alone. If it was to extend to Scotland, it would be necessary to insert wholly new clauses. It would introduce great confusion into the law of Scotland. If the House thought it desirable at once to extend the measure to Scotland and Ireland, it would be necessary to bring up a whole set of clauses and add them to the Bill.

MR. M'CANN said, he would withdraw his Amendment, on the distinct understanding that it was seriously intended to extend the provisions of the Bill to Ireland.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

MR. HENLEY said, he believed that whether the Bill was a good or a bad one, Irish Members might rest assured that it would be extended to their country. He remembered that those hon. Gentlemen had at one time congratulated themselves on the fact that the income tax was not to be extended to Ireland; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer had "let them in" upon that question; and he (Mr. Henley) had no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman would also give them the advantages or the disadvantages of his Wine Licences Bill.

VOL. CLVIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. AYRTON said, he would not press his Amendment, as he understood that the Government were pledged to extend the measure, at a fitting opportunity, both to Scotland and to Ireland.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he hoped the Government had given no such pledge.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.
Additional Clause.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he wished to propose a clause in lieu of Clause 12, which had been postponed. The new clause was, in fact, the same as Clause 12, with amendments. There was one point which they discussed at some length on a former occasion—namely, the question whether, within the limits of the Metropolis, the power of veto, and the hearing of parties who applied for licences, should be lodged in the hands of the police magistrates, or of the Middlesex magistrates. The Government were of opinion that that power should be lodged in the hands of the police magistrates for the reasons which they gave at the time, and likewise for other reasons. The Government were informed that it would be very inconvenient to place that power in the hands of the Middlesex magistrates, inasmuch as they had not petty sessions, as was the case in other parts of the country. In fact, they had not the machinery that would be requisite for working a Bill of this nature.

MR. AYRTON said, he could conceive no possible reason why the Metropolis should be subjected to a kind of despotism from which all the rest of the country was exempted. For a long time past the justices of the peace had discharged the functions of licensing magistrates, and had all the requisite machinery in their hands. The magistrates of police held office at the pleasure of the Secretary for the Home Department, and could only see through the eyes of the police, while the justices of the peace discharged their functions as members of society generally, without any particular bias. He hoped the Committee would not sanction a system which, if once adopted, must extend to all places where there were stipendiary magistrates. He would, therefore, propose as an Amendment that the notices of application for licences should be given to the justices of the peace who had hitherto discharged analogous duties in the Metropolis.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets was quite in error in supposing that the position of the stipendiary magistrates in London was the same as that of stipendiary magistrates in Manchester, Liverpool, and other places. In London the power of the police magistrates was exclusive in their own districts. They did not sit with the other magistrates. But in Liverpool, Manchester, and elsewhere the stipendiary magistrates sat with the others, and exercised a concurrent jurisdiction with them. This clause was prepared with a view of meeting this difference of circumstances. The hon. Gentleman said that the stipendiary magistrates in Middlesex were in the power of the Crown, and seemed to think that it was the constant habit of the Executive to interfere with their functions. He (Sir G. Lewis) was not aware of any instance in which the Secretary of State had interfered with the stipendiary magistrates. Practically their position was the same as that of a judge at common law. As to the notion of the Commissioners of the Metropolitan Police having any control over the stipendiary magistrates, it was a perfect chimera. The title of inspectors of police might have a formidable sound in the ears of the Committee, but they were only officers over the main body of the police; and they possessed no control over the magistrates. He thought there was no ground for the objection of the hon. Gentleman.

SIR WILLIAM MILES said, there seemed to be some difficulty in the case. He should be most happy to give the magistrates of Middlesex the same power that ordinary magistrates possessed, for he thought a purer body of men did not exist; but he foresaw a difficulty, if the Middlesex magistrates had a power of refusing licences, but not the power of enforcing the prescribed penalties.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that the Middlesex magistrates performed almost all the duties which were usually discharged by other magistrates throughout the country. They imposed fines, they licensed public-houses and slaughter-houses, granted game licences, and performed numerous other duties. They met in petty sessions, sometimes every fortnight, but at all events as often as circumstances required. He could fancy no reason for the course proposed to be taken by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, except that he feared that the Middlesex magistrates would be more strict in the granting of licences than would exactly suit his present purposes. The Middlesex magistrates were as competent to perform the functions in question as any magistrates in England, and certainly as the police magistrates.

MR. LAING said, a moment's consideration of the actual working of the machinery of the justices in the Metropolis would show that, without casting the slightest imputation upon them, no kind of supervision could be exercised by them in the granting of licences. The jurisdiction of the Middlesex magistrates was not concurrent with that of the police magistrates, who had ousted them from almost all authority except that of granting licences twice a year. The licences under the Bill would be granted in the first place by the Excise, subject to giving notice to the clerk of the justices of petty sessions holden within the district; but there were no petty sessions in Middlesex, and no clerk, no communication with the police, and therefore the effect of giving such power to the Middlesex justices would be that licences would be granted to all persons that would apply for them; or, instead of making the grant of wine licences a thing going on from month to month, they would have to assimilate it entirely to the granting of licences to public-houses, which were granted but once or twice annually.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he would beg leave to correct the hon. Gentleman. The Middlesex magistrates met most frequently in petty sessions, and had a regular clerk. In the district in which he resided, the magistrates had a clerk; their duties were most onerous, and embraced a variety of matters totally distinct from licensing—everything, in fact, except such duties as were performed by the police magistrates, which were very limited.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he had been a magistrate of Middlesex for many years, but after all he had heard about them, he began to think himself a myth. He was not aware that the magistrates of Middlesex had no petty sessions, no clerk, and no connection with the police. The right hon. Gentleman seemed, in the eyes of the hon. Baronet (Sir W. Miles), invested with one of the Royal prerogatives—that he could do no wrong. Supposing it were true that an objection was made by one authority, and a penalty for abuse enforced by another, why that was the present state of the law, and was intended to be enforced under this Bill. His impression was, that the Middlesex magistrates, like those of other counties, were in the habit of making much closer investigations into character than seemed fashionable with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He could see no validity in the objection, and agreed with the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets that no reason had been shown why they should begin in this Bill thus to subvert the whole principle of local Government. He said nothing against stipendiary magistrates in the Metropolis, but that was a question of local Government. He spoke himself as a Middlesex magistrate who had once acted on behalf of the House, in 1848, when he was associated with another magistrate and swore in two-thirds of the special constables. The bench of the Middlesex magistrates was not, as the Home Secretary seemed to suppose, a defunct body, and if he would turn to the evidence of the chairman of the magistrates (Mr. Pownall) on the Beer Bill, he would find that the magistrates of Middlesex were not uninformed upon the subject of licensing.

SIR WILLIAM MILES said, he could assure his hon. Friend he had no intention to make any objection to the jurisdiction of the Middlesex magistrates. If they met especially for licensing, he would give them the power of objecting. But he wanted some information as to how often they met for the purpose of licensing. If they met once a month he would give them the power of objecting; but if only once or twice a year, it would be perfectly ridiculous, for, if the licences under the Bill were to be at all useful, they ought to be granted every week.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that for all county business the Middlesex magistrates were more completely organized than any bench of magistrates in the United Kingdom. They were subdivided into committees, and met frequently, and they could, of course, meet any time for a particular purpose.

MR. PEACOCKE said, he hoped the House would show a distrust of any extension of the power of the stipendiary magistrates. It would be very dangerous to entrust them with county business, for it would be introducing the principle of centralization. He believed there was a strong feeling in every county that the magistrates of the county should not be superseded.

MR. BYNG said, he regretted the remark that had been made, to the effect that the stipendiary magistrates were too much under the control of the Home Office. But he would ask the Home Secretary whether the powers of the county magistrates were anything new, and whether he thought those powers had been abused? The Middlesex magistrates sat in petty sessions. They met to grant licences, and they had special sittings to hear appeals. Had the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to divest the magistrates of any other county of their powers, a loud storm would have been raised against the proposal.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, the Middlesex magistrates met frequently, and did everything but administer justice. If for the first time these refreshment-houses were to be placed under the police magistrates, those able gentlemen would necessarily be guided by the police reports, and would not be able to institute those independent inquiries which the Middlesex magistrates would feel it their duty to institute.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary to the Treasury had not been properly informed when they stated that the Middlesex magistrates had not the machinery requisite to carry out this measure. He wanted to know who regulated the transfer of licences. [Mr. Alderman SALOMONS: The Middlesex magistrates.] Then, if the Middlesex magistrates met to transfer licences, surely they could meet to grant licences. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not cast such a reflection upon a body of magistrates and take away from them functions which it was shown they were competent to fulfil.

MR. BUTLER said, the Middlesex magistrates were not at all anxious to have these additional duties cast upon them, but he could not admit that they were not competent to them. The Secretary to the Treasury said there were no clerks to Petty Sessions upon whom the notices could be served; but that was not the fact. There were clerks to all the special divisional courts, and the magistrates held eight special meetings in the year for the purpose of licensing public-houses, besides other meetings throughout the year for the grant of game and slaughter-house licences, cases of weights and measures, highways, parochial assessments, and other business. It would be absurd to say that the Middlesex magistrates were not competent to fulfil all the duties of granting licences.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he thought it had been shown that the police magistrates had quite enough business to occupy them, and to confer upon them fresh duties would only be to impair their efficiency in other respects. If their duties were to be taken away from the magistrates of Middlesex, could they stop there, and must not the whole licensing functions be transferred to the police magistrates? It would be said that the Middlesex magistrates were more severe or more lax than the police magistrates, and an argument would be raised for relieving them of those functions. He looked on this as a more important question than it appeared at first sight to be. He quite agreed with the hon. Gentleman who proposed the Amendment, and trusted the Committee would not sanction any departure from the recognized principles which had hitherto guided them.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the only wish of the Government was to place the power of licensing these houses in the hands of those who were most likely to perform the duties with care and circumspection, and he had been led to believe it would have been a mere sinecure in the hands of the Middlesex magistrates; but, as he found the feeling of the Committee was in the opposite direction, he had no hesitation in saying he was prepared to give way upon the point, and upon the Report he would move words to meet what he believed to be the wish of the Committee.

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to call the attention of the Committee to that part of the clause which gave the magistrates power to object. By the clause, if no objection was made by the magistrates within thirty days after the supervisor had sent them notice of the application for licences, it was granted. In many cases, however, Petty Sessions were not holden more than once a month, and therefore he thought the time allowed for objection was too short. There were no less than five causes on account of which the magistrates could object to a licence; that the house was not a confectioner's shop or eating-house; that the rental was not equal to the amount required; that it was disorderly; that it was frequented by prostitutes or bad characters, and that it was disqualified under the Act. Before the magistrates objected they were very properly required to summon the party against whom they were to object, and to state in the summons the grounds of the objection. But, he asked, were the magistrates themselves to be the objectors, or were they to object on information given them by somebody else? He thought it objectionable to make the magistrate the objector "on his own hook," and that the best plan would be for some person to raise objections before the magistrates. He did not see how the two clauses could be worked at all, and should like to hear the opinion of the Solicitor General on the point. As the Excise were the people who collected the money, perhaps they were the proper people to grant the licence; but he thought something like the recommendation of the Committee which sat on public-houses should be adopted in this case. That Committee recommended, if he recollected rightly, that the licence should be granted by the magistrates at Sessions; and he thought something like that would be the right course, because then the character of the applicant would be stated affirmatively, and not negatively, as would be the effect under the clause as it stood. The magistrates might grant a certificate, and upon that certificate being shown to the Excise, the licence might be granted at once. All that the Chancellor of the Exchequer required as to fitness of character could be then proved affirmatively by the parties themselves, instead of negatively, as was at present proposed. Negative proof amounted almost to nothing. The applicant would bring to the hearing certificates of character from persons who knew him, many of whom would be known to the magistrates, who would be able to say what credit was to be attached to their statements. The Committee on Public Houses also recommended that all applicants of good character should have a licence, and he thought they ought. Indeed, it was not often now that people of bad character applied for a licence; they knew that the proof of character required was such that they would not succeed; but the misfortune was that people of good character, having obtained a licence, often fell into a bad course of life afterwards. For the purpose of raising the question, he would move the omission of certain words, with the view to afford the Chancellor of the Exchequer an opportunity of recasting the clause so as to obviate the objections he had taken to it.

Amendment proposed, in lines 20 and 21, to leave out the words, "and every such duplicate."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he should be glad to hear the subject which had been mooted by the right hon. Gentleman discussed by the Committee, for the views he had expressed did not altogether carry conviction to his (the Chancellor of the Exchequer's) mind. He was surprised at the disposition shown by the right hon. Gentleman to attach great value to the positive proof of character, for he had thought that certificates of that kind were now very much discredited. The right hon. Gentleman objected that the matters to be proved were all negative; but surely the fact that a house was disorderly, and that a man was disqualified for selling wine in consequence of having kept a disorderly house, were affirmative propositions. Some, no doubt, were negative, such as that a particular house was not an eating-house within the terms of the Act, or that the requisite amount of annual rent was not paid for the House; but these were all matters easily proved, and nothing would be easier than for the magistrates to make up their minds regarding them. The Committee to which the right hon. Gentleman referred recommended that the licences should issue from the magistrates, whereas the right hon. Gentleman proposed that it should issue from the Excise. He must say that the reasons given by the right hon. Gentleman were not sufficient to induce him to accede to his Amendment.

MR. ROEBUCK said, the right hon. Gentleman did not see the full force of the objection. The question seemed to be, who was to take the initiative. Should a person who wanted to take out a licence go to the Government office and say he intended to take out a licence, or should he be referred by that office to the magistrate, who should give him a certificate of character, so that in reality the issue was with the magistrate. He (Mr. Roebuck) believed the best way would be for the person to go to the Government office and say he wished to have a licence, and ask was there anybody who had an objection to him. He thought the onus of proving the objection ought to rest with the magistrate.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS observed, that he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that the whole tendency of the evidence taken before the Committee was to shake confidence in evidence of character; and that so far as magistrates had any rule in the granting of licences, they were guided by the necessities of the district. It was also given in evidence that there was no class of persons who so constantly changed their business as that of publicans.

MR. HENLEY said, it would ill become him to comment on the interpretation the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Villiers) had given to his own Report. He (Mr. Henley) had spoken, not from the evidence, but from the Report. That Committee was unanimous, and the recommendation of the Committee was, that it should be open to all persons of character to obtain licences. He confessed he could not put the same construction on the Report which the right hon. Gentleman had done. He thought that, as far as they could get at a man's character, they should try to do so. It might not be of the greatest possible use, but it might, perhaps, be of some use.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, there was a great distinction between the two propositions before the Committee. If they decided on an affirmative certificate they would continue the present system, which it was the object of this Bill to get rid of.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT remarked, that the question to be decided was, which of these systems would be most effectual? He would undertake to say that the mode suggested by the Chancellor of the Exchequer would never bring into play that which he seemed to think was so desirable, because there was nothing so disagreeable as to be called upon to prove a negative. He would advise the House to adopt the suggestion of his right hon. Friend.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 124, Noes 104: Majority 20.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that as there was no prospect of getting through the remainder of the clauses on that occasion, he would suggest that the Chairman do report progress.

House resumed; Committee report Progress: to sit again on Thursday.

NUISANCES REMOVAL AND DISEASES PREVENTION BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. LOWE said he would state, in a few words, the exact object of this Bill; but first he would mention what it would not do. It would not increase the central power of the substitute for the General Board of Health nor the local powers of local boards of health. Its object was simply to carry out the intentions of the existing law, which was that there should be in every place in England a local authority responsible for the health of the district. The present Act, passed in 1855, provided that wherever there was a Local Board of Health that should be the local authority for the Administration of the Act. In the absence of a Local Board of

MR. HENNESSY said, he should not oppose the adjournment, but he should not give way in what he had asked for, and which he had obtained the order for as an unopposed Return.

MR. MALINS said, he thought the hon. Member for King's County should, on public grounds, be satisfied with all but the confidential correspondence.

Debate Adjourned till To-morrow.

INDIA.—PETITIONS.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE presented two Petitions from India, which had been some time in his hands; but he the less regretted the delay that had occurred in their presentation, because the events which had taken place since the petitions had been in England would secure for them a greater degree of attention. One of the petitions emanated from Madras, and the other from Bombay, and they adverted to various subjects well deserving attention, and which must meet with attention from the Government in this country and the Government in India if it were desired to retain the Empire of India. Their Lordships had seen into what a condition India had been brought, and if they reflected on what had taken place within the last few years, they would acknowledge that no misfortune had occurred in that country which had not been clearly predicted both in India and in England; and that it was owing to their neglect to take those steps which were necessary for the reform of the Indian government and administration, that much that had happened was due. The first petition he had to present came from Bombay, and he regretted the rule of their Lordships' House which prevented any petition from being printed, because he should have been glad if the sentiments expressed by these Natives could have been read by their Lordships in their own words. He would shortly mention the heads of the matters to which the petitioners prayed attention. They prayed for a reduction and reform of the public expenditure; for a settlement of the relations between the Imperial Government and the Native Principalities; the settlement of claims relating to the tenure of land; the construction of public works; for the promotion of education; an improved administration of justice; a re-construction of the Legislative Council; and the appointment of non-official and independent Members, with separate Councils for each Presidency. The petitioners also prayed that a Royal Commission should be sent out to India to investigate these subjects and report thereon. The other petition, from Madras, related more exclusively to two subjects, and to those he should chiefly confine his observations. The Madras petition adverted first to the question of finance, and next to the administration of justice and the composition of the Legislative Council. The plan they recommended for the legislative body of India was not one to which he could give his entire support; but, as the statement came from Natives of India, it well deserved their Lordships' consideration. They proposed that each Presidency should have one Executive Council and Legislative Council, consisting of the Governor and his Cabinet, the Chief Justice, and a certain number of non-official Members, nominated by the Governor, but not removable, except on the unanimous vote of the Council. The petitioners suggested that there should be a Supreme Council for Imperial measures, while the local Governments should apply themselves to what might be properly termed local questions. He did not entirely concur in that suggestion, but, as it proceeded from a body of highly intelligent Natives, it well deserved their Lordships' consideration. The matters to which he wished particularly to direct their Lordships' attention were connected with the administration of justice and the formation of the Legislative Council. The conviction of the necessity of an efficient administration of justice in India had been forced on the mind of every one by events which had latterly taken place in connection with the indigo cultivators. The state of the local courts in the country parts of India and the total absence of anything that deserved the name of administration of justice were not new matters, but had been repeatedly forced on the attention of Parliament. These courts had been described by the late Lieutenant-Governor, Mr. Halliday, as the terror of honest and well-disposed people. The cultivation of indigo was very valuable, and had always been encouraged by the Government of India, and by the authorities connected with that country; and these occurrences, to which he should call attention, had not taken place in any remote or semi-barbarous district, but from within 40, 50, and 100 miles from Calcutta. These things could not have happened if the Government, at home and in India, instead of seeking to extend their possessions, had attended to the proper administration of the countries under their control. As it was, they were a disgrace to the Indian and the English Government. The indigo planters having invested their capital in the cultivation, deserved protection; but everything was not to be sacrificed to their interests. The Natives in many instances had been treated like slaves; while, on the other hand, the planters had not received proper protection. The time had now arrived when the condition of both should be thoroughly investigated, and when a permanent remedy should be applied. The possessors of factories in India could derive very large profits from these establishments, provided they were assured of a sufficient supply of indigo at certain prices. But the Natives were averse to the cultivation of indigo, which they found very troublesome, and not profitable to themselves. Nevertheless, they were in some sort compelled to enter into contracts for the production of a certain amount of indigo at a certain price. Of course, the Englishman endeavoured to drive a good bargain for himself; but, on the other hand, the Native was excessively cunning, and anxious to evade as much of the contract as he could. The result was that hardly a single indigo contract was carried out fairly on both sides. Under these circumstances the European planter, unable to enforce his rights in a court of justice, frequently had recourse to the most violent and unjustifiable measures. He maltreated the Natives in a way paralleled only by the most barbarous treatment of slaves. On the other hand, the Natives sometimes attacked the factories of their oppressors, and in these conflicts much property and some lives had been destroyed. While the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal was on a recent visit to the indigo districts petitions were addressed to him by the Natives, setting forth the tyranny and oppression to which they were subjected, and praying for redress. The Lieutenant Governor ordered a Report to be made to him on the subject, and the result was the publication of a notification in the shape of an instruction to the police of the district which had since been made the excuse for all the occurrences that had taken place, but there seemed nothing objectionable in that document. It was to the effect that persons should not be forced to enter into contracts against their will; that when a Native failed in his contract the other party should not seize his land, far less injure his person, but take civil action against him; and in short that both parties were entitled to the protection of the law. Upon this, so little used were the Natives to the fair administration of justice, there arose a rumour that the Government were in favour of the non-cultivation of indigo, and, under the idea that they would not be punished for non-performance of contract they attacked the factories of the planters, who had had recourse to violence, destroying a considerable amount of property. The consequence was, that the Legislative Council in Calcutta hastily enacted a law whereby any man guilty of breach of contract was declared punishable as for a criminal offence—a law quite unparalleled in its nature, especially since it was to be put in force by the magistrates upon the mere deposition of a planter. Last autumn a case was brought under the notice of the Lieutenant Governor in which a planter, having made a descent upon a Native village, drove the inhabitants into his factory and there flogged them with his own hand. But this was not the worst feature of the case. Complaint was thereupon made to a Native magistrate—one of those officials whom we would not allow to have jurisdiction over our own countrymen—who punished those of his own countrymen who had been engaged in the outrage, and ordered that the planter should pay the damage done to the sacked village. But his sentence was reversed by a European magistrate. This was not a question of peasants refusing to fulfil a contract, but one of the peasants refusing to enter into a contract, and an outrage committed upon them in consequence. An individual who had been subjected to the ill-treatment he had just narrated was not forthcoming on the trial, the reason was the poor creature was dead. The whole punishment inflicted on the man that had in fact murdered him was a fine of £30. It was said in a public document that the peasants were inclined to evade the fulfilment of the contracts, and that if a pressure were not put upon them they would ruin the planters. The indigo contracts were very numerous. Mr. Furlong, the agent of a large London company, held no fewer than 1,900, which under the present existing law might have to be enforced in courts notoriously corrupt. So bad, indeed, were those courts that Europeans had almost risen to insurrection whenever it had been proposed to subject them to their jurisdiction. The consequence was, that at this an European, who was charged with committing perjury in the interior of the country, had to be taken to Calcutta for examination, and it was stated that the cost of his trial would be no less than £3,000! Considering the difference between the treatment of Natives and Europeans he was not surprised that under extraordinary circumstances the Legislative Council should have passed such an exceptional law with regard to contracts made with the ryots. Nor was it only the lower classes of Natives who were exposed to this oppression. Even the highest zemindars and rajahs who were subject to our jurisdiction suffered from the maladministration of the law, as was shown by the numerous appeals which were brought to this country, and which invariably terminated in favour of the Native suitor. In one of these cases Lord Kingsdown, in giving judgment, charged the Indian Government with having suppressed documents, and with having, with a view to obtaining a judgment in its favour, brought the case before fresh Judge appointed by the Government in the same court after former Judges, who were removed, had decided against it. Yet we were the people whose sense of justice was so great, and our practice of it so evident, that we pretended to be justified in excluding the Natives from the judicial bench, and that all men ought to receive the decrees of our Courts without a murmur! The petition also prayed for an alteration of the legislative body. Although he was himself of opinion that more depended upon the administration of the law than upon its enactments, yet he thought that the state of our finances in India, and the differences which had recently arisen between the authorities there, showed that an improvement was required in the composition and working of the Legislative Council. Their Lordships were aware that Mr. Wilson had produced a plan for improving the financial condition of our Indian empire, and that both the inferior Governments more or less objected to it. One of the Lieutenant Governors had risen in insubordination, and had not only pointed out to the Governor General and to the Legislative Council in Calcutta, but had pleaded coram populo against his Superiors, and had stated that the plan of taxation which was proposed would be both impracticable and mischievous. It seemed to be impossible that after this Mr. Wilson's plan should be adopted without some modifications; and this and the other House of Parliament had a right to know what the Home authorities as well as those of India thought upon the subject, what were the opinions of the Indian Council, and what was that of the Secretary of State, and they were bound to express their judgment upon this most important and vital question which had been brought before the British public and the British Legislature. He need make no condemnatory remarks upon the conduct of Sir Charles Trevelyan in publishing his Minute. His conduct had already been condemned by the Government, and he had been recalled; nor did he think it was possible, whatever might be the view taken of the opinions expressed in that most able paper, that the Ministry could have taken any other course. But, looking to the organization and action of the Legislative Council, there was some excuse to be made for the course which had been pursued. Mr. Wilson published both his speech and his plan, and invited discussion upon it, and said he rejoiced that there was a public press in India. The whole tenour of his speech, indeed, was that of a man who courted public discussion. That being so, what was Sir Charles Trevelyan to do under the circumstances? In point of fact he had no locus standi in the Council, although certainly there was in that body what was called a Member for Madras—namely, a European gentleman who, as far as his connection with that Presidency was concerned, might as well sit for Manchester as for Madras. It would have been competent for that gentleman to have made an answer to Mr. Wilson's speech on the spot, if he differed from him in opinion, and in that way to have proclaimed the existence of dissensions, not, indeed, between Members of the Government, but in the much more decent form of differences of opinion in the Legislature. Nevertheless, it was quite clear that Mr. Wilson invited controversy, and so far it was open to Sir Charles Trevelyan to enter into it. Sir Charles had, however, adopted controversy in a shape which all must condemn. The anomaly of the Governor of a subordinate Presidency appealing to public opinion against the proposals of the Supreme Government could only have occurred under the absurd system of Government which prevailed in India. There was no parallel for it in the history of any other country. But Sir Charles Trevelyan said the scheme would not only create discontent among the people of Madras, but would put an end to all the improvements now in progress in that Presidency. Sir Charles Trevelyan had dealt with great ability as an administrator with one of the subjects mentioned in these petitions—namely, the tenure of land free from taxation, and had attempted improvements in relation to it, which, he now alleged, would be much prejudiced by Mr. Wilson's scheme, and especially by the proposed income tax. Whether that assertion was well or ill-founded, he knew not; but the matter having been ventilated in India, it ought to be taken up and discussed by Parliament, instead of being left to be settled by the Indian Legislature alone. These extraordinary circumstances and unparalleled events told strongly in favour of a proposition contained in one of the petitions that he had presented to their Lordships. The petitioners laid great stress upon having local Legislatures and to a certain degree representative Government. In that opinion he himself to some extent concurred. To think of attaining that object by means of the debating society of a few gentlemen who composed the Legislative Council was quite preposterous. Our greatest mistake had been the attempt to legislate through such a body for India as a whole. To attempt to do so was to attempt to deal with an empire of the vastest extent and of endless diversity of circumstances in the same way as they might legislate for the Isle of Man or some other of our smallest possessions. It might or might not be desirable to establish an income tax in India, but that they would be able to introduce it all at once over the whole of that country, and to carry it out effectively, he gravely questioned. All authorities agreed in thinking that the expense of collection would render it comparatively and at first unproductive. The Correspondence for which he had now to move would, he believed, throw considerable light on matters which deserved their Lordships' serious attention. He was convinced that our Indian Empire was in very serious jeopardy. It was impossible to continue, as we had hitherto done, in a system by which the Natives were excluded from the higher offices of every kind. There was no example in history of any nation having been so ruled. We might send out our Governors, Pro-Consuls, and Viceroys, but to attempt to govern upwards of 160,000,000 of people without admitting any individual among them to have a share, either here or in that country, in their own government, was an experiment which had yet to be tried, and which he was sure would never succeed. The noble Marquess concluded by presenting a Petition from Inhabitants of Madras praying for Alterations in the present Scheme of Indian Government, and that each Presidency may have its own Legislative Council; another from Native Inhabitants of the Town and Island of Bombay for Inquiry into the system of Taxation and Finance in India, with a view to its Amendment; and by moving, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, for

"Despatch from Mr. E. H. Lushington to the Commissioner of the Nuddea District, dated 23rd October, 1859, and relating to the treatment of Natives by European Planters in India:

"Also, Report of Mr. Reid to the Lieutenant Governor, referred to in the above-mentioned Despatch:

"And to present a Petition from certain Natives of India, praying for legal Reforms and for their admission into higher offices of Government than are now opened to them."

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he was quite aware that their Lordships could not generally be expected to follow the course of events in India; but, while everything in that vast empire was of the greatest importance, it could not but be a matter of the deepest interest to consider the formation of a Legislative Council:—the quarrels indeed between the indigo planters and the ryots raise questions of great interest but of far less Imperial importance. The first point in the speech of the noble Marquess related to the state of the Legislative Council. Their Lordships would recollect that before the Act of 1833, the whole Legislative authority resided in the Governor General in Council. In 1853 it was determined to establish a Legislative Council, to consist of the Governor General and the several Members of his Executive Council—including a legal gentleman, who was at the time a Member of Council, and whose place is now taken by a financial Gentleman, much, he thought, to the advantage of the Government; further, there were two Judges, and some gentlemen representing the subordinate Presidencies. The total number of Members was only twelve, of whom three were legal gentlemen; if the same proportion were observed in the composition of their Lordships' House they would have at least 100 noble and learned Lords to assist in their deliberations. But there was this peculiarity in the constitution of the Legislative Council in respect of these three Members, that unless one of them were present no business could be transacted; so that these legal Members practically had a negative over the whole legislation for India, because they had only to stay away and no law could be enacted. He admitted that the Members of the Legislative Council had been very fairly and properly selected, and that they were all personally very respectable Gentlemen. The Legislative Council carried on its discussions in public, and its debates were to some extent reported. But he could not conceal from himself—he thought no man at all acquainted with the subject could conceal from himself—that it had been altogether a failure—that it had not succeeded in acquiring the confidence of the public. Various propositions had been made for extending the Council by adding to it persons unconnected with the Government, and particularly from among the Natives. He had considered the subject, and after mature consideration he thought there were two principal points involved in the question, and which should be considered in any future arrangements. First, it was absolutely necessary in India that the Governor General and his Executive Council should have the power of passing instant any Act of Parliament that was absolutely necessary at the time for the service and safety of the public—the whole of the responsibility resting on them. But the Governor General in Council was very greatly in want of a consultative Council, with whom he might communicate on any matter in connection with measures on which he desired to form an opinion, with a view to having any subject to be laid before the Legislature well canvassed, and discussed preparatory to legislation. He thought that nothing could be more desirable than to establish a consultative Council, to which, under all ordinary circumstances, every Bill should be submitted; but that it should be made absolutely necessary, under all circumstances and on all occasions, to submit for the opinion and report of such Council, any measure in the slightest degree affecting the laws, customs, and religion of the people of India. He would also have that consultative Council composed, to a considerable extent, of Natives. Undoubtedly members of the Government should be members of the Consultative Council, which should also embrace the Secretaries of the Government. To these, he thought, should be added ten or twelve European gentlemen of distinguished character, engaged in business in the country, and not having a salary, but attending as independent persons and giving their opinions; and he would have at least an equal number of Native gentlemen, of equal respectability, equally connected with business in the country, and whose presence in such a Council was, he thought, absolutely essential to the good Government of India. It was impossible for him to express himself too strongly on the matter, when he saw measures affecting in the highest degree the religious feelings and prejudices of the people had been submitted to a few Englishmen and decided according to English notions. He saw three great measures of taxation, all novel in themselves and involving most important points of political economy, submitted at once to the decision of a few English gentlemen whose judgment must be founded on English notions of taxation, although their decisions affected not only the interests but the peace and security of the country, and the permanence of our dominion—and that decision would be given in the absence of a single Native out of 120,000,000 of people. This was a monstrous inconsistency, and contrary to all views that we ought to entertain upon the subject of just and beneficial legislation for India. The noble Marquess had adverted to another subject of interest and importance, the disturbances in a considerable part of the Bengal Presidency, and the differences that existed between the planters and the ryots. The noble Marquess had spoken in terms of strong condemnation of the planters. He (the Earl of Ellenborough) had read both sides of the question. He had read a great deal written—it was said by the missionaries ; how that might be he knew not—inveighing strongly against the planters. If all that was said on that side was to be believed the relations of the planters and the ryots resembled that of the Barons and the villains in the reign of Stephen. On the other side, he had read the newspapers in the interest of the planters, and to read them their Lordships might be led to believe that there was not a more beneficent class of persons—that they were a species of Providence to the people of India, and that they alone maintained the progress and prosperity of that empire. He did not intend to take part with either of these extreme parties. What he believed was, that there was as much variety among planters as there was among parties engaged in other pursuits. There were some gentlemen of considerable landed property, substantial gentlemen, who resided on their own estates and collected the product of their own lands, who made advances to the Natives by whom the indigo was cultivated, who lived as gentlemen did in England, amid their property and speculations, and who behaved as English gentlemen did. But many of the persons who carry on these speculations were not persons of property at all ; they either carried on their operations with borrowed money, or were only the agents of others, who themselves were operating with money borrowed from bankers and others ; who again held the money of their constituents, and who, while they paid considerable interest to their constituents, exacted larger interest from the speculators. Under these circumstances it was not a matter of surprise that there should be in some, perhaps in many cases, much violence on the part of the planters, as well as fraud on the part of the ryots. But this was clear, that if a ryot once received any advance whatever, it was a rare thing for him ever to get out of it—he was, comparatively speaking, a prisoner for life. And not only was it so with the unfortunate ryot, but the gentleman did the same thing, and he in his turn hardly ever got out of the hands of the man who first lent the money. There he remained to the termination of the service an indebted and miserable man. This he feared very much was the condition of the parties. But that of which both ryots and planters complained was that neither could get justice—Nulli negabimus, nulli differemus justitiam—was one of the great promises of Magna Charta. There was in fact a refusal of justice—or a delay of sixteen months, which was practically a refusal of justice. He had endeavoured to look round and ascertain in what way this difficulty could be dealt with. If the income-tax were established—but he believed that it would be perfectly impracticable even if passed by an Act of the Legislative Council to carry it into effect ; but if it were established, he thought 1 per cent out of the four to be raised on the property of India would be much better employed in improving the administration of justice, than if it were placed in the hands of the municipal authorities to improve the comforts, convenience, and accommodation of the persons residing in particular municipalities. The first desideratum of all was to give justice ; and how was justice to be given ? He believed that in a country like India really strict justice was only to be given by means of circuit Judges, and that it was contrary to reason to expect that a man who lived on the most intimate terms with a gentleman who was to come before him as a plaintiff or a defendant, and who went from his table to the judgment seat—it was difficult to suppose that he would give equal justice between the ryots and that gentleman ; but of this they might be quite sure, that the ryot never would believe that justice had been done. Thus, all confidence in the administration of justice was destroyed ; and in the administration of justice confidence was almost of as much value as the bestowal of justice itself. He thought that in all possible cases the difference between the planters and the ryots should be decided by circuit Judges, going round frequently, and not by resident magistrates. There was another suggestion which he thought well worthy of the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. They would recollect that in former and not very distant times there were created protectors of slaves and afterwards of Coolies in the different colonies. He had always understood that the action of that system was productive of great benefit to those on whom its protection was conferred. He certainly thought it was most desirable that Her Majesty's Government should communicate with those Gentlemen who were acquainted with the state of those parts of India in which the indigo and other English speculations were carried on, and with those who had seen the system of protectors in the West Indies and elsewhere in practical operation, with a view to consider whether it was not possible to apply the system to India. He did not mean that they should have legal authority but that they should act under the instructions of the Government, and be the friends of the Natives, to advise them in their difficulties, and endeavour, when disputes arose between the planters and the cultivators, to bring about a compromise. There was another point to which he would refer with great regret; but as it had been mentioned, he would not decline to express his opinion on the subject. It was impossible for any one to feel deeper regret than he did at the loss to India of the services of Sir Charles Trevelyan. Of all the men who had been sent in recent times to India, he appeared better qualified than any for the position he filled. By his antecedents, by his long residence in India, and his long public services in that country, he had secured the highest confidence in the discharge of the most important functions. He was then, too, at a period of life when a man's feelings were warm, when he acquired attachment to those amongst whom he moved and lived, and when he had acquired a strong feeling of friendship and regard for the people. Since that time he has in this country, under successive Governments, exercised the highest functions, with the highest approbation, and has shown the greatest zeal, as well as the greatest executive ability and aptitude; combining with it a knowledge of India, and a regard for its people, with all that could be acquired for the purpose by European practice. With all these advantages combined, Sir Charles Trevelyan, of all men, he imagined, was the man most qualified to exercise the authority and to fill the position of Governor of Madras. Sir Charles appeared to him to have remained to the last what he was from the first. He first distinguished himself by an investigation of a most important character, with respect to which it was his duty to pronounce an opinion for the consideration of the Government. And he did so without regard to his own personal interest, risking everything for the public service. He remained to the end the same; and seeing, as he thought, a great danger to the people committed to his charge, at every risk to himself he determined, if he could, to stay the pestilence, and save the people. Whatever they might think of official indiscretion and irregularity, it was impossible not to honour the feeling of the man, and be satisfied that to the last moment of his life he would look back to that act as that of which he might be most proud; because it was the greatest personal sacrifice to himself, that enabled him, as he thought, to do the greatest service to his country. He desired to stay the plague and peril. It was not so much in what he said against the proposed system of taxation that there was danger, but in neglecting his advice with respect to it. By his advice, if attended to, the danger will be averted. As to what the noble Marquess has said of the Legislative Council, there was in that Council a Madras representative. Why was he there? For the sole purpose of explaining to the Supreme Government all the circumstances connected with his Presidency: of showing in what manner their legislation would act upon its inhabitants; and of upholding, not only his own views, but those of the Government which he represented. Now, had Sir Charles Trevelyan instructed the gentleman who occupied that position to read to the Legislative Council his own Minute, as well as the Minutes of the other Members of the Council of Madras, and had he, in obedience to those instructions, read these documents and moved for their production, and spoken in the censure of the Government he represented, he would, in taking that course, have been perfectly in order; and every word which had been written on the subject by Sir Charles Trevelyan, as well as by the other gentlemen to whom he had alluded, would have been published in the newspapers at Calcutta the next morning, in perfect accordance with the forms of the Legislature. The error which Sir Charles Trevelyan has committed, appears to me, therefore, to consist, not so much in the act of publication itself, as in the manner in which his discretion in the matter was exercised. He would now say no more on this subject. He had with Sir Charles Trevelyan no personal acquaintance. He had never even seen him, to his knowledge. Sir Charles became known to him (the Earl of Ellenborough) through his official services in connection with a particular case some thirty years ago. As regards his career in this country, he had no further information than that which all their Lordships possess; but, so far as his knowledge of him extends, he entertained for his character, as well as for his ability, the highest respect. He would only add, that his last public act, however indiscreet it might be, had raised his character in his (the Earl of Ellenborough's) opinion, instead of producing in his sentiments towards him any change derogatory to the high estimation in which he had hitherto held him.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, the paper relating to the hardships suffered by certain ryots at the hands of European indigo planters in India, for which the noble Marquess has moved, had not, when I last saw my right hon. Friend the Secretary for India, arrived in England. I need, however, scarcely add that when it does reach this country there will not be upon the part of the Government the slightest objection to its production. But I apprehend my noble Friend referred to them principally for the purpose of introducing the subject generally, and thus enabling himself to offer certain observations to the House. In reference to the remarks of my noble Friend who has just sat down (the Earl of Ellenborough), I may observe that I have read several statements upon both sides of the question with respect to the system pursued by the indigo planters in Bengal; and while I believe that there are in that province many excellent planters who treat the ryots under their control in the most considerate manner, I am bound to say that, from official evidence, I have derived very painful impressions of the system under which the indigo planting is carried on in other districts, and in particular in the especial district referred to. There is a great variety as regards individual districts, and as regards individual men. I am, I may add, informed that those districts in which the cultivation of indigo is carried on with the greatest success are those in which no system of oppression whatever prevails, while, upon the other hand, the localities in which the greatest difficulty in the management of ryots is experienced are those in which the vices of the system are most extensively put into practice. The main evil of the system is that when once an advance is made to a ryot he rarely ever escapes from the thralldom of the planter, and practically he remains in a state of slavery after, unless some accidental circumstance should relieve him. The subject is one, however, which now seriously engages the attention of the Government of India, who have issued a Commission to inquire into and report upon all the evils connected with the system of indigo cultivation in Bengal. I need hardly inform the House that the measure which was lately passed, and to which allusion has been made, is one merely of a temporary character, and does not propose to effect a permanent settlement of the relations which subsist between the landlord and the ryot. There are, however, difficulties involved in the question which it is no easy matter to overcome; for while, on the one hand, it is inexpedient to maintain a vicious and oppressive system, it is on the other unwise to take any steps which may have the effect of discouraging the application of English capital to any part of India. I nevertheless trust that when the Report of the Commission to which I have referred arrives here we may be able to devise some means by which the evils of the system may be obviated without leading to a result which we should all desire to avert. I may now be permitted to refer to another subject to which the noble Marquess who introduced this subject has drawn our attention—I allude to the composition and powers of the Legislative Council. When it is said that the present constitution of that body has turned out to be a failure, I would beg those who entertain that opinion to bear in mind that it assumed its present form after very careful consideration in 1853, and was adopted, in a great degree, for the purpose of meeting existing complaints. It was then recommended that a representative of the minor Presidencies should have a seat in the Council, and the object with which that recommendation was made has, I believe, been pretty satisfactorily secured. I am, however, bound to admit that the impression appears to have gained ground both in India and in England that the constitution of the Legislative Council in India is not quite as good as it might be, and that some further changes in its case are required. My noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Ellenborough), in dealing with this subject, did not, I regret to say, touch upon the most difficult portion of the question—namely, what should be the powers of the Council, and what should be the area over which its legislative action should extend. [The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH: There should be no legislation at all.] I need hardly state to your Lordships that one great object which many Indian reformers have in view is to decentralize authority and to confer upon the minor Presidencies more extensive legislative as well as executive powers. I did not, however, gather from my noble Friend opposite that he desired this object to be carried into effect. He appears to wish that authority should be vested in the hands of the Governor General and Government at Calcutta, assisted only by a consultative Council. Such a change as that would, however, I fear, be by no means satisfactory to the minor Presidencies, nor obviate the difficulties to which the noble Earl has attributed to the conduct of Sir Charles Trevelyan.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: I should have stated my wish in the matter to be that small Consultative Councils should be established for the other Presidencies, and that any Bills proposed by the Supreme Government for adoption should in the first instance be passed through those Consultative Councils.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I infer from what my noble Friend has stated that he is not in favour of a system of decentralization, and I am afraid his views, even if carried into effect, would not prove satisfactory to the greater portion of those who seek for a change in the constitution of the Indian Government. I must beg also to remind the House that if we were to determine to give to local legislatures any portion of that power which is now centralized at Calcutta, it would be absolutely necessary to define the subjects with which they could deal, as contra-distinguished from the Supreme Government. The difficulty of arriving at a satisfactory determination on this point is, I may add, exemplified in the case of questions of finance, in connection with which the unfortunate difference between Sir Charles Trevelyan and the Government at Calcutta has taken place; for if India is to continue one great Empire with one general system of taxation applicable to the whole, it is perfectly clear that the same difficulties that have hitherto existed would continue to exist; and, on the other hand, that it would be no easy matter to draw a definite line within which these local assemblies should be confined, and which should at the same time leave the Supreme Government free to exercise their judgment with respect to great questions of finance and taxation affecting the whole of our Indian Empire. With respect to the admission of the Native element into the consultative and legislative Councils, I am to a great extent disposed to agree with the sentiments on the subject to which the noble Earl has given expression. There are, for instance, individual Natives eminent in point of education and position whose association with the administration of affairs might tend to impart confidence in that administration to their fellow-subjects. The Governor General, I believe, holds that view; and, I may add, that one mode of consulting the feelings of the Natives has been resorted to under the existing system, by providing that, except in cases of absolute necessity, time should be afforded for bringing to bear the influence of Native opinion on any measure introduced into the Legislative Council before it is passed into a law. I have now touched on the main topics to which the noble Earl has alluded; but I should wish before I sat down to say a few words with respect to that to which he more particularly adverted at the close of his speech. It was, I need hardly say, matter of infinite regret to the Government to be obliged to recall Sir Charles Trevelyan from Madras; but the step was one, my Lords, which they deemed to be as necessary as it was painful. For my own part, I entertain for Sir Charles Trevelyan the highest personal regard as well as the greatest admiration; but I cannot go the length of my noble Friend opposite in holding the opinion that the specific act to which his recall is attributable is one which is justly entitled to the praise either of this House or to that of the Executive Government. I have, however, no doubt that in adopting the course which he pursued, Sir Charles Trevelyan was actuated by the most honourable motives; and I may add that the action of the Government in his case did not proceed upon the ground of the merit or demerit of the particular views with respect to the income tax to which he gave publicity, but was based on the conviction of the absolute necessity which exists for upholding the authority of the Government of India, and enforcing due subordination on the part of its subordinates.

LORD LYVEDEN said, the noble Marquess had presented petitions referring to the administration of justice in India, to the financial system, and to many other important questions; but the House had no materials for discussing those questions. Under the new system of Government for India they had received less information with regard to India than they did under the double Government. At the present moment they had not received copies of the Bills which were presented to the Legislative Council embodying Mr. Wilson's proposals. The practical question involved in the present discussion was the composition and powers of the Legislative Council; and he trusted that the noble Earl opposite would bring forward some nite Motion on that important subject. It was utterly impossible that the powers of the Legislative Council could remain as they were now. Those powers were given by the Act of 1853, and they had become a totally independent body—an arbitrium in imperio. They arrogated to themselves powers utterly inconsistent with the Home Government. They contended that they were not liable to the orders of the Secretary of State; in fact, that he had no command over them, that they might pass any Act they pleased, that no alterations could be made in it, and that if any alterations were made, they might refuse to pass any Act at all. [The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH: That is the law.] It was impossible such a state of things could continue, and he trusted the Secretary of State for India would introduce some measure to define at least the powers of the Legislative Council. The remedy proposed in the petition presented by the noble Marquess was very vague and unsatisfactory, because the petitioners said, in effect, "Let us have, instead of one central debating society in India, a little debating society established in every Presidency." That was certainly not a way to get rid of the evil, and he was surprised that the noble Marquess should be the advocate of such a course. [The Marquess of CLANRICARDE: I did not advocate it.] With regard to the recall of Sir Charles Trevelyan, he could only express his regret at that circumstance, in common with those who had spoken of his ability and energy. He should like to know from the noble Duke if the Members of the Council who wrote Minutes in corroboration of Sir Charles Trevelyan's Report would remain at their posts? A difficulty would arise if Members of considerable importance, disposed to resist the proposals of the Executive Government at Calcutta, remained; but if they were taken away, better men, he feared, could not be found. The noble Marquess had said that it was Sir Charles Trevelyan who had brought the land tenures of India into their present state, and that it was to him that the improved system was to be attributed; but in truth it was only due to a noble Lord (Lord Harris) who sat near him to say the system had been carried out by him and afterwards by Sir Charles Wood.

THE EARL of ELLENBOROUGH: Let me say that the removal of the Members of Council would not only be a great loss but an act of most atrocious injustice. They only did their duty; they were obliged to state what they thought on the subject of this proposed legislation.

LORD STANLEY of ALDERLEY said, he had a petition to present from a very important body of persons who had formed a large public meeting at Calcutta, which was presided over by the sheriff. This petition stated the apprehension entertained in reference to the present financial state of India, especially the difference between the receipts and the expenditure; and the petitioners deprecated the continuance of the system of open loans which had failed to a great extent in raising money on advantageous terms, and had seriously affected the credit of the Indian Government. They prayed that attention would be given to the construction of railroads and other modes of communication, and that freehold tenure would be introduced into India, as that would tend materially to attract British capital. They deprecated the Constitution of the Legislative Council, and they hoped that an alteration would be introduced to render those Councils more independent. Without entering upon the other questions which had been discussed, he (Lord Stanley of Alderley) would say that he hoped that some of the financial propositions before the Government would not be carried into effect without great consideration and examination. The income tax might not be objectionable if it could be levied; but the tax upon tobacco was open to great objections; and he deprecated the imposition of heavy import duties on British manufactures, which was at variance with the principles which had been recently advocated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as those which ought to govern the financial policy of the country. There was, indeed, one item of import duties—the duty of 10 per cent on cotton yarn, which was more peculiarly open to this objection, and to which he entertained the greatest objections. It, in fact, directly tended to establish a protected interest, by offering an inducement to the establishment of spinning mills in India, contrary to the principles of free trade, which would raise great difficulties in dealing with these protected interests hereafter, besides diverting capital from where it might be more advantageously employed in India—the improvement and cultivation of the land. With regard to the conduct which had been adopted by Sir Charles Trevelyan, and that had led to his recall, if, instead of publishing these Minutes, the Madras Member of the Council sitting in Calcutta had only communicated the views of Sir Charles Trevelyan in the Council of India at the time when Mr. Wilson made his first great speech in introducing his Budget—if his objections had been urged and fairly discussed in India, then the Government would have avoided the disagreeable position in which they were now placed, of either abandoning the project which they had carried through the Legislative Council, or prosecuting it in the face of the difficulties which had been occasioned by the promulgation of those despatches.

After a few words from the Marquess of CLANRICARDE,

PAROCHIAL CONSTABLES.

QUESTION.

MR. DEEDES said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in any measure this Session to repeal the Acts relating to the appointment and payment of Parochial Constables, namely, 5 & 6 Vict., c. 109; 13 Vict., c. 20; and part of 7 & 8 Vict., c. 52?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Acts to which the hon. Gentleman referred were passed at a time anterior to the passing of the County Police Act, and therefore under a different state of things from that now existing. The changes made in the Law seemed certainly to render it desirable that those formal enactments should be reconsidered. He had taken steps to procure information as to their practical operation, and should be prepared to bring in a Bill on the subject.

Lord Stanley of Alderley

CONVEYANCE OF VOTERS BILL. QUESTION.

MR. HUNT said, he rose to ask the hon. Member for Plymouth, Whether he will proceed with Conveyance of Voters Bill To-morrow?

MR. COLLIER stated that it was not his intention to bring forward the second reading of the Bill until after the Committee which was inquiring into the subject should have made its Report.

WINE LICENCES.—QUESTION.

MR. DUTTON said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the wholesale Wine Licence at £10 10s. confers upon the holder the power of selling by retail, without the necessity of taking an additional retail Licence?

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he would also ask, Whether the wholesale Wine Merchants, who are under their present Licences allowed to sell Wine by the single bottle, will have the same privilege under the new Law.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there was no intention to deprive the holders of the ten guinea licence of any privilege they were entitled to under the existing law. The Excise Department had no doubt that the ten guinea licence did convey the privilege of selling wine by the single bottle, and as there was no intention to make any alteration in that respect, if there was anything in the Bill which might be supposed to do so it would be altered.

THE QUAYS OF DUBLIN.

QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland if he can say when the repairs of the Drawbridges on the Quays in Dublin will be completed, and if he has any objection to lay a Copy of Contract entered into by the Board of Works for such repairs upon the Table of the House?

MR. CARDWELL replied that he could not state the exact time when the repairs would be completed. He had no objection to lay a Copy of the Contract on the Table.

ITALY AND FRANCE.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, as stated in the "Indépendance Belge," the French Government have intimated to Lord Cowley that, in case of the occurrence of contingencies which might affect the present distribution of power in Southern Italy, France would feel it her duty to claim further territorial compensation, or whether any private conversation or communication to any such effect and purpose had taken place.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: No such intimation has been made to Lord Cowley, either publicly or in any private conversation.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY.

QUESTION.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government are in possession of any intelligence whatever to the effect that Russia has concentrated a considerable Army on the Pruth, and that the Ottoman Government has assembled a corps d'armée at Widdin; and whether Her Majesty's Government have been advised or in any way informed that Prince Gortschakoff had assembled the Representatives of all the Powers except Turkey, and had stated that the condition of the Christians in the Turkish dominions was every day becoming less supportable, and that his Government hoped to obtain the concurrence of the other Powers, and would make a strong remonstrance to Turkey upon the subject?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, in answer to the first question put by the hon. Gentleman I have to state that Her Majesty's Government are not in possession of any intelligence to the effect that Russia has concentrated a considerable army on the Pruth, or that the Ottoman Government has assembled a corps d'armée at Widdin. But, with respect to the second question, I have to state that I received yesterday a despatch from Sir John Crampton, Her Majesty's Minister at St. Petersburg, which is very much to the effect stated by the hon. Gentleman. I may add that I have also received a despatch from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris, stating that he had had a conversation with M. Thouvenel, who spoke to him on the subject, and said that if any action was to take place he was of opinion that it should not be an action by Russia alone, or by Russia and France united, but a combined action of the five great Powers.

INLAND BONDING WAREHOUSES.

QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is prepared to bring in a Bill to authorize Inland Bonding Warehouses?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was his intention to introduce a Bill upon that subject at the earliest possible period. In that measure he thought it would not be advisable to confine the bonding system to four great towns, but to provide that it might be extended to any place in which such an arrangement might be found convenient. He would, therefore, suggest to the hon. Member the propriety of either withdrawing or postponing his own measure until he should be able to ascertain whether or not he should feel satisfied with the Government Bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.—QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI said, he rose to ask, Whether it is intended to proceed with the Army Estimates on Thursday? If so, he hoped they would not be proceeded with except at an early hour.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, his right hon. Friend (Mr. Sidney Herbert) hoped to be able to bring forward the Army Estimates on Thursday, after some other business had been disposed of; but he would not ask the House to go into the Army Estimates later than eleven o'clock.

THE DERBY DAY.—QUESTION.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he wished to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government, Whether, as Wednesday, the 23rd, is fixed for the celebration of our Metropolitan Circenses Ludi, he intends to propose that the House shall adjourn over that day.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I rather think one may say that an adjournment over the Derby Day would please the House. In fact, to adjourn over that day is part of the unwritten law of Parliament. I am sure that Her Majesty's Government do not wish to ask the House to depart from so wholesome a custom. It has been usual to leave it to some private Member to make the proposal, but I think that it is not exactly the proper way, and I mean, therefore, to propose on Tuesday that the House should adjourn at its rising until Thursday, the 24th.

RECREATION GROUNDS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. SLANEY said, he rose to move a Resolution in favour of Public Walks and Places of Recreation. It was of the utmost importance to the health of towns that proper means should be provided for the recreation of the people away from the close factories where they were obliged to work. He ventured to say that the change of circumstances was such as to call attention to this subject. At the beginning of this century the rural population was as to the civic population two to one, but now the proportions were reversed, and the civic populations were upwards of two to one to the other portions of the population. The condition of the lower classes in the great centres of population had been inquired into by several Committees and Commissions—by the Factories Commission, the Handloom Weavers Commission, the Childrens' Employment Commission, the Health of Towns Commission, and the Railway Labourers Commission. It was shown that the cost of crime had increased by £10,000,000 a year. The spirituous liquors of various kinds consumed by the dwellers in close and narrow courts and places, after every allowance had been made for necessary refreshments, were calculated at £15,000,000. The two totals gave an aggregate of £25,000,000, a great portion of which might be saved by an improvement in the physical condition of the great mass of the population. The late lamented writer, Mr. Porter, stated that the number of criminals was now five times more than it was at the beginning of the century. It was also undeniable that the industrial classes had not improved in physical comfort in the same proportion as the middle and higher classes. In 1840 he moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the Health of Towns. Their Report described a lamentable state of things on the part of those who live in closely-pent, narrow courts, and who work in ill-ventilated workshops and factories. In 1842, Sir R. Peel issued a Commission for inquiry into the Health of Towns. The result of their inquiry was to establish that, in regard to three main points necessary for the comfort and health of towns—the supply of water, the drainage, and cleansing—out of fifty towns only seven or eight were tolerably well off. The Commission established incontestably that a large class of crimes were much fostered by the low state of physical comfort in which the town population often lived. The consequence of the crowded state of the large towns and the absence of open spaces was that the health of the inhabitants suffered, and that the appetite for intoxicating liquors, the prevalence of which among the lower classes they so much deplored, was developed to a frightful extent. The Health of Towns Act had, no doubt, tended considerably to remedy the evil, and the Local Improvements Act was also of use, but neither went far enough. The rapid growth of population and increase of buildings far outran all attempts at improvement. A General Building Act was imperatively called for, not merely to regulate the width of party-walls as a preventive against fire, which was all that was done at present, but to check the erection of those narrow, miserable streets and alleys which fostered uncleanness and disease. Periodical reports of the condition of the large towns in these respects ought also to be published. Above all, it was necessary that large open spaces in towns should be preserved, and anybody who witnessed the manner in which the people of London flocked to the Parks on Sundays and holidays must be convinced of the very great moral influence they exercised, as well as the physical benefit they conferred on the poorer classes. In 1833 he moved for a Select Committee on Public Parks, which was the first movement in this direction which was ever made. The Report of that Committee stated that during the last half century a great increase had taken place in the population of towns, while little or no provision had been made for public walks and open spaces for the recreation of the public. Now population had increased fourfold, while much of the space which then existed in towns had been built over. He appealed to the House whether the opening of public parks and places of resort in Manchester, Birmingham, Sheffield, and other places through private liberality had not been productive of great good, and whether they had not materially increased the comfort and content, as well as the health of the working classes, besides giving a stimulus for innocent enjoyment, of which they were not slow to avail themselves, and which had exercised great influence in the amelioration of their moral and physical condition. Reverting to London and the Report of the Committee on Public Parks, he rejoiced that Primrose Hill had not been covered with buildings, and that thousands of working people were able to go there on Sundays to breathe the fresh air which could not elsewhere be obtained. He regretted that Copenhagen Fields had been partly occupied with the New Cattle Market, but he suggested that there was still space enough to lay out a public walk, and that by the addition of a few benches and buildings for shelter, people might be induced to resort there, especially on those days when the market was not held. The Victoria Park was an inestimable boon to the inhabitants of the east end of London, and he was glad to see, in the course of frequent visits which he had made to it, that it was extremely well managed. The embankment of the river from Limehouse to Blackwall, which had been recommended as a not very expensive work, had not been done; but he hoped that public attention would be called to it, and that the improvement would be made. Kennington Common had been enclosed and improved, and Battersea Park was becoming the resort of great multitudes. Partly in consequence of the Report of a Committee, and partly in consequence of the Health of Towns Commission and the Health of Towns Acts, improvements had been made at Manchester and other large provincial towns. A great deal had not been done for London, but he felt sure that opulent persons would be most willing to contribute if it were officially pointed out how such means could be best directed to the object in view. There were various sources from which assistance might be derived. Moderate grants from the Crown for a great public benefit like this were justifiable, and especially if they called forth large private donations. An exchange might also be made of Crown lands near large towns for other lands at a greater distance, and funds might be raised by a voluntary rate, to facilitate which a Bill was now before Parliament that he hoped would receive the Royal Assent. The splendid palaces of Genoa and Turin had been described in eloquent language by Mr. Roscoe, as the work of great merchants and great landowners; but in a single street in this town—Pall Mall—might be seen a whole row of palaces equally splendid, which were the result of a combination of a number of small contributions. The Crystal Palace, too, was formed by a number of small shares under limited liability, and though it had not been so profitable as it might have been in a pecuniary point of view, there was no question that it had conferred the greatest benefits on the working classes in the way of amusement and recreation. If the Government and the Legislature would but lead the way, this law of limited liability, he had no doubt, would be very generally taken advantage of by benevolent persons to establish institutions for the benefit and recreation of the great mass of the community. Such places as those which he was anxious to see set on foot ought, for instance, to be exempted from taxes; for two or three days in the week they might be allowed to make a small charge for admission, but the rest of the time they ought to be open entirely free. He had no doubt that many benevolent persons would be willing to take shares in such undertakings. There was no time, however, to be lost, for open spaces were daily being more and more built upon, and in a short time few would be left. He thought, also, that much might be done in the way of improving the existing Parks. It was not merely exercise, but regulated recreation, that was necessary for the humble and lower middle classes. If places for athletic exercise and small low buildings in which accommodation might be given to school parties taking a holiday were erected in some of the public parks great benefits would accrue to a large class of the population. There was one society, of which he had the honour to be a member—the Zoological Society—which was extremely liberal, inasmuch as they gave any member power to send a school of sixty or seventy, at certain hours, to see the different specimens in their collection. That was an example which he should be glad to see generally followed. As most of the public fairs in the neighbourhood of the Metropolis had been done away with in consequence of their having been ill-regulated, he would suggest that in Regent's Park, Victoria Park, and Battersea Park, fairs under the regulation of the Commissioners might be held for three days in the week twice a year—in the spring and in the autumn. He would venture to say if this were done the whole expense would be paid, and the people would behave as if they were grateful for the boon. If there was an act for the improvement, not the enclosure, of the commons about London, so as to enable persons, by subscriptions, to clear them and put down benches, just as had been done at Clapham Common, it would be a great public benefit. He would suggest, also, that many of the gardens in the squares of the Metropolis might, under certain conditions, be thrown open to the general public. Take the case of Lincoln's Inn Fields. A garden existed there ; but it was comparatively useless, for the persons — lawyers and others—who occupied the dwellings which looked down upon it remained in town for the most part, only from ten to five o'clock in the day. He would ask, what harm would be done by throwing open this garden to those persons who dwelt altogether in the neighbourhood — perhaps in close streets or pent-up courts and alleys — for the purpose of slight but still beneficial exercise and recreation ? He would venture to suggest to those who were possessed of well-situated properties in the immediate vicinity of this great city whether, without injury to themselves, but with much benefit to those who toiled hard and for long hours in a vitiated atmosphere, they might not, especially during their absence abroad or at their country residences, give facilities to their less favoured countrymen to take recreation in their grounds. The subject was one deserving consideration, both at the hands of that House and of the country. The great and rapidly increasing mass of the people were industrious, contented, and loyal, and deserved every encouragement, and all the advantages in point of health which could be afforded them.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That it is expedient Her Majesty's Government, or Parliament, should take steps to inquire how best adequate open spaces in the vicinity of our increasing populous towns, as public walks and places of exercise and recreation, may be provided and secured ; and to encourage and direct efforts, by private subscriptions, voluntary rates, or public grants, to carry out such objects.”

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he hoped his hon. Friend would not think him guilty of disrespect if he abstained from following him at equally great length through the various topics which he had brought under the notice of the House. Few, he thought, would withhold their assent from the general proposition that parks and other public places, where they could enjoy the fresh air, were of the utmost importance to inhabitants of large towns, especially to the working classes. But the question for the House practically to determine was as to the mode in which, under the existing law, or by any modification of it, provision could best be made for the establishment of such modes of recreation. The inquiry which bodied in the terms of the Resolution which he had put on the paper.

LIFE MODELS IN SCHOOLS OF ART.

RESOLUTION.

LORD HADDO said, he rose to move the following Resolution :—

“ That the Exhibition in Schools of Art of Females wholly unclothed ought not to receive the sanction of a Public Grant of Money to the Schools in which such practice is adopted.”

Last year he presented a petition signed by upwards of 500 clergymen, including the canon residentiary of St. Paul's, complaining of this practice as tending to vice and immorality. He mentioned that fact to justify him in bringing forward a question relating to so disagreeable and distasteful a subject. He thought it was time for the House to apply a remedy to what he considered was a great evil. He believed it was not generally known, indeed he himself was astonished to hear that, in the Royal Academy and in many of the schools of art supported by grants of Parliament, a mode of study had been adopted of a disgraceful and dissolute character. If such a practice had been followed in a lower class of life, he was sure that the most summary means would be taken to put a stop to it, and to punish the offenders for their indecencies. It was, in his opinion, impossible for young men to visit those schools of art, where nude figures were presented, without being led into acts of great debauchery. He understood it was a positive fact that mothers frequently brought their daughters to those places, and actually bargained with the managers of art schools for the exposure and degradation of their children. And what was the advantage gained? He had heard it said that as artists must have living models to study from, it was better they should study them in public institutions, where proper regulations could be made; but if that were so, why not permit gambling-houses and houses of ill fame to be established? It was said that the study of art could not be carried on without the particular practice to which he invited attention, but he did not believe the statement. He had the authority of Mr. Westmacott, the professor of sculpture in the Royal Academy, for saying that the study of the naked female form was not only unnecessary, but injurious to art. In the best ages of art the nude living figure was never required. It was only the prurient vitiating taste of modern times that encouraged that practice. But even if the practice were of use in an artistic point of view, that benefit could not outweigh the outrage it inflicted upon public decency and public morals. Upon those grounds he thought that no public grants should be given to schools that adopted the practice. There were about twelve schools of art in England connected with the Government grants, and in four of them nude figures were studied. When he brought forward his Motion last year he understood that something would be done by the Government to remedy the evil, but as he had been disappointed in that expectation he felt called upon to renew his Motion this year. The noble Lord concluded by moving his Resolution.

MR. SPOONER seconded the Motion.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he rose to give a brief reply to the noble Lord. For himself, he had no special knowledge of the subject—he meant no knowledge of the practice of the department to which this question related. He was therefore unable to say what instructions had been given upon the subject, but he apprehended it had never been the practice of Government to interfere with the details of the regulations of any school. The noble Lord said that the practice was confined to four schools, but the return on which that statement was based was eighteen months old, and how the matter stood at present he could not say. But, certainly, he could not believe that the study of art had any corrupting influences, nor that it excited prurient thoughts in the minds of the students attending schools of art. He believed that all the ancient masters whose works all admired, and who were recognized as the classical models in all departments of art, had cultivated their knowledge by a study of the human figure, male and female. It was possible, however, that a more refined feeling of delicacy in the present day might render such a practice impossible. If that were so, it was desirable that such Resolutions as that of the noble Lord should be encouraged by the House; but, in the mean time, he did not think it was at all desirable the House should proceed at present to any vote on the subject.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he wished to make a few observations upon this subject, as he had been for a time connected with the department of the Government to which the Resolution of the noble Lord referred. He felt bound, in the first place, to observe that the noble Lord had made an inaccurate statement as to the real facts of the case. The noble Lord had said there were four schools of art out of the twelve that received public grants in which naked women were employed in the studios as models. That was not the fact. The only school of art, aided by Government, that introduced naked women into the life-school was that of Manchester. The noble Lord had referred to the Royal Academy. Now, the Royal Academy received no grant from that House, and, therefore, even if the practice spoken of was adopted, the Motion was inapplicable as far as that institution was concerned. He really thought, when the noble Lord spoke of studios in which the naked figure was studied as places of as vicious a character as gambling houses and brothels, it was a gross misrepresentation on the part of the noble Lord. It was quite evident that the noble Lord's opinion upon this matter was founded upon a false appreciation of the whole subject. The noble Lord had observed, that in the best days of ancient art study from the life was not practised. Now, he (Mr. Adderley) could not tell where the noble Lord had obtained his facts. He should not be exceeding the limits of truth if he said that the portraiture of the human form could not be accurately given without the study of the naked figure as a model. The first lessons of an artist in human portraiture were a study of the skeleton, then came the body clothed with its flesh and muscles, and last of all the living model. If the noble Lord thought that a study of the draped figures in these days of bustles and crinolines was the highest study of art in order to arrive at a true portraiture of the human figure, Madame Tussaud must be nearest to the noble Lord's beau idéal of a great artist. It seemed to him that the noble Lord had altogether misunderstood the nature and object of the study in question, and he would appeal to the noble Lord's own habits to show the fallacy of the ideas he had put forward on this subject. Did he not visit galleries in which were pictures and statues of the naked human form? Had he not seen and admired in common with every other person the magnificent statue of Venus di Medici? Nay, did he not think it was worth going a thousand miles to see it? How, then, were we to get such statues if the noble Lord's notions upon this subject were to be carried out? Were they to fall from Heaven? The noble Lord professed to appreciate the results of the study of art, but would throw obstacles in the way of the only processes by which these results could be achieved. He appealed to the noble Lord that it would be of no avail for him to propound in that House year after year the crude notion that the use of a thing was to be condemned because of the possible abuse of it. If the noble Lord knew of any instance in a public school of art, assisted by public money, in which the study of living models had been pursued for purposes of indecency, let him bring it forward. A few years ago it was reported that in the Hibernian Academy in Dublin the life school had been somewhat irregularly conducted; that young men in large numbers had been permitted to be present when nude women were sitting as models, and that a larger number attended than could properly be there for purposes of the highest art study. He understood that last year the Vote of money for that school was discontinued, and he hoped that the Vote was not to reappear without a guarantee that only students of the highest order are admitted to the life-school. If this study were so regulated, it would be nonsense to talk of the indecency of such a practice; for the higher class of students absolutely needed opportunities for studying the living model. Besides, there was not a studio in London where the living model was not studied; and were the public schools of art to be deprived of the study which is found indispensable by all — places of all others where indecency was least possible, seeing that they were subject to stringent regulations, and constantly under the public eye?

MR. SPOONER said, he was much surprised and grieved to hear the view taken upon this subject by the right hon. Gentleman and those who had cheered him. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentleman might treat this subject as a matter of laughter, but the people outside were not disposed to treat it in such a spirit. He had that day received a petition, signed by the rural dean and many of the clergymen of Birmingham and other places, deprecating in the strongest terms this pernicious practice, and praying that such indecent scenes as took place in these schools of art might no longer be countenanced by grants of public money. It was said that no practical evils resulted from the practice; but he put it to the House whether it was possible for ten or a dozen students, day after day, to be accustomed to the sight of naked women without harm to their morals?

He contended that the inevitable tendency of such a practice was to deprave the character. Could it be possible for a woman to present herself, perfectly naked, for the purpose of having her likeness drawn, without great moral degradation to her feelings and character? The practice, besides, was contrary to the holy Word of God. They were told that it was necessary for the purpose of encouraging the study of art. He would not condescend to argue that question; he was content to accept the testimony of Mr. Westmacott that the study of the naked living model was not essential to the successful pursuit of art. He (Mr. Spooner) was convinced the practice tended to corrupt the youthful mind, and to engender feelings and desires which broke into positive sin; it ought, therefore, not to be encouraged by grants of public money. It was no argument against interference on the subject to say with his right hon. Friend that the practice obtained largely in private studios. Every man was responsible for his own actions. Surely no man could say it was a light thing to see mothers bartering the honour or virtue of their own daughters for a miserable sum of money which the Government enabled those schools of art to offer them. A grave responsibility would rest upon the Government and that House if they countenanced such an abominable system. Let them, for Heaven's sake, keep the nation free from this sin, at all events, by withdrawing the aid of the public purse from institutions that encouraged such immoral practices. They were told last year that the public money was not given for this purpose; but it was mere nonsense to talk in that way, when it was notorious that a portion of the money so given was applied to the payment of women who consented to expose themselves in a nude manner to the gaze of men. The feeling of the people against this system was increasing every day, and it would not be long before their voices would find their echo in that House. [Laughter.] Instead of treating this matter as one of laughter, he thought that hon. Members ought rather to be ashamed of making themselves parties to such a disgraceful system.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I think the House will scarcely deem it desirable to adopt the Motion of the noble Lord. It is one of those endeavours to interfere inquisitorially by legislation, or by Parliamentary sanction, in matters which are really not proper subjects for interference of this kind. In the first place, it is impossible to carry into effect the view of the noble Lord. If the noble Lord means anything—if his theory ought to be reduced to practice, his Motion ought to go further than it does. He ought to bring in a Bill to make it penal for any person, anywhere, to study the female form. The very Motion he has made would at once lead us into a difficulty, because he proposes to resolve that no public money should be granted to any school of art in which the female form, wholly unclothed, is studied. I should like the noble Lord to be more precise in his future notices on this subject, and to mention to what extent he wishes us to go; to say what is the minimum of clothing which consists with his notions of propriety:—because there is a minimum as well as a maximum in such matters, and without in the latter case insisting on crinolines and the voluminous dresses to which reference has been made, it is quite clear that you might go to different parts of the world, to some of the southern climes—the regions of Africa, for example—where you would find patterns of clothing, which, although they might not subject the models precisely to the anathema of the noble Lord, would still undoubtedly be objectionable in his eyes, on account of the large portion of the human form which they discover. I hope the noble Lord will not press his Motion, and leave this important question of morality to the decision of the persons most concerned. I understand that there are few, if any, of the institutions to which he refers to which objection can now be taken. With reference to the Irish institution mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) I am informed that it is now under the control of the Privy Council, and so regulated that no recurrence of the objectionable circumstances he referred to can take place.

Motion made, and Question put,

“That the Exhibition in Schools of Art of Females wholly unclothed ought not to receive a sanction of a Public Grant of Money to the Schools in which such practice is adopted.”

The House divided:—Ayes 32; Noes 147: Majority 115.

HIGHWAYS.—(SOUTH WALES).

LEAVE.

VISCOUNT EMLYN, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill for the better management and control of the highways in South Wales, said he should not have attempted this task had he not been given to understand that he should receive the support of the Members of the present and late Governments. He felt confident that the Bill would be acceptable to Members generally, and therefore he trusted there would be no opposition to the Motion.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he merely wished to say that from what he understood of the views generally of his noble Friend he concurred with him thinking that, from the facts which experience had shown in regard to management of the turnpike trusts in South Wales, it would be well that all roads in that part of the country should be included in one general Highway Bill.

Leave given.

"Bill for the better management and control of the Highways in South Wales, ordered to be brought in by Viscount EMLYN, Mr. HUSSEY VIVIAN, and Mr. HENRY BRUCE."

TURNPIKE ROADS AND BRIDGES.

COMMISSION MOVED FOR.

MR. ALCOCK said, he rose to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that She will be graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire and report how far it may be desirable and practicable to substitute an equitable system of assessment in lieu of the present mode of maintaining the Turnpike Roads and Bridges in England and Wales by tolls."

He did not know whether he was open to the charge of too much pertinacity in bringing forward this Motion this Session, or the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the charge of too little consideration he had for the comfort and convenience of the people in England and Wales. His object in bringing the subject before the House was to induce the House to follow the example which had been set in Ireland. Four years ago a Commission was granted for Ireland, and a Report was presented which recommended that the country should be released from turnpike tolls, and that result had followed in two years afterwards. Another Commission had been issued for Scotland, but it would in his opinion have been fairer and more equitable if the Government had in the first instance granted a Commission for England, because there was but little prospect that the Government would do for Scotland what they had done for Ireland. The debt upon the tolls in Scotland was in a much higher proportion to the value of the real property of

Viscount Emlyn

Scotland than the debt on the tolls in England was in proportion to the real property of England. The debt in Scotland was £2,400,000, and the annual value of the real property there was £12,000,000, being about 20 per cent of debt upon that annual value; while the debt in England was £5,236,000, and the annual value of real property in this country £117,000,000, the debt being about 5 per cent on that annual value. He understood that the right hon. Gentleman, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, had ventured to defend the turnpike system, although he knew that it cost £500,000 to raise £1,000,000 in tolls. Now, he contended that any turnpike trust free from debt had no right to continue to raise tolls. There was a trust, called the first and second district, in Essex, of 180 miles in length, which had continued to levy £3,000 a year in tolls since 1837. That was at variance with the common law of England. There were 135 trusts in England, owing no debt, which collected £170,000 a year. His plan would be to fall back on the common law of the country, as had been done in Ireland. A rate of 2d. in the pound on the annual value of all the real property of the country would give enough to keep up the roads, pay the interest on the debt, provide gradually for its extinction, and buy up all the bridges of the country. He estimated that the whole cost would be £824,000, or £40,000 short of the amount which a rate of 2d. in the pound would give. The right hon. Gentleman last Session recommended him to follow one of two courses, either to bring in a Bill, or, if the Motion were refused, to induce Rebecca to appear again and destroy the toll gates throughout the country. With regard to drawing a Bill the right hon. Gentleman had his own draughtsman, whose public duty it was to do that, and he should therefore desire the right hon. Gentleman to do that work, or get it done for himself. But with respect to "Rebecca," if there were a Rebecca rising in England similar to that which took place in Wales, he could only say that he should, with all his heart, desire a successful result to the movement. If the Government now opposed his Motion he should consider it nothing more or less than a capricious exercise of power. It was said these Commissions were expensive, but he would remind the House that the cost of the Commission for Scotland was £185, and the one for Ireland only £350, and it had resulted in freeing the whole of that country from tolls; and he would further remind the House that the Fine Arts Commission cost the country £11,000, without any good result apparently. It was perfectly reasonable and fair that what he now asked for should be granted, and that it should not be refused through the capricious conduct of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary.

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON seconded the Motion.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: The two opinions which my hon. Friend has attributed to me are inconsistent with each other, and I cannot admit that either of the two imputations are well founded. My hon. Friend says that last Session I recommended the people of England to resort to Rebecca in order to get rid of turnpike-gates, and he also represents me as an ardent zealot for the turnpike system. I have no recollection of having made that recommendation, and I beg to disclaim being in any degree a fervent admirer of maintaining roads by a system of turnpike tolls. I am quite aware that there is hardly any method of taxation the cost of collecting which amounts to so large a percentage. That, I admit, is a considerable objection to the system of turnpike tolls; but the incidence of the tax is to this extent fair, that it falls on those who use the roads, and does not fall on those who do not use them. Although persons who live a short distance from a turnpike gate do not pay so frequently as persons who live close to it, still the general incidence of the tax must be considered fair. When it is proposed to abolish the system of turnpike tolls in England, because such is the effect of the proposal of my hon. Friend, and to substitute an assessment upon the land, it is right to consider what is the present financial state of the existing turnpike trusts. That financial state must undoubtedly be described as favourable. The total revenue has not materially diminished since 1849. In 1849 the total revenue throughout England was £1,097,000. In 1857, which is the last year for which the accounts have been presented, the total revenue was £1,030,000. Therefore, notwithstanding the great increase of railways, and the diminution of travelling on the main lines of turnpike-road, the total revenue must be considered stationary. The repairs, in like manner, have been stationary since the same year. In 1849 the repairs of turnpike roads in England cost £609,000; and in 1857 £611,000; therefore both the revenue and the principal item of expenditure have been stationary since the year 1849. There is also another very material consideration, to which the hon. Member adverted with respect to turnpike trusts, and also with respect to the policy and practicability of making the change which he proposes. That consideration is the amount of the debt and of the interest of the debt. The amount of both is considerable. Nevertheless, it is in gradual process of diminution. Both the debt and interest, considerable as they both are, are in progress of diminution, and therefore it cannot be said that that circumstance affords any reason for such a fundamental alteration in the mode of maintaining the roads as that proposed by the hon. Gentleman. In 1843 the bonded debt of turnpike trusts of England was £6,932,000. In 1857 it was diminished to £5,117,000, showing a diminution of £1,815,000 in that period of fourteen years. That exhibits, I think, a favourable aspect with regard to the state of turnpike finance. In 1843 the interest of the debt was £281,000. In 1857 it was £175,000, showing an annual diminution of £106,000. Therefore, in whatever point of view the finances of turnpike trusts are regarded, whether as regards the total revenue, the cost of repairs, the amount of principal, or the amount of the interest of the debt, we cannot find any circumstance which leads to the supposition that the present state of things is disastrous. As I have already stated, it is undoubtedly true that the tax is objectionable on the ground of the large cost of its collection. It is also a vexatious impost which persons feel who are stopped on the road and called on to pay a small sum. But when that has been said I do not see that any strong case can be established against the present system, nor did I discover that my hon. Friend was able to allege any great defect. If there was a general desire to abolish turnpike tolls and resort to the mode of repairing all the roads of the kingdom by an assessment, there would not be the smallest difficulty in arranging such a system. There is no necessity to issue a Commission in order to frame such a plan. I would undertake, without putting my hon. Friend to the expense of employing a draughtsman, to lay a Bill upon the table by this day week which would most effectually carry that object into operation. But the difficulty is to obtain general consent to substitute for a system of turnpike tolls a system of highway rates. A very simple plan has been sent to me by a gentleman in the country which the House will see would most effectually accomplish the views of my hon. Friend. The plan is to keep up the present turnpike gates until the whole turnpike debt is discharged; that is to say, to make the debt the exclusive charge on the toll revenue, to keep up the gates only to pay the interest of the debt, and to create an annual sinking fund, and to throw the whole expense of the repairs on the rates, as in the case of ordinary parish highways. I think it will be seen that that is a very simple plan, and that after a certain number of years the present turnpike debt would be extinguished. If the House were likely to agree to such a plan, it would not be at all necessary to go through the process and delay of a Commission; but I entertain very considerable doubts whether, if I or my hon. Friend brought in such a Bill, it would be likely to meet with general assent. I feel sure that the difficulty consists not in devising the means for the accomplishment of the end, but in obtaining the general concurrence of the House. For that reason I regret that it is not in my power to consent to the Motion of my hon. Friend.

MR. PHILIPPS said, he agreed that the issue of a Commission on this subject was not necessary. It was a mistake, however, to suppose that tolls were abolished in South Wales. On the contrary, the roads there were mainly supported by tolls. No more was levied upon the county rates than was required to pay the interest of the original debt. In his county, out of the sum of £24,000, £16,000, or two-thirds of the whole, went to the repairs of the roads, the remaining £8,000 going towards the payment of the interest of the sum advanced by Government, and for the extinguishment of the debt. He could assure the hon. Gentleman that he miscalculated greatly if he thought an impost of 2*d.* in the pound would not be strongly objected to. At present the rate was not more than ½*d.* in the pound, and it was strongly objected to, and only tolerated because it was so small. He (Mr. Philipps), for one, was not anxious to see any feeling against turnpike tolls encouraged in populous places, as he thought that police regulations made it expedient that tolls should be levied.

commendations. It might be said, too, that Lord Clyde had sent home as many names for his short campaign as the Duke of Wellington sent home during the Peninsular war; but besides his well known contempt for these honours, which might induce him to think that other officers would despise them also, it must be remembered that the Duke had but 30,000 or 40,000 British troops under him, while Lord Clyde had 110,000 British troops, to say nothing of the Indian army of at least 250,000 men. Lord Clyde had so many to recommend that it was not to be wondered at that the proportion he recommended should exceed that recommended by the Duke of Wellington, especially when it was recollected that if the great Duke had a failing it was an indisposition to recommend officers for such distinctions. These honours were not hereditary, and should therefore be conferred as soon as possible after they had been fairly won. In the French army distinctions were continually conferred at the moment they had been merited; and they were the more appreciated when they could be enjoyed in the full vigour of life. It was well known that Her Majesty loved to see Her subjects honoured, and it seemed extraordinary that these officers, who had been so strongly recommended, were still without their rewards. In addition to the injustice done the officers recommended by Lord Clyde, the very worst compliment would be paid to that noble and gallant Lord, if on his arrival in England he found that his recommendations in favour of these officers, who assisted in bringing the conflict with the Indian mutineers to a successful end, had not been attended to. He moved for a Copy of any Correspondence which has taken place between the Indian Board and the Secretary of State for War on the subject of Officers recommended by the Governor-General of India and Lord Clyde for the Companionship of the Bath.

COLONEL DICKSON seconded the Motion. He was, he said, as anxious as any one to see that our brave officers of the Indian army obtained all deserved honour, but still he could not help thinking that the decoration of the Bath had recently been distributed with rather too much profusion. The correspondence, if produced, would prove the truth of this assertion. At the same time he would admit it was necessary to avoid taking any step which might seem to infringe upon the prerogative of the Sovereign.

MR. CHILDERS said, that it would be also satisfactory if the Secretary for War could give any information in respect to the honours recommended to be given to the civil service in India.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he quite agreed in the observation that Companionships of the Bath had been rather too lavishly distributed; and this put him in mind of a naval saying that there were a great many more C.B.'s than A.B.'s.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that before he said anything in reference to the particular Motion before the House, he was anxious to disabuse the mind of the hon. Baronet by whom it had been brought forward of the impression under which he seemed to labour, that the Queen's officers had been treated with some partiality as compared with the local officers in the distribution of distinctions for services in India. So far from that having been the case, there had been a very remarkable preponderance in the number of honours bestowed upon the Indian army. To the officers of that army there had been given, down to the month of August last, 69 companionships of the Bath for services performed during the Indian mutiny, and 24 more officers had been selected for the same distinction, and were to receive it as fast as vacancies occurred; so that the total number of officers of the local force thus honoured amounted to 93. But in the Queen's army, three times as numerous, the whole number of companionships and crosses distributed was only 90, and consequently, if there were any reason for complaint in that case on the ground of numbers, it must be on the side of the members of Her Majesty's service. He had no doubt, however, that the recommendations had all been made with the strictest impartiality, and that the disparity of numbers was to be attributed to the fact that some corps had been more fortunate than others in meeting with opportunities for distinction. Comparing the services for which these recommendations were made with the services formerly thought necessary for the honour, it was impossible to deny that the distinctions were now distributed with a more lavish hand, the standard of service being lower. In 1847 the statutes of the Order of the Bath were revised, and an addition of 50 was made both in the Queen's and in the Indian service. Nevertheless, the number recommended had been so great, that the limit had been exceeded, and on that account the Government, without refusing the recommendations, had recorded the names of the officers who would receive decorations as vacancies occurred. It was obvious that it would be very wrong to distribute these honours with so lavish a hand as to destroy their value. The hon. and gallant Member had alluded to the distinction of the Legion of Honour being conferred on the spot, when the Sovereign in command bestowed the distinction, drawing it from his pocket. He did not think, however, that the people of this country would like to see the Order of the Bath made so common in England as the Legion of Honour was in France, where it was conferred almost indiscriminately on every civil functionary of a certain grade, and on every military man who had attracted the notice of his commanding officer. With regard to the correspondence asked for, he thought its production would be objectionable, as it would have the appearance of interfering with the prerogative of the Crown in respect to the choice of persons to receive these distinctions, and of teaching individuals to look to the House of Commons rather than to the Sovereign for the acquisition of honours. He also felt persuaded that the correspondence which passed between public departments ought not to be laid before the House, except in cases which implied some marked impropriety of conduct. The officers who engaged in that correspondence took it for granted that as a general rule it was not to be published; and any departure from that rule would only impose upon them an inconvenient reserve, and lead them to conduct their communications either verbally, or in some private and confidential form. Looking, then, at the nature of these honours, the source from which they flowed, and the anxiety with which they were looked to, he did not think it would be consistent with his duty to produce the correspondence moved for by the hon. Baronet. He had no desire to withhold any information on the subject; he had stated the facts of the case, and under these circumstances he hoped the House would not sanction the Motion.

Motion made and Question put,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House a Copy of any Correspondence which has taken place between the India Board and the Secretary of State for War, on the subject of Officers recommended by the Governor General of India and Lord Clyde for the Companionship of the Bath,"

Motion negatived.

NAVY (GUN AND MORTAR BOATS).

RETURNS MOVED FOR.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, the House would recollect that there was a rather sharp debate the other evening on the subject of our gunboats. The Government must feel that the House was extremely indulgent on that occasion. The moment the Secretary to the Admiralty stated that the contractors had honestly intimated beforehand that they had not timber sufficiently seasoned to build the gunboats with, the House saw that no blame attached to the contractors as far as the employment of green timber was concerned. It also acquitted the Admiralty of any blame in the matter; for, as he himself stated at the time, if the gunboats had been built a year sooner, even with green timber, the Baltic campaign might have terminated differently. But the question of bad and fraudulent workmanship was a totally different thing. Ships built of unseasoned wood would not endanger the lives of their crews, at least for a certain number of years, but a terrible catastrophe might happen at any moment from bad construction. The Secretary to the Admiralty had declined to give the names of the builders of the defective gunboats. Why should those men be screened from public censure? He did not say that the contractors had any particular pecuniary interest in building the gunboats with short bolts or no bolts at all. They were probably sitting in their offices when the fraud was being carried on; but it might have been avoided by a moderate amount of care and supervision. The contractors might not have been personally cognizant of the fraud, but they were responsible for the work done in their establishments, and if their vessels were built badly that fact ought to be published to the world. Would any naval officer contend that any builder belonging to the Royal dockyards who should fasten his vessels with short bolts ought not to be immediately dismissed from the service? Moreover, by giving the names of the contractors the Government would show that they were doing everything they could to punish the guilty, and prevent them ever again having it in their power to endanger the lives of our seamen. The publication of names might appear a hard measure, but what would the drowning of hundreds of men have been? Each of our gunboats was manned by something like 150 men, whose lives, what with short bolts and bad workmanship, would have been at the mercy of the first gale of wind. It was wicked to conceal the names of the contractors, and why the Secretary to the Admiralty should have changed his mind on the subject he could not understand. The Admiralty could have no interest in withholding information from the public. He might be told that they were going to prosecute the guilty parties, provided the Law Officers thought a verdict could be got against them. He was too old to be deceived by that trick. The contractors would probably go to the Admiralty and express their sorrow for what had happened. Then the noble Secretary would throw the blame on the shipwrights; other business would intervene, and eventually the whole matter would be thrown aside. Now there was nothing like hitting the nail at the proper time, and he hoped the House would insist upon having the names of the contractors at once. He wished to know how many of our gunboats were fit for service. It had been stated in "another place" that we had 164 altogether. Two had been broken up; other two were undergoing the same process; and sixteen had been examined and repaired. Of the rest a hope was expressed that they might not be so bad. The House might depend upon it that all, whether in or out of the water, were equally defective. They ought to have been examined long ago. We had plenty of inspectors and surveyors for the purpose. At all events there could be no harm in giving the names of the contractors. He knew some of them, and would not conceal their names. The builder of the Caroline, in which 100 short bolts had been found, he believed was Mr. Green. If he was wrong, let the Secretary to the Admiralty set him right. But why should the name of Mr. Green alone be published to the world. He should like to know some of the others. This was an important matter, because the same thing might happen to ships which were now being repaired or converted. It was therefore high time that the country should know, without any concealment, the condition and state of repair of all the ships in the navy. Only on the preceding evening he was introduced to an American gentleman who owned more ships than there were in the United States Navy, and who, with another American and a Prussian gentleman, had recently visited Toulon. These gentlemen said that there were at work in the dockyards of that place no less than 14,000 men, besides 3,000 convicts, and that the French could in 14 days fit out and send to sea 20 sail of the line. By employing their large steam transports, which were from 260 to 300 feet long and were capable of carrying a large number of troops, and the vessels of the Messagerie Impériale they could in 14 days send to sea 30,000 men; and if they sent men from Cherbourg and Brest by railway they could, as these gentlemen asserted, do it in even a considerably shorter time. Well, that was the position in which we stood as regarded France. The right hon. Gentleman told them the other day that the country was not in a very safe state, and they had since heard that Russia was collecting an army on the banks of the Pruth, with what object it was not difficult to guess. The late Emperor of Russia was looking out for the death of "the sick man." But the sick man, by the aid of France and England, recovered for that time; but was there no reason to apprehend that the sick man might not be again ready to receive medicine, and that a severe dose might not be preparing for him? What security had we that Russia might not propose the same game to France that she wished us to join in? It might be France had declared she would enter into no arrangement for the dismemberment of Turkey; but they could all recollect that last year France, in spite of a declaration that she would not attack Austria, had deprived her of one of her fairest provinces. Again, they had been assured that the Emperor Napoleon had no designs upon Savoy and Nice, and yet shortly afterwards they saw those territories actually in his possession. In the same way he might now tell us that he was not going to do anything in the East, but had we any reason to trust him? Suppose there were a secret design on the part of Russia and France against any part of the dominions of the Porte—Egypt for instance—the first news that we should hear of it would be that an expedition had sailed for Alexandria, and perhaps had landed. We had a respectable naval power in the Mediterranean—12 sail of the line—but that would not be sufficient to cope with the 30 sail which France could in a few days equip and send out from Toulon fully manned. It was well known that the first news we had here in England of the first Napoleon's expedition against Egypt was the intimation that he had landed there with an army of 40,000 men; and at that time, be it remembered, there was nothing but sailing ships, and very bad sailing ships too; and now, when the motive power was steam, the army might be transported there in less than a quarter the time. He thought the Government ought, at least, to be able to satisfy the House and the country as to what was the exact state of our navy—how many ships were efficient and sound, and how many they could man in a case of sudden emergency. In his opinion, they could not man many more than they had now in commission. The Government had not carried out the recommendations of the Manning Committee—indeed, they had done little or nothing towards it. He found that he was in error the other evening when he stated that we had 7,300 Coastguard men. What we really had was only 3,200 regular Coastguard men, 1,900 of the district ships' companies, 1,500 Revenue men—civilians who were not fit to go on board a man-of-war—and 600 men in the Revenue cutters. Thus, instead of the 12,000 men recommended by the Manning Commission, we had only about 6,000. The reason of this was that the qualification for entering the Coastguard was 10 years' service. If it was reduced to seven years we could, he was informed, speedily raise the whole 12,000 men. The noble Lord had accused him of insulting sailors by saying that the Coast Volunteers were not to be relied upon, but he was not to be humbugged by calling the Coast Volunteers sailors. He would proceed to notice some other points in which the recommendations of the Commission upon the Manning of the Navy had not been carried out.

MR. SPEAKER said, he must remind the hon. and gallant Admiral that the question before the House was, Whether a Return should be ordered of names of the gun and mortar vessels which had been constructed with short bolts, and not as to the Manning of the Navy generally.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he had thought it was as well to take that opportunity of making a few observations on the general subject; but as Mr. Speaker ruled he was out of order he would content himself with submitting the Motion in the terms stated. He contended that there could be no valid reason for refusing to give the names, and if they were withheld by the Admiralty on the ground that the contractors were about to be prosecuted, he warned the noble Lord that he was about to enter on a long job. The law officers must be consulted, inquiries would have to be made into the specifications according to which the contracts were undertaken, and time would be lost in every possible way. The builders, meanwhile, would represent that the fault lay altogether with the men who drove the bolts; that on their parts no disposition whatever existed to jeopardize the lives of brave men, but that it was impossible for them to exercise a never-failing supervision. In the end the whole affair would be shown to have originated in a misapprehension, the inquiry or prosecution would result in nothing, and the country and the House would not be a bit the wiser. In conclusion, he wished to obtain from the Admiralty, without any prevarication or subterfuge whatever, the names of the gun and mortar boats with the short bolts, and the names of the builders, together with a statement of the vessels in that class which were actually fit for service, and he, therefore, would move for Returns conveying that information.

MR. BENTINCK seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That there be laid before this House, Returns of the names of the Gun and Mortar Boats with the short bolts, and the names of the Builders: And, of those now fit for service."

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: I hope the gallant Officer will not accuse the Admiralty of wishing, intentionally or otherwise, to screen any persons who may have not performed their contracts or have fallen short of their duty to the Government. It would not be fair to the Admiralty to do so; because, so far from entertaining any such desire, I beg to inform the gallant Admiral that before the circumstances were made known in this House, or received publicity in the public prints, the Admiralty had already taken measures to ascertain how far their powers extended of prosecuting such contractors as might appear to be deserving of punishment. The gallant Admiral asks me to mention the names of the gun-boats in which the short bolts were found, and the names of their builders. The Admiralty could have no objection whatever to make their names known to the House, if it were not that to do so while the matter is what may be called sub judice would be manifestly unfair to all parties. We are taking the opinions of the law officers as to the propriety of prosecuting certain individuals, and if I were now officially to give their names I should be unfairly prejudicing the public mind, and possibly that of the jury before whom their case may hereafter be tried; and I believe the House would feel this to be an act of great impropriety on my part. I am not prepared to say that we shall be able to prosecute any person; but, if the materials for establishing a case should exist, it is our full intention to bring whoever may be the offending parties to justice. I quite agree with the hon. and gallant Gentleman that a considerable time must elapse before a complete legal case can be prepared; but this unavoidable delay ought not to make us forget the principle that every man is innocent until he is found guilty; whereas to couple the names of men with fraud is to condemn without granting them a fair hearing. As regards the gunboats, there can be no objection to granting, as far as our information extends, the Return which the gallant Admiral has asked for; but, knowing that many of these vessels have before now unexpectedly turned out to be defective, we must not be surprised if that Return should not be strictly correct. The gallant Admiral knows that a vessel may appear to be perfectly sound, and that defects, if they exist, cannot be discovered till we open her timbers and try. The condition of the gunboats is no new discovery. The late Board of Admiralty were aware that there was a great deal of decay among them, and they had no less than one hundred men engaged in their examination and repair. The present Board have increased that number of men to one hundred and fifty, and we are getting these vessels in hand one after the other as fast as we can. Those which are not sound will be repaired, and if—as was the case with some of the mortar boats—they are not worth repairing, the next best thing is to break them up. It is very easy to say—“State the number of efficient gunboats;” but are we to haul them up together, and to employ the whole of our men in the dockyards in examining them to the neglect of other duties? The Board of Admiralty is fully alive to the importance of this matter, and likewise to the necessity that justice should be done. If on examination we find we have no legal case, we shall offer no opposition to a Committee, or to any other inquiry which the House may desire; but, under present circumstances, and bearing in mind that we are acting under legal advice, I trust the gallant Admiral will not press his Motion.

selves, but he did not think the question had been put on a right footing by the noble Lord who had just sat down. The House did not ask the Government to say whether the contractors were guilty or not; what they wanted were the plain simple facts—in what gunboats had these defects of construction been found, and what were the names of the contractors who had sent out from their dockyards vessels defective in such important particulars? The House had not interfered, and he was not aware of any intention to interfere, with any decision which the Board of Admiralty might arrive at relative to the prosecution of the contractors; and the actual state of the gunboats could not be told until they had been thoroughly overhauled. But, unless the noble Lord declared that the production of these names would be prejudicial to the interest of justice, he should advise the gallant Admiral to persist in his Motion.

MR. BENTINCK said, nobody who was conversant with the proceedings of a dockyard could for a moment suppose that the contractors had been guilty of wilful fraud in substituting short bolts for those of a proper length, because no one would put himself in such a false position for the comparatively trifling amount which might thus be saved. Every shipwright in the yard would have to be an accomplice in such an act of spoliation, and would expect to share the spoil. But the charge which was preferred against the contractors was, that owing to their neglect and to the want of proper superintendence on their part, the lives of hundreds of men had been jeopardised; and the sooner an exposure of their negligence took place the better. The affair might be sub judice, and it might be a difficult task to decide who ought to be prosecuted and who not; but that was surely no reason why the House should not be enlightened upon a simple matter of fact—namely, what were the names of the gunboats in which the bolts were found to be short, and who were the contractors in whose yards they were built. That was all the information now sought, and its production could not interfere with any pending legal proceedings. The case might not be one of fraud against the contractors, but that there had been gross negligence nobody could deny, and they had, therefore, a perfect right to ask where the responsibility for that negligence and its consequent risk rested. The noble Lord (Lord C. Paget) was not sure that the Admiralty would be able to prosecute at all. That was an additional reason for granting this information, for if it was found that legal proceedings could not be taken the whole matter would fall to the ground, and nobody would be any the wiser. The required information could be obtained, indeed, in a roundabout way, but he hoped the noble Lord would re-consider his decision and consent to furnish it in a direct and official shape. He believed that when the rest of the gunboats were examined the whole of them would be found to be thoroughly rotten, owing to the hasty manner in which they were built and the badness of the materials. But a larger and much more important question was involved in this matter. The noble Lord said the late Government were perfectly aware of the state of the gunboats. No doubt of that. Everybody was aware of it. Discussions took place on the subject in that House last Session, and the condition of the gunboats was a standing joke. But that being so, why had the survey of them been deferred till the present time, instead of taking place immediately, for the double object of ascertaining on what gunboats we might rely for purposes of defence, and of adopting prompt measures to arrest the progress of their decay? If a gunboat, found to be rotten in October, was not examined, and the bad material removed, till the following spring, her condition must have become tenfold worse in the interval. She would be touchwood from stem to stern, and not even worth burning. Why, then, were not immediate steps taken to repair the mischief as soon as it was discovered? Moreover, with the knowledge that they had hardly a gunboat that was worth a pinch of snuff, the Admiralty had been lately discharging thousands of shipwrights and other workmen. The noble Lord said it was impossible to employ the whole of the dockyard force in repairing gunboats; but it appeared, with all their admirable professions of anxiety to maintain the efficiency of the navy, the Board had been dismissing large numbers of artisans. In their wretched parsimony the Admiralty had put off the work required to place these gunboats in proper order until they were now found thoroughly rotten.

MR. WHITBREAD said, the hon. Gentleman assumed, without evidence, that the whole of these gunboats were in a state of decay; but such was not the fact. Within the last three years seventeen or eighteen of them had been upon the China station, knocking about in all sorts of weather and tried in every conceivable way, and yet not one word of bad report had been sent home of them. There were also a vast number afloat in the harbours at home of which no bad report had been made. There were sixteen gunboats upon Haslar slip which had still to be examined. These things must, to a considerable extent, be a question of degree. The gallant Admiral thought that the moment one gunboat was found rotten all other work ought to have been suspended to see whether the rest were not in the same condition. [Sir C. NAPIER: No.] The Estimates were pretty large in amount, and perhaps the House might think the Government had gone on fast enough with this expenditure. With regard to the Returns asked for, it would be unfair to make public the names of the contractors who had built these particular boats, while the names of others were withheld who, for aught they knew, were equally guilty; moreover, the facts were not all collected. As he had said, some of the boats had not yet been examined. Besides, the House was perfectly satisfied the other night with the explanation that was given on the subject by the Government. If the Government found that they could not proceed with the prosecutions they would not object to a Committee. The gallant Officer and the hon. Gentleman said they only wanted facts, but the Admiralty could not give the facts without raising a storm of indignation throughout the country, which, whilst the matter was still under consideration, would be contrary to that spirit of fair play which characterized their proceedings. If the gallant Officer waited for ten days or a fortnight he would have that information which if given now would have an appearance of vindictive hostility.

MR. H. TAYLOR said, he thought the House could not, on mere hearsay, adopt a course amounting almost to the impeachment of a respectable body of men. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty had fairly answered the Motion before the House. No doubt, if the contractors had not faithfully executed their engagements proceedings would be taken against them; but in the meantime opportunity ought to be allowed for a proper inquiry into the state of the gunboats.

SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR said, he had had some twenty of these vessels under his command, and must say that no boats could have done their work better as far as concerned their general character and structure. Many of them received hard knocks, and saw a good deal of rough service, and yet, although the whole of them came in sooner or later for casual repairs, he knew of no instance in which the timber used in making them had been found to be faulty. Indeed, in the main, they might be said to have been extremely well constructed. Many of them had been wholly stripped of their copper, and their only defect was a leakage from a little slack caulk—a circumstance not uncommon in contract-built ships. Caulking was nowhere done as well as in Her Majesty's dockyards. He could not well support the Motion of the gallant Admiral near him; and he hoped that, for the reasons stated by the Secretary to the Admiralty, it would not be pressed. The original sin of these vessels appeared to be the character of the timber of which some of them were built. It was well known that not only in Her Majesty's dockyards but in the private building yards of the country there was a lack of that properly seasoned timber which the undertaking of a large number of such boats would require. Now, in France it was not an unusual thing—in fact he believed it was the system—to give a salt water seasoning in the dockyards to a large quantity of timber, sufficient for the consumption of six or seven years. This was admirably arranged; and he never heard in France of such decay in ship timber as sometimes attacked our vessels. This plan was well worth the attention of the authorities.

MR. W. EWART said, that what he was most anxious for was to have security for the future, and he hoped some system of rigid and thorough inspection of gunboats and vessels generally might be adopted, periodically reporting the results to that House. On the other side of the water experiments were constantly being made, not only in the building of ships, but in testing the strength of their sides; and he did not see why we should not in these matters emulate the activity of the Emperor of the French.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I think my hon. and gallant Friend will feel that this is merely a question of time—and that a very short time—not a question of granting or refusing information to the House. My noble Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty stated that in the opinion of the law officers of the Board the case of those whom it was now intended to prosecute would be prejudiced if a Return were laid before Parliament indicating that they were persons guilty of fraud, and permitted negligence in the construction of these vessels. Whether they have been guilty or not will be the subject of investigation by the prosecution it is intended to institute; and if my hon. and gallant Friend will only wait for a short period, he will find, in ten days or a fortnight, whether prosecutions can be instituted. If prosecutions can be instituted, the result of them will give much more ample and complete information than the Returns now called for. If it be found that there are no legal grounds on which a prosecution can be founded, then undoubtedly any prima facie evidence which a Return can give might be properly laid before the House. But my hon. and gallant Friend will see that the Return at present would really not give the full information which is required, because it would state that in regard to a certain number of gunboats the deficiencies had been found, but until sixteen others, now about to be examined had been so, the Return would be incomplete; and therefore not only would it prejudice the case of those mentioned, but exempt and acquit others in the sixteen additional cases which might appear to be equally guilty when actually examined.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, that he thought it very desirable that they should have accounts kept of the repairs necessarily incurred by bad workmanship, distinct from those consequent on the time the boats had been in use. This was the only way of knowing how much blame was attributable to the contractors.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty and the hon. Gentleman one of the Lords of the Treasury (Mr. Whitbread) appeared to give a very lame excuse, and therefore the noble Lord came to the rescue. He had guarded himself particularly and most distinctly against accusing the contractors of fraud. All he wanted was the names of those contractors in whose yards the short bolts were used; and he could not see why the names should not be given. He did not ask the names of all the builders, but only those who came before the public as having driven short bolts and bad fastenings into the gunboats. What this had to do with prosecutions he did not understand. As for a storm being raised against them, why, all he could say on the subject was, "the sooner the better;" because that storm would force the Admiralty to go on and bring them to punishment—the punishment which they would well deserve, of never being employed again. The noble Lord said it was very difficult to know, on looking at a ship, whether there was any defect in it. That was all the excuse the noble Lord could offer on behalf of the inspectors for permitting vessels to enter into the service which would sink when they had been twenty-four hours at sea. His hon. and gallant Friend (Sir M. Seymour) had spoken about the gunboats sent to China. It was not about them that he wanted to know anything, but about the gunboats now at home. The gunboats might have been examined more easily than any other class of vessels. If precautions had been taken at the proper time, the progress of the rot might have been stopped. After the observations of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, however, he would not divide the House, but he was not satisfied with the explanations that had been given; he thought the names of the builders of the faulty vessels ought to be known, in order that they might receive the reprehension which they deserved.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

THE LATE PRIZE FIGHT.—SOUTH EASTERN RAILWAY.

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

LORD LOVAINE said, he rose according to notice to move an Address for Copy of all Correspondence between the Home Office and the Directors of the South Eastern Railway Company, in the year 1859-60, relating to the conveyance of Persons intending to commit a breach of the Law. He was not on that occasion about to enter into a discussion on the merits or demerits of prizefighting. On a recent occasion an exhibition of that kind, at no great distance from the Metropolis, was declared—rather reluctantly and apologetically, he must say—but it was declared by the Secretary of State for the Home Department to be illegal; and it consequently followed that those who attended those illegal exhibitions or promoted them were accessories before the fact, and equally guilty with the principals. That was not the first time on which complaints had been made of the conduct of the South Eastern Company in this respect. That company had been entrusted, as everybody knew, with a very large portion—he might almost say, with a monopoly—of the traffic in the counties over which their lines ran; and they had been warned of the illegality of aiding and abetting prize fights by himself, when he was a Member of the late Government. It was then understood the directors pledged themselves that nothing of the sort should again take place. Last year a letter was addressed to them by the bench of magistrates of the county of Surrey on a similar occasion; the answer of the Secretary was, that any arrangements for the conveyance of such excursionists had been made without the knowledge of the directors, and that it should not occur again. But so far was the company from keeping this pledge that it allowed two special trains to be run down the line on the morning of the recent fight. At every station in the county of Surrey these trains were met by police, but on passing into Hampshire no police were found, the passengers got out at a station in that county and the fight took place. Nor was this all; with one of these special trains, he was informed, was an officer of the company, a superintendent from the office at London-bridge, while the use of the telegraph was denied to the police authorities while the fight was going on. Under these circumstances he submitted that the complicity of the company was clearly established. Whether it was possible to bring the law to bear on the directors was another question, perhaps it would not be right, as he perceived none of the law officers of the Crown present, to ask the opinion of the Government; but he hoped the House by assenting to his Motion would intimate that they would not permit persons to whom they had given great powers to wield those powers in defiance of the law. Few could form an adequate idea of the inconvenience which arose from those special trains, from which 2,000 or 3,000 of the worst ruffians in London were in a moment launched upon a quiet neighbourhood. He was happy to quote the example of the South Western Company as a Company that had entirely given up the practice, and that had recently refused to grant trains for any such purpose. The House knew that the Executive was not very strong when opposed to numbers, as shown by the case of St. George's-in-the-East, where a mob of ruffians had for the last three months been able to keep up a continual disturbance in the church. He thought it right, therefore, to ask whether the Government had in this instance attempted to enforce the law; or whether anything had been done to stop the practice to which he had referred?

Sir Charles Napier

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I do not intend to offer any objection to the noble Lord's Motion, but I must make a protest against the sort of exaggerations in which the noble Lord has indulged. He has described the railway launching 2,000 or 3,000 ruffians upon some quiet neighbourhood in a manner that might lead one to imagine the train conveyed a set of banditti to plunder, rack, and ravage the country, murder the people, burn the houses, and commit every sort of atrocity. I am not going to dispute the point, because I am told that it is the law, that a fight between two men—not a fight of enmity, but a trial of strength—is, technically, a breach of the peace, and an act that renders the parties liable to prosecution; nor whether the persons who go to witness it are not, technically, involved in the charge. But, as far as the latter are concerned, they may conceive it to be a very harmless pursuit; some persons like what takes place, there may be a difference of opinion, as a matter of taste, whether it is a spectacle one would wish to see, or whether it is calculated to excite disgust. Some people look upon it as an exhibition of manly courage, characteristic of the people of this country. I saw the other day a long extract from a French newspaper describing this fight as a type of the national character for endurance, patience under suffering of indomitable perseverance, in determined effort, and holding it up as a specimen of the manly and admirable qualities of the British race. All this is, of course, entirely a matter of opinion, but really, setting aside the legal technicalities of the case, I do not perceive why any number of persons, say 1,000 if you please, who assemble to witness a prize fight, are in their own persons more guilty of a breach of the peace than an equal number of persons who assemble to witness a balloon ascent. There they stand; there is no breach of the peace; they go to see a sight, and when that sight is over they return, and no injury is done to any one. They only stand or sit on the grass to witness the performance, and as to the danger to those who perform themselves, I imagine the danger to life in the case of those who go up in balloons is certainly greater than that of two combatants who merely hit each other as hard as they can, but inflict no permanent injury upon each other. I think there should be moderation in all things—moderation in all opinions; and, although it may or may not be desirable that the law should be enforced—whatever the law may be—still I do not think any advantage is gained or good done either to public morals or public feeling by the sort of exaggerations in which the noble Lord has indulged. At the same time the Motion is one to which I see no objection, and therefore I do not oppose it.

LORD LOVAINE: The noble Lord has pleaded the cause of prize-fighting so strongly that I am almost led to expect that he will bring forward a Bill to make it legal. I was under the impression that all breaches of the law were to be discouraged and guarded against by the Government, and more especially by the Secretary of State for the Home Department; but the noble Lord very skillfully turns the discussion into one on the merits of prize-fighting, whereas I specially guarded myself against saying a word on that subject. I hold with respect to it opinions the opposite of those of the noble Lord; but I did not say a word about prize-fighting. I said that some thousands of ruffians had been carried down by the train to one spot for that purpose. There were persons present at the fight who were not ruffians, I admit. I have heard of great names as having been present. ["Name!"] Of course I shall not mention names; but if the noble Lord had done what I did—if he had gone in a train with some of the gentlemen who were present at the fight—[Laughter—I assure the House I was only a casual passenger—he would have seen that many of the passengers were not such as he would like to be in company with. I repeat, I am not going into the merits of prize fighting; but if these things are to be put down let them be put down. If they are not, let us not be calling on the police to endeavour to preserve the peace in those cases, while you, who occupy a much higher position, are endeavouring to contribute the whole weight of your influence to support those who are abettors in a violation of the law. Let us have one thing or the other.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he did not think it right to let it go abroad that the noble Lord (Lord Lovaine) stood alone in that House in his condemnation of those exhibitions. He, on his own part, must enter his protest against them; but he thought the noble Lord who brought forward this Motion should fly at higher game than the directors of a railway company who were guided by a desire of profit. The Ministers of the Crown, instead of putting down prize fighting, lent every encouragement to it. The Home Secretary, whose peculiar business it was to put down prize-fights, defended them; and now the noble Lord at the head of the Government spoke of them only as playful exhibitions of the animated nature of the British lion. It was the duty of the Government to enforce the law, whether they considered it a good law or not. Such used to be the doctrine laid down in his own country, and ought to be applied in this instance. He could only add, that his schoolboy experience taught him that those who set others on to fight were generally cowards themselves.

MR. W. EWART said, he had a few nights since asked the Home Secretary to state what was the law relating to prize-fights, but received in reply an indirect defence of the practice. He thought that if the law said one thing the Secretary of State ought not, even by anticipation, to say another. He did not object to fighting with gloves as an exercise, nor did he object to the art of self-defence, which was better than the knives or stilettos used in foreign countries. Neither did he object to fencing with foils; but he drew the same distinction between such fencing and a duel with swords as he did between a fight with gloves and a prize-fight. The paper which the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) had quoted as eulogizing the recent fight, was the Journal des Débats; but, in fact, the paper did not justify such proceedings, and only mentioned it as an instance of the pugnacity and vigour of the Anglo-Saxon character. The Siècle, however, a paper of great circulation, condemned the proceeding in strong terms. He hoped that the present discussion would terminate, and that they would hear no more in that House about this matter.

MR. CLIVE said, that in justification of the Directors of the South-Eastern Railway Company he felt bound to say that he was informed that they did not admit they had forfeited any pledge. Upon a former occasion a special train was stopped without the Directors' knowledge or sanction, at a place intermediate between two stations, where a fight came off, and a promise was given that in future no trains should be allowed to stop anywhere but at stations on the line. Some time after, and that was the occasion more particularly alluded to by the noble Lord, a train stopped at a station and a fight took place, but the Directors maintained that they knew nothing about it, and had not broken their word. They declared, truly or not, that they could not tell the intentions of those who travelled by their trains, and could not assume that any breach of the peace was intended.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he was not one of those who were very squeamish on those matters. He admired the skill and courage displayed by Englishmen on such occasions, and more especially the pluck and skill shown at the recent fight; but the question was whether prizefights were not breaches of the peace, and magistrates ought to know what would be their position if they took part in endeavouring to keep the peace on those occasions. He happened to live on the South-Eastern line, and was also a magistrate for the county of Surrey. One or two of those prize-fights had taken place in his own immediate neighbourhood, and one or two of his brother magistrates had run considerable risk of personal danger in endeavouring to prevent them. But what would be their position when it was known that those proceedings were sanctioned by the voice of the Government in that House? He was very much astonished at the tone of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) on this subject; and he wished to place before the House the position himself and his brother magistrates would be in if they thought it to be their duty to suppress those breaches of the peace while they were sanctioned by the executive Government, and encouraged by the railway companies for the sake of gain.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I distinctly stated that it was ruled by legal authorities that such prize-fights were breaches of the peace; but I protest, at the same time, against the exaggerated terms in which the noble Lord (Lord Lovaine) characterized the conduct of the spectators on those occasions.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he was surprised to hear his hon. Friend (Mr. V. Scully) take the noble Lord at the head of the Government to task for the remarks he had made on this occasion, for he (Colonel Dickson) could not understand an Irishman objecting to fighting. The noble Viscount (Viscount Palmerston) had not laid himself open to such taunts. He sat on a different side of the House from the noble Lord, and did not often find himself in the same lobby with him on a division; but he would say for the noble Viscount, that if he had one attribute more than another which endeared him to his countrymen it was his thoroughly English character and his love for every manly sport. He (Colonel Dickson) would not stand up for prize-fighting, nor had he ever seen a prize-fight in his life; but he would say that the two men who fought on the recent occasion showed qualities of which the whole English race had reason to be proud; our own man in particular, who evinced powers of endurance and an indomitable pluck which entitled him to the admiration of his countrymen. He said so advisedly, as he had been partially disabled at the commencement of the struggle. Many men in this country received honours who did not so well deserve them. He did not think Parliament ought to legislate with the view to put down manly sports; and, with regard to the duties of magistrates, about which the hon. Baronet (Sir W. Jolliffe) professed to have doubts, the law was clearly laid down. Magistrates themselves ought to know when to act and when to shut their eyes.

MR. PAULL said, until the gallant Gentlemen (Colonel Dickson) had spoken he was not prepared to hear that the noble Lord at the head of the Government, after fifty years of memorable public service, would be known to posterity as the patron of prize-fighting. He thought it an unfortunate thing, whether or not it was in the power of the Government to stop those exhibitions, that the First Minister of the Crown and the Home Secretary should be found palliating, if not sanctioning, them. After what the noble Lord had said, he thought the caricature in a certain facetious public print, which a few years ago represented the noble Lord as a bottle-holder, was not altogether wrong.

Motion agreed to.

Address for "Copy of all Correspondence between the Home Office and the Directors of the South Eastern Railway Company, in the years 1859-60, relating to the conveyance of Persons intending to commit a breach of the Law."

TENURE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read; Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

SIR JOHN WALSH said, that pursuant to notice, he rose to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. The Bill reminded him of a certain personage, who was said to be like—

"Three single gentlemen rolled into one;"

for it dealt with three separate subjects rolled into one. At that period of the Session, that was an exceedingly convenient mode for the Government to deal with business which seemed likely to overwhelm them. Nothing could be more easy than in that way to despatch a number of subjects which had no necessary or intimate relation to each other. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) had, in the Bill under consideration, embodied three distinct principles, three distinct sets of details, and three very complicated pieces of machinery, dealing with different interests and different persons. The first branch of the Bill had for its object to enable the limited owner of an estate to charge the inheritance with a terminable annuity, terminating at the expiration of twenty-five years, for the purpose of raising money, to be applied to the improvement of the land. To a principle of that sort, which was a wise and healthy one, he (Sir John Walsh) could have no objection; for under its operation, the settlement of an estate could no longer operate as a bar to its improvement; but when he came to look at the details of the measure, several strong objections presented themselves to his mind. He might also observe that as a difficulty arose from the conglomeration of Bills in the measure, as he objected to the details of some, but to the principles of others. Amongst the first of his objections to this special legislation was that it did not deal with the relation between landlord and tenant, properly so called, at all, but it dealt with the law of real property itself. Why, then, should it be confined to Ireland? There could be no reason why Ireland should be made the subject of exceptional legislation of this kind, regarding the relations between the limited owner and the owner of an inheritance. But he found that this legislation had already been, to a great degree, applied to England. The Attorney General for England introduced a measure which passed in 1856, called the Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act, and which provided for nearly all the cases that were, by the present Bill, the subject of special legislation; and this same Act of 1856 had been extended to Ireland, and was actually now in operation in both countries. It dealt safely, prudently, cautiously, and, as he was informed, effectually, with the relations existing between the limited owner and the owner of a subsequent estate of inheritance. If it were necessary to make any alterations or amendments in that Act, let them be made, but in the presence of such an Act, where was the necessity of this part of the Bill? Why not have the same law in this respect for both countries? But the right hon. Gentleman introduced this measure on the ground of the necessity, as he said, of special legislation for Ireland. He objected, also, to the machinery by which the measure was to be carried out. The relations of the limited owners and the owners of the inheritance were of a very delicate character, and required, when touched at all, to be administered by high and competent authorities. But the whole of the machinery of the Bill which dealt with these delicate relations was made to turn on the Chairman of Quarter Sessions in Ireland. He was to be the agent for carrying the Bill into effect. Members connected with England did not, perhaps, understand the exact position of a Chairman of Quarter Sessions in Ireland. He was a very different person from the Chairman of Quarter Sessions in England. In Ireland he was a stipendiary officer of the Government, and exercised not the very highest judicial functions. He did not wish to say a word in disparagement of the Chairmen of Quarter Sessions in Ireland. They were members of a liberal profession; they had many able men in their ranks; but every scale had two ends, and it so happened that the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice were at one end of the judicial scale in Ireland, and the Chairman of Quarter Sessions at the other. He was alarmed at the idea of giving such excessive powers as this Bill proposed over the whole landed property in Ireland to judicial functionaries, not holding the very highest position in that country; and they were to exercise their powers without appeal; so that they would, in fact, be irresponsible for their decisions. The principle of Sic volo, sic jubeo—stet pro ratione voluntas, would be their rule; and after their decisions were pronounced, it would be impossible to reverse them. In the second portion of the Bill, which dealt with the powers of limited owners, it was provided that the limited owner might grant leases for twenty-one years, and improvement leases for forty years. This was a power attended with great danger. So long as he kept steadily in view the ultimate interest of the owner of the inheritance, the matter was safe; and he (Sir John Walsh) would not, of course, depart from the principles of equity or justice. But the House ought to recollect that the Bill was dealing with the interests of those who were inadequately able to protect their own interests. No doubt the Bill made ample provision for notices which were to be served in various ways, according to circumstances. If the party concerned were a minor, the guardian or trustee was to be served. Every legal requirement was embodied in the Bill. But they all knew how difficult it was by those notices to guard the interests of persons who were absent, or perhaps not then in existence. They knew how careless and indifferent guardians or trustees were sometimes to the interests of minors. Perhaps the minor might be a young soldier fighting battles in China, or a midshipman engaged in the Pacific Ocean. How was such a person to be guarded against fraud by the empty formality of legal notices? These improvement leases might be worked by a limited owner greatly to his own advantage, and to the injury of the owner of the inheritance, through the trickery and chicanery that this Bill would enable him to employ. A lease for forty-one years in Ireland was a very marketable commodity. There were plenty of people who would pay a large fine for such a lease; and numbers who would be glad to give a considerable sum of ready money to possess it. He might be told there were clauses in the Bill that prohibited any fine from being taken; but how were these stipulations to be enforced, when the person most interested in enforcing them was not present? Suppose a limited owner endeavoured, with this forty-one years' lease, to deal with a tenant who was willing to make an engagement by which he might possess himself of the farm, at a very low rent. They would look at the improvement clause and see what improvements were necessary. The clause said "these improvements, or any of them;" and there might be six or seven, would qualify the tenant to receive an improvement lease, and would justify the Chairman of Quarter Sessions in giving his sanction to the grant of a lease by the limited owner to the tenant. Suppose the improvement was held to be the removal of stones from the fields, and let the House imagine, for the sake of the argument, that there were some boulder stones among them. That was an improvement that would justify the Chairman of Quarter Sessions in sanctioning this forty-one years' lease at a low rent; and this arrangement would be facilitated by a sum of money which the limited owner might quietly receive. The House could at least imagine a reckless spendthrift or involved landlord who might have the power, through this Bill and its machinery, of defrauding the owner of the inheritance, the latter of whom might come some twenty years afterwards into the possession of a barren estate. He always entertained great objection to very long leases in Ireland. It was the fashion to object to the customary yearly tenure in that country. Forty years ago very long leases were as general as year-by-year tenure in the present day. He believed that three-fourths of the distresses, the agricultural difficulties, and the evils which had afflicted Ireland, but which were now passing away, were owing to that very system of long leases. To that practice might be attributed the subdivisions, the subletting, the divorce, and separation of the head landlords from his tenants. Regarding, then, these long leases as the curse of Ireland, he looked upon the proposal for their renewal contained in the Bill with jealousy and suspicion. If they looked to Scotland they would find none of these long leases in those parts of the country where the greatest agricultural improvements had been effected. The common tenure of land in Scotland was a twenty-one years' lease, under which large tracts of country had been reclaimed within a very recent period. But in the midst of the most flourishing agriculture the traveller saw now and then patches of six or eight acres not yet reclaimed. These were precisely the pieces of land that the tenant had not been able to get at, through some long existing lease or other obstacle to possession. By the present Bill the sole protection to the owner was the Chairman of Quarter Sessions, and a most imperfect protection he was, as he could not be supposed to scrutinize all the improvements narrowly. Another defect in rendering the Quarter Sessions and the chairman the entire agency for carrying out this Bill was, that as the court was not one of the highest practice, the best legal practitioners did not usually resort to it. If the provisions of the Bill relative to leasing powers, which he had thus felt bound to condemn as the great blot of the measure, were passed at all, they would require considerable modifications. He now approached another portion of the Bill, which might properly be said to refer to tenant right. He did not know whether hon. Gentlemen near him would receive it as such, or whether it would fulfil their expectations, but he supposed it was the mode in which the Government proposed to deal with this much-vexed and difficult question. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) in opening this question to the House naturally began with the Devon Commission. It was the text-book of every one who was not practically acquainted with Ireland. He did not admit in an unqualified manner the authority of the Devon Commission. He did not wish to disparage the labours of the eminent men who were engaged in it; but that Commission was really an advertisement for grievances. The Commissioners went round the country to collect evidence, and those who were discontented made their complaints known, while those who were contented stayed at home and said nothing. The Devon Commission always seemed to him like a bad photograph, in which all the prominent features were enlarged and all the best parts were thrown into shade. It gave a very exaggerated likeness of Ireland, even in the depressed and calamitous state in which the country then was, when on the eve of a tremendous social convulsion. The Devon Commission described the state of things immediately previous to the famine. He believed that about sixteen years had elapsed, but above one hundred years had passed if they measured Ireland by what it was now and what it was then. The country was altogether changed. Great improvements had been effected, and the remedies which were then applicable were not so now. The Devon Commission gave a very long, and in many respects an exceedingly able, catalogue of remedial measures. The majority had already been adopted, and of the small remnant which the Report indicated was the question of tenant right. That question had been brought forward in many different shapes, and had been constantly rejected as contrary to sound sense, as contrary to the feelings of equity of the British people, and as contrary to those principles of policy and justice which had always led them to the conclusion that the relations between landlord and tenant were better left to the free agency of landlords and tenants themselves. All attempts to interfere with the natural free action of men were false and faulty in principle. He was sure that the right hon. Gentleman, who was so distinguished a disciple of the principles of free trade, would acknowledge that he was correct, and that a departure from those principles could only be justified upon very strong and exceptional grounds. But he said that if those exceptional grounds ever existed in Ireland they did not exist now, and that the state of things was such that there was no difficulty whatever in landlord and tenant dealing with each other as landlord and tenant did in England. Many of the evils which formerly existed arose from subletting, and he believed that sublettings were gradually disappearing. Except where some old lease subsisted the relations between the landlord and the occupying tenant were now direct, and it was the general desire of landlords in Ireland to establish that rule. Hon. Gentlemen who represented Irish constituencies were exceedingly anxious to persuade the House that the people were not happy and not progressing, and that all ideas of improvement were illusory. An hon. and learned Gentleman, who had a Bill upon this subject, took the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to task for having spoken of the increase of horned cattle as a test of prosperity, and quoted statistics to show that the cereal acreage had diminished. [Mr. HENNESSY: Hear, hear!] He had great respect for the hon. and learned Gentleman, as a young Member of great promise and distinguished talents; but as far as he could see, the bent of the Gentleman's genius was not bucolic. In dealing with facts and statistics he did not think that the hon. and learned Gentleman exactly understood where they would lead him. The number of acres under wheat cultivation was not a test of progress. A better test was the number of quarters per acre which the land produced. There might be too much cultivation. Bad farmers sometimes grew too many corn crops and impoverished the land. Although it was quite possible that the number of acres under corn cultivation might be less in Ireland now than ten or twelve years ago, he was quite certain that the agricultural improvement in that country had been most marked and most decisive. These horned cattle, which were the bugbears of the hon. Gentleman's imagination, really were great fertilizers. If they wished to have good corn crops, it was necessary to have stock on the land, and therefore the increase of horned cattle was rather a proof of the increased fertility of the soil. It might be that crops of turnips and clover had taken the place of corn crops, but there was no doubt of the fact that the improvement in the agriculture of Ireland was wonderful. It was now the agriculture of the farmer instead of the cottier, with his wretched cultivation of a few potatoes, a patch of oats, and, perhaps, a little wheat, extracted from the soil by the stimulus of lime, until the stimulus failed and the land would produce nothing. The whole of Ireland was now advancing in cultivation and in comfort, and it was impossible to visit the Irish peasantry in their own homes without seeing that they were better dressed and fed than they used to be. They were no longer those miserable objects who used to haunt the roadsides to pain and disgust the passer-by. Well, then, he thought Parliament ought to leave well alone. They ought not to interfere between landlord and tenant, and attempt by this peddling legislation to alter a process which had worked so beneficially. He admitted that for a Tenant Right Bill there never was one more mild and moderate than that of the right hon. Gentleman. His objection to the earlier portion of the measure was not so much to principle as to details; to the latter portion he was opposed on principle rather than on points of detail. There was a danger in admitting the necessity of dealing with the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland otherwise than in England. If such an admission were made, there would be plenty of people to push it further than those who proposed it ever intended. Even the fact that the Bill was almost of a permissive character, and gave the landlord a veto upon projected improvements, inspired him with alarm, because hon. Gentlemen would say "You admit the principle, and yet you shrink from carrying it out. We thank you for the principle, but we spurn your provisions. By passing this Bill you will give us a ground of vantage, and will show to Ireland that you are endeavouring, by a worthless concession, to satisfy an agitation which you will thereby only feed and excite." No doubt, hon. Gentleman who favoured the tenant right movement would use this argument. The Bill would not satisfy them, and this concession would give them a stronger ground for carrying out those ultimate objects which were so subversive of the real prosperity of Ireland. Of late years the whole tendency of events, even the misfortune and calamities which Ireland had undergone, had tended to remove the differences which existed between the two countries and to bring them into closer connection. A wise legislation would encourage and assist these processes, and endeavour to unite the two countries still more closely by similar interests and similar laws; but the Bill aimed at the very reverse of all this. If it passed there would be a broad distinction between the mode in which Irish and English tenants were dealt with. He, therefore, objected to the measure as uncalled for and mischievous, as likely to promote agitation, instead of appeasing it, and he should feel it his duty to move that it be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now" and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. MAGUIRE: Sir, the House has listened to the hon. Baronet with that attention which his ability always commands; still I cannot help saying that I have never heard a stranger speech or a more unaccountable Motion than that which he has delivered and proposed. What the real object of his notice of Motion is, I really do not know, unless it be that he wished to have an opportunity of stating his views and opinions at considerable length, not only for the advantage of this House, but of the country at large. Sir, it is my duty to refute some of the statements and assumptions of the hon. Baronet; and I shall also endeavour to show the House that it would act wisely, not only in adopting the principle of the Bill now before it, but in making it better and more useful for the classes for whose advantage it is intended, and thus laying the broad foundation of the future prosperity of Ireland, and cementing between the two nations those bonds of amity and union, without which England is not and cannot be really strong or powerful. It is also my duty to show that Ireland is not so happy and prosperous as the hon. Baronet described her to be, and that the state of things in that country is not so balmy and delightful as it was his object to make us believe it to be, from the picture which he has so glowingly painted. The objections of the hon. Baronet to the first part of the Bill, indeed to two parts of the Bill, refer entirely to their details, and not to their principle. But there was an objection as to the structure of the Bill, and the variety of subjects which it embraces. Now, I cannot see the force of the objection that the Bill is divided into three parts, and that it deals with different interests; for, after all, no matter in what manner they are described, all these different branches are of the same question, and refer to the same subject,—they are all intimately identified with the one ostensible object of the Bill, the improvement of the soil and agriculture of Ireland. So that I cannot agree with the hon. Baronet in condemning the Government for having treated the interests of different classes—limited owners, inheritors, and tenants at lease and at will—in the same measure. Besides, were they treated of in distinct Bills, one Bill only might be passed, and that the least important, while the more important measure might be sacrificed to the discussions on the other. In as far as the hon. Baronet's objections mainly apply to the machinery and details of the Bill, I would avail myself of the stereotyped answer given on such occasions, which answer is in this case founded in justice, and ask the hon. Baronet to support the second reading, and then in Committee seek to improve the details, and make perfect the machinery—in which task, no doubt, he would be supported by a majority of the House. The hon. Baronet strongly objects to referring matters of such grave moment as those connected with property and land to the Chairmen of Quarter Sessions, or Assistant Barristers, as we are in the habit of calling them in Ireland. But here again is a mere question of detail; and if the hon. Baronet will only attend when the Bill is in Committee, he may propose, that an appeal should be given to the Judge of Assize in cases where serious controversy should arise, or he may endeavour to limit the value of the interests to be entrusted to the jurisdiction of Chairmen of Quarter Sessions. However, I can assure the hon. Baronet that those officials, whom he seems rather to think lightly of, are generally not only men of great eminence in the legal profession, but that many of them are large owners of property, and that all of them are more or less imbued with strong landlord sympathies, and respect for what are termed the rights of property. At the same time they are just and upright men, and, though their sympathies, interests and feelings are not identified with the tenant class, I firmly believe they would hold the scales of justice evenly, no matter whether those who appealed to their tribunal were clad in broadcloth or in frieze. The hon. Baronet gives us his idea of the real cause of the misery of Ireland—the misery which, he asserts, is entirely of the past, but which, according to him, has no existence whatever in the present day. Before he does so, however, he cleverly seeks to damage and discredit the authority of the Report of the Devon Commission. But is there any man pretending to the character of a statesman who is not prepared to rely on the authority of that Commission and its Report? No matter what Government happened to be in power since the publication of that grave document, they have successively relied upon it as their chief justification for dealing with the question of the tenure of land in Ireland. The hon. Baronet is entirely wrong in saying that the Commission was a mere advertisement for grievances, and that it reflected only one phase of society in Ireland. On the contrary, eminent landowners, agents of extensive estates, men in high position and entirely impartial, came before that Commission and gave their evidence; and not merely tenant farmers who had wrongs and grievances to expose, and who would perhaps naturally give exaggerated pictures, the result perhaps of their individual miseries and oppressions. Having done his best to discredit the authority of the Report of the Devon Commissioners, the hon. Baronet then places all the evils of Ireland to the credit of long leases. No doubt such leases as created the system of middlemen were a great evil, and had acted injuriously on the country; but that system has been utterly swept away; and what we now seek for, are not leases under which tenants may divide and subdivide the land, but improvement leases, for the encouragement and protection of intelligent and industrious tenants, and for the better cultivation of the soil. The Devon Commission did not lay the misery of Ireland to the score of long leases; and in order to show the hon. Baronet and the House the real cause of the evil which existed, and which I assert still exists, I will quote a passage or two from the digest of their Report. The chief reason assigned is that farmers would not invest their capital in the improvement of the soil, because, from the want of legal security, they were not certain of reaping a remunerative profit from their investment. Here, Sir, in the following passage is a cause very different from that assigned by the hon. Baronet:—

"It has been shown that the master evil, poverty, proceeds from the fact of occupiers of land withholding the investment of labour and capital from the ample and profitable field for it that lies within their reach on the farms they occupy; that this hesitation is attributable to a reasonable disinclination to invest capital or labour on the property of others, without a security that adequate remuneration shall be derived from the investment; that no such security at present exists in regard to the vast masses of cases, including tenancies from year to year and leases with short unexpired terms; that the characteristic tillage of the country is most barbarous and unprofitable, &c., &c."

After describing the evils resulting from this fatal system, the writer thus continues:—

"No effort is made by the farmer—1st. Because he is not certain of being permitted to reap a remunerative benefit from his exertions; 2nd. Because, if a tenant-at-will, he may be immediately removed from the improved lands after having invested his labour or capital without receiving any compensation for what he has done, or his rent may be immediately raised to the full value of the improvement thus effected by such labour or capital; 3rd. Because, if a tenant with a lease, the unexpired period of his term may be insufficient to remunerate him, and at its termination he may either be removed, without receiving the balance of his investment, or his rent may be raised so as to deprive him of the power to repay himself from the lands."

These extracts show most clearly that the reason why the tenant did not expend his labour and capital on the land—in other words, in improving his dwelling and his out-offices, and in developing the capabilities of the soil—was, that he did not know when he might be removed, or his rent raised to the full value of his own improvements. The Government have been blamed by the hon. Baronet for having by this Bill attempted to establish one system of laws for Ireland and another for England; but neither this Government nor any other Government is answerable to the charge of having proposed or created a difference in the legislation of the two countries. It is the different practice which prevails in both countries which has made the difference; and legislation only seeks to deal with the state of things which it finds to exist. The fact is, Irish landlords are very different, as a class, from English landlords. The latter, as a rule, do everything for the tenant; the former, with a comparatively few exceptions, do nothing for him. In Ireland, the tenant builds, drains, fences, reclaims bog; and it is his hardy labour that climbs the mountain side, and changes sterility into bloom and beauty. No doubt, there are improving landlords in Ireland, men who delight in seeing their tenantry respectable and comfortable, and who, having means at their disposal, accumulated perhaps during their minority, build houses for their tenantry, and assist them to make permanent and beneficial improvements on and in the soil. It is also true that some Irish landlords, who have resided in England for some time, have imitated the example of their English friends on their estates at home. But these cases, however numerous they may be, are after all mere exceptions to the general rule, which is, as I have said, that in Ireland it is the tenant who does everything, and not the landlord. This being so, nothing could be more monstrous or absurd than any attempt to apply the same principles to both countries. The hon. Baronet has drawn a bright and glowing picture of the present state of Ireland. I wish I could believe that the picture was a faithful one; but I regret, as an Irishman, to be compelled to express my doubts of its accuracy. And I hope that Irish Members, for the sake of a momentary object, will not be led to represent their country otherwise than it really is. Can any Irishman in this House assert that his country is so prosperous that no cause for regret is left? Is there no misery, no poverty, no oppression, no discontent? Was it last year, or was it the year before, that an hon. Member, now a Member of the Government, moved for an inquiry into the state of Donegal? That inquiry took place, and disclosed such an abominable state of things, existing in an extensive district, as one could hardly imagine to exist except in a state of society almost savage. One witness in the landlord interest—a plump, rosy, well-fed doctor—actually came forward to prove that seaweed and bad potatoes were the most nutritious food for the people—that seaweed was an admirable article of diet for the independent and sturdy yeomanry of Donegal! In many parts of the country there is still great misery among the people, though I cannot deny that, taking the state of Ireland generally, considerable progress has been made within recent years. There does not exist that grim and terrible poverty of the famine period, when thousands and hundreds of thousands of the people literally rotted away from hunger; but what I do assert is this—that, with all the evidences of a better state of things, there is no comparison between the condition of Ireland and the condition of England. The hon. Baronet is in the habit of visiting the south coast of Ireland once a year, seeing his agent, drawing his rents, and off again: but if he would leave his yacht in Cork Harbour or Valencia Harbour this summer, and make a tour through the south—through Cork and Kerry—I venture to say he will have a different tale to tell when he next rises to address the House on this Question. Where in Ireland are the comfortable homesteads, the substantial out-offices, the advanced tillage and scientific treatment of the soil, which meet the eye everywhere in this country? In Ireland, the English traveller beholds bad cultivation, rude implements of husbandry, and houses in which, it may be said of too many of them, an Englishman would scarcely wish to put a dog. Not to say anything of the millions of acres of waste land, there are to be seen large portions of the soil, within the limits and boundaries of farms, almost in a state of nature, and left to remain in that condition, to the injury of the tenant, the landlord, the community, the country, and the empire at large. Now, these things, which make an Irishman ashamed, do not proceed so much from the poverty of the people, as from their disinclination to invest their capital in substantial and permanent improvements, because of the small security which they have of ever being able to obtain a return from them in case of eviction. Of course, there are many instances where tenants have built for themselves, or their landlords have built for them, commodious dwellings and sufficient out-offices; but, as a rule, the state of things which I describe too generally exists to this day. There are in Ireland as noble specimens of the landlord class as any country can boast of; but there are, unfortunately, unscrupulous, tyrannical, political, and foolish landlords as well; and the greater part of this class require the constant prick, not of conscience, but of a strict law, to keep them right. Legislation is not required for the good—they are good without it; it is for those who are inclined to act unfairly or foolishly, that, for the interests of the country, legislation is necessary. For instance, a tenant may improve; but if an election come, and he is moved by a strong sense of right to vote against his landlord, what security has he that he will be allowed the benefits of his improvements?—what security has he that he may not be summarily evicted from his farm? How is it that so few Irish Members have raised their voices in favour of reform? Because they know that, to the great mass of farmers, those who hold from year to year, and who are, therefore, entirely dependent on the will of their landlord, the franchise, so far from being an advantage, is a positive curse. It is a notorious fact, that if a candidate at an Irish election have the landlords with him, he is pretty sure of his return; but, if he happen to have them against him, the most desperate efforts must be made to counteract their enormous power. Tenants from year to year, on whom the burden of the cultivation and improvement of the land rests almost entirely, are afraid to improve; for they know they may be turned out at a moment's notice. In his speech the Secretary for Ireland stated that evictions had fallen off last year to 2,500. Surely that number was more than sufficient. It is no proof of prosperity and happiness that so many families were compelled to abandon their only means of livelihood. I object to the material portion of the present Bill, because it does not provide that sufficient protection for the industrious tenant, which the circumstances of the country imperatively demand. I admit that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) is anxious to serve Ireland; still I cannot help regretting that the Attorney General had not more to do with the Bill—for he knows the wants of the country, and what would really promote its prosperity; and he cannot be satisfied with the measure as it now stands, or believe that it meets the necessity of the case. The great foundation of the social fabric in Ireland is the farming interest, represented by the occupiers of the land; and, if their condition be benefited, if their farms be improved, the estates on which they live must be improved, and the position of the owner must be improved; and while the happiness and prosperity of Ireland is secured, England is enriched, and the empire is strengthened. At first, according to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, if a tenant-at-will applied to his landlord for leave to improve, and if the landlord refused, that refusal terminated the tenancy. That most absurd and fatal proposition does not appear on the face of the present Bill; but the Bill now provides that if the landlord refuse to allow the tenant to improve, he must not do so. I ask the Government, is that the way to improve the condition of Ireland?—is that the manner in which the energy and industry of the occupiers are to be stimulated and encouraged? On the contrary. Ought not the object of legislation be to give every man who is willing to improve his holding, by the sweat of his brow and the outlay of his capital, the fullest opportunity for the exercise of his energy and industry; and in the event of his tenancy terminating, ought not the tenant have a claim for full and fair compensation—provided that his improvements were suitable to the holding, and calculated to raise its letting value? If a man build a good house on his farm, or erect suitable offices, or reclaim bog or waste land, he injures no human being thereby; but he benefits himself and the estate, he improves the condition of the landlord, and he gives an impetus to various branches of industry in the village near him. To render the Bill really suitable to the emergency, the veto of the landlord should not be a bar to improvement. If the landlord will improve, let it be so; but if he will not or cannot himself make the required improvement, do not allow him to prevent the tenant from doing so. Bid him stand out of the way, and not be a barrier to progress and prosperity. Then, as to the nature of the compensation given where improvements are made with the sanction of the landlord, it is utterly inadequate. For instance, after twenty-five years' occupation of a house which the tenant has built, he is not entitled to any allowance whatever. Would any Gentleman present build a house on such terms? Would he consider that the occupation of it for twenty-five years was quite sufficient return for his outlay? Surely not. Hear what the Devon Commissioners say on this subject:—

“If the full value of the land be paid by a tenant, where new buildings are required, and that no deduction or allowance be made to supply the means for erecting such buildings out of the proceeds from such lands, or out of the proprietor's funds, it appears reasonable to adopt the suggestion of a large class of witnesses, who recommend that the tenant who builds at his own cost should be repaid, on removal from his farm, the value of such buildings in their then existing state, limiting, however, the class and cost of buildings and the consequent claim of the tenant with strict reference to the size and description of the farm or holding; and this latter restriction in Ireland would require much caution and forethought.

“The broad principle here is, that the farmer must be supplied with all those essential matters which his enterprise absolutely requires, and that this must be furnished out of the proceeds of the land.”

The hon. Baronet was perfectly correct in his anticipation when he predicted that my hon. Friends would desire more than the Bill proposes to give. It is our duty to demand all that we can or ought obtain for those we represent; and we, therefore, vote for the Second Reading, in order to afford ourselves an opportunity of endeavouring to make the Bill better in Committee. We are accused of wishing to deny, or rather not enjoy, the tide of prosperity which, according to the hon. Baronet, is now flooding our country. Why, Sir, we would be the first to rejoice at the prosperity of our country, and the happiness of our people; but we are here to speak, and not to disguise, the truth. I ask the House, I ask the Government, if Ireland is so happy and contented as she is stated to be, why has the Government refused to entrust the people of that country with arms at this moment? I ask, why are they not called on to arm, as the people of this country? The truth must be told—because it is well known that a large class of the people are discontented, and not happy and prosperous as represented. But, Sir, it is not too late to effect a change; wise and generous legislation, given with kindly and noble words uttered by Parliament, would work a magical effect on a sensitive, a warm-hearted, and a grateful population. I demand an earnest and an honest legislation for Ireland, not merely in the interest of Ireland, but for the peace and happiness of the empire at large. God knows I look with the gloomiest apprehension to what I believe is looming in the future; and it is for the welfare of all the interests that this House holds most dear, as well as for those which I represent, that I implore the Government to improve and pass the present Bill, and to give other remedial and conciliatory measures to the people of Ireland. I ask this House, is it a sign of prosperity that the Irish race are leaving the land of their birth, and that the stream of emigration is deepening and widening in its current and in its volume? The bone and sinew of the land are being wafted across the Atlantic to add to the population and strengthen the power of America. That would be a fearful day for England if America, losing sight of her cotton interest, came into collision with her—with the strong Irish element against her; for every Irishman who leaves these shores carries with him an abiding sense of wrong, that rankles into hatred in his breast against England and English institutions. This may seem exaggerated language; but I have seen letters written by those who have been driven to the United States, either by the pressure of adversity, by the action of oppression, or by a love of adventure; and they breathed a feeling of hate and vengeance which no language could exaggerate. I desire to give our people a stake in their country—something that they could defend, something to bind them to the soil. The population of Ireland are now as a ship riding at single anchor, awaiting the first favourable wind to unfurl its sails, and seek a distant shore. I want to retain what we still have left to us after famine, death, and emigration; and while I believe that nothing would tend so much on the one hand to give a further impulse to that which needs no additional impulse, I believe, on the other, that a liberal Bill would have a tendency to check what I hold to be a ruinous draining of the strength of a nation. I honestly desire that you will now try and make the people of Ireland—those whom we can still call our own—prosperous, independent, and happy, the friends of peace, law, and order; and, Sir, the statesman who will effect this, by wise and liberal legislation, will prove himself the greatest benefactor that country has ever possessed.

MR. GEORGE said, that if anything could have induced him to oppose the second reading of this Bill it would be the speech just delivered by the hon. Member for Dungarvan. He thought the time had gone by when the House of Commons was to be treated to a tirade of abuse against the landlords of Ireland. The hon. Member had given play to the fancies of his brain, and gloated over the imaginary wrongs of his country. The hon. Member had painted miseries which had no existence. He possessed as much experience as the hon. Member; he was continually travelling in Ireland—north, south, east, and west—and he must conscientiously say that the statements of the honourable Member were exaggerated, if not entirely unfounded. He begged to remind the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland of his solemn declaration that it was not the intention of the Government to affect the rights of the landlords of Ireland, or to lend themselves to the subversion of the rights of property. He regretted to hear the right hon. Gentleman state that one rule was to be observed in Ireland, and another rule in England—and that that which was done by usage and good feeling in England must be done by law in Ireland. To speak of the Devon Commission as a criterion of the state of Ireland at the present day was a great solecism. That Commission was issued in 1845, and the witnesses who were examined before it were such only as had grievances to dilate upon and expose. The state of Ireland in 1845 and in 1860 was as different as the state of the desert and the most blooming garden. At that time there were misery and woe in the country. It was on the very eve of that fearful famine which began in 1846, and continued for years afterwards. What was the fact now? How changed was the country from what it was? That very morning a Statistical Return had been delivered to hon. Members, in which he found some facts that bore upon the question before them. He found that, in 1849, four years after the date of the Devon Commission, the number of paupers in Ireland, including the out-door recipients of relief, amounted to 620,747, whilst at that moment they were only 44,929. But it was not alone in the physical aspect of the people that there had been improvements. Their moral status had infinitely changed; and in the next column of the same Return he found that, whilst in 1849 the convictions in Ireland were 21,202, in 1859 they were but 2,735; that in 1849 the acquittals were 20,767, and in 1859, 3,109. He thought, then, he was justified in saying that both in a moral and physical aspect the situation of the Irish people since the date of the Devon Commission had greatly improved, and that the Report of the Commissioners was no guide to the present condition of Ireland. It was notorious, unhappily, that in the same period the population had seriously decreased; that owing to the famine and its attendant evils, and the emigration which succeeded, it had been reduced from 8,000,000 to 6,000,000, though, perhaps, 5,000,000 was nearer the correct amount. There was another circumstance that was worthy of notice. By the operation of what had been the Encumbered Estates Court, and which was now known as the Landed Estates Court, no less than £25,000,000 of property had changed hands in that country, and he believed that considerably more than £20,000,000 of property had, by investment of Irish capital, been transferred to the hands of the Irish people. In many instances farmers had become proprietors, and the difference in the aspect of the country concurrent with that change was remarked by every traveller. Allusion had been made to the decrease in cereal crops; and he thought that might be accounted for to a certain extent by the enormous diminution in the population, which had led, of course, to a scarcity of and an enhanced value for labour—a circumstance that had induced many farmers who used formerly to indulge a little too much in tillage crops to resort to grazing, in which they had been further encouraged by the high price which butter had realized in the market. At the time of the Devon Commission too the number of small holdings in Ireland was 691,000; but that amount had fallen off in 1851, when the last census was taken, to 113,222. These facts he had mentioned in order to show the House that the Devon Commission was no criterion to go by, because the state of the country then and now was totally different. The whole system of labour in Ireland—the agriculture, the habits, and manners of the people, had become more and more assimilated to those of England; and so far from endeavouring to draw a line, that there might be one usage in England and a strict and obligatory law in the sister country, he believed that the anxious desire of every Government ought to be to increase as rapidly and as completely as possible that assimilation of the two countries which consisted in an identity of interests, rights and privileges, burdens and obligations. That that principle was not thoroughly recognized was, however, proved by the fact that there were upon the Paper that evening five Bills which had exclusive reference to Ireland. With regard to the Bill now before the House he could not concur in the definition of a limited owner, as contained in it; nor did he think that the provisions as to leasing powers were so good or so clear as those of a leasing powers Bill which had already passed the House of Lords. He strongly objected to the large powers which were by this Bill to be transferred to the Judges of local Courts in Ireland. The extent of the facilities which a tenant for life would enjoy of burdening the inheritance as against his successor was also a point to which he was opposed. In the name of “improvements” by the limited owner and his tenants a sum might be raised which would diminish the value of an estate of £1,000 a year by £400 per annum. Having repeatedly expressed himself in favour of a settlement of the landlord and tenant question he should vote for the second reading of the Bill, without however pledging himself to those details of which he disapproved.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he would support the Bill as likely to give considerable satisfaction in Ireland. He firmly believed that this Bill would be the means of effecting a great deal of improvement in the relations of landlord and tenant. In answer to the objection that this Bill would give a tenant for life great opportunities of burdening the estate, he could say that a similar provision was in operation in Scotland, which had been attended with no ill results. Considering the great increase of emigration that was going on in Ireland, and the progress of agriculture in that country, he thought they were particularly bound to consider and settle this question at the present moment.

MR. DAWSON said, he also should give his support to this Bill. He had not heard the speech of the Secretary for Ireland in introducing the measure, but he was surprised on reading it to find the name of Mr. Sharman Crawford, who had brought the question forward in 1835, when he sat for an English constituency, omitted from the list of those who had assisted in the legislation upon this subject. In the Bill before the House he recognized a fair and just measure, and one that contained within itself the elements out of which a satisfactory settlement of this question might be effected. The circumstances of Ireland were such that the capital as well as the industry of the tenant was required for the proper cultivation of the land, and tenants were therefore entitled to fair compensation for the improvements they had made whenever their tenure was altered or terminated. He rejoiced that it was proposed to extend the powers of landlords to grant leases, and he should hail the disenthralment of the soil from various feudal restrictions by which it was still bound. The press of Ireland had declared that the Bill would become a dead letter, and certainly the measure did not create any enthusiasm in the northern counties of that country; but he trusted that the present offer to set at rest this long-vexed question would not be rejected, and that, stripped of all illusory enactments, this Bill would soon be enrolled in our statute book.

THE O'DONOGHUE then moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY appealed to the hon. Baronet (Sir J. Walsh) to withdraw his Amendment, and allow the Bill to be read the second time. In Committee they would see whether they could not make a good Bill out of it. The provisions respecting tenant's improvement formed the only part of the measure that he cared a farthing about. The rest was all "bosh." The machinery of the Bill required remodelling.

MR. WHITESIDE said, the hon. Member for Cork had adduced the best argument for agreeing to the adjournment. That hon. Gentleman had alleged that two-thirds of this measure were, as he had classically phrased it, "bosh," and the remaining third impracticable. For himself he desired to see the question settled; but having served a long apprenticeship to it he was convinced that this Bill never would settle it. Dealing as the measure did with the real property of the country, it ought not to be passed without the fullest consideration. The hon. Member for Cork, in his oratorical excitement the other evening, said he would prefer a bad law for both countries to a good law for Ireland and a different one for England. Now, he took exactly the opposite view, and wished to have a good law for Ireland, which was at the same time not very dissimilar from the law in England.

MR. CARDWELL said, he had no wish to stand in the way of an adjournment if such were the wish of the House. He had no doubt the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside) when he had the opportunity, would state all the objections he could urge against the Bill; and, on the other hand, he believed he should be able to show sufficient reasons why it should be sent to the other House with every prospect of successful enactment this Session.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. DEASY said, he rose to move the second reading of this measure. [Cries of "Adjourn."] He hoped he should be allowed to proceed with the second reading of this Bill. It was merely a measure of law reform which all sides of the House consented to, and his object in moving the second reading was to advance it a stage. It was a Bill for consolidating the existing law of landlord and tenant in Ireland, and was principally taken from the Bill of the late Lord Chancellor for Ireland (Mr. Napier). It repealed partially or wholly fifty-five Acts of Parliament. The principal Amendments in the law it proposed to introduce were these. It made the relations between landlord and tenant a matter of contract. It proposed to restrict the power of distraining for rent for one year, and to provide that all receipts should specify the date for which they were given, and that in the absence of date the receipt should be held to apply to the last rent due. It proposed to give remedies against waste. It proposed to extend the right of ejectment for non-payment of rent to yearly tenancies; but so that the tenant should, on payment of rent, get back his land; and it proposed to extend the jurisdiction of the Civil Bill Courts from £50 to £100. These were the principal provisions of the Bill. He would most gladly receive suggestions as to its Amendment, from any quarter. The Bill involved no social changes, but, as he had said, it was simply a measure of law reform.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that it was true that the clauses of the Bill were similar to that which had been introduced some years ago; but there was this difference, that neither the law of distress nor the law of fixtures had been dealt with. The Bill he had prepared was, no doubt, a better Bill than that introduced some years ago, and the law of distress was dealt with. It had been thoroughly revised and reprinted, and he would compare it with the Bill now introduced, and on a future occasion submit it to the House.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he must protest against the Bill being now read a second time. It was a very long Bill, and required great consideration.

LORD FERMOY said, he was of opinion that if this Bill was not read a second time, they would never get on with their legislation. It appeared to him that there was nothing in the Bill that would press heavily on any tenant who was desirous of paying his rent and managing his farm properly. The details could be more maturely considered when the Bill got into Committee. At the same time, he should be very glad to see the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman opposite dealing with the law of distress introduced. The two Bills might be considered together, and, if necessary, referred to a Select Committee.

MR. HASSARD said, he also should support the second reading of the Bill. The measure of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Whiteside) was not the objectionable Bill before referred to; but the one which had been privately printed and circulated, and was a measure he should be glad to see introduced and considered with the present Bill.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for Monday next.

LAND IMPROVEMENT (IRELAND) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said he rose to order. It was the rule of the House that a Bill should not be brought in on the same subject twice in one Session. He was informed by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Pollard-Urquhart) that this Bill was identical with one on the same subject which the House had rejected in March last. It was now brought in under another name.

MR. SPEAKER said, if the Bill was the same in substance, it was undoubtedly the rule of the House that it could not again be introduced, and the order must be discharged. But the fact must be ascertained.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON remarked, that independent of this objection this was a Bill to which the greatest objections existed on other grounds.

MR. HENNESSY said, the noble Lord had given him no notice of the course he had intended to pursue, and had moreover spoken in the absence of the hon. Member for Westmeath. If the order for the Second Reading were postponed till Thursday, he should be prepared to say what the Bill was.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday.

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock.

ANNUITY-TAX ABOLITION (EDINBURGH) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved the second reading of this Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. HADFIELD said, he rose to express his very great surprise that a measure such as that proposed should have been brought forward, after the assurances which were given last year that they would have a perfect and satisfactory settlement of this long-vexed question. So far from the Bill being a relief to the people of Edinburgh it seemed to him that it would impose a permanent tax upon them. It provided that the tax should be continued for fifteen years for the purpose of forming an accumulated fund to be applied to the support of certain of the clergy, but the Bill contained a further provision that if, at the expiration of the fifteen years, the requisite sum of money was not raised, the tax should be continued. Was that a satisfactory settlement of a long-vexed question, which had led to outrage and violence being committed, and in some cases the military even had to be called out? Meetings of inhabitants had been held to protest against this Bill. It was only so late as Monday last that resolutions had been adopted by the magistrates of Edinburgh entirely disapproving of the Bill. He was greatly astonished to find the hon. Member for Edinburgh, (Mr. Black) a gentleman whom he had always taken for a staunch voluntary in favour of this Bill—indeed he had hesitated to believe it was really the case until the hon. Gentleman rose and acknowledged it in his place. He advocated the voluntary principle, and to show the value of this principle, he need only mention that the members of the Free Church in Scotland had raised amongst themselves, for purposes of their own religious progress and instruction, a sum of money amounting to about four millions within the last sixteen or seventeen years. He stood there solely upon his rights as a member of the British community, and as a Member of Parliament, and he objected to perpetuate a tax upon any people for the purpose of maintaining any system of religious instruction of which they disapproved. Was the Ministers' tax in Ireland compounded for, or did the people listen to anything like a compromise? No; but they had persevered in a plain, positive, and direct principle, and the consequence was that the tax was abolished altogether. He could not allow a Measure so completely at variance with Nonconformist principles to pass without entering his decided protest against it, and he should feel it his duty to take the sense of the House upon it. He, therefore, begged leave to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

MR. PADMORE seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. CAIRD said, he wished to explain the reason why he had withdrawn his opposition to the Bill. It was simply because the Lord Advocate had intimated that the most objectionable part of the Bill, to which the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) had referred, would be withdrawn by him in Committee; namely, the provision of an accumulating fund. That was a principle so objectionable that the whole of the people of Edinburgh raised their voice against it. Nearly all the public bodies had sent petitions to that House against it, and he had presented petitions himself, signed by 15,000 inhabitants of Edinburgh, against that principle. But that principle the Lord Advocate had signified his intention to withdraw, and he (Mr. Caird), in the exercise of his judgment, thought he might be promoting a settlement of this question by not opposing the second reading. The Bill contained many objectionable points; but he hoped when the House went into Committee they would obtain such a modification of those parts of the Bill which were now deemed objectionable, as would give satisfaction. In the first place, he thought that the establishment of an Ecclesiastical Commission, in a Presbyterian country, was a very objectionable step, and he trusted the Lord Advocate would reconsider whether some method more in accordance with their views in Scotland could not be adopted. He thought it would fare better with the Church in Edinburgh if it threw itself more on the goodwill and the voluntary efforts of its own people than it had shown a disposition to do. Not only the example of the Free Church, but the remarkable results that had attended the efforts of Professor Robertson in the Established Church, who had succeeded in raising near a quarter of a million of money, and in building more than 250 churches by voluntary contributions, showed that the Church of Scotland need fear no injury from relying on the good-will of its members. Under the circumstances he should not offer any opposition to the second reading of the Bill.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, it was a noteworthy circumstance that, so far, the only hon. Member who had opposed the Bill was unconnected with Scotland in any way whatever. The reasons on which that hon. Member (Mr. Hadfield) had based his opposition to the measure might be urged with equal force against the maintenance of an Established Church in England. It was impossible, while recognizing the principle that an Established Church was to be maintained, to do more than was done in this Bill to lighten the burden which the maintenance of the Church involved; and, therefore, it was that he supported the Bill. The hon. Member had taunted the Lord Advocate with having abandoned the voluntary principles he professed in framing this measure; but any one acquainted with the learned Lord, and with the subject on which the House was now asked to legislate, would perceive that that taunt was wholly unfounded. His noble Friend was, in fact, endeavouring to lighten the taxation of the people of Edinburgh, and still to maintain at the same time the privileges of the established clergy in that city; and the temperate and conciliatory character of his Bill derived additional confirmation from the circumstance that the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Caird) had withdrawn his opposition to it. The hon. Member for Sheffield had grounded his objection to the continuance of the provision for the established clergy in Edinburgh on the attendance at two churches there—the Canon-gate and the Tolbooth; but he (Sir James Fergusson) submitted that it was altogether unjust to take the amount of money collected in seat-rents in any church in a poor district as a test of the efficiency of a church establishment; for it was precisely in a poor district that there was the greater need for the Church being supported by the State. Besides, the poverty of attendants at the churches referred to was easily explained—it was entirely owing to the manner in which the patronage was exercised. He believed the present incumbents were forced on the respective congregations against their expressed wishes. The hon. Member had also said the Lord Advocate had rejected every suggestion for a compromise which had been offered to him. He (Sir James Fergusson) would rather say that the Town Council of Edinburgh had rejected every compromise that had been offered by the Lord Advocate. He believed that this measure was altogether one of compromise.

Sir James Fergusson

It was a compromise to those who objected to the maintenance of a church establishment by endeavouring to terminate, after a certain number of years, that which they regarded as an obnoxious impost. The learned Lord had conciliated the Church, inasmuch as he had recognized the duty of the community of Edinburgh to support the established clergy, and the Church, too, had shown an earnest desire to effect a compromise of the matter, by consenting to a reduction of the present number of the clergy in that city from eighteen to thirteen. The hon. Member had likewise talked of this being a new tax; but it would be needless to show that it was a very old one, and one which it was the duty of the City of Edinburgh to pay. It was, however, by the Bill under consideration to be a lighter and a terminable tax. The learned Lord, in truth, in his anxiety to secure a compromise of this vexed question, had done everything short of stripping the clergy of their means of subsistence. But when he proposed a permanent tax, the Town Council objected to its permanency; and when he spoke of a temporary tax, then straightway they were in favour of a permanent one. How was it possible to deal with people who acted thus? He (Sir James Fergusson) admitted there were objections to be taken to the Bill. It proposed, for instance, to reduce the number of the clergy; and he thought if such a proposal were made with respect to the clergy of the Established Church in London it would be met with a storm of disapprobation. It was certainly a strange course to take where the community was increasing and multiplying, especially in the poorer districts. It was a mistake to say that the Church of Scotland had agreed to any such reduction of the number of its ministers. Even in the presbytery of Edinburgh there was considerable difference of opinion upon that point. He thought it would be satisfactory to the House if the hon. Member for Sheffield were to withdraw his Motion, seeing that the hon. Member was opposed to those with whom he generally acted in the House, and especially to those hon. Members who were chiefly interested in this question.

MR. MACKIE said, he hoped the Amendment would be withdrawn, and the Bill be allowed to pass, as he believed it would go far to heal a religious sore of long standing in Edinburgh. As proofs of the strong feeling of hostility with which the annuity-tax was regarded in that city, he might state that during the last two years no less than 112 summonses had been issued against persons for refusing to pay it, and that on a recent trial a jury had refused to convict in a case where it was shown that the accused had interfered to prevent the execution of a warrant issued to compel payment of the impost. He did not, however, sympathize with the persons who had refused to pay, for he held that no man had a right to set himself above the law, and that so long as it continued to be a law it was the duty of every lover of order to obey.

MR. BLACK, after referring to the numerous attempts which had been made without success to obtain a settlement of this exceedingly disagreeable question, said, I last year introduced a Bill which was founded on principles which, I believe, were congenial to the spirit of the Christian religion; and because I support the Bill of my right hon. Friend I am now charged by the hon. Member for Sheffield with having departed from the principles I have always professed. I must remind him that in my Bill of last year, which was supported by the Nonconformists generally, I provided that the eighteen ministers of Edinburgh should have a vested interest in their stipends during their whole life; and the tax was therefore continued, not for fifteen, but for more than twice fifteen years before it would cease. It is questionable whether the burden upon the citizens would have been greater by it or by this upon the principle of a terminating tax. As far as the removal of the burden of the tax is concerned, it is only provided for by a different process, and this Bill, I hope, will receive the early sanction of Parliament, while the other might have continued the struggle and the strife for many years. On the first reading of the present Bill, I must confess I did not receive it with favour, because at the first it did not appear to me to accomplish the object aimed at, and perhaps I had some little partial affection for my own progeny. Upon duly considering, however, the great responsibility that lies on me as a representative of the City of Edinburgh, I felt that if on personal consideration, or on account of my own peculiar denominational views, I were to be accessory to frustrating a measure which would have a tendency to alleviate the burdens of my constituents, which would promote peace and remove a great scandal from religion, I should be pursuing a most unjustifiable course. I am, as is generally known, a Dissenter. I approve most heartily of the voluntary principle. But I have not been sent into this House merely to support any denominational views which I hold. I stand here as the representative of the City of Edinburgh, and feel bound to promote the best interests of that community by every means in my power. With that view, I have been led to believe that this measure afforded a basis on which we might come to a satisfactory settlement of the question. I must acknowledge that in coming to that conclusion I did not secure the approbation of a great many who formerly supported me. On the contrary, I experienced a considerable amount of obloquy and opposition. My learned Colleague and myself were assailed by a certain portion of our constituents in no very measured terms for bringing in and supporting this Bill. We thought it best to face our opponents, and took advantage of the Easter recess to meet them fairly, and discuss the question with them, and they at length acceded to what I consider to be the essential principle of the Bill. And it will be seen that the meeting unanimously acquiesced in the proposition that there should be ultimately thirteen ministers, and that the city should provide £600 a year, with undoubted security, for each of them. This is the essence of the Bill, which I consider my right hon. Colleague and myself bound to maintain, and rather than depart from what I consider the terms of agreement, to withdraw the Bill. Another part of the Resolutions agreed to by the meeting, referred to the question whether the tax should be continued at a higher rate for fifteen years and then ceases, or that the rate should be small but permanent; the meeting, and I believe the majority of the inhabitants, prefer the smaller rate, though it should be a permanent burden. I do not agree with them. I think the tax so objectionable that I should like to have the prospect of its speedy and total abolition; but as one great object of this Bill is to promote peace, I don't think it would be prudent to provoke agitation by thwarting them in the mode of providing for the clergy; and whether we approve of this mode or not, I feel bound to submit to the general decision, though I do so with regret, as I consider it a much greater violation of principle than the plan originally proposed in this Bill. Allow me here to say that an unfair representation was made to some Members of this House on this subject, and it is but right to undeceive them. It was said that this Bill proposed to lay a tax on the present generation, to accumulate a fund to provide for the clergy, and to relieve future generations from the tax. That was all a mistake. The fact is, this Bill did not propose to add a farthing to the taxation, but to give a certain amount of relief for fifteen years, and then to abolish it altogether. If this Bill does not pass, the tax will be heavier than the income tax so much complained of; and if it had passed, as originally proposed, it would have been at once reduced, and in fifteen years abolished. However, since the people will have it reduced, and permanent at 4*d.* or 3*d.*, they should have it so. There is only one other question on which there may be some difference, that is the value of the seat-rents; but that may be left for calculation and adjustment in Committee, along with other details, which I will not detain the House by alluding to at this stage. This question is complicated by a variety of circumstances—first, in regard to the locality affected by the tax. Sometimes, when the City of Edinburgh is spoken of, it is supposed to mean the large community of 170,000 inhabitants, and sometimes the ancient royalty of 66,000; in the same way as the City of London sometimes means the old city within the walls, and sometimes the whole community of three millions. I mention this, because the eighteen ministers and fifteen churches are sometimes supposed to be appointed to the whole Parliamentary boundaries; whereas they resemble the cluster of ill-attended churches within the ancient City of London; of which common sense says some should be removed from where they are not wanted to districts where they are wanted. Then it should be observed, that the burden of all these ministers and churches is laid exclusively upon the royalty, containing about 66,000 inhabitants; not one-fourth of whom belong to the Established Church; and those who live beyond the line of the royalty, have, if they choose, the benefit of ministrations paid for by others. Again, there has been another anomaly in the case. The lawyers, a numerous and the most wealthy class, have been exempted from the payment of the tax. I am happy, however, to say they have now agreed to waive the privilege which they have too long enjoyed, to enable the plan proposed by this Bill to be carried out, although a considerable minority object to the arrangement. Again, the seat-rents, which are really ecclesiastical funds, are the property of the Corporation, who were at the expense of building the churches; and to complicate this still further, these seat-rents are pledged as a security for payment of the city debt. This Bill proposes to make an equitable adjustment of all these complicated incidents. But there is another material point to be considered in our case. All these ministers were appointed by us, or by our representatives, under certain conditions, so they have a claim upon us, which we cannot ignore; and we are bound in honour to fulfil our obligations. The scheme, to be justly appreciated, should be viewed as a whole. To take one part of it, and distort and exaggerate it is only to alarm the timid and inconsiderate, and to prevent the settlement of a difficult question. The Bill proposes a compromise among all parties, on what I conceive to be equitable principles between the inhabitants of the royalty, the inhabitants beyond the royalty, the members of the College of Justice, and the Church. This compromise should be carried out honestly upon an understood basis; the agreement being that the number of ministers be reduced as vacancies occur to thirteen, and that the City shall secure a stipend of £600 a year to each minister. I must here glance at one clause of the Bill, which provides that £1,500 shall be taken from the police funds for the purposes of the arrangement. I am prepared to hear that this is to extend a portion of the tax for support of the Church over districts which were exempted by law from this impost. Now, this Bill does no such thing;—it only provides that the extramural districts shall pay their just debts in bearing a small share—indeed, a smaller share than they ought to pay, for municipal expenses incurred for their behoof. The seat-rents of the churches, which are the property of the ancient city, were expended for the general purposes of the municipality; it is one of the objects of this Bill to apply these ecclesiastical revenues to their legitimate use—consequently to reduce the income of the Corporation by so much. It is therefore necessary and just that the districts which till now took the property of the City to pay for their expenses, shall henceforth bear their own burdens. The opposition to these propositions has been aggravated by the feud which has long raged between the Dissenters and the Establishment. The Dissenters, formerly a minority, now number at least two-thirds of the population, and the grievance of the Annuity-tax has been to them a powerful lever with which they have operated against the Church; some of them would prefer carrying on the war against the clergy, and hope, by increased resistance, to abolish the tax by force. But I am not disposed to carry on the war. I want to have peace among all sects and parties, and the time seems favourable. I believe the world is growing wiser when the very clergy begin to be reasonable. The clergy are disposed to concede, the members of the College of Justice have agreed to surrender their exemptions, Leith has withdrawn its opposition, and the citizens are offered a great diminution of taxation: and should the citizens reject this compromise, the conflict may be continued for many years, during which they would have to pay a tax of 10½d. instead of 4d. or 3d., and at last they may not be able to make so favourable a compromise as is now offered. As long as the clergy refused to make any advances towards conciliation, and the College of Justice insisted on retaining their exclusive privileges, the inhabitants of the royalty carried the sympathies of the public with them; but if these advances towards conciliation are rejected by them, and the war is carried on with increased rancour, they will lose the sympathies of the public, the tax will be rigidly exacted, and all chance of a favourable compromise may be lost. I gave this warning to the citizens, and I would give a similar warning to the friends of the Establishment, if this compromise is prevented by their obstinacy, then, as the fault will be theirs, the danger to the Church will be increased. I am prepared to hear great objections to the reduction of the number of the City clergy, and that the quarter of the town where these are situated requires the superintendence of even more than at present minister in that district, and that provision should be made for the great extension of the town. Now, it should be borne in mind that the population cannot increase in that quarter any more than the population of London within the old walls can increase in the old town. The merchants are converting the houses into warerooms. I was myself guilty of evicting about a hundred of the most vicious of our population, and pulling down all the houses in the closes, and converting them into warehouses; and a new street is at present being made from the High Street to the railway station, which has caused the removal of a great many of the houses of the district, so that all this talk about providing for the extension of the town, and the necessity of maintaining such a staff of ministers, is mere moonshine. In the year 1841, Mr. Abercromby, then Speaker of this House, writing on this subject to the Town Council, says:—

“The question with regard to the number of the City clergy in Edinburgh may give rise to considerable diversity of opinion. I am decidedly of opinion that the number ought as occasion offers by the death of present incumbents to be reduced to thirteen. It is not contended by the Presbytery of Edinburgh, as I hear, that the collegiate charges should be continued. . . . If there had been only thirteen clergymen in Edinburgh, would the Presbytery have ventured to propose that an addition of five should be made to the number? I assert, with confidence, that no such proposition would have been made. I compare the provision made for the religious instruction of the population of the royalty with that made for the population of St. Cuthbert's, the different districts of Glasgow, of Paisley, and other places; and I find that it is much larger, with thirteen ministers, than in any of those important towns.

The fact is, the Establishment is encumbered by a superabundance of ministers and churches in the ancient royalty. There is not population to fill them, and when they are only a half or a fourth filled it is like a wet blanket thrown upon both minister and people. It would be wise to reduce the number and increase the ardour of both. A late excellent minister in one of these churches, with a considerable dash of humour in his composition, in a speech before the Presbytery when complaining of the inappropriate positions he had been placed in, compared his congregation to Æneas' fleet after the storm—Rari nantes in gurgite vasto. Now, what are the facts of the case? In the ancient royalty there are ten churches and twelve ministers, and the population is 30,857—the great bulk of them Dissenters. I have here the last statement of the City churches, from which I could have shown how miserably they are occupied; but I will not weary the House by referring to it. Hoping that in Committee we shall be able to adjust the details to the satisfaction of all parties, I should be very unwilling to lose the present opportunity of getting rid of one of the most fruitful sources of bitterness and strife and outrage; and trusting that this measure, if it become law, will tend to maintain peace and goodwill among the friends of the Church, the Dissenters, and the citizens of all classes, I cordially support the Bill.

MAJOR W. F. HAMILTON said, he wished to remind hon. Members that this Bill might prove in future a precedent for further legislation, and therefore demanded the serious consideration of English as well as Scotch Members. An hon. Member opposite had spoken of the scandal and disgrace of levying a tax upon persons who had conscientious objections to the payment of it. He (Major Hamilton) had conscientious objections to the payment of the 10*d.* income tax; but would the hon. Gentleman withdraw his support from the Government because it imposed that tax in opposition to his conscience? The annuity tax was the result of a bargain, and a bargain which they were bound to maintain. It was a bargain for value received, there was a quid pro quo, and the City of Edinburgh bound itself to a perpetual payment of the tax. If the Bill abolished the tax without injury to the interests of those whom they were bound to protect he would give it his support; but if it passed through Committee without sufficiently guarding their interests, he would oppose it on the third reading. In the meantime he would not oppose the second reading of the Bill.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that, although the measure might not go the full length which some hon. Gentlemen desired, it nevertheless offered a compromise. For the first time in the history of Scotland, a disposition was shown by the Established Church to make a concession upon that most important question, and it was, therefore, an occasion on which some concession ought to be made upon the other side. He hoped, therefore, that the hon. Member would not persist in his Amendment.

MR. BLACKBURN said, it appeared to him that the Church of Scotland made the great concession in accepting that measure. The sum to which it was at present legally entitled was over £13,000 a year, and the sum it had actually received of late years was £9,600 a year; but under the Bill it would only obtain a sum which, including the seat-rents, would at most amount to £5,800 a year. Yet the Church, for the sake of peace and quietness, was willing to make the sacrifice. But he did not think it was desirable to bind the Church down to reduce the number of churches within the city. The House ought to leave it to the Church to distribute the money in such manner as might seem desirable. He thought it questionable whether the patronage ought to be left in the hands of the Town Council. He hoped some Amendments in the measure would take place in Committee.

MR. MURE said, he hoped the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hadfield) would pause before he divided the House upon the Bill. The hon. Gentleman had said the Bill proposed to levy a heavy tax upon the people of Edinburgh for fifteen years. But that was not the case. The Bill did not impose any additional tax upon those who were now liable to the impost. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Black) in deeming the proposed perpetual tax as extremely impolitic; but seeing that the people of Scotland offered no objection to the principle of the measure, it ought to be allowed to pass unanimously. He thought there were clauses which might be amended in Committee, and especially if the tax of 4*d.* was to be made perpetual it should not be levied on occupiers, but on proprietors. He wished also to see provision made for the maintenance of some of the charges in the poorer districts of the city. He should give his cordial support to the second reading, reserving all objections for the Committee.

THE LORD ADVOCATE: It is certainly very gratifying to me, and ought, I think, to be very instructive to the hon. Member for Sheffield, that not a single representative of a Scotch constituency has objected to the second reading of this Bill. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accordingly not press his Amendment to a division—seeing that, whatever alterations he is desirous of making in it, there is a general feeling in favour of its principle among the representatives of Scotland. Under these circumstances, I shall not occupy the time of the House in answering objections which have not been made, but shall content myself with giving an explanation of what I propose to do in Committee. It is quite true that the Bill as it stands proposes to continue the collection of the existing tax for a period of fifteen years from the ratepayers who are at present liable, and from the members of the College of Justice, to whom its application is to be extended, in order to accumulate a fund by which a permanent endowment for the clergy may be secured. It is, however, altogether a mistake to suppose that this accumulation would be derived from the tax. It would be derived from the concession on the part of the clergy of the City of Edinburgh of a considerable portion of that to which they are now by law entitled, and from the reduction in their number, to which they are also willing to consent. It has been represented to me by a portion of the community of Edinburgh, and by the Town Council of that city, that they would prefer a reduced burden as a permanency to the continuance of the present rate for fifteen years, with the final abolition of the tax at the end of that period. I conceive that that is a matter wholly immaterial to the interests of the clergy. Whether they are to receive the interest on the sum of £120,000 in perpetuity, or whether they are to receive the capital sum within a limited period, is a question which does not affect the interests of the clergy; but I own I did think it material to the interests of the City of Edinburgh. And my own opinion was and is that the proposition of the Bill was the fairer and more advantageous of the two. I was the more encouraged to think so, because in 1857 I introduced a measure for the purpose of abolishing the annuity tax which was practically the same in principle as that now before the House. I proposed in that Bill to continue the tax at the full rate of 10*d.* in the pound, and to form a fund for the endowment of fifteen ministers, and that Bill received the full concurrence of the Town Council. I am sorry to find that there is a general feeling of preference for a reduced permanent rate, and cannot help thinking that the persons who entertain it most strongly have failed to consider the matter so thoroughly and carefully as it requires. I am sorry, I say, to find there is a general feeling among the inhabitants of Edinburgh that a permanent tax on a reduced scale would be the better of the two propositions. But still, in 1853 I brought forward a measure, also with the full concurrence of the Town Council of that day, for the purpose of establishing a perpetual tax at a diminished rate—the rate being 6*d.* in the pound for a temporary period, and 5*d.* in perpetuity. I acknowledge, therefore, that I can state no objection to the principle of a permanent tax. On going into Committee on the present Bill, I shall therefore be prepared to bring forward clauses, the effect of which will be, instead of accumulating the £120,000 as a capital fund for the endowment of the clergy, to secure by a permanent rate the payment of thirteen ministers at the salary of £600 a year to each. I think I shall be able to do that, as far as security goes, in a way that will be perfectly satisfactory to the Church. On the matter of the security to be granted, it is right that I should state what I shall propose. I received in April a communication from the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, in which he made a proposition to me, which, if not exactly the same in point of amount as the one I am going to propose, was at least substantially the same in principle, as far as security was concerned. The Lord Provost wrote as follows:—

“If such a modification were proposed, I would propose to give the Church the best and the only security we have—a preferable security over all our rates, postponed only to the city creditors, and in the event of bankruptcy, the right to a separate rate, to provide the amount for which the city is liable. Under the obligation, we should require the imposition of a royalty rate, in order to meet the deficiency upon our other revenues, which these payments would require, or a larger rate at present, and a smaller one eventually.”

Now, I read that passage for the purpose of saying that if I propose a permanent, instead of a temporary rate, I shall certainly take care that the security to the clergy is as good as the town of Edinburgh can afford, and is placed in a position that will, as far as practicable, put it beyond the reach of agitation for the future. I certainly could never consent to adopt a permanent rate as the principle of the measure, unless it were made perfectly clear that the fund for paying the ministers would be a debt on the revenues of the town, and that the additional rate should not constitute a tax with which the clergy were brought into immediate connection, but simply a means by which the town should reimburse itself for payments made. This proposition has been made to me, and I am ready to act on it. It is quite true the question has been raised whether it is right to take the seat-rents at their present amount of £1,600 a year or at the prospective amount of £2,500. I have considered that question with all the attention I could bestow on it, and the conclusion I have arrived at is that the town have no right to require that the clergy shall be debited with a greater amount, in respect of seat-rents, than they at present yield to the town. I shall now say a few words as to one or two other points. The hon. Member for Stirlingshire (Mr. P. Blackburn) is under a misapprehension when he speaks of the suppression of the city charges. In point of fact they are not reduced. The Bill proceeds on the principle of providing only for thirteen ministers, as an equivalent for the Annuity tax, but the number of charges is left as it is, to be filled up by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, if they have funds for that purpose. There is another matter which I should like very much to introduce into the Bill, provided that I could do so—otherwise I would not think of doing it—with the general consent of the House. The House is well aware that the Town Council of Edinburgh received from the North British Railway Company, for the rebuilding of Trinity College Church, a sum of money which now amounts to about £20,000. I would propose that that money should be transferred to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners—that that body should be bound out of it to build a church, either now or at some postponed period, in accordance with the judgment of the Court of Session—that the balance of the fund should go to maintain the minister of Trinity College Church, until the number of charges has been reduced to thirteen—and that whatever may then be left should be handed over to the Commissioners to be applied to such ecclesiastical purposes as they may think fit. The effect of such an arrangement would be to confer a benefit both on the town and on the Church. The town would be immediately relieved from the burden of one of the supernumerary charges; and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would be put in possession of a considerable sum for the purposes of their trust. It is also deserving of consideration whether provision might not be made that the surplus fund should go to buy up the patronage of the town council. I cannot admit that the town council have done anything to forfeit their patronage. I have never thought so either as to the University or as to the Church. But at the same time, I think that if an arrangement could be made by which the patronage could be purchased, it would be desirable to do so. If the case of Edinburgh can be satisfactorily disposed of, there will be no difficulty, I hope, in meeting the cases of the Canongate and Montrose. I can only say, in conclusion, that it is to me a matter of heartfelt congratulation that this long-vexed question is now to be closed by an equitable and satisfactory adjustment.

MR HADFIELD said, he could not re-

The Free Advocate

the probable fate of that Bill in "another place." Her Majesty's Government had entered into treaty arrangements with the Government of the Emperor of the French with reference to certain Customs duties, and amongst those duties was included the Customs duty upon paper. The interest of the question which he wished to put would be evident when he read its terms. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman—in case the other House of Parliament insists upon maintaining the Excise Duty upon Paper, what will be the position of the question of the Import Duty on Foreign Paper, of which it is intended to propose the repeal?

YEOMANRY HORSE DUTY.

QUESTION.

MR. PEACOCKE said, he wished to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer the question of which he had given notice—Whether the Horse Duty will be allowed to the Yeomanry this year?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I believe it is customary with most men, when they have to deal with two points, to begin with the easier. I will therefore answer the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Peacocke) by informing him that, although the Yeomanry are not to be called out this year, according to the intention of the Government, the regular directions have been given for allowing them the exemption from the duty on Yeomanry horses, which is, I think, in accordance with obvious justice.

With respect to the question of the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), as it refers to a matter, which, of course, was under the consideration of the Government at the time the Treaty of Commerce with France was being negotiated, and as I learnt a few hours ago that the question was to be put, I sent for a copy of the Treaty with France, and I have no difficulty in giving an answer to the hon. Member, which embodies the opinion of the Government upon the effect of that article. I, of course, take no notice of those portions of the hon. Gentleman's questions, which appear to anticipate that the Bill for the repeal of the duty will probably be lost in "another place;" since that is an occurrence which it is not for me to anticipate. The Seventh Article of the Treaty commences thus:—

"Her Britannic Majesty promises to recommend to Parliament to admit into the United Kingdom merchandise imported from France, at a rate of duty equal to the Excise duty, which is or shall be imposed upon articles of the same description in the United Kingdom. At the same time, the duties chargeable on the importation of such merchandise, may be augmented by such a sum as shall be an equivalent for the expenses which the system of Excise may entail upon the British producer."

Sir, I do not understand the hon. Member to ask me what might be, or might not be, the obligations of England, according to the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, in the event of the repeal of the Excise duty upon paper; and, therefore, that matter I leave for the present altogether aside. But, the hon. Gentleman asks me the opinion of the Government upon the obligations of England, under the Treaty with France, and under the terms of the Address, by which each House of Parliament has bound itself to give effect to the Treaty, in case the Excise duty on paper should not be repealed. Well, Sir, I apprehend that is a question, upon which no person who has examined the Article I have quoted, can possibly entertain a moment's doubt. At any rate, Her Majesty's Government consider it to be a matter beyond all doubt, and beyond all argument or necessity for construction or interpretation; inasmuch as the words appear to be as plain as possible and directly applicable to the case. If there be a duty of Excise on paper, then, subject to a single condition, it is the obvious duty of England towards France, and of the Houses of Parliament, under the terms of their Address, to reduce the Customs' duty on foreign paper to the precise level of the Excise duty on paper made at home. The single condition, to which I refer is, that contained in the latter portion of the clause, which specifies that the duty chargeable on the import of such merchandise may be augmented by such a sum as shall be an equivalent for the expense which the system of Excise may entail upon the British producer. And that principle has been applied, in the course of the present Session, in conformity with the general spirit and express terms of the Treaty, to the case of spirits, where the regulations of the Excise are so restrictive in various particulars, that they entail disadvantages upon the producer, that are capable of being stated in money. And a compensation for these disadvantages, in the shape of what the French call a surtaxe, has been added to the import duty chargeable on foreign spirits. But, with respect to the duty on paper, whatever may be its effect in restricting trade—which is not now a matter of discussion—no one has ever alleged that it imposes disadvantages on the manufacture of paper of such a definite nature, or such an amount as to be capable of being stated in the form of a certain rate of money. No claim of such a character has ever been made, or could be made. The inconveniences, whatever they are, to the actual manufacturer of the article which we call paper, are not so appreciable or palpable, as to be capable of being reduced to such a form. There will, therefore, be no case for a surtax like that imposed in the case of spirits, and, therefore, I presume that in such a contingency as that to which the hon. Gentleman has adverted—and which again I decline to accept or to suppose possible—my hon. Friend the Member for Herts (Mr. Puller) will withdraw, or cease to persevere, with the Motion of which he has given notice.

INSURRECTION IN SICILY.—SUBSCRIPTIONS FOR GARIBALDI.

OBSERVATIONS.

Mr. HENNESSY said, he rose pursuant to notice to call the attention of the House to the Statement by the Solicitor General with reference to an advertisement in The Times newspaper for raising money to assist the insurgents in Sicily, and to call attention to a decision of the Court of Common Pleas as to the illegality of such a proceeding. He was induced to bring the question before the House in consequence of the reply given by the hon. and learned Solicitor General on the previous Friday night to a question put to him by an hon. Gentleman who was a supporter of the Government (Mr. Grant Duff). His (Mr. Hennessy's) opinion as to the state of the law might be of little weight, but the opinion of the hon. and learned Gentleman had attracted great attention, not only from his official position in that House, but also because he held a distinguished position as a lawyer. It would, perhaps, be convenient if he recalled the attention of the House to the circumstances under which the question was put. The attention of the hon. and learned Gentleman was called in this House to an advertisement which had appeared in The Times, relative to the collection of funds to promote the insurrection in Sicily. The hon. Member (Mr. Grant Duff) who introduced the subject frankly owned he wished success to the revolt, and hoped that, spreading into the main land,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

"Independence requires revolution and war. All considerations as to progress of knowledge, civilization, industry, riches, and public property must be put aside."

He spoke of Christianity thus:—

"The fatal plant born in Judea—that error which has taken root among men—has only reached its high point of growth because it was invigorated with waves of blood. But a new era will soon begin for men, the glorious era of a redemption, very different from that of Christ."

The despotic tendency of Italian liberalism he thus indicated:—

"We do not want a popular assembly, fluctuating, uncertain, and slow to deliberate; we want a hand of iron to rule a people hitherto accustomed to differences of opinion, and enervated by slavery."

Such were the words of the compatriot of Garibaldi. [Cries of "Date!"] The proclamation of Ricciardi, from which he had quoted, was issued in 1848. [A laugh.] The other companion of Garibaldi was the equally well-known Zambianchi, of whom some account would be found in a work with which a right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) was well acquainted—Farini's Stato Romano. In that work it was recorded that in 1849 Zambianchi had gathered together all the priests in San Carlino, and there slaughtered them. He was well-known in Italy by the title of the "Priest Slaughterer," and was a prominent member of the society known as the "League of Blood." He wished also to direct their attention to the antecedents of Garibaldi himself. A correspondence took place last summer between two noble Lords as to General Garibaldi. In communicating with one of them on this subject he (Mr. Hennessy) called his attention to the character of the secret society of which Garibaldi, as a member, had taken the oaths, and his letter was published in some of the continental papers. It attracted the attention of a distinguished diplomatist employed by Her Majesty, who wrote to him to say he was very much struck by the rules of that society, as they completely confirmed the impression he had previously formed, and to ask permission to make use of his letter as an authority in "another place." Of course that permission was given at once. He would read to the House some of the rules of the society in question:—

"Members who will not obey the orders of the secret society, or who unveil the mysteries, shall be poniarded without remission." "Each secret tribunal is competent not only to judge guilty adepts, but to put to death all persons whom it shall devote to death." "If the victim succeed in escaping he shall be pursued incessantly in every place, and the guilty shall be struck, were he sheltered on the bosom of his mother, or in the tabernacle of Christ."

Few persons were aware of the extent to which these secret societies prevailed in Italy, or the nature of the oaths which they imposed on members. The rules he had quoted would give the House some idea of their character. He would proceed however to call the attention of the House to the opinion given by the hon. and learned Gentleman on the subject of the subscriptions. His statement had attracted much attention on the Continent. In The Times of the 15th inst. appeared a letter from a correspondent at Turin, who wrote thus:—

"The late debate in the English Parliament respecting subscriptions opened in England for the avowed purpose of aiding Garibaldi's expedition, will go far, I have no doubt, towards reassuring the King's Ministers here, who thought themselves gravely compromised by the indulgence extended to some of the Sicilian sympathizers, who collected money for Garibaldi here. The position of Sardinia, however, differs in some degree from that of the British Empire, and the Italian proverb says 'the same offence brings one man to the throne, and another to the scaffold.'"

Almost every paper in France, in Italy, and generally throughout Europe had published the opinion on this question given by one of the chief law advisers of the Crown. He would like to ask the hon. and learned Gentlemen himself whether he had not received intimations from subjects of the Queen in this country calling attention to the fact that they had been solicited to subscribe in aid of the Italian insurgents, and requesting him to institute a prosecution against those who thus violated the law. When he ventured the other evening to question the soundness of the opinion given by the hon. and learned Gentleman, he was only able to cite from memory a certain common law case in which an important decision had been given. This was a question, however, which depended, not merely on the common law of England, but also on international law. And he maintained that both by the common law of England and by international law, as understood in every State in Europe, and in every century of civilization, such a proceeding as that which one of the law advisers of the Crown had declared to be legal, was distinctly condemned as a violation of the law. He would first address himself to the common law of this country. They were fortunately in possession of a decision on the subject by the Court of Common Pleas—a very thoughtful and deliberate decision, given by one of the most eminent Judges who ever sat upon the bench. In the year 1824 a case came on for trial before Chief Justice Best, in which the question arose whether a certain engagement to raise money was valid or not. The Chief Justice laid down the law that the engagement being to raise money to promote insurrection against a Government in amity with our own was null and void, and subsequently, on a Motion for a new trial in the full Court, and giving the unanimous judgment of the Court, he said :—

“ It occurred to me at the trial that it was contrary to the law of nations, which in all cases of international law is adopted into the municipal code of every civilized country, for persons in England to enter into engagements to raise money to support the subjects of a Government in amity with our own in hostilities against their Government ; and on further consideration I think that my opinion at the trial was right, and on that ground that we ought not to grant a new trial.”

The force of this decision would be understood by every hon. Member of the House. It at once declared that the act set forth and described in the advertisement in The Times was illegal according to the common law of England. He might, perhaps, be allowed to say a word upon the general question of international law and policy. He should quote the opinion of a learned Gentleman, once a Member of the House, whose authority would be admitted. Mr. Phillimore, in his Commentaries on International Law, said :—

“ A State is prima facie responsible for whatever is done within its jurisdiction. A body politic is responsible for the acts of individuals which are acts of actual or meditated hostility towards a nation with which the Government of these subjects professes to maintain relations of friendship or neutrality.”

He had a higher authority, however, than Mr. Phillimore—that of a gentleman who, he trusted, would take part in this debate—the present learned Attorney General himself. On February 19, 1858, on the second reading of the Conspiracy Bill, the hon. and learned Gentleman laid down the general principle :—

“ It is undoubtedly a principle of our law that whatever tends to interrupt the amity of the Sovereign with a foreign Power in alliance with our Sovereign is an offence, to use the language of some of the older statutes of our country, against the amity of the Crown.”—[3 Hansard, cxlviii. p. 1824.]

Mr. Hennessy

Another Member of Her Majesty's Government gave his opinion upon the subject in 1851. Dealing with a question closely resembling the present, the then Home Secretary, Sir George Grey, said—

“ I shall not be contradicted by any legal authority in this House when I say that foreigners adopting any measure with the view of levying war against any foreign country with which this country is at amity are guilty of an offence at common law, and are punishable on conviction by fine and imprisonment.”

At the time of the Conspiracy Bill, as well as he remembered, a distinction was drawn between foreigners and subjects of the Queen. It was alleged by the noble Lord at the head of the Government that the subjects of the Queen could be punished for certain offences, but that foreigners residing here could not be punished for those offences. The question which they were now considering was, whether an act in which both subjects and foreigners residing here had taken part was illegal, and therefore the authorities which he had read were much stronger than on the occasion to which he had referred. There remained a still higher authority—he believed he might say the highest living authority in this country—Lord Lyndhurst. It was a remarkable fact that a circumstance very similar to this occurred in the year 1851, and Lord Lyndhurst, in calling attention to the advertisement of the Central National Italian Committee for obtaining funds to raise insurrection in Italy, said—

“ Now, it is quite obvious, my Lords, that this is a breach of the implied engagement which those persons entered into when they came to this country to seek the protection of our laws, and I am sure your Lordships will join with me in reprehending such conduct in the strongest possible terms. My Lords, I am not so weak as to suppose for one moment that much money will be raised in this country by a body of this description. People are much more ready to throw up their caps and shout in favour of liberty, equality, and fraternity, than to lay down their money for such objects.”—[3 Hansard, cxv. 623.]

Fortunately, at that time Lord Lyndhurst's question was not addressed to a Member of Her Majesty's Government, whose sympathies with the Italian cause made him for the moment forget the common law of England, and Lord Grey, who replied to Lord Lyndhurst, used these remarkable words :—

“ Her Majesty's Government disapprove of any such proceedings as strongly as the noble and learned Lord himself, and to the full extent of the authority invested in them by the constitution and the law they would discourage and discountenance all such proceedings."

The effect of that debate in the House of Lords was that proceedings ceased, the advertisement was withdrawn, and the Central Italian Committee to promote insurrection was not heard of again until within the last few months. He might content himself with making this statement; but he felt that the present question was really connected with some others which had lately engaged the attention of the House. He felt that it was above all connected with certain despatches which the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary had thought fit to address to the Court of Naples; that it was very intimately connected with the attitude of the Emperor of the French, and the territorial changes which were taking place or impending in Europe; and, with the utmost respect, he would ask the House, on whose opinion the public opinion of Europe had so often relied, carefully to consider before they endorsed the insurrectionary spirit which he was sorry to say pervaded a certain portion of the English public, and before they encouraged the filibustering expedition of Garibaldi. Some time ago it was made a reproach to our friends across the Atlantic that they encouraged filibustering expeditions, and the American Government was called upon by more than one of the European Governments to explain their conduct. They repudiated those expeditions; but now, for the first time, one of the oldest established Governments of Europe—an old monarchy—actually came forward to sanction, almost to enforce, a filibustering expedition. There was a time when the foreign policy of England was not associated with revolutionists. There was a time when it was directed to maintain legitimate order, to uphold dynasties, and to promote the cause of civilization in Europe, and not to promote, as it now seemed, not only the cause of revolution and anarchy, but, as he thought he had indicated, the cause of assassination and outrage. He begged to apologize to the House, and particularly to the Solicitor General, for having presumed to call his attention to a point of law, and he assured them that in doing so no one knew better than he did himself how very poor his opinion must be.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: Probably before this discussion proceeds further, it may be thought desirable that I should now state to the House, what was the real purport of the answer which I gave to the question put to me on Friday night last. I thought, at the time, that it was desirable I should be very careful and precise, and I endeavoured to be so. I prescribed strict limits to myself, but I see by the Report, with which I find no fault, that, especially if my answer be read disconnected from the question, what I said may tend to mislead. With the permission of the House, therefore, I will, as on that occasion, refer to the important words of the question. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Grant Duff) gave notice of his intention to ask me, whether my attention had been called to an advertisement, which appeared in the The Times of Wednesday, the 9th of May, announcing that a subscription had been opened in London in aid of the Sicilians; and whether persons, in this country, who contributed to the fund which it was proposed to raise, would render themselves liable to any legal proceedings. I intended to give a precise answer to that question. I understood—as I think every one would understand, and as I presume the hon. Gentleman who put the question intended by the words with which it concluded—by "legal proceedings," proceedings in a criminal court, by way of indictment. I considered the question I was answering to be simply whether a person who should read this advertisement, and in his own mind approve the result to which it points, and, acting singly and individually, pay money into the hands of any one of the recipients named—aye or no, is he liable to be indicted at common law for a misdemeanour. My opinion was, and is, that he is not. I am not prepared to say that upon a matter like this, which is not of frequent occurrence, that is an opinion in which, without being limited and guarded, every lawyer in this House will concur; but I take upon myself the answer which I then gave, in the sense and with the intention I have explained. I will state, in a few words, the reasons for my view; but I must previously express a hope that the hon. Member (Mr. Hennesy) will excuse me if I decline to follow him into some of the topics to which he has thought fit to advert. It is not for me to defend Garibaldi, or any person who may be engaged with him, in any part of Italy, in any act of insurrection. All I have to deal with is the dry point of law, and the propriety of the answer which I gave the other night. I repeat that my real intention in giving that answer was to express my opinion that an individual who by himself, of his own free will, paid a subscription of this sort, would not, by the mere simple fact of his subscribing, render himself liable to an indictment at common law. The question is whether that would be an indictable act. I am not prepared to question the doctrine—though the point is a very different one from that which the hon. Gentleman has brought before the House—that persons engaged in a conspiracy to foment, or excite, insurrection in the States of a friendly Power, would be liable to prosecution. The hon. Gentleman has stated that noble Lords and persons of high authority have laid it down that such a conspiracy may be dealt with criminally as a misdemeanour, and the persons engaging in it visited with fine and imprisonment. So far from taking exception to that doctrine, I will quote a passage from a speech of Lord Lyndhurst on this point. The noble and learned Lord said, on the 4th of March, 1853:—

“If a number of British subjects were to combine and conspire together to excite revolt among the inhabitants of a friendly State—of a State united in alliance with us—and these persons, in pursuance of that conspiracy, were to issue manifestoes and proclamations for the purpose of carrying that object into effect; above all, if they were to subscribe money for the purpose of purchasing arms to give effect to that intended enterprise, I conceive, and I state with confidence, that such persons would be guilty of a misdemeanour, and liable to suffer punishment by the laws of this country, inasmuch as their conduct would tend to embroil the two countries together, to lead to remonstrances by the one with the other, and ultimately, it might be, to war.”—[3 Hansard, cxxiv., 1047.]

I find no fault with that proposition, but every lawyer is aware of the extreme difficulty of bringing the provisions of the criminal law to bear on such a case; indeed, we had not long ago a proof, in the case of Dr. Bernard, of the extreme difficulty of applying the common law—assuming it to be the law—against persons conspiring in this country to forward some act that was to take place in a foreign country. In justice to myself, I must repeat that I expressed an opinion, the other night, only on the particular case which was put to me. No person has asked me what would be the condition of persons forming themselves into a Committee, for the purpose of exciting or supporting an insurrection in a foreign friendly State. I gave no opinion as to what might be the position of persons causing the insertion of these advertisements in the newspapers, or of the publishers of the newspapers themselves; much less did I take upon myself to express any opinion as to what might be the consequences, penal or otherwise, of a conspiracy such as was referred to in the debate in the Lords. With this limitation, I still hold, and I repeat the opinion which I expressed the other night. The Foreign Enlistment Act does not touch the case of subscriptions; but there is the strongest evidence in that Act of the insufficiency of the common law of this country to deal with offences of this description. The preamble of the Act runs thus:—

“Whereas the enlistment or engagement of His Majesty’s subjects to serve in war in foreign service without His Majesty’s licence, and the fitting out and equipping and arming of vessels without His Majesty’s licence for warlike operations on or against the dominions of any foreign Prince, State, &c., or against the ships, goods, or merchandise of any foreign Prince, &c., as aforesaid, may endanger the peace and welfare of the kingdom; and whereas the laws in force are not sufficiently effectual for preventing the same—”

It does not give a penal character to offences in violation of its enactments beyond the terms of the common law; it makes the offences, which arise from such a violation, misdemeanour, and misdemeanour only; and therefore there is in it the strongest evidence of the insufficiency, in a general way, of the common law doctrine of misdemeanour to reach these cases. My attention has been called by the hon. Gentleman to a case decided in the Court of Common Pleas, and from some general observations made in that case—more in the way of dicta than decisions on any particular point—he has inferred that the act of subscription would, according to the authority of the Court of Common Pleas, amount to an indictable offence. Upon that point I am entirely at issue with the hon. Gentleman. I do not deny that, in the case of a foreign loan attempted to be raised here, for the purpose of fomenting an insurrection in a foreign country in amity with us, the Court of Common Pleas, in an action on the contract, has held that the contract could not be enforced, being tainted with the character of illegality. But every lawyer knows that illegality is one thing, and criminality another. Every lawyer knows that contracts are perpetually brought before the Courts, either to have their performance enforced, or to recover damages for a breach of them, with regard to which the Courts decide that fulfilment cannot be compelled, nor damages recovered, and yet no one would say that the persons engaging in them were liable to an indictment. The law holds a variety of contracts to be void, such, for instance, as contracts for the price of obscene and immoral books or prints, contracts prejudicial to the public revenue, against the policy of the bankruptcy and insolvency laws, contracts affecting the course of public justice, and others; in all these cases there is an illegality in one sense, and such an illegality as to prevent the Courts of law enforcing the contract, but there is not in them what I will call criminality. If a person, who had received subscriptions for the purpose of an undertaking of this kind, were to turn round and say, "I shall not apply them to the purposes indicated. I shall give them, instead, to this, that, or the other Prince or potentate," and the subscribers were to bring their actions, the Courts might say that, though there was no criminality in the contract, it was so far tainted with illegality, so much against the policy and spirit of the law, that damages for a breach of it could not be enforced. When the matter is really understood, it will be found, I apprehend, that there is no great difference between the authorities cited by the hon. Gentleman and myself; and, with the limitation of the doctrine of conspiracy to which I have adverted, I adhere to the opinion which I gave the other night.

MR. WHITESIDE: If, Sir, the answer given to the House the other night by the hon. and learned Gentleman, has, by means of the electric telegraph, created some confusion abroad, I think I can undertake to say that the speech which he has just made, if transmitted in the same way, will not be productive of much alarm, as I rather think it will not be understood. In the words of the old couplet,—

"He darkens by elucidation,
And mystifies by explanation."

I am utterly at a loss to know what the hon. and learned Gentleman really thinks upon this matter, which is one of great importance to the peace of Europe, and to the estimation in which this country is to be held abroad. When he sat down I was more in the dark even than when he got up to understand what are his views upon this grave question of international law. The question is this:—An advertisement appeared in the papers referring to a committee of individuals who had joined themselves together for the purpose—whether laudable or not this is not the place to discuss—of collecting and conveying subscriptions to those persons who are now in insurrection against their Sovereign, the King of Naples in Sicily. That is a fact which it is beyond the hon. and learned Gentleman's powers of explanation to mystify. I understand that the learned Gentleman was asked, in reference to that advertisement, whether it was legal for a body of persons so to join themselves together in this country, and whether it was legal for persons to subscribe according to the requisition of that advertisement, for the purposes therein stated. I understand him to have stated that, in his opinion, it was. Forthwith his reply is flashed over Europe, and is quoted in the Sardinian Parliament. It has been taken up as an exposition of international law, that the more friendly you appear to be to a particular Sovereign, the more actively you may engage in compassing his destruction; and therefore, if to-morrow an advertisement were to appear from certain exiles in some journal, referring to a committee for regulating the affairs of France, and calling on persons to give in their subscriptions for the purpose of restoring the Orleans family, and de-throning the French Emperor, we should be told in the same way that such a proposition was legal. To do justice to the Solicitor General—not that I understand it—the distinction which he drew was this: If an individual pays his money, it may be misapplied; but, as it would be opposed to the principles of morality, to sanction a legal investigation as to whether the money was applied in disposing of the Sovereign for whose destruction, according to the terms of the advertisement, it was specifically to be applied, therefore, he says, an individual may lawfully subscribe. I doubt it. The hon. and learned Gentleman was not asked by what means such a person was to be prosecuted, nor as to the form of the indictment—that was not the technical question which was put; but whether a man could lawfully subscribe in aid of the object, which persons forming themselves into a public body, had undertaken to accomplish. I say they can not.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: The question is, whether they would be liable to any legal proceeding.

MR. WHITESIDE: It is true the question is put in that form; but the hon. and learned Gentleman is not asked to specify what exact proceedings should be taken; and it is impossible to escape from the difficulty by reference to the case of an individual, because the very document shows that he is only one of a number. I cannot understand the distinction taken by the hon. Gentleman, when he puts the case of a person who is supposed to subscribe to a fund set on foot by a number, and at the same time to isolate himself from a conspiracy; or the case of a fund to which contributions are made by foreigners resident in this country. Nobody ever heard of a distinction drawn in such cases between foreigners residing here, and natives of this kingdom; all alike are subject to the laws of England. And if it be unlawful for a body of British subjects to form a committee to collect subscriptions, and to dethrone the Emperor of the French, it would be equally repugnant to international and positive law—by which I mean the common law of this country—for them to meet together and subscribe for the purpose of overthrowing any other Sovereign. The law of nations does not depend on the nature of any Government; it is immaterial to us whether the State be a Republic, or whether the Government be absolute or Parliamentary, as long as we are living at peace with it; and, for my part, I hope we shall live at peace with all Governments. States are bound to behave towards each other with scrupulous impartiality, and with the strictest good faith. And I know nothing more mischievous—though the occurrence was, I believe, accidental, and the hon. and learned Gentleman admits that his answer may have been misunderstood—than that any Member of the Government, even for the sake of a little temporary popularity, should have the appearance of connecting himself with such a prominent person as Garibaldi, and in the face of Europe to sanction proceedings, which international law disapproves. The hon. and learned Gentleman, when he refers to an opinion of Lord Lyndhurst, shows that he approves of it; and, I must say, that it is an opinion exactly applicable to the question before the House. The noble Lord there speaks of a committee formed for an illegal object; here are members of a public body presuming to assemble themselves together, and by means of advertisements inviting persons to subscribe, it being directly stipulated that the amount raised shall be sent to Garibaldi, to aid in overthrowing the Government of the King of the Two Sicilies. It has been spread all over Europe that, in the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, there is no illegality in such a proceeding. I venture, with all humility, to say that if such an opinion were inadvertently given, it is a mistake. No contributions to be collected through a body, of which, by his subscription, the person makes himself one—and therefore responsible for their acts—can be legal, or in accordance with constitutional law, when it is openly avowed that these contributions are sought for the purpose of overturning the Government of any Sovereign with whom we live on terms of amity and peace.

MR. EDWIN JAMES: Sir, I should not have said a word on this question if the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General had not cited as a precedent—or rather as an instance of the difficulty of convicting persons on a criminal charge of conspiring to commit offences against the laws of foreign countries—the case of Dr. Bernard. That case has nothing whatever to do with the matter we are now discussing. Dr. Bernard was not indicted for conspiracy at common law, but for an offence under a particular statute, and he was acquitted by a jury. Inasmuch as I was an advocate in that case, I shall refrain from stating any grounds of the acquittal but those which are publicly known. It was felt on that occasion that a statute had been perverted for the purpose of endeavouring, by the indictment of an individual, to relieve the Government from a political difficulty; and the jury were perfectly justified in the view which they took, because the Government were challenged to bring forward their legal arguments, and, those legal arguments being postponed, the defendant was acquitted on the facts of the case. Dr. Bernard was indicted, not for conspiracy at common law, as the hon. and learned Gentleman has told the House, but under a statute which every lawyer in Westminster Hall knew was framed and passed to meet an entirely different offence from that with which the prisoner was charged. And therefore, when the Solicitor General states the difficulty of convicting persons of conspiracy, his observation must be taken to apply to the evidence; and if this is a conspiracy—and I, as a lawyer, have no doubt that it is—the hon. and learned Gentleman, I think, will find grounds for reconsidering the hasty and immature opinion which he has given on this subject. What clearer evidence to insure conviction can you have of the overt acts of a conspiracy than the payment of money by one individual, and its receipt by another? If a committee advertise for subscriptions, they are surely supposed to be human beings congregated for the purposes of that subscription; and if a person pays to them a certain sum towards the object for which they have advertised, and they receive it, I want any lawyer to get up in this House and say what stronger evidence of overt acts can be afforded. The hon. and learned Gentleman, therefore, when he stated that persons under such circumstances were not liable to legal proceedings, answered, I think, a little off his guard, and gave rather a rash opinion. I deem it of great importance that this matter should be thoroughly understood on the Continent; and I feel that we are indebted to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the King's County for having brought it forward. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General has truly said that this is not as an offence against the Foreign Enlistment Act. It certainly is not. It has no more to do with it than with the Habeas Corpus Act; but there is a question to which the Foreign Enlistment Act does apply, and I ask the hon. and learned Member for the King's County to bring that forward on another occasion. I allude to circumstances to which the Foreign Enlistment Act expressly applies, to the case of parties who are now committing offences under that Act by carrying on the enlistment in Ireland of persons who are to be sent over to Rome, and there to join the army of General Lamoriciere. When the hon. and learned Member talks of the slaughter of priests, I think we may say with equal force that the transmission of recruits to swell the foreign army which is to take part in the massacre of the Pope's subjects, comes equally within the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: There should be no misunderstanding with regard to the principles by which every Government and every nation ought to be guided on subjects such as that now under consideration, and those principles I freely agree to be these:—You have no right whatever to interfere in the domestic affairs of another nation. That, unquestionably, is the rule of the common law, and the foundation of all legislation on the subject. If you wanted to exemplify this in your own history, the lecture which you read to the French king on the occasion of the revolt of your North American colonies would supply you with abundance both of principles and of reasoning. I quite agree, therefore, that, according to the common law of England, any subjects of the Queen who, either directly or indirectly, may supply money in aid of the revolt of subjects of any nation or Power with whom we are in alliance, commit an offence at common law. But, as I before had occasion to state, there is a very great difference and a long interval between the enunciation of that principle and the manner in which it is to be carried into execution. In proceedings of a criminal nature, or which are otherwise founded on any rule of common law, your only guide can be precedent and authority; and those hon. Members who speak most confidently on this branch of law would, I think, be quite unable to point out any case or decision in the books in which there has been any instance of a successful application of the general principle, in the shape of an indictment for this particular offence. That, however, is not exactly the point to which the attention of the House can be advantageously directed, although it was the precise point to which the remarks of my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General were directed by the very narrow and limited question which was put to him. When the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside) indulged himself in that ridicule in which he is so successful, both of the answer which was given, and of the explanation which has been afforded, I could heartily wish that the accuracy of the right hon. and learned Gentleman and his knowledge of the subject had been equal to his powers of speech. I certainly should advise him never again to indulge himself in his usual vein of ridicule until he has thoroughly ascertained the facts of the case on which he is speaking. Now, the question put to my hon. and learned Friend was simply this—Had the persons subscribing to this fund rendered themselves liable to legal proceedings? Could any one imagine that by "legal proceedings" it was meant could a civil action be brought against them? Could the legal proceedings mean anything but a criminal prosecution? The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone says the Members of the Committee are conspirators; and that any persons subscribing to the funds might be included in an accusation of conspiracy. I should have been glad if the hon. and learned Gentleman had condescended to mention some instances that would have justified this conclusion. I was very anxious to find one when the Conspiracy Bill was under consideration, but I did not succeed, although I found enunciations of the general principle in abundance. I cannot therefore think that my hon. and learned Friend spoke unadvisedly or rashly when he said there was no ground on which an indictment could be laid against persons contributing to these funds. At the same time, I should have been very glad if my hon. and learned Friend had accompanied his remarks with the general statement—as he would no doubt have done if his attention had been directed to it—that all these things are contrary to the policy of the law, the object of which is, above all, that the peace of the Crown should be preserved. The law, therefore, prohibits anything that may endanger the peace between the Sovereign of England and the Sovereign of another State. That great principle of the law must be accepted by every person; and the common law of England, although it may have provided no particular remedy, yet in conformity with general good faith and expediency, lays down in the strongest manner the principle that all subjects of the realm are bound to abstain from every interference that tends to excite the subjects of another country against its lawful authorities. What those authorities may be is not the question. It matters not that they may be cruel, or tyrannical; that is not the question. If the sovereign be in amity with this country, it would be wrong and illegal for any persons here to interfere with the affairs of his kingdom. An hon. Gentleman has said that the committee formed for the collection of those subscriptions is open to an indictment for conspiracy. I must, however, observe, that according to the papers, almost the whole of that committee is constituted of foreigners. Now, I do not mean to say that the principle of the law does not extend its prohibition to all persons who are permanently resident within this kingdom, and who owe allegiance to, as they receive protection from, the Crown; but I do not believe that that principle has ever been established upon authority, and I therefore warn the House against receiving with confidence the statement that there has been (as the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite seemed to say) a positive enunciation of the law to that extent. I confine myself solely to the question of the common law, which lays down the principle I have stated in the strongest possible form, and it is therefore the duty of the Government to take care that that law is not violated by any of the subjects of the realm.

The Attorney General

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: I think if the answer of the Solicitor General had been at the time accompanied by all the explanations, the comments, and, I may add, the solemn lecture just delivered by the Attorney General, that answer would have done very little harm; and, probably, there would have been no necessity to trouble the House again with a discussion on the subject. I entirely concur with one part of the speech of the hon. and learned Solicitor General that the importance of the question cannot be overrated. But there are two grounds which render accuracy in dealing with this question especially necessary. The first is the effect of inaccuracy on our relations with foreign Powers, which cannot fail to be seriously disturbed if a rash and inaccurate answer is spread abroad as having been given by the Government in this House. The other reason that renders accuracy of great consequence is this,—the law officers of the Crown know perfectly well that their answer will be read by foreigners in this country; and persons who are amenable to the law of the Queen, are likely to regulate their conduct by this statement of that law as given officially in this House. It would be much to be lamented, if, after an opinion had been given on the part of the Crown in the House of Commons, criminal proceedings should be taken against any persons for misdemeanour, and the persons indicted should be able to say they trusted to the opinion given by the legal advisers of the Crown as the true exposition of the law; and that when they acted in the manner complained of they thought they had competent authority for what they did. I think with the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone that the hon. Member for King's County (Mr. Hennessy) has done good service in bringing this subject forward. It has been reduced to the smallest possible compass by the definition of the law given by the Solicitor General. He admits the principle laid down by Lord Lyndhurst,—that if a course of united action is taken to effect an illegal purpose, by any number of persons, that amounts to a conspiracy, and all who take part in that action are liable to be indicted for the conspiracy. The question, then, is this:—Does a subscription to funds raised with the object of subverting the government of another State render the particular individual subscribing liable to indictment for conspiracy? The Attorney General wants an authority for such an indictment. I think the point is clear ; I think an illustration may be given, of which the House will see the force, and which does not require much legal acumen to appreciate. Suppose subscriptions were advertised for in London with the object of raising a riot in Yorkshire, would any person say that a person subscribing to that fund, for the promotion of that purpose would not be guilty of conspiring to effect it ? I cannot conceive what act of conspiracy can be more overt or more definite than handing money to a common fund when it is known that the fund is to be applied in a particular way. But the Attorney General says there is a further difficulty that must be attended to. He says, " True, the funds are advertised for in this country, but the persons advertising, though residing here, are foreigners." It is the first time I ever heard, when it is a question of the application of the common law, that foreigners residing within the Queen's dominions, do not owe perfect and complete allegiance to the Crown, and are not liable to punishment for every offence for which penalties are inflicted by that law. Certainly questions might arise, under particular statutes, whether the words are large enough to include foreigners, or whether they are limited to British subjects. That must depend on the words of the particular enactments. But to say that the common law does not extend to every man, woman, and child within the jurisdiction of the Queen is a proposition that I never expected to hear from an Attorney General of England. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL: I did not say that.] I am glad that the simple application of the argument has drawn a negative from the hon. and learned Gentleman. That application, however, I submit is fatal to the distinction which he attempted to draw. It is quite patent that whether the parties are foreigners resident in this country, or natural-born British subjects they are equally liable to an indictment for a conspiracy for contributing to such a fund as that described in the advertisement alluded to.

MR. BOVILL: The importance of this question cannot be overrated. By the interpretation of the law on this subject, the interests of England and Europe may be affected. If what is being done in the present instance is legal, might also be done in the case a neighbouring country, where the interests of England would be more nearly concerned. If this subscription is illegal by the law of nations, being made openly without any attempt to repress it, the King of Naples might immediately, and without a declaration of war, seize the property of all British subjects in his dominions. I assent to the proposition of the Attorney General, that this subscription is illegal ; the Government has not prevented the subscription ; and at this moment we might be treated as virtually at war with Naples. I do not say this without authority ; I have high authority for the statement—one respected throughout Europe. There are passages in Vattel, which will distinctly show the peril to which we are at this moment exposed in consequence of the Government not having disapproved and endeavoured to stop the subscription. The law of nations is part of the common law of this country. And it is the recognized law of Europe that whatever tends to the destruction of peace, is a violation of the law of nations. How, let me ask, would the case stand between two countries which happened to be at war, and a third which desired to be neutral ? Why, it is evident that that third State must exercise an absolute neutrality in order to effect her object, and must not assist either party with subscriptions ; and if that be so, how much stronger is the case when the subjects of a nation revolt against the constituted authorities ? It is, I may add, illegal, even if no Foreign Enlistment Act were in existence, to allow the recruiting of soldiers here in favour of one country against another with which we happen to be on terms of amity, or in favour of subjects who have revolted against their own established Government. Vattel lays down the doctrine that it is a violation of the law of nations to invite subjects to revolt against their lawful Sovereign, although they may have substantial grounds to complain of his rule. That opinion distinctly applies to the present case, and is borne out by Chancellor Kent and other eminent authorities. The Court of Common Pleas, moreover, decided that it was illegal to subscribe or enter into contracts for the purpose of affording assistance to subjects who rebelled against their Sovereign ; and it matters not, let me remind the House, whether that assistance be rendered by means of troops, or vessels, or money. Let me suppose, that we had, in the present instance, to deal, not with a movement against the King of Naples, but with reference to the Emperor of the French, and that we were to invite subscriptions against him in support of his subjects who had revolted against his authority. What course would it, under those circumstances, be open to him to take? Why, he would have a perfect right to call us to account for the course which we allowed to be pursued, and to enter into hostilities against us without even making a declaration of war. Assistance rendered by France to America led to a war between England and the former country, just as our proceedings now may lead to a war with Naples. We are, indeed, told by the Attorney General that the principle of those proceedings is opposed to the policy of the common law; but the hon. and learned Gentleman, I think, somewhat astonished the House by intimating that there was no legal remedy against those who took part in them. It is contended that you must in those instances proceed as for a conspiracy; but I should like to know what evidence of conspiracy there is in the case of an individual who libels a foreign Sovereign, for being guilty of doing that for which Peltier was tried and convicted, on the ground that the act tended to embroil the subjects of the King of Great Britain with a foreign State. It is then, I maintain, an offence of the most serious description for any individual—even though he may do it without concert with others—openly to invite subscriptions—it matters not whether they be or be not collected—for the purpose of aiding the revolt of the subjects of a foreign country against their Sovereign. Such a proceeding is a direct violation of international law, and ought to be held liable to punishment. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen may dissent from that view; it may not be thought necessary to enforce the law; but it is, I submit to the House, a most important question whether we have, or have not, done acts which place us in a condition leading to actual war with the King of Naples. I may also remark that if it goes forth that the acts of which we are speaking are illegal, but that the law of England cannot touch the offenders, the consequence may not improbably be that we shall have persons coming over to this country from abroad and openly soliciting subscriptions for this purpose. I maintain, therefore, that the subject is one of considerable importance, and that the commission of acts by which the peace of the Queen and her subjects is likely to be disturbed, and by which this country may be involved in war, is in itself a serious misdemeanour.

Mr. Bovill

ARMY (PENSIONS FOR WOUNDS).

HER MAJESTY'S REPLY TO ADDRESS.

LORD PROBY (Comptroller of the Household) appeared at the Bar of the House, with a reply from Her Majesty to an Address from the House, on the subject of Pensions for Wounds:—

I have received your Address, praying that I will reconsider the Warrant granting Pensions and Allowances to Officers of the Land Forces, limited to Wounds and Injuries received in Action.

And you may be assured that the subject shall receive due consideration.

THE REFORMATORY SYSTEM IN IRELAND.—QUESTION.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland if his attention has been called to the case of William Hawthorne, who was recently confined in the St. Kevin's Reformatory; and whether any inquiry has been made as to the authors of certain Letters, written from that establishment, which were represented to have been written by William Hawthorne. He was happy to be able to say that in asking this question and making a few remarks on the subject to which it referred, he had no intention in any way to arraign the conduct of any Member of Her Majesty's Government. On the contrary, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) had, as he was informed, acted in the matter with great firmness, propriety, and efficiency. The circumstances of the case, however, had excited a good deal of interest in some parts of Ireland, and his object was to elicit a statement of the facts as they had actually occurred. It was well known that the formation of reformatories in Ireland had been viewed with great jealousy and distrust; and, after a good deal of discussion and consideration, separate reformatories were established for the youths of the several religious persuasions. This being the state of things as regarded the institutions themselves, a Protestant lad, residing at Belfast, having got into bad company, was arrested on the charge of theft, of which offence he was convicted before the resident magistrate. He was sentenced to a month's imprisonment in the county gaol, and five years' detention in a reformatory. The moment the lad heard the sentence he announced that he was a Roman Catholic. His companions in guilt were of that persuasion, and his motive in making that statement no doubt was to induce the magistrate to send him to the same reformatory with them. His parents, who were Protestants, informed the Court he was no such thing, having been born, baptized, and brought up as a Protestant. The magistrate decided, however, on taking the boy's statement, and sending him to a Roman Catholic reformatory. The mother of the lad was in a state of extreme grief at the thought that her son was about to be incarcerated for five years in a Roman Catholic establishment. She immediately proceeded to the place where he had been baptized, and got a legal certificate of his baptism as a Protestant. However, the magistrate—for what reason he (Lord C. Hamilton) could not say—had taken the evidence of the lad himself, and in due time he was sent to a Roman Catholic reformatory in the county of Wicklow. The case created great excitement in Belfast, and it was right to mention that Mr. Lavery, the sanitary inspector of the Belfast Town Council, a very respectable gentleman, himself a Roman Catholic, had got up a memorial, praying that the sentence, so far as it directed the detention in the Roman Catholic reformatory, might not be carried out. To that memorial a large number of signatures were attached; nevertheless the magistrate adhered to his decision, and notice was sent to the Roman Catholic reformatory that the boy was to be sent there. He (Lord C. Hamilton) was happy to be able to say that another Roman Catholic of great respectability interfered at this stage of the proceedings. Mr. Murray, the hon. Secretary of the Wicklow Roman Catholic Reformatory, at once protested against the proceeding. He wrote a letter, in which he stated that he considered the sending of the boy to the Roman Catholic reformatory was a breach of the Irish Reformatory Act; and he wished to enter his protest against it. He received no reply to his letter, and, two or three days after, on going through the establishment, he was greatly surprised and much vexed at seeing the lad there. In spite of the efforts made by Roman Catholic gentlemen—in spite of the appeal of the boys' parents—in spite of the memorial stating that the father and mother of the boy were Protestants, and that he had been brought up a Protestant—and in spite of the production of the baptismal certificate—he was sent to the Wicklow Roman Catholic Reformatory. The first portion of his (Lord C. Hamilton's) question, therefore, was, whether any inquiry had been made into the circumstances of this extraordinary deviation from the Irish Reformatory Act. The second portion of it related to what had taken place after the lad arrived there, and which he thought the House would say was of a most extraordinary character. The lad was not a very good scholar, he was barely able to scrawl, and was not capable of expressing himself in any but very common language. The House might judge of the astonishment of his parents when, on the third day of his residence in the reformatory, they received from him a letter commencing thus:—

“My dear Mother,—“I seize the earliest opportunity of addressing a few lines to you in order to inform you of my whereabouts, and of the kind of place I am in, and the privileges and many advantages which are held out to boys who are well-disposed to be good.”

He then went on to describe the place and said—

“Now to begin, we have 100 boys, exclusive of all the staff and officers. We have a capital school, a beautiful chapel, and hear mass every day; also a fine band for our amusement, and recreation.”

The letter proceeded:—

“Everything that can possibly be done both for our temporal and spiritual welfare and well-being in after life is most strictly attended to. This is nothing short of home for us; we have everything granted to us which may be necessary, and plenty of open air exercise and recreation.”

He (Lord C. Hamilton) asked the attention of the House to what followed:—

“I have heard of what you have been doing [this referred to the efforts of his parents to get him out, which could have been communicated to him only by some functionary within the establishment], but I can only say, in the midst of my grief, that the day I leave here will go nigh breaking my heart, for I should be sent to a Protestant reformatory in Dublin, which is totally against my wish and inclination.”

Every one must admit that the boy had made great progress in three days. The mother, who knew the state of her son's scholastic acquirements when he left his home, must have thought that if the letter had been written by her son, St. Kevin's Reformatory must be an establishment in which miracles were performed. In a few days after the father got a letter, in which the boy said—

“When I last wrote to you I was positively assured that a representation had been made to the Lord Lieutenant, to the effect that you had objected to my being sent to a Catholic reformatory, and that, consequently, I was to be transferred to the Protestant reformatory in Dublin. Now, my dear Father, you know that I am not a Protestant; and if I were sent to an institution where I could not practise the duties of my own religion I should be broken-hearted. As for my being sent home to you, there is not the slightest chance of such a thing, for the Lord Lieutenant would never do it. Now, my dear Father, if you wish to do me good, as I know you do, write a few lines to Mr. Tracy, the magistrate, and tell him that you are quite willing (if I must be in a reformatory) to have me left where I am."

There was more to a similar effect, and then came a repetition of the observation—

"But if I am taken away, and sent to a Protestant Reformatory, I shall be broken-hearted."

Owing to the prompt intervention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, the lad was very properly sent home to his parents. On his arrival, he expressed the greatest satisfaction at returning home, and assured his parents he had never written any letter home, requesting to be allowed to remain at the reformatory; all he knew was that one of the gentlemen connected with the Reformatory read something to him which he did not understand; but he neither wrote himself, nor did he express any of the wishes which those letters contained. This alone showed that something was going on within the walls of that reformatory which called for the most searching inquiry. He knew nothing of the author of these documents; but, on authority which he believed to be correct, the schoolmaster of the reformatory was supposed to be the writer of them. When an establishment for the reformation of young criminals was maintained at the public expense, what was to be thought of the tuition given in it when it was in the hands of a schoolmaster who could deliberately forge the letters purporting to come from that boy, for the double object of deceiving his parents as to his wishes, and also of carrying on a system of proselytism. He hoped the Attorney General for Ireland would, therefore, state whether an inquiry had been instituted into how it happened that the magistrate, in violation of the statute, came to send a lad, being a Protestant, to a Roman Catholic reformatory. Also, whether any investigation had taken place into the authorship of the letters, a portion of which he had just read, with the view of making the writer responsible for his conduct. The case had created great disgust in Ireland, and, unless effective steps were taken to check such practices, the suspicions which existed when reformatories were originally established would be greatly strengthened and increased.

MR. DEASY said, he should be sorry if anything that occurred in that case or in any discussion in that House should have the effect of prejudicing the mind of the House either against the reformatory system generally, or against the particular reformatory alluded to by the noble Lord. That reformatory had been productive of very beneficial effects upon the criminal population of Ireland; but, no doubt, it was the duty both of the Government and the House to see that in institutions maintained, not indeed at the public expense, but to which the public contributed, every safeguard was provided against abuse. William Hawthorne was convicted of larceny before Mr. Tracy, the resident magistrate at Belfast, and sentenced to one month's imprisonment and five years' seclusion in a reformatory. When before the magistrate the boy stated that he was a Roman Catholic, and that gentleman, who was a very efficient magistrate and a Protestant, took this view of the case—that he was to be guided in the selection of a reformatory by the religion of the criminal himself. That was a mistake in point of law, and that was the only thing that could be said of it. As soon as Mr. Tracy found that his view of the law was questioned he called the attention of the Government to the matter; a case was submitted to the law officers, and directions were issued for the instruction of magistrates in similar cases. Mr. Murray, the hon. Secretary of St. Kevin's Reformatory, also wrote, stating his opinion that the committal was erroneous, and that the boy ought to be removed, which fact showed that there was no wish on the part of those having the management of the institution to detain him contrary to the provisions of the statutes. The case was submitted to the late Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Justice FitzGerald) and himself, and they were of opinion that Mr. Tracy's view of the law was mistaken, but that the period allowed by the Act for transferring the boy to a Protestant reformatory having expired, the only order that could legally be made was one for his discharge, and he had been discharged accordingly early in the month of February. With regard to the letters just quoted by the noble Lord, the Chief Inspector of Reformatories (Captain Crofton), under the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, lost no time in communicating with the manager actually in charge of this institution, and ascertained that the letters in question were written at the dictation of the boy by the schoolmaster. The manager expressed his regret that any such thing should have occurred, and undertook that there should be no recurrence of anything of the kind. Captain Crofton had no doubt that the statements of the boy as set out in the letters were highly coloured and exaggerated. The House would perhaps think that there was a sufficient guarantee for the general management of this and similar institutions in the fact that Captain Crofton, who issued the certificates to the reformatories, had the power of recommending that they should be withdrawn, should it appear to him that they were not properly conducted, and the Government would at once act on his recommendation.

ITALY.

INSURRECTION IN SICILY.—SUBSCRIPTIONS FOR GARIBALDI.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. G. W. HOPE trusted that the House would receive a fuller explanation of the state of the law than had yet been given by the learned Attorney General on the subject of the subscription for the insurrectionists in Sicily. It was fully established that we had no legal power to turn aliens out of this country. We were, therefore, according to the Attorney General, in this extraordinary position—that while we could not expel foreigners, we were at the same time unable to enforce our laws upon them. This was a matter that concerned other countries as well as our own, and the House had been given to understand that our law could not be enforced equally on foreigners living in England, and on our own fellow-subjects. That was too important a point to be left as it stood, upon the mere casual explanation of an authority like the Attorney General, and he hoped, therefore, that that learned Gentleman would distinctly state whether he meant to propound such a doctrine to the House.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: What I stated was simply this, that the rule of the common law is applicable to the subjects of England; but it has never been decided that mere foreigners resident in the country would come within the meaning of the words "subjects of the Queen." The better opinion undoubtedly is that any conduct which in the subjects of the Queen would be entitled conspiracy would in the case of foreigners receive the same designation; but it is difficult to say how far the rule is to be carried, for let me put this case—Suppose that a natural born English subject sent £100,000 to Garibaldi, undoubtedly I should consider that act a misdemeanour indictable at common law; but suppose a Sicilian refugee sent the same sum, I should have no confidence in giving an opinion that that also would be a misdemeanour at common law. In the absence of decisions the subject does not admit of a more decided opinion.

MR. MONSELL said, that before the House left this subject from which their attention had been already divided by two little episodes, he wished to call upon Her Majesty's Government to state what were their intentions with regard to this most important matter. The law had been distinctly laid down by the Attorney General, and there was no doubt that what was now being done in this country, not only by foreigners but also by subjects of the Queen, was in direct contravention of the law of nations and contrary to the law of this country. If these subscriptions had reference to the invasion of the territories of a more powerful Sovereign than the King of Naples, could there be any doubt as to the course which Her Majesty's Government would feel themselves bound or rather forced to pursue? He would suppose the case of the Ionian Islands. He had, it was true, never met a Sicilian who was not opposed to the Neapolitan Government, but neither had he ever met an Ionian who was not equally opposed to British rule. Suppose, then, that in France or Russia subscriptions were got up and announced in the public papers for the purpose of freeing the people of the Ionian Islands from the yoke of Great Britain, should we for one moment tolerate such a proceeding? Was it not right and proper, then, that we should do to others what we should wish them to do to us, and should deal with small and insignificant States in the same manner that we should be compelled to deal with great and powerful ones? He, therefore, wished to know whether Her Majesty's Government were prepared to take up this matter, to ascertain whether a prosecution could be instituted, and, if it could, to undertake it at once; because the very announcement of their determination to pursue such a course would have a moral force and a moral weight in this country, and would throughout Europe destroy the lamentable and unfortunate effect which the doubtful opinion given by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General had already produced. Before resuming his seat he could not help alluding to an observation which had, as he conceived, been improperly made by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Marylebone (Mr. James). The hon. and learned Gentleman whilst anxious to attack the Solicitor General had endeavoured to cover the unpopularity which he felt would attach to the course he was taking by the never failing expedient of making an attack upon the Pope. Now, he asked hon. Members, whatever might be their prejudices or their feelings, was that a justifiable course to pursue? What were the words that he used? He said that the army under General Lamoriciere was to be used by the Pope to massacre his subjects. What right had the hon. and learned Gentleman to speak in such a manner of General Lamoriciere, a man who was known throughout Europe and throughout the world as one of the most gallant and distinguished soldiers on the face of the earth; a man whose whole career had been one of the most noble and most brilliant that any military man ever pursued, and who had gained the esteem, admiration, and affection of all those who had served under him; what right had the hon. and learned Gentleman to presume to speak of such a man in such language? There might be differences of opinion as to the Government of the Pope, there might be persons who complained of this thing or of the other, but no man, not even his greatest enemy, accused him of inhumanity or cruelty. Why, he commenced his reign with the proclamation of a general amnesty, and through its whole course his every act had been marked by the greatest benevolence. He was now forced to collect troops; and for what purpose? Had they read one of the proclamations of General Garibaldi, in which he summoned the Italian people to unite and deliver Umbria and other parts of the Papal territories from the dominion of the Pope? When the Pope found that there was an union of powerful forces against his small State, what could he do but gather together troops to resist them? That was his object, not to massacre his subjects, nor to ill-treat those whom he had always endeavoured to benefit, but to resist those foreign Fillibusters who were coming thus ostentatiously to raise a rebellion in his States. That he believed to be the real fact, and the words which had been used by the hon. and learned Gentleman with regard either to his Holiness or to General Lamoriciere were words which ought not to have been used by any Member of that House. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone had also erroneously stated that the Foreign Enlistment Act was passed for the purpose of meeting such a case as that of certain Irishmen enlisting in the army of the Pope. Everybody knew that during the 17th century English subjects were in the habit of serving Foreign States. In the reign of George II., on account of the Jacobite conspiracy against the English Crown, it was found necessary to pass an Act for the purpose of preventing foreign enlistment; and in 1814, at the time of the peace, there was a Treaty made between England and Spain, one of the sections of which contained an engagement on the part of this country not to assist in any way the revolted provinces of Spain. In 1819 it was found that under the law of George II. English subjects, although not able to enlist in the Spanish army, might lawfully take service on the side of the revolted provinces. Mr. Canning considered that that was a breach of the Treaty of 1814, and an Act was passed for the simple purpose of making the prohibitory law include, not only enlistment in the army of any Foreign Prince, but enlistment in the service of anybody claiming to have any authority in a Foreign country. Undoubtedly English subjects had always been in the habit of taking service with Foreign States, and that, too, without any fault being found with them. When the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was in the Home Office, he (Mr. Mousell) had made an application to him on the part of an English officer in the Austrian army, who wished to be allowed to get rid of his English naturalization. That application was refused, as being contrary to the law of this country; but the Home Secretary never dreamt of finding fault with the British officer for having enlisted in the Austrian army. Any attempt to prevent Irishmen from enlisting in the army of the Pope would be contrary to our usual policy, and especially contrary to the traditions of the Liberal party, who had always been opposed to the Foreign Enlistment Act. Hitherto it had not been the practice to prevent enlistment in the army of a friendly Power. His principal object in rising had been to protest against the unjust and ungracious attack which had been made by the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone upon the Pope and upon General Lamoriciere.

MR. MALINS said, that the House owed a deep debt of gratitude to the hon. Member for King's County (Mr. Hennessy) for bringing this matter under their consideration, in order that any doubt which arose from the ambiguous expressions of the Solicitor General, in the incautious answer which he gave the other night to a question put to him on this subject might be explained. Perhaps that hon. and learned Gentleman would have done better had he candidly admitted his mistake than by the elaborate attempt he had made to prove that right which every lawyer present knew to be wrong. Had he frankly admitted his error, the House would have granted that indulgence which it never refused to any of its Members. Nothing could be more dangerous or erroneous than the doctrine which had been laid down by the hon. and learned Gentleman. The proposition submitted to him was, whether it was contrary to the law of England for a combination of foreigners to be established in this country to raise subscriptions for the purpose of making war against a friendly power. The hon. and learned Gentleman alleged that he had been asked whether any proceeding could be taken, but the real meaning of the question was whether such a proceeding would be lawful, and the Attorney General had given the weight of his great authority in entirely repudiating the doctrine laid down by his hon. and learned Colleague. He (Mr. Malins) was, however, bound to say that the anxiety of his hon. and learned Friend to screen his colleague had induced him to express himself with considerable ambiguity, and it was because the subject was still left in doubt that he wished to state what was the understanding on that, the Opposition side of the House, as to the state of the law. He made no complaint of the terms in which the Attorney General had laid down the law. He quite concurred in his definition, namely—that where any body of men combined—combined or conspired—for the purpose of raising money to make war, or to take hostile proceedings against a friendly power, it was contrary to the common law of England; but he deeply regretted when his hon. and learned Friend went on to raise a doubt whether that general principle was applicable to foreigners resident in this realm. Now, if the hon. and learned Gentleman really entertained any doubt upon that point, it was his duty to remove it without the loss of a single day, for surely nothing could be more just than that foreigners resident in this country, and enjoying the protection of our laws, should be bound to comply with them in all respects. On Saturday morning last, in taking up the morning paper, his eye was arrested by an Italian advertisement from a foreign body of gentlemen resident in England inviting subscriptions to be sent to a gentleman to whom they were all in the habit of listening in another capacity—one of the most eminent vocalists we had, Signor Mario. Signor Mario was the treasurer, to whom the subscriptions for the purpose of making war on Sicily were to be sent. It was not a question whether or not the Neapolitan Government was a government to be admired. There were many governments which we did not approve. But that which would be applicable to Russia, or France, or Prussia was equally applicable to the kingdom of Naples. Naples was not a great Power, but he should regret to hear it proposed in that House that they were to adopt one principle in relation to the great and powerful nations, and another to a nation that was not great and powerful. They must act on general principles, and he was sure that no Member of Her Majesty's Government would encourage the idea that one principle was to be adopted towards the Government of Naples and another principle towards France, or any other great Power of Europe. If the Government were to see an advertisement in the papers asking for subscriptions for an association formed for the purpose of raising subscriptions to put down the Government of the Emperor of the French how long would that be permitted to go on? The Attorney General had said that if the thing had been done by Englishmen there was no doubt as to what the law would be. If the hon. and learned Gentleman entertained any doubt as to what the law was with regard to foreigners, clearly it was his duty not to permit that doubt to remain another day. His (Mr. Malins') own opinion was that the common law of England, so accurately defined by the Attorney General, was equally applicable to natives and foreigners; but if the Attorney General thought the law of England on this point was at all dubious, it was his duty at once to take steps for the purpose of removing the anomaly. He wished to know what the Government intended to do. This was a most important debate, and ought to end with a substantial result. Was it the intention of the Government to let such advertisements as the one under discussion be issued every day without interference; If they interfered they ought to do so without hesitation and without ambiguity; no doubt ought to be permitted to hang over their decision, and the law of the country ought to be plainly and distinctly stated. If it was an offence at common law it was indictable, and the Government could readily bring it to a test by preferring an indictment against those who issued the advertisements, unless they were discontinued. The Government would thus give an evidence of good faith towards other countries, and would show a repudiation of any intention to connive at any conspiracy to upset the Government of any other country. So also with regard to the Pope's Government, they were bound to observe the same strict neutrality. It was a question between the Pope and his subjects, whether the Romagna should remain with him or be handed over to the King of Sardinia. So far as they could collect the intentions of his Holiness, he desired now to make war with those who had been his own subjects and with Sardinia, and to raise troops in all parts of the world for the purpose of restoring the Romagna to his dominions. Adhering, therefore, to principles of strict neutrality they ought not to acquiesce in the Pope enlisting troops in Ireland, and he thought the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone had done quite right in calling the attention of the House to the subject.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that having had some experience in the understood, but unacknowledged arrangements of the House, he was sure the Speaker would excuse him when he said that no communication from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, or from any one else by his authority, made to the Speaker with reference to himself (Mr. Newdegate), had his sanction. He mentioned this as an independent Member of the House, and as such he wished to call the attention of Her Majesty's subjects to the circumstance.

MR. SPEAKER: I have received no communication from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, nor from any individual in this House, with regard to the hon. Member.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was exceedingly obliged to the Speaker for this announcement. He was only adverting to vernment? The second was, whether Englishmen enlisting in a foreign service without such consent, did not, from the hour they entered that service and left this country, lose all claim to the rights of British subjects, and whether the consent of Her Majesty's Government not having been given to their enlistment they did not stand in the position of pirates, and were not therefore at the mercy of any foe to whom they might be opposed, if captured? The Garibaldi affair was a matter of trifling importance in comparison to the Romish enlistment, to which his remarks had been directed. That was a question of serious importance.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE:—Sir, I am not about to enter into the question of enlistment in Ireland. That is not properly the question before the House. The original question was one calling attention to the reply given by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General respecting Garibaldi's expedition, and that to my mind appears the more serious matter. The House must feel that it has arisen from the very elaborate answer given the other evening by the Solicitor General, who has been universally thrown over by every lawyer in the House, and even by his own colleague the Attorney General. I must say, I heard that answer with great surprise, for it is no slight thing for the Solicitor General, by implication, to leave people out of doors to imagine that the subscription which has been so extensively advertised is a legal one. In one point, at any rate, this discussion has been useful—we have now ascertained from every lawyer that the subscription in aid of the Garibaldi expedition is strictly an illegal one. Whether it would be advisable on the part of the Government to prosecute, and whether they would get a conviction, is another question; but it is no doubt the place of the Government to give expression to their opinion on the subject in this House. If they are for the doctrines of non-intervention, of which I am a humble disciple, they ought to state that this is an illegal combination for assisting people in opposition to a Sovereign with whom we are on friendly terms. If we once give way to this sort of thing, on what ground can we complain of the conduct of America? Have I not heard hon. Gentlemen here using the strongest language with reference to General Walker? What was said about the attempt by American Filibusters some time ago to take the Havaunah? Those are parallel instances, and if we are on every occasion to express our sympathies by subscriptions in opposition to Sovereigns with whom we are in amity, you may say what you like about the common law of England, but I am sure it is against all the principles of international law. These may not be popular sentiments, but I think they are such as ought properly to be entertained by an independent Member, who has no sympathy with Naples and much liking for the Sicilian cause, but who thinks, whatever his sympathies may be, that it is not right to truckle to mere out-of-doors feeling, and that he ought to lay down the position which he wishes this country to assume upon all occasions. Now, I wish on this subject to put a question to the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary. I have read in the newspapers with considerable surprise that the landing of Garibaldi's force at Marsala was greatly assisted by two English vessels. Whether that be true or not, I know the report is very prevalent on the Continent, because I have received communications from abroad stating that the fact clearly shows this country to be in favour of the expedition. On the Treasury bench this question has been narrowed down to the mere consideration of its legal bearing; but I think it is important that it should rest on some broader grounds. I think we ought to have a Minister of greater authority than the Law Officers of the Crown overthrowing one another, to tell us what truth there is in the statement, that the landing of the expedition has been mainly assisted by English vessels. With regard to the subscriptions, I believe there are many sympathizers with the Sicilian cause even in this House. I, perhaps, may sympathize, but my duty here is superior to my sympathy, and I certainly will not show that sympathy by breaking the law of my own country.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, the hon. Member who had just spoken had acknowledged a sympathy which he believed was participated in by many hon. Members in that House. It used to be held, however, that illegal acts only met with approval and sympathy in Ireland; but such a doctrine could now no longer be maintained. He had recently had the honour of presiding at two meetings, and of taking part in a third influential meeting, for the purpose of expressing sympathy with His Holiness the Pope. He had never done anything of which he felt so proud, and he was sure the House would agree with him that there was a great difference between assisting a legitimate Sovereign to maintain order in his dominions and assisting a rebel mob who were endeavouring to overthrow their legitimate Government. He hoped the Government would answer the question which had been repeatedly put to them, and would state what course they intended to take in this matter. Unless they did so this debate would have had a most unsatisfactory termination. As to the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. James) that those who were going from Ireland, if any were going, were proceeding to Italy in order to massacre the subjects of the Pope, he had no hesitation in saying that was a most unwarrantable calumny on the people of Ireland. He believed that if they were going it was with no such intention. He should not take upon himself to say whether these proceedings were contrary to the Enlistment Act or not; but he gave the most emphatic denial to the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: My hon. Friend (Mr. B. Osborne) has asked me a question respecting the landing of Garibaldi, and respecting two British ships which are said in certain telegrams to have protected the landing of these men. Now, I received to-day from the Admiralty the despatch of the officer commanding one of these vessels—the Intrepid. Hon. Gentlemen should be informed that there is a considerable amount of British property at Marsala, and that from the time when a rising in Sicily was expected, and still more from the time when the report was circulated that Garibaldi was going there, applications have been made both to the Foreign Office and to Admiral Fanshawe, who commands in the Mediterranean, to send ships for the protection of British property where British subjects were to be found. Admiral Fanshawe accordingly sent the Intrepid and the Argus to Marsala. The Intrepid arrived, I think, on the 11th, but had not been there long before two merchant steamers came in with Garibaldi's force and began to land it. Captain Marryatt, who was in command of the Intrepid, has written an account of the whole transaction to the Admiralty, and that has been transmitted to me. He states that when the two vessels were going in, two Neapolitan ships of war—a steamer and a frigate—approached Marsala; but this officer says that, although these ships might have fired upon the vessels and bility of obtaining a conviction. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Malins) says, we ought immediately to prosecute the persons who put the advertisement into the paper. I am surprised that a lawyer should say that. What evidence have we of who it was that put that advertisement into the newspaper? We must first go to the printer of the newspaper and endeavour to obtain evidence of who had sent it, and then to connect them with the advertisement and the subscriptions.

MR. MALINS: Names are given of persons by whom subscriptions will be received.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: There are names given by the printer of The Times newspaper, I allow, but I am not convinced that Signor Saffi, or others whose names appear, if they were asked by some one sent by the Attorney General, would at once admit that they desired their names to be given as the collectors of subscriptions to be expended in making war against the King of the Two Sicilies. I should think it would be necessary to prove all that, and to bring evidence to show that the printer of The Times did not wantonly and without authority use the names of Signor Saffi and others, or we should all be at the mercy of the printer of The Times, who might give the names of all the Cabinet as contributors of large sums to be used in waging war against the King of the Two Sicilies. The hon. and learned Gentleman is a much better judge than I am of these matters; but if the Government were to prosecute in such cases they would have to ask the law officers as to the means of obtaining convictions. All I can say is, that I do not remember any case of successful prosecution of persons who had been subscribing for the purpose of maintaining insurrections or war in Poland or other countries. There is one country in regard to which I recollect that I myself, together with many distinguished persons, was guilty of such an act. I refer to the insurrection in Greece. We carried on our proceedings openly. I was a Member of a Committee which met, I think, at Lord Fitzwilliam's house in Grosvenor-square, and afterwards we went to a public meeting in the City. I did not find at that time there was any great zeal for prosecuting us, and certainly I never suffered any imprisonment in consequence of my connection with those proceedings. Therefore, the question of common law does not appear to be quite solved yet, and it requires much consideration what the Government can feel. But, after all, I have no opinion upon the subject. "What a wicked waging war against Sicilies, and in exercise of his power!" But I say, "That is no dreadful thing to do." That is a crime if you consider these and international law, and then to take them from each case as that which W. America, when to obtain possession of a higher object in interests, is one thing for the independence of a country quite another case of sympathies and will distinguish between the filibuster and the patriot. We had once a general in the month of the south-west coast of England received considerable numbers of people of England. That filibustering was sufficient to any fighting against ought to respect, deavouring to maintain lawful expedients. These things in a These questions, of law, or perhaps much examination either moral blame who are foreigners would not pledge to undertake a prosecution ever we find that outraged, it is one to see that it is done frequently in Foreign Enlistment that statute we difficulties in the into effect. I will give a general declaration of law to prosecute subscriptions for the enterprise as that taken in the king rafter, he rose to state with reference to the "blasphemous proclamation" that had been attributed to Ricciardi, that that document had never been acknowledged by that patriot or his friends. With respect also to the statement that Garibaldi was a member of a secret society which sought to attain its objects by assassination, it was the peculiar characteristic of Garibaldi that he had never joined any secret society. The fact was, that he was too noble, generous, and chivalrous to engage in any dark intrigue for the promotion of his political aims.

MR. MAGUIRE: The noble Lord has stated that the printer of The Times might take extraordinary liberties with the Cabinet, and might, in fact, publish the name of every Member of it as having aided and assisted Garibaldi. Now, Sir, if the printer of The Times had done that, I do not by any means think he would have made an extraordinary mistake. I believe Her Majesty's Government have done everything in their power—it may be unconsciously—to foster discontent in the dominions of the King of the Two Sicilies, and, to a certain extent, to promote and encourage the present rebellion. More extraordinary despatches than those addressed by the noble Lord to the Government of an independent Sovereign, I suppose, no one ever read. The noble Lord sitting in the Foreign Office as a kind of European schoolmaster, has regularly "birched" the King of Naples; in fact, he has done everything in his power, by the language and tone of these despatches, to discredit his authority in his own dominions, and, by anticipation, has almost justified the present insurrection. The King of Naples has been compelled to take steps and adopt measure which may be called arbitrary and harsh; but, whatever their character, they were absolutely necessary in the state of things created by the machinations of those who were conspiring against his Government. Surely, that Sovereign, when he found conspiracies hatching in Naples, had a perfect right to turn the conspirators out of the country. If there were a conspiracy in Ireland to-morrow, with a treasonable object, the noble Lord at the head of the Government would just do what the King of Naples has done in his dominions; and I may remind hon. Gentlemen that the Government of this country was not very scrupulous, on a late occasion, in putting down a conspiracy which was described as foolish and ridiculous. The noble Lord, the Foreign Minister, lectures and denounces petty Sovereigns and feeble States, but he carefully abstains from extending his censures to powerful Sovereigns, like the Emperor of the French. The spirit in which the foreign policy of the Government is conducted is that of truckling and cowardice to great Powers, and tyranny and oppression to small Powers. The noble Lord is brave when he has to deal with the King of Naples or the Sovereign of Rome, but he blanches when he has to face the Emperor of France. What is the fact? That the most abominable conspiracy which the world has ever seen is now being carried out upon the soil of Italy. Two Royal robbers—I can call them nothing else—pretending to be moved by the cries of "distressed nationalities," but really thinking only of their own aggrandisement, entered into an infamous engagement to strip certain Sovereigns of their dominions; and all the confusion and horror that reign at this moment in Italy, as well as all the evil results to the peace of Europe which may follow, are owing, and will be owing, to the infamous machinations of these kingly robbers. I am perfectly justified in believing that the robbery which has been perpetrated of a portion of the States of the Pope, of the Austrian possessions in Lombardy, and of the dominions of the Dukes, and the subsequent division of booty between these unscrupulous potentates, originated in a base personal compact between them. To what extent has this course been sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government?—and how far have the principles enunciated by Her Majesty's Government given countenance to those spoliations? Why, Her Majesty's Government have declared that it is lawful for any portion of the subjects of a legitimate Sovereign to rise up against him, cast off his authority, and transfer their allegiance to any other State or Power. Let you make it your own case. On the same principle the people of Cornwall or Devon, or the people of Wales, may throw off the yoke of the Queen, and may, by universal suffrage, express their discontent with Her Government, and their determination to be free and independent, or to transfer their allegiance to the Emperor of the French. And why, in that case, should not the Emperor listen to the cry of a "distressed nationality?" And, I ask, if such a case as this did occur, what real difference would there be to the throwing off and transfer of their allegiance by the Pope's subjects in the Legations. Garibaldi has been spoken of as an illustrious patriot, and by many more such high-sounding epithets; but who are his accomplices, who his associates? Why the very scum of Italy—bandits and assassins, leagued together by ties of blood; and among the foremost of them is one whose deeds have been chronicled in the work of Farini, well known to its distinguished translator, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone). Judging Zambianchi by his acts, he is proved to be an infamous villain, a sacrilegious robber, and a blood-stained assassin of the darkest hue. I shall tell the House something of this Zambianchi, who is now one of the associates of Garibaldi in his efforts to liberate Italy. He had been, before the breaking out of the rebellion of 1848, a Custom-house officer, whose duties lay at some point on the frontier of the Papal dominions. He was an infidel and a vagabond, who feared neither God nor man; but because he was an enemy of the Pope, he was, therefore, like all the Pope's enemies, a hero and a patriot. Let the House understand how this noble character, this enlightened friend of freedom, vindicated his principles and endeavoured to enforce them upon others. During the rebellion he assisted in arresting those who sought to fly from the confusion and anarchy then reigning at Rome and throughout the Papal States; and if those whom he arrested held opinions different from his own, and if he could not bring them round to his views by such mild arguments as threats and intimidations, he usually settled the controversy by the dagger or the pistol. The presence of so illustrious a patriot was naturally required in Rome, where he found a wide field of action for his zeal for free institutions. Priests and monks were the objects of his special care. He arrested them whenever he had an opportunity, and brought them to San Calisto, when he imprisoned them. There he shot some, stabbed others, starved more to death, and murdered others by piecemeal, burying them up to their chins in the earth, and gloating over their agony. Such were the scandal and horror, even in that time of licence, excited by the atrocities of this fiendish miscreant, that the revolutionary Government were eventually compelled to interfere, and put an end to his atrocious barbarities; and that interference saved eight or nine clergymen, who were found in his dungeon, and who undoubtedly would have been slaughtered as some hundred others had been. I have myself spoken to persons in Rome who had a narrow escape from the daggers of Zambianchi and his band of assassins. But, perhaps, it may be said this miscreant did not act so badly after all, because he had only raised his hands against a Catholic Sovereign, and that Catholic Sovereign the Pope. [Cries of "Oh!" and "No!"] What is the use of hon. Gentlemen saying "oh," when they constantly cheer every sentiment that breathes an opposite opinion or an opposite principle? I ask, what right has this Government, which we are assured is maintaining a "strict neutrality" in Italy, to interfere in an insurrection against the Pope? Is not this neutral Government always interfering? Because the Government of the King of Naples is a Catholic Government, rebellion in Sicily and Naples receives every encouragement from the Government of this country; and with respect to the Pope, Her Majesty's Ministers are constantly in the habit of declaring opinions and making statements most dangerous and damaging to the authority of the Sovereign Pontiff, but which, I may add, they dare not utter in reference to the Emperor of the French. When the King of Naples exercised his kingly authority, in order to prevent rebellion from breaking out, he was, of course, guilty of cruelty; but when the Emperor of the French acts as the King of Naples has done, is there the same ready rebuke from the noble Lord and his Colleagues in the Cabinet? Why, I ask, does the noble Lord do that to the King of Naples which he does not do to the Emperor of the French? The noble Lord may say, of course, as he has said before, that the Emperor went to Italy to give liberty to her people. Was there ever a more monstrous 'humbug' than that? [ironical laughter, and cries of "Hear, hear!"] I repeat, was there ever a more monstrous "humbug" than to assert or pretend that one of the most consummate despots that the world has ever seen went to Italy for such a purpose? Is it consistent with reason or probability that the Emperor Napoleon crossed the Alps to confer on Italy a free press and representative institutions? Do they exist in France? But has the noble Lord ever attempted to rebuke the Emperor because they do not exist in his dominions? Nay, when the people were shot down in the streets of Paris at the time of the coup d'etat, did any rebuke of the brutal atrocities perpetrated on that occasion come from the English Government?

Was there not, on the contrary, an expression of sympathy with Louis Napoleon from one whose name was almost synonymous with encouragement to revolution throughout the world? ["Oh, oh!" and "Hear, hear!"] Is this really a slander against the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston)? But certainly we have never heard of any formal expression of disgust or horror at the atrocities which were then perpetrated in Paris. I say, Sir, gentlemen should be careful in laying down and sanctioning revolutionary principles, for no man knows how soon they may be turned against yourselves. If you had a quarrel to-morrow with France, I cannot see why Louis Napoleon, whose large heart throbs with compassion for "distressed nationalities," may not fancy that he heard "a cry of agony" come from Cork, or Kerry, or Connemara; I cannot see why, according to established precedent, the plaint of that afflicted nation may not move his tender heart, and stimulate his love of universal liberty. Why should he not land some 30,000 or 50,000 sympathisers with liberty and promoters of large and liberal institutions on the shores of Ireland? You should be cautious. I, as an Irishman, would be one of the first to repel such an attempt on the part of France, for I abhor the man, and I detest his rule; and much as I am disposed to find fault with the Government of England in its dealings with Ireland, I solemnly believe it would be one of the deadliest calamities which God could permit to afflict any country, if that man, or a single soldier that fights under his flag, set a hostile foot upon its shores. Sir, I desire that we in this country should be preserved from the machinations of a man so reckless and so unscrupulous; and I, therefore, ask Gentlemen to pause before they sanction principles which they may ere long find dangerous to their own interests. We ought to be the last, as the friends of true liberty, to encourage every rascally filibuster, every foul assassin, who is now seeking to promote his own private aims and objects under the auspices of two royal robbers, whose names will be branded with infamy when the history of these times is written.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he rose to express his surprise at the speech of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, and, in reference to that speech, he would first mention a conversation which he heard on the bench near him a few minutes ago. One hon. Member said to a friend who sat near him, "Of course, you are in favour of non-intervention?" and the reply was, "Of course I am." The conversation then continued in these terms: "What do you think of Lord John's view of the Sicilian insurrection?" and the reply was, "I think he is holding a candle to it." He thought himself that the noble Lord had taken up too decided an opinion on this question. The noble Lord certainly had held out very strong encouragements to those who were willing to assist General Garibaldi.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon; I gave no opinion at all, either for or against the attempt. I said that all these cases must be judged by different gentlemen according to their own views and opinions; but I gave no opinion whatever.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR: If I understood the noble Lord aright, he compared Garibaldi to our William III., and the landing in Sicily to 1688.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I compared General Walker with William III. landing in England.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, that was certainly such an analogy as he should have least expected to hear from the noble Lord—a comparison of General Walker with William III. But he thought, and he believed many other hon. Gentlemen were under the same impression, that the tone of the noble Lord's speech was to encourage the Sicilian insurrection. He was certainly glad to hear that the noble Lord did not allow such to have been his intention, because he thought the position of this country should be one of non-intervention. If there was any country in the world that lived in a glass-house it was our own; and if we encouraged filibusters, or any persons who believed that they were invading a country in order simply to better its government, we might have those doctrines turned against ourselves. It seemed to him that it was a matter entirely of private judgment. Many persons considered that General Garibaldi, if he succeeded, would better the condition of the Sicilians; but that in the case of General Walker, he would not have done so. He (Mr. Danby Seymour) quite agreed with those who thought that Garibaldi, if he succeeded in Sicily, and if he was able to form a stable government there, might very easily set up something better than the Neapolitan Government. But when they considered the great difficulties that must arise if Garibaldi succeeded in abstracting Sicily from the rule of Naples, and the European complications which must ensue upon that event, perhaps their best wishes might be directed to seeing a better Government in Sicily without that island being taken from those who were at present its lawful Sovereigns.

THE DEFECTIVE GUNBOATS. QUESTION.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he has any objection to discontinue the breaking up of the defective Gunboats until a full opportunity shall have been afforded for thoroughly examining into their state under the direction of a Select Committee, should it be appointed? A Motion of his own in reference to these gunboats had been postponed until the following Tuesday; and if it were true, as had been stated, that such boats were in the course of being broken up, then his Motion would fall to the ground. The breaking them up would get rid of one great means of forwarding a prosecution should such a step be deemed necessary, and he was, therefore, very desirous that the Government should give orders to suspend any attempt to break up any of these vessels or to repair or alter those which were not in so bad a state, in order that a Committee might have the means of ascertaining where the fault lay, and to what extent the injury had gone. The other evening the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty was asked to name the contractors by whom the boats were built—a question which he, with his usual good taste and judgment, declined to answer. But since then the respectable firm of the Messrs. Green had come forward and publicly stated in the newspapers that they were the constructors of a large number of the boats stated to be imperfect; and they admitted the use of unseasoned timber, and, to a certain extent, that of short bolts. If their statement was as correct as he hoped it was, with respect to the extent to which short bolts had been used, the mischief was not so great as had been imagined. The letter of Messrs. Green gave the strongest reason why there should be a Committee of Inquiry, and why the work of demolishing the boats should not be further proceeded with. They said:—

“As to the vessels being defective, we are not surprised, as many of them were built of unseasoned timber, although the best that could be got at the time, and the air excluded when they were hove up out of the water at Haslar, instead of having a plank taken out fore and aft for ventilation, which ought to have been done.”

Any man who knew anything about ships would see the force of this observation. They then proceeded:—

“With regard to the short bolts, we beg to state that during the progress of the work we were pushed very hard by the Admiralty to complete our contract, and even threatened with legal proceedings if behind time, which compelled us to employ a large number of strange shipwrights, who worked very often night and day, and it would, therefore, be impossible for us or the Government inspector to be answerable that every bolt was properly driven. It is admitted by the Admiralty, in their report, that 2,202 bolts were properly driven through; and we maintain, as shipbuilders, that planks fastened with one through bolt in every other timber, with a short one between, are quite sufficient to secure the safety of any vessel of war. Lloyd's require one through bolt and one short bolt in every butt, and not less than half of the trenails to be driven through, in building their highest class ships, calculated to carry heavy cargoes; and, should the ship be copper-fastened, they require only one half of the bolts to be through bolts, and all the rest short bolts. We complain of the Admiralty for not giving the contractors longer time to build these vessels, and for not having a larger staff of inspectors to superintend the work, and also for not taking proper care of them after they were duly delivered up into the charge of their authorities, according to contract, with the necessary certificates.”

He thought that those allegations were matters for inquiry, and therefore he was anxious that the best evidence in the case—that of the boats themselves—should not be put out of the way. He hoped the noble Lord would be able to give him the assurance that the destruction of these boats would be immediately stopped.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he had hitherto forbore to offer his opinion upon this subject, for he had hoped that the matter would take some tangible form, and the question have been put on a footing which would be productive of some advantage to the country. These vessels were defective in every possible form; and as they formed a species of defence which had become of the very greatest importance to this country, he thought that if his hon. Friend persevered in his Motion for a Committee of Inquiry into their state, he ought also to add that that Committee should inquire into the whole question as to how that arm of the public service could be best supplied. He would not on that occasion enter into the personal question. It was necessary, during the Russian war, to construct a force of gunboats speedily, and, as the means of providing seasoned timber was wanting, the Government was compelled to take what they could get, and they built certain vessels of a new description, which, to some extent, answered their purpose. Having said this he had said all he could in their favour; and he would add that he thought that the much more sagacious course would have been for the Government, at the end of the war, to have dispensed with these vessels altogether, and to have directed that vessels of a more suitable character should be constructed. There were one hundred and fifty of these gunboats, and they constituted a description of force and a means of defence which were rendered requisite by the preparations going on elsewhere. But the existing gunboats could neither steam nor sail. They could not carry their guns in heavy weather, and they were incapable of moving from one point of the coast to the other, when they were required. If he supported this assertion, he thought it clear that one great object of the Committee should be to inquire and ascertain what a gunboat really ought to be. A friend of his, a short time ago, fitted out a gunboat for a distant colony, and the gentleman to whom he alluded being an officer of great intelligence, he (Sir J. Elphinstone) asked him to let him know what were the performances of his vessel. The communication he received was the following:—

“ I can sum up the good qualities in one short sentence—she is an excellent seaboat and stays well; beyond this, I cannot add a word in her praise; and her defects would fill a sheet of foolscap. She will neither sail nor steam, and draws eight feet six; maximum speed about five-and-half—we once obtained seven and eight, with a gale on the quarter. She cannot steam under any circumstances for more than twenty-four hours without stopping to ‘sweep tubes,’ and with any head breeze or sea her rate may be represented by the minus quantity. She cannot generate steam sufficient to maintain a regular speed of five knots even for more than six hours at a time. She leaks like a sieve. So badly were the boards under the stoke-hole plates fitted that the ashes readily found their way into the bilges, choked the pumps, and continually, on our passage out, obliged us to stop, when under steam, to take them to pieces. The suction pipes of these pumps were so miraculously placed as to be totally unserviceable except the ship was on an exactly even line. These two defects have been remedied at Rio, at an expense of £37, which might have been done in a home yard for £5. Sic transit argentum Angliæ. Moral—which fully accounts for the income tax. The magazine has generally from one to two inches of water in it, and the bilges, notwithstanding the most careful attention, stink to such a Thames-like degree as fairly to drive me a wanderer and a fugitive from my cabin, the paint in which was turned in a few hours from white to a slimy-looking chocolate. On the passage out I was obliged to sling and sleep under the mizen boom in fine weather; and in foul I used to draw my waterproof around me and doze for the night in a chair. As for my cabin, I never went near it—could not—except to dress in a morning or bolt my meals. Everything I had in it has been completely spoiled, stock and clothes. One-half the ship’s company only can sling their hammocks, the other spend the night in crawling on to bins and rolling off again.”

This was an account of a gunboat on service, making her way to the point where she was to defend the honour of the country. He would give the House another instance. He was on board one of Her Majesty’s ships at Spithead last week, and when he left the ship the wind was blowing fresh from the east. To come on shore he availed himself of one of these gunboats, and they arrived in safety opposite South Sea Castle. The tide was running to the eastward at about four knots, and, as had said, the wind was blowing half a gale from the east. With a handy vessel, without steam at all, the wind would have carried her over the tide. But this vessel, with all the steam she could muster, could not stem the tide, and after all kinds of efforts she got on the top of one of the buoys and could not get clear of it. At last, after sticking for twenty-five minutes in one place, with all the ladies and gentlemen looking at them from the Esplanade, they were obliged to land in small boats. He went down to the beach an hour or two afterwards, and the gunboat was still in the same place, and there was no difference, except that they had let go her anchor because she could not stem the tide. He inquired whether the boat was inferior to the rest of her class, and the answer he got was that this particular vessel was one of Her Majesty’s advanced steam reserve, the Beaver, and that she was understood to be so efficient that she was used for the purpose of taking the officers backwards and forwards. He would appeal to his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Devonport (Sir Michael Seymour), if he were present, to say whether, in transporting these gunboats from Hong Kong to the Nore last year, he was not obliged to take the guns out of them. One of these gunboats, thus not having a gun on board, but only two howitzers to defend herself, was attacked by three or four piratical vessels, and only saved by the extreme gallantry of the young lieutenant who commanded her. The mistake made by the Admiralty was in not selling these vessels out of the service at the close of the Russian war. They would have made very good coasters, and their engines, being high pressure, might have answered very well for thrashing corn. Instead of doing that, however, the mischief had been perpetuated by the creation of that most extraordinary establishment, the gunboat stable at Haslar. There were forty or fifty gunboats there laid up in a row like horses in a stable, dependent for the means of getting them afloat on a very complicated screw, and the slightest derangement of that machinery would lock them up, so that they might as well be in Winchester Gaol. Such was the strange contrivance of a First Lord of the Admiralty to keep these useless vessels; but the precaution of removing a plank from the bow, and another from the stern of each vessel, to secure internal ventilation was omitted; the timbers were neither kyanized nor subjected to any process to prevent the growth of fungus, and so they had rapidly decayed. Every naval man must perceive the absurdity of the course that had been adopted. He, therefore, recommended the House to institute an inquiry into the whole subject of small vessels, for that was an arm of our navy which, in future wars, would be of the greatest advantage if it were properly cared for. His opinion was that the form of these vessels should be entirely altered. In the next war an Armstrong gun might be put aboard each of the penny steamboats on our river; he would undertake in a forenoon to fit one of those boats for the purpose. We should then have vessels of the highest speed under steam carrying guns which could throw shot or shell an immense distance; and those vessels moving with great rapidity, and being painted with a tint which could not be distinguished from the colour of the water a thousand yards off, it would be very difficult to hit them. Such should be the vessels to which we might confide the defence of our shores, and not to those miserable things of which he had given no exaggerated description, and which would be certain to fail us in the hour of need.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, his hon. and gallant Friend had given them a very graphic description of the defects of the gunboats, and he (Lord C. Paget) was not going to attempt to defend them or to state that they were perfect in all respects. But the best proof he could give that these gunboats were not thought to be perfect by the Admiralty was that the gunboats now in course of construction were built of a very superior form, and would carry a very superior armament to that of the gunboats which had been built at the time which had been alluded to. He agreed with his hon. Friend in what he thought as to the lamentable exposé which had happened at Portsmouth. With respect to these vessels, all he could say was that the Government was not in the act of breaking them up, and this applied particularly to those which were alluded to in the Motion. The moment in which the Admiralty found the very defective state in which they were, they ordered them to be left in that state, so as to allow the contractors to see their state, and also with a view to ulterior measures, if any should be adopted. As to the mortar boats at Chatham, he apprehended that it was too late to prevent their being broken up, for by this time the work was in a very forward state; but with regard to the other vessels, no doubt the Admiralty would leave them as they were until it was ascertained what course should be pursued.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he fully concurred in the opinion that this was a subject which could not be too often discussed. It was a most important question, for on it depended the lives of our seamen and the defences of the country. He did not blame the Admiralty for having built the gunboats, because they were urgently demanded at a period of emergency. But, as to the manner in which they had been built, Mr. Green had let the "cat out of the bag," and it appeared that the Admiralty were as much to blame as the contractors. Mr. Green alleged that the Admiralty did not provide a sufficient number of inspectors to look after the contractors, although, as the work was carried on during the night, instead of fewer there should have been more of these officers in attendance than usual. The hon. and gallant Member for Portsmouth had said very truly that these gunboats were unfit for any service but that for which they were originally intended—to make short voyages, not far from our own shores, and to act on an enemy's coast. If we were to go on building these small craft, we ought to build a very different sort of vessel. He hardly thought it would be safe to trust so important a matter in the hands of the Admiralty as at present constituted, seeing that their previous efforts had proved such complete failures. How could it be otherwise in a department ruled by a civilian, who knew nothing whatever about naval matters, with a Board appointed chiefly for political reasons, and with but little regard to professional merit? He could hardly recollect single naval man of eminence and distinguished talent who had ever had a seat at the Board of Admiralty. Sir Thomas Hardy was the best of them. [An hon. MEMBER: Sir George Cockburn.] Well, he owned Sir George Cockburn was a distinguished officer; but during the whole eighteen years that he was at the Admiralty scarcely a single improvement took place. In the War Department there were the Adjutant General, the Quartermaster General, and their respective deputies, who could be employed to inquire into anything that went wrong and prepare a report on the subject. But the services of no similar officers were at the disposal of the Admiralty, although in the case of the recent mutinies they would have been found of great value. When the Admiralty wished to make an inquiry into any irregularity on the spot where it occurred, so many of their Lordships went down in their yacht, which was very beautifully fitted up and well stocked with wine, and enjoyed themselves as though they were a mere party of pleasure. He would suggest that the offices of Rear Admiral and Vice Admiral of England should no longer be allowed to remain sinecures. The Senior Lord of the Admiralty ought to fill the office of Rear Admiral, and the next Lord that of the Vice Admiral. They could then visit the dockyards, inspect the ships and the works, and examine everything for themselves. They might then, perhaps, be able to instil some sound ideas into the head of a non-professional First Lord. He was aware that civilians were in the habit of retorting that the business of the Admiralty had never been conducted more efficiently when a sailor was at the head of it. The Administration of Lord St. Vincent had been subjected to a good deal of criticism. Now, Lord St. Vincent entered upon the duties of First Lord at a time when the fleet was in a deplorable state, but he succeeded in re-establishing discipline. He wished we had another like him to re-establish discipline now, for it had almost disappeared in our navy. He feared that as long as the navy was governed as at present no true economy would ever be secured. It was startling to look back on the various classes of vessels which, after having been constructed at great cost had been abandoned as useless. First there were the notorious "Forty Thieves," and then the "donkeys," which were made use of when the frigates were found to be failures. Lord Spencer's gunboats, called after his dogs, came next, followed in succession by Sir W. Symonds's vessels, the iron vessels and the gunboats, which he agreed with his gallant Friend opposite had better be broken up. The slip at Haslar was invented by a civil Lord of the Admiralty, who did not, it was said, consult his Board at all on the subject, and his gallant Friend had shown them what sort of a job he had made of it, and how quickly the 70 vessels hauled up there had gone to decay. There really ought to be a Committee of Inquiry into the whole question of the government of the navy.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: I have refrained from taking any part in the discussion upon the defective state of the gunboats, because my noble Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty has acted in my belief with the greatest fairness. He has promised that every effort to bring the builders of the unseaworthy vessels to punishment will be made by the Admiralty, and, should they fail in doing this, that he himself would move for a Committee of inquiry. No man could do more than this. I think the noble Lord has acted with propriety in withholding the names of the contractors who built the defective vessels, pending the conclusion of the examination into the condition of the greater number. We must bear in mind that these gunboats were required during a great emergency, when it was indispensable that no time should be lost in their construction; the contracts were offered, in the first instance, at £20 a ton; the contractors avowed that it was impossible to find seasoned wood, the Admiralty were apprized of the fact, and, if the Board was satisfied, upon inquiry, with this statement, they were justified under the extreme exigencies of the occasion, in directing that kind of timber to be employed. Still it is, apparently, an extraordinary fact that all the large private yards could not supply a sufficient amount of seasoned wood to build one hundred such vessels; in that case the Admiralty would be justly censured if it had not insisted on its employment at any cost. The honour and reputation of the country, and the lives of officers and men might have been endangered owing to the defective construction of these vessels, I, therefore, cannot command language sufficiently strong to express my abhorrence of the manner in which these gunboats were launched for service. The contractors, in their defence, plead the shortness of time allowed by the Government for the completion of these vessels, and the necessity laid upon them of employing shipwrights with whom they were unacquainted, and whose honesty and character they were unable to rely. I cannot believe that the contractors were themselves guilty in the face of knowing that their reputation was at stake, and that one day the truth would be elicited. Any miscreant with a chisel and hammer could cut off the bolt-ends in the dead of the night without fear of detection, and dispose of the metal to the marine store dealers. I will not breathe one word of censure against any man without previous inquiry, and I understand the Admiralty has instituted proceedings of that nature to discover the persons worthy of blame, which, I am afraid, will be a task of extreme difficulty. All the Government yards were at the period actively engaged in preparing vessels for sea, when the war was at its height, and I cannot believe that it was in the power of the Surveyor of the Navy to send two or three persons to each of the private yards to oversee the works during their progress. I always believed that these gunboats would prove of no value, and I have some consolation in thinking that now they will give place to a superior class of vessels.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES. QUESTION.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Treasury when it is intended to proceed with the Civil Service Estimates; how soon No. VII. of those Estimates will be laid upon the table of the House, and whether the same will contain an Estimate for the Expenditure of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests during the current year? The hon. Member reminded the House that four months had elapsed since the commencement of the Session, and expressed an opinion that, of late, forty or fifty items were included in No. 7, many of which might very well appear in Nos. 4 and 6.

MR. LAING said, he should be very glad to be able to reply to the first question, but he was sorry to say that the period when the Civil Service Estimates would be taken must depend upon the course of public business, over which he had manifestly no control. It would be necessary before Whitsuntide to ask the House for a Vote on account of those Estimates, as was done last year, and they would be proceeded with on the earliest opportunity of which the state of public business would admit. No. 7 contained those Miscellaneous Votes which could not be ascertained until a late period of the Session, and that class was never presented until late, in order to obviate the necessity of Supplementary Votes. The papers would certainly be presented, and in the hands of hon. Members, so as to give time for consideration at least equal to that which had been the usual practice. With regard to the expenditure of the Woods and Forests, that involved a very grave constitutional question. In 1857 a Committee which inquired into the subject recommended that the salaries should be voted, but not the expense of collecting the revenue, which was settled by the Act by which the Civil List was given to the Sovereign in substitution of it. The Committee of 1857 also pointed out the constitutional difficulty of departing from that course, and it was not the intention of the Government to undertake a responsibility which two Committees admitted was not free from difficulty. The Woods and Forests Estimates would therefore be submitted in the usual form.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I have no wish to prolong this discussion, but I must say a few words as to the practice which the hon. Secretary to the Treasury has just adverted to—that of voting money on account. I quite agree that there are occasions on which it may be expedient to have recourse to that practice; but I hope it will not become chronic, and that the House will seriously consider before it consents to take this course. The Government may be able to state very fair reasons for it on the present occasion, but the proposition is one which the House of Commons ought to view with great suspicion. It is, in fact, a mode by which all real examination into the expenditure of the country is prevented, and, without referring more particularly to the present case, I wish generally to impress on the House that it is of great importance that this proceeding should be looked on as one of extraordinary character, and one which if persisted in will virtually dispossess this House of all practical control over the expenditure. I am totally unaware what are the circumstances which can justify the Government to make this demand on us. No doubt, the statement which they have to make may be perfectly satisfactory, but, if this demand is only made on us to enable them to go on with business in which the House and the country do not appear to take any great interest, whereas the expenditure of the country must always be a matter of general interest, I shall view the proposal with feelings not of a character to make me too eager to sanction it.

CHINESE CUSTOMS.—QUESTION.

MR. WYLD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Earl of Elgin, while at Tientsin, made any arrangements with the Chinese authorities for the appointment of Foreign Inspectors of Customs at the open Ports, and reserved the right of filling eleven such appointments; and if so, why the correspondence relating to those appointments was not printed in the Blue Book of his Mission; if there is any objection to lay this Correspondence upon the Table of the House, together with the Despatch from Lord Elgin announcing the appointment to the Chinese Customs of the Secretary to his Lordship's Embassy; and if there is any objection to lay upon the Table of the House Copies of the Correspondence from Mr. Bruce on the subject of the Chinese Customs' Foreign Inspectorship, especially as regards the Ports of Canton and Swatow?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, there was no such Correspondence in regard to the appointment of foreign inspectors of Customs, as far as Lord Elgin was concerned, to be found in the Foreign Office. There had been a correspondence with Mr. Bruce on the subject, but as it related chiefly to the objections raised by the American Minister at Canton it would not be right to give it. There had been no correspondence with regard to the appointment of Lord Elgin's secretary to any office connected with the Chinese Customs. The system now at work at Canton and Shanghai was understood to work satisfactorily, but it was not at work at Swatow, because the trade was not opened there. No doubt, however, it would be established there when the trade was opened.

Question, "That this House will, at the rising of the House this day, adjourn till Monday next," put, and agreed to.

REFRESHMENT-HOUSES AND WINE LICENCES BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 12. (Notice of First Application for a Wine Licence for a Refreshment House to be given to Justices, who may object to the granting thereof on grounds to be stated.)

shape in which the numerous additions and Amendments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would place it. It had already been once completely altered, and now the Chancellor of the Exchequer was going to add a new proviso to it. Until they saw it in its complete shape it was impossible to judge of its practicability. It was quite true that most Petty Sessions met more than once a month, and many even every fortnight, but the fact was, it would take so many of these meetings before anything satisfactory could be done. The Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to him to have an idea that having given notice to a magistrate's clerk, the magistrates, when they came together, were to have a kind of intuitive knowledge of every man's character in the district. Magistrates, however, could only obtain that knowledge by inquiry, and inquiries required an outlay not only of time but of money. Then, again, the caveat was to be served. Who was to pay for all this? Somebody must be paid for making inquiries, or the inquiries would be of very little use. It was not to be expected that magistrates were to go poking their noses into every hole and corner. Some machinery must be set on foot to get the required information; somebody would have to ferret the matter out and to report to the magistrates what they thought worthy of stating. He should not offer any opposition to the clause, but the sooner they could have it before them in the shape in which the Government proposed to leave it the better it would be, because they could then all see whether it would be likely to work or not.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he rose to move the Amendment of which he had given notice on the 12th clause. The Bill, as it at present stood, would create a great anomaly. It gave the magistrates the power of refusing or placing a veto on the licence of a winehouse; but that veto was limited to two grounds of objection. He proposed to ask the sanction of the Committee to an Amendment which would give the magistrates the same power of refusing a licence to a winehouse they now possessed with regard to ordinary public-houses. If it was right to take from the magistrates all control over public-house licences, let it be done by a distinct Bill; if it was wrong that they should possess this power over the new wineshops, it must also be wrong that they should exercise it over the common public-houses. If the power was left to them over one class of houses, and not over the other, the law would be rendered impracticable and perfectly ridiculous. The establishments which the Bill would create would combine all the elements of the old public-house; they might combine the eating-house with a beer licence; and then a wine licence might be added to it. This would make the new wineshop, to all intents and purposes, a public-house; for no one knew better than the right hon. Gentleman that spirits would be privately sold at them. But these establishments were to be licensed by the Excise department; the magistrates would have no power of judging whether the requirements of a neighbourhood rendered such houses necessary. Yet the Bill made a concession of this power of deciding according to the requirements of a locality to the Chancellors and authorities of the two Universities. The number of young men attending the lectures of the London University and King's College was large; and there was the whole youth of the Metropolis to be considered. If the controlling power was retained to the heads of the two Universities from consideration of the young men residing in them, why should not the same power be continued to the magistrates in the Metropolis? If they had not exercised their power over licences properly, let the law that gave them the authority be repealed altogether. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had alluded to a case, reported in The Times, in which a person named Langham had applied for a public-house licence, which the magistrates refused. What would be the result of such a case under the present Bill? A man whose application for a public-house licence was refused would immediately take out a wine licence, or a beer licence, with which the magistrates could not interfere, carry on his business, and laugh at the magisterial power altogether. He did not deny that the licensing power of the magistrates might have been abused; if so, let it be abolished altogether. The hon. Member for Westminster (Sir John Shelley), who seemed to be an opponent of the public-house keepers—perhaps because they were opponents of his—was opposed to this magisterial power. But, as the hon. Member for Norfolk said, it was quite ridiculous to suppose that people would get pure claret and chablis in these new wineshops. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said he would gladly exchange the drunkenness of London for the drunkenness of Paris; but every one who knew anything of Paris knew that a cheap liquor of the strongest kind was commonly sold in the estaminets at Paris. But he did not put the question on this ground; he thought that the law as to licences should be applied to both classes of houses, or let it be repealed altogether. But if they confide the power of licensing to the magistrate in one instance, it was only just and fair they should give them the same power in the other.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the words "Wine Licence in line 31, to the word "respectively," inclusive in line 39, in order to insert the words "at the discretion, and upon all or any of the grounds on which they are now entitled to refuse or disallow any Licence by virtue of the Acts now in force regulating the granting of Licences to Public Houses."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could complain neither of the Amendment nor of the manner in which it had been proposed. The hon. and learned Gentleman, in submitting it to the notice of the Committee, had commented on the conduct of the hon. Member for Westminster, who, he suggested, was the opponent of the publicans probably because they were opposed to him; but he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) should very much like to know whether the converse of that proposition held good. Be that, however, as it might, he could not help thinking that it was not necessary to argue at length a question which certainly was a grand question of the debate on the second reading of the Bill. Anything in the shape of restraint—anything in the way of showing cause why licences should not issue the Committee would be willing to entertain; but there could be no doubt that the pith and marrow of the Amendment lay in opposing the principle which was adopted by the House in the second reading. The hon. and learned Gentleman had cited the example of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, but in those cases there were vested rights secured by ancient charters from which those corporate bodies derived considerable revenues, and he was sure the House would not destroy these beneficial interests by a bye-blow. The whole question raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman was involved in the three operative words of the Amendment "at their discretion," and it was the question of discretion that was disposed of on the second reading of the Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman had said, "Let us

been refused by the magistrates on the ground of his keeping a disorderly house. Let him suppose that upon that refusal he had taken a house in the immediate neighbourhood of that which he had formerly occupied, and obtained a licence, as he might do under the present Bill. He might make it an eating-house; the magistrates could not call it a disorderly house, for it had not been previously occupied, and a licence would be granted. They might make the law as strong as they pleased, but to a certain extent it would be evaded, and their only security would be to give the magistrates the initiative. He frankly owned that his objection to the magistrates was not as to what they had done in the initiative, but in respect of what they had omitted to do by way of check. They had paid too much respect to vested interests. When houses became disorderly, magistrates had no more reason to respect vested interests. At that moment the magistrates ought to interfere most stringently; and where there were two or three convictions for a disorderly house, they should proceed against the house itself. He did not admit the right of old charters to introduce immorality and disorder into the Metropolis. Three or four of the very worst places in London were under the free vintners, or they would long ago have been put down by the magistrates. So long as character was left out of this clause, it became an imperfect means of putting a check on these houses; he should therefore support the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that with reference to what had been stated of him in connection with the licensed victuallers, he begged leave to say he had that respect for the licensed victuallers of the Metropolis to be convinced that if they saw a person stand up manfully maintaining his opinions, though these might not entirely coincide with their own, they were not at all likely to form a worse judgment of him. He was bound as a representative of the people to look to the general good of the community; and his firm belief was the public would derive the greatest possible advantage from these refreshment-houses. The Amendment sought to put these refreshment-houses entirely under the jurisdiction of the magistrates, who were to have the right or discretion of saying how many houses should be licensed for the sale of refreshments. The magistrates from the agricultural parts of Middlesex had no real means of knowing what number of refreshment-houses were required in any particular district of the Metropolis, and therefore he entirely objected to a discretionary power being placed in the hands of the magistrates. The number of refreshment-houses in any district would soon find their own level. Whether he lay under the imputation of acting for or against the licensed victuallers, he should certainly oppose this Motion.

MR. KER SEYMER said, he believed the adoption of this Motion would tend to create a new set of vested interests, and they had enough of vested interests to deal with already. If the magistrates had power to decide how many houses should have these licences, in the Strand, for instance, or Holborn, the houses so licensed would speedily acquire that mysterious value now attached to the establishments of the licensed victuallers. If they ever wished to adopt the recommendations of the Committee let them reject the present Motion.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he thought that this clause embodied almost more objectionable features than any that he had ever seen. The irresponsible power proposed to be lodged in the hands of magistrates would bring down a great deal of blame upon them. If they were to give magistrates any power they had better give them power under the licensing system as it at present stood, but it was not fair to throw upon them a duty which they could not exercise without subjecting themselves to blame.

MR. AYRTON said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not entitled to quote the decision of the House on the second reading of the Bill in favour of this clause; because that right hon. Gentleman had undertaken, if they only consented to go into Committee, to make all sorts of amendments, obviating almost every conceivable objection. It was said the present licensing system ought not to continue, because a Committee had recommended that it should be changed. Nothing, however, could be more unjust or more impracticable than the plan suggested by that Committee—namely, that every public-house in the Metropolis should pay £30 before it was licensed; and every public-house in other parts of the country only £8. All experience showed that the discretion given to the justices in this matter should be as absolute as that proposed by this Amendment. Since the Norman conquest, and probably long before it, houses for the sale of beer and wine had been under the strict control of the law; and, instead of relieving them from existing restraints, those restraints ought rather to be strengthened. If the justices did not now discharge their duty in regulating these places, let us have a law to make them; or, at all events, their functions might be remitted to the inhabitants of each locality. There was no more important duty which the magistracy could perform than that of repressing intemperance; and the better portion of the working classes desired to see stringent restrictions applied to places where the people now gathered together and were incited to drink to excess. If the magistracy were not prepared to co-operate in the promotion of public morality, let their powers for this object be confided to other hands. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said they must create increased channels for the abundant supplies of foreign wines which he anticipated. That argument only showed the necessity for taking additional precautions against abuse. By their legislation they might easily prevent the setting up of any of those new vested interests which appeared to frighten hon. Gentlemen. The conduct of Government on this question was anything but frank or satisfactory. Why did they not bring in a measure to consolidate and amend the whole of our law relating to the sale of intoxicating drinks? At all events, that law ought to be left as it stood, until it was revised with a view to the end for which it was designed—the repression of intemperance, not the filling of the public coffers.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, that in this case the Excise was to grant the licence, though a sort of veto was given to the magistrates. This hybrid form of uniting together the two kinds of licence would produce great confusion. The competition likely to be created would be pernicious to public morals, and would render it more difficult to deal hereafter with the whole subject in a comprehensive measure, framed in accordance with the Report of a Select Committee. He should vote for the hon. Gentleman's proposal, because he thought it would be well to put the matter on something like an intelligible footing.

SIR WILLIAM MILES said, they were now in a transition state. The plan of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was much better than that of the Beer-houses Act. It gave to the magistrates the power of regulating these refreshment-houses; and the result would be to make those places far more orderly than the existing beer-houses. The Bill gave everybody who did not wish to frequent either a beer-house or a public-house the opportunity of partaking of wine in moderation. ["Ob, oh!"] Well, it might be without moderation. But that was a point that depended entirely upon the taste of those who frequented these houses. The measure should have his best support. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman was one which the Government could not support, and he trusted that they would go to the division as the friends or enemies of the Bill.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 154, Noes 117: Majority 37.

MR. HUNT said, he proposed to insert in the clause words authorizing the refusal of a licence in cases in which the applicant had within three years been convicted of any offence, or had within that period kept a common inn, alehouse, or victualling-house, and been refused a renewal of his licence.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL suggested that the word "misdemeanour" should be substituted for "offence" in the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had no objection to the substance of the Amendment, but thought that it ought to have been introduced earlier in the clause.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he thought that "offence" was too large a term. Anything was an offence, even the infraction of a Road Act.

MR. PULLER suggested that the disqualification should be a conviction for felony, for any offence punishable by transportation or penal servitude, or for keeping a disorderly house.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought the objection taken by the hon. Member for Sheffield was a good one. There might be offences which did not really imply criminality.

MR. HUNT would extend his Amendment, so that the disqualification should apply to the case of persons convicted of any offences punishable by imprisonment.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER suggested a further addition—"coupled with hard labour."

MR. AYRTON thought the words should be "convicted of an offence which, in the opinion of the justices, ought to disqualify him from holding a licence."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL suggested that the word should be "a misdemeanour punishable by fine or imprisonment."

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, it was a misdemeanour punishable by fine or imprisonment for a person to sleep in the open air when he had no house to be in. Was that to be a disqualification to last three years?

MR. PEACOCKE said, a subscriber to the fund for Garibaldi's expedition would be punishable by fine or imprisonment, and if the Solicitor General's suggestion were adopted he would be unable to keep a public-house for three years.

MR. HARDY said, he thought that the hon. and learned Solicitor General would, by the substitution of this word, lead to a division where no difference really existed. The offence referred to in the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hunt) must be a misdemeanour, as it could not be a felony or high treason.

MR. MELLOR said, though he thought the word misdemeanour was not quite applicable to the case, he quite agreed with his learned Friend the Solicitor General that there were many offences, such as offences against the Highway Act, which would not come within the class proposed to exclude a person from taking out the licence.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR suggested the words "misdemeanour, or other offence punishable by imprisonment."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he proposed to add, after the word "respects," the words, "And the clerks of the said justices shall be entitled to receive a sum to be fixed by the justices, not exceeding 2s. 6d. for each licence." The object of his Amendment was to create a fund to reimburse the clerks of the justices for the extra duties they would have to perform.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, the hon. Member for Greenwich ought to have given notice of the Amendment, but as he had not done so it ought to be postponed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved at the end of the clause the insertion of a provision rendering it lawful for the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and justices respectively pending their decision on any objection aforesaid, to transmit to the supervisor before the expiration of thirty days a notice by way of caveat against the granting of the licence, and in that case the licence should not be granted if within the further period of thirty days the objection to the granting of the licence should be confirmed by the said Lord Mayor, aldermen, or justices, and notice thereof given to the said supervisor.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he would suggest that a form of caveat should be inserted in a schedule.

Motion agreed to.

On Question that the Clause as amended stand part of the Bill,

SIR WILLIAM JOLIFFE said, that in the Metropolitan districts the power which they were now granting to the magistrates would neither benefit the public nor improve the regulation of these houses. The caveat would have no beneficial effect whatever. He would prefer to see the clause expunged altogether.

Clause as amended, agreed to.

Clause 13. (Notice to be given of Application for Licence to retail Wine to be consumed on the Premises in a House not previously licensed.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was not thought desirable to provide an appeal from the decision on original applications for licences, but with respect to applications for the renewal of licences it was considered advisable to provide appeal. He, therefore, proposed to introduce words giving an appeal with regard to renewals from Petty Sessions to the next General Quarter Sessions, but requiring that notice of objection to such renewal should be given three months before the time of renewal.

LORD LOVAINE suggested that such a proposition would give three months' impunity to persons who improperly conducted their business.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied, that as to all positive offences the present law would apply, and it was only fair that some such notice should be given.

MR. HUNT drew attention to the additional expense that would be imposed upon the magistrates to defend their decision.

MR. AYRTON observed that possibly the offence which made a renewal objectionable might occur within three months of the expiration of the licence.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER admitted that might happen, but the only alternative would be to deprive persons of the power of continuing their business during the pendency of the appeal, which would not be just.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

MR. P. W. MARTIN moved the following clause—

“That from and after the passing of this Act there shall be repealed the 12th Clause of an Act passed in the twenty-fourth year of the reign of his late Majesty King Geo. II., c. 40, and commonly called the Tippling Act.”

His object was to prevent persons who bought a bottle or two of wine or spirits at a time of an innkeeper instead of a wine merchant, on credit, to be consumed in their own private houses or lodgings, from afterwards pleading the Tippling Act. The peculiarity was that this was not done by the persons described in the preamble of the Act of George II. as of the “poorer and baser sort,” but persons in a class of life who ought to have known better.

MR. HARDY said, he objected to the hon. Gentleman's proposition, because the clause in question had been found most useful in its operation, for it had prevented publicans from imposing on poor men who, sitting in their houses till a late hour, at last got into such a state of intoxication that they really could not remember what they had had, and were therefore unable to swear that they had not had the quantity of drink for which in many cases they would, but for the operation of this clause, be sued. But also if the clause were repealed it would tend to increase drunkenness, for publicans, knowing that they could not recover for small quantities of drink supplied in such a manner, refused to give credit, and so the amount of drink consumed was limited.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he considered the clause not applicable to the Bill, the object of which was the sale of wine. He hoped the clause would not be pressed.

MR. AYRTON said, he trusted the Tippling Act would not be repealed under any circumstances.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he would then propose the following clause:—

“That from and after the passing of this Act, sec. 7 of 5 & 6 Will. IV., c. 39, shall be and the same is hereby repealed.”

His object was to place persons who sold spirits and beer in theatres on the same footing with licensed victuallers, over whom they had now an advantage with regard to the mode of obtaining a licence.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the proposed Amendment referred to matters not touched upon by the present Bill, and therefore it would be improper to add such a clause to it.

MR. AYRTON said, he hoped the hon. and learned Member would be able to introduce his Amendment in the Bill in another shape, as the practice he proposed to deal with was a great scandal and disgrace.

MR. HUME moved, That the Chairman report progress.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not persist in his Motion. He had several clauses to propose, which, if introduced, would make the Bill complete, and enable hon. Members to judge of it as a whole, and it was of importance that that should be done now.

LORD FERMOY said, the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) was believed by many to be of great importance. He, therefore, hoped it would be understood that an opportunity would be given for its discussion on the Report.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there would be no difficulty upon that point.

MR. HARDY said, he hoped that the Motion for reporting progress would be withdrawn, so that they might have the Bill printed in a complete form.

MR. HUME said, he would withdraw his Motion for reporting progress, on the understanding that the Bill should be re-committed with the new clauses in it.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) would be in order in moving his clause respecting theatres on the Report.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved a clause to the effect that a wine licence should be forfeited on a second conviction within two years.

Clause agreed to.

On the Schedule,

MR. AYRTON said, he would propose to insert in the licence that the main and chief business carried on should be the sale of food. Unless some such condition were expressed the sale of a few biscuits would entitle a person to a wine licence.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER could not agree to the proposal. He did not think it desirable to make the Excise the judges whether eating was the main and chief business of the house. The Justices, too, would not look to the licence, but to the Act of Parliament. The form of licence for a refreshment-house was, after some further conversation, agreed to, as was also that for the sale of wine to be consumed on the premises.

MR. WARNER said, he thought the objection raised by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets was valid. The law would be evaded if the words were not inserted.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT suggested that the sale of wine under this licence should be placed under the same restriction as to hours as that for the sale of wine to be consumed on the premises.

SIR MORTON PETO approved of the suggestion.

MR. AYRTON thought it would be better for the Government to bring in a comprehensive measure to regulate the new system of morality that was to be established under this Bill.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would shut up the houses of the licensed victuallers at the same time as the winehouses.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER admitted that there was some force in the observation of the hon. Member for Sheffield. They could not, however, insert anything in a schedule which they had not enacted in the clauses of the Bill.

Schedule agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Monday next.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHARITIES BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. BOWYER said, he would move that this Bill be committed pro forma, in order that certain additional clauses which had been proposed by the Attorney General on the part of the Government might be printed. He stated that the measure was simply a conveyancing Bill, and involved no important principle.

House in Committee.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he hoped that as this Bill involved a number of serious considerations, and the repeal of many Acts, the Government would give an opportunity for its full consideration.

MR. BOWYER observed, that it was merely a conveyancing Bill to remedy certain defects of title in Roman Catholic trusts. He would suggest its reconsideration that day week. It involved no principle.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he must object to that course, as it would be calculated to postpone the discussion of the Bill, and pass it without any.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the Bill was the Bill of the hon. Member for Dundalk, and he would fix the day for the consideration of the Bill in Committee.

Amendments inserted.

Bill reported; re-committed for Thursday next.

The House resumed.

INNKEEPERS' LIABILITY BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he should oppose the Bill. The law as it stood was now clear, but the proposed Bill would only superinduce confusion. It proposed to limit the liability of innkeepers with respect to goods deposited with them by guests to £40. He moved that the Chairman report progress.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, at present innkeepers were subject to great injustice, who were compelled to receive guests at any hour; and, whatever property they might bring with them, the innkeeper was liable to the full amount. He thought his liability should be reduced to a reasonable amount.

COLONEL SMYTHIE said, he should support the Bill, though he thought £40 too high a sum.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped the Chairman would be allowed to report progress.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he had several Amendments to propose.

MR. WHITESIDE observed, that the hon. Baronet ought to have given notice of his Amendments.

The House resumed.

THE EXPEDITION TO CHINA.

QUESTION.

EARL GREY wished, before the business of the evening commenced, to put some questions to the noble Earl (Earl Granville), of which he had given him notice. He wanted to know—first, whether or not the expedition sent to China would be at the charge of the British Government from the date of embarkation; next, whether the English regiments sent to China would be entitled to Indian pay and allowances while serving in China with troops from India; and, thirdly, whether any provision had been made for placing the expenses of the Indian regiments and the extra pay of British regiments serving in China in any Estimate laid before Parliament.

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to say that the British regiments serving in China would be entitled to Indian pay and allowances, and that no such Estimate as the noble Earl had referred to had been as yet laid before Parliament.

PAPER DUTY REPEAL BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read,

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I rise to move the second reading of a Bill the object of which is to repeal a tax which has now existed for nearly 150 years. That tax, as stated in the preamble of the first Act, was imposed for the purpose of enabling Her Majesty Queen Anne to carry on the war then raging, and it was to continue until she had secured a lasting peace. Contemporary writers, however, inform us that the real object of the Bill was, in conjunction with other taxes that were levied at the same time, to impose restrictions on the press, which was at that time thought too licentious. It is curious that Swift, the great Tory writer and the friend of the Ministry then in power, complained of this proceeding both in verse and in prose. In verse, in some lines, describing himself, he said,—

“ His works are hawked in every street,
But seldom rise above one sheet;
Of late, indeed, the paper-stamp
Did very much his genius cramp.”

In prose, in his history of the last four years of Queen's Anne's reign, there is a passage, which is too long to read to your Lordships, but which is well worthy of attention, arguing, upon Conservative grounds, against the expediency of throwing any difficulty in the way of cheap publications of a political character. The tax, however, with some modifications, has continued to our time. In 1832 an agitation was begun against it. In 1835 a Royal Commission, of which Sir Henry Parnell was at the head, was appointed to examine into the effects of this tax among others. They reported in favour of some modifications, and also the reduction of the duty by one-half. That reduction accordingly took place, was followed by an enormously increased consumption, and, what is more remarkable, by a diminution in the price of paper to double the amount of the duty repealed. The Commissioners, in their Report, begged it should not be thought that they approved the tax, and they hoped the time would soon come when Parliament would be able to repeal the tax altogether. Motions were then made in the House of Commons on the subject. Two years ago an abstract Resolution was adopted there; and, although in general abstract Resolutions respecting taxation are not very desirable, it was adopted with the full concurrence of the late Government through their representatives in the House of Commons. Her Majesty's present Ministers decided upon the repeal of the tax this Session. They brought forward a proposal to that effect in the House of Commons; it has in different shapes gone through the ordeal of three divisions in the House; and it now comes here for your Lordships' approval. On any ordinary occasion I should have satisfied myself with the short history I have given of this tax, trusting that your Lordships would be glad to take your share, whatever that may be, in the work of relieving the people from a burden of this character. Considering, however, the Notice which has been given by my noble Friend below me (Lord Monteaagle), and the energetic assurance given by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) that he would not only Vote for but would use all his endeavours in the support of the noble Baron's Motion, I think it necessary to trouble your Lordships at much greater length than I should otherwise have wished on this subject. I must first briefly refer to the objections which are likely to be brought against this Bill. From a Report that I have read of what took place elsewhere on Saturday I have reason to suppose that the noble Earl does not intend to go much into the merits or demerits of this tax. I was quite prepared for this course, because the noble Earl, no doubt, felt that it was impossible to say anything in favour of a tax of which the leading Members of the late Government had expressed themselves in favour of the repeal. Lord Stanley, whose opinions on any question affecting the social state of the country are so liberal and unprejudiced, has long been known as a warm advocate of the repeal of this tax. Sir Bulwer Lytton, equally distinguished as an able public man and man of letters, has been most eloquent in his denunciations of the tax, and to him the country owe the happy and true definition of this impost as a tax upon knowledge. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer, in opposition voted for the repeal of the tax; when in office he stated that it combined moral as well as physical objections, and, as leader of the House, he agreed to the Resolution to which I have just referred, and which declared that paper was not a fit subject of permanent taxation. With regard to the noble Earl himself I am informed by the report of what took place, as well as by a gentleman who was present, that the noble Earl, in answer to a deputation which waited upon him on a previous occasion, declared that he only repeated his former impressions when he stated that this tax was bad in principle and bad in practice. I am not therefore surprised at his determination to refrain now from entering into the merits of the tax; but, as I do not know what view may be taken by other noble Lords on the subject it will be necessary that I should state as shortly as I can what are some of the principal objections to it. There is a phrase used by Lord Stanley which so well describes the operation of the tax that I should almost wish to take it as the text of the objections which may be advanced to it. He stated that the tax was vexatious in collection, that it impeded improvements in manufacture, that it heightened the price of an article, the demand for which already exceeded the supply, and pressed injuriously on the supply of cheap literature and the diffusion of news. As to its being vexatious in collection, I must refer to the Report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue published on the 1st of March in the present year. I see the noble Baron smile; but I do trust that in this House we shall not hear the insinuations which have been thrown out elsewhere, that this is not the deliberate opinion of the Commissioners, but a Report "got up to order." To prevent the repetition here of a statement so derogatory to the gentlemen of high character who compose the Board of Inland Revenue I will state what I have ascertained on this point. I went to Somerset House for the purpose of making inquiry on the subject, and what I found to be the case was this:—Very soon after the passing of the Resolution agreed to by the late Government the difficulties in the way of collecting the tax daily became greater. Towards the beginning of this year the Board were beset with applications for exemptions to which they were unable to give any answer whatever; and in this dilemma, not knowing whether the Government meant to repeal the tax or not, they appointed some of their most able and practical officers to examine into the question and see whether they could frame any regulations with regard to its collection which might be draughted into a Bill, and which, if approved by Parliament, might enable them to collect the tax with something like justice. Afterwards, when the Government, acting partly on the opinion of the Board of Inland Revenue, and partly from reasons to which I shall presently advert, came to the determination of repealing the tax, a debate took place in the House of Commons, and Mr. Walpole said that, comparing the former Report of the Board with the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he did not think these were perfectly consistent. Upon this the Commissioners drew up their Report perfectly spontaneously, and without the slightest communication with the Chancellor of the Exchequer or any other Member of the Government. I shall be confirmed that this is as the opinion of the Commissioners by the noble Earl opposite, as he can tell your Lordships that during the time he was in office, letters were constantly received at the Treasury from the Commissioners bearing exactly on the same point. [The Earl of DERBY intimated doubt.] If the noble Earl does not know it, I can assure him that it is the fact. I will not read the whole of the Report—I will read only a few sentences. The Commissioners say—

"We beg leave to state that it is our deliberate opinion that the paper duty (to use the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer) 'is rapidly becoming untenable'; and we hope to satisfy your Lordships that this opinion is not inconsistent with those which we have previously expressed on the subject."

Again, they say—

"In our third Report, however (that of last year), we were compelled to draw your Lordships' attention to the very great and increasing embarrassments in which we were involved in collecting this tax. We pointed out that this state of things was attributable in a great measure to the condemnation of the duty by a Resolution of the House of Commons, and we might perhaps have added that the evils of which we complained had been accumulating for many years previously under the prevalence of a general impression that the duty on paper would be given up on the very first available opportunity. We endeavoured to show how impossible it was, under these circumstances, to apply to Parliament for power to subject new branches of the trade to excise regulations."

They go on to say—

"And at the same time how unjust it was to allow to one an exemption from this duty and survey, which alone prevented a rival branch from successful competition in the market."

The Commissioners proceed to point out the difficulties with which the collection of the duties is beset, and when it comes to this, that those charged with the administration of the laws are unable to discharge their duty without injustice, which cannot be remedied it is time that the tax should be brought to an end. The whole of the Report is well worthy of your Lordships' attention, as showing the excessive injustice and inequality of the tax, and the necessity to which they were driven to exercise an arbitrary decision, there being no definition of "paper" sufficiently clear. The noble Earl opposite in the course of the answer he made to the deputation that waited on him on Saturday last, stated that he had received intimations of a contrary character from publishers, booksellers, and newspaper proprietors, and stated that he was intrusted with petitions from Irish newspaper proprietors on the subject. I can explain this matter to your Lordships, and the petitions of the Irish newspaper proprietors need not have very great effect on your Lordships' minds. The Irish newspapers only pay three farthings tax, and the English newspapers pay 1*d.* stamp duty; and the Irish newspaper proprietors had been told that if they were relieved from the necessity of buying dear paper, it would be only fair to put them on an equality with the English newspaper proprietors. With respect to the opposition of the manufacturers to the repeal of this tax, we all know what happened on the abolition of the excise duty on glass—how, by the competition that arose, that material was cheapened, and how it increased in quantity and improved in quality; but its immediate effect on the profits of the manufacturers was not favourable, in consequence of the competition which was there-

encouraged. I know that with regard to the material from which paper may be made, some persons declare that fibre is not applicable to the manufacture of the finer and better sort of paper. Still it is applicable to the manufacture of a paper most useful to the poorer classes of persons. I remember four or five years ago a very interesting discussion being brought on in this House respecting the manufacture of beautiful paper from West Indian fibre; and a complaint was made by the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) that a charter of limited liability had not been granted to a company for the manufacture of that paper. Now, it appears to me a clumsy proceeding to put a tax on one side, and then to prop it up by some special privilege on the other. There are several very ingenious inventions waiting to come into operation as soon as the excise duty shall be abolished. Pulp may be used for forming models from works of art, some of the finer kinds of which are liable to be hurt by contact with clay or plaster of Paris. This pulp is applicable to any work of art without injury; but it is obliged to be dry before it leaves the paper-maker, and, therefore, until the duty shall be repealed, it would be absolutely impossible to use it for the purpose I have indicated. I have been informed within the last day or two, that a large mill in Lincolnshire, owned by a person named Sharpe, has been built to turn twitch, that most destructive weed to the farmer, into paper; but the tax interferes so much with the process that the owner has been compelled to shut up the mill. If the duty were repealed, the mill would be reopened. And instances of a similar kind are, I am told, very numerous. The duty operates also in a peculiar way in creating a monopoly, owing to the manner in which the payment of the duty is made to press on the mill-owners, in consequence of purchases made from them shortly before the moment when the duty must be paid. When I look abroad and see that in America all the processes of papermaking are infinitely superior to ours, that the paper is made much cheaper, and that the consumption is something like treble of ours per head, then, considering the wealth and enterprise of this country, I think there must be some reason for this. When I advert to France and note the enormous quantities of paper exported from that country, and when I remark that the French paper is superior for printing purposes, the same reflection forces itself on my mind; and so, when I go in imagination to Japan, or read the interesting book written by Captain Osborn, in reference to that country. Captain Osborn says, in the interesting volume he has recently published :—

"It was wonderful to see the thousand useful as well as ornamental purposes to which paper was applicable in the hands of these industrious and tasteful people. Our papier-maché manufacturers, as well as the Continental ones, should go to Yedo to learn what can be done with paper. We saw it made into material so closely resembling Russian and Morocco leather and pig-skin, that it was very difficult to detect the difference. With the aid of lacker-varnish and skilful painters paper makes excellent trunks, tobacco-bags, cigar-cases, saddles, telescope-cases, the frames of microscopes, and we even saw and used excellent water-proof coats made of simple paper, which did keep out the rain, and were as supple as the best Macintosh. The Japanese use neither silk nor cotton handkerchiefs, towels, or dusters; paper in their hands serves as an excellent substitute. It is soft, thin, tough, of a pale yellow colour, very plentiful and very cheap. The inner walls of many a Japanese apartment are formed of paper, being nothing more than painted screens, their windows are covered with a fine translucent description of the same material; it enters largely into the manufacture of nearly everything in a Japanese household; and we saw what seemed balls of twine, which were nothing but long shreds of tough paper rolled up. If a shopkeeper had a parcel to tie up, he would take a strip of paper, roll it quickly between his hands, and use it for the purpose, and it was quite as strong as the ordinary string used at home. In short, without paper all Japan would come to a dead-lock; and, indeed, lest by the arbitrary exercise of his authority a tyrannical husband should stop his wife's paper, the sage Japanese mothers-in-law invariably stipulate, in the marriage settlement, that the bride is to have allowed to her a certain quantity of paper."

I think the fact of a great enterprising nation like ours being, in respect to the manufacture of paper, behind the Americans, the French and the Japanese may, without any great stretch of imagination, be attributed to the effect which we know the Excise laws produce in other matters. I will now come to the last branch of the subject—namely, the effect which the repeal of the duty will probably have upon cheap publications. On this subject some people have the most extraordinary notions, thinking that that repeal is merely advocated to give a greater circulation to a particular newspaper, expressing extreme views, not certainly in accordance with those held by the majority of your Lordships. What is the case? In London there are three cheap daily papers,—The Morning Star, a journal of advanced Liberal opinions; The Daily Telegraph, also a Liberal paper, but not on all questions with The Morning Star; and the Standard, a journal of purely Conservative principles. I had the pleasure days ago of reading an interesting well-written article in The Standard attacking the Liberal party in general, and myself in particular. Well, I have a letter written in 1858 by the proprietor of The Standard, stating that he paid £29 to the Excise, and paper duty were repealed he would save £20 for the better remuneration of his extraordinary talent and the purchase of material to print upon, leaving, of course, a larger profit for the proprietors. He also points out the obligation placed upon newspapers like The Standard in the obligation to have their paper of certain sizes dried before the paper-mill, and damped again in the printing-office, all causing great waste of labour and money. He adds that if the paper duty were abolished, he has not the slightest doubt that the circulation of The Standard would be doubled in amount. That, I think, is a consummation which noble Lord must earnestly desire to bring about, because it means that with great talent Conservative principles spread among double the numbers. So with respect to books, paper duty presses very lightly upon popular novels in three volumes, and even more so upon annually got up annuals, and works of the sort, and costly works—such as Caesar's History or Mahon's History of England. But, when we come to books intended for circulation among the poorer classes of the community, the effect of the tax upon them is very great. Instead of 5 or 10 per cent, as upon the publications purchased by the rich, the duty rises to 30, 40, 50, or 60 per cent upon publications which the working classes desire and ought to have. Mr. Black, the eminent publisher of Edinburgh, says that upon one work he has paid duty to the amount of 10s. and he calculates that the tax increases the price of the book at least 25 per cent, a statement which is, of course, applicable to smaller books. You know that Mr. Knight has been all his life in endeavouring to put cheap and instructive books at the disposal of the people. He was the author of the Penny Cyclopædia, a work under the patronage of a noble Lord who is at this moment in the cause of education—a cause which he has served during a long and laborious life—and whose absence I regret to-night, because I know he entertains a strong opinion as to the necessity of the immediate abolition of the paper duty and an equally strong objection to the course which is proposed to be taken by this House to-night. What does Mr. Knight say? He states that in twenty years he spent £80,000 on authorship, and £50,000 on Excise. The Messrs. Chambers say they have been constantly prevented issuing cheap publications of an improving character in consequence of the paper duty. They once published a series of instructive tracts sold at three halfpence per copy. The sale was enormous, but after a certain time they found, on making up their books, that they had paid £5,000 to the Excise without getting a single farthing in the way of profit to themselves, and therefore, in the middle of an immense circulation, they stopped the publication. I could go on thus for ever. Here is a bulky pamphlet full of details, in which Mr. Knight proves to demonstration that, while the tax on paper falls with crushing effect upon cheap publications of an instructive character, it does nothing whatever to stop licentious and obscene books, which are got up for a mere trifle. But let me come to a class of books which greatly interest me—the National School books. The duty upon them is quite enormous, and while these school books, on one side, are paying a heavy tax, I, in my office, on the other, am administering Government grants to counteract that effect. It is impossible to conceive a more ridiculous system. I have been given to understand that the son of the noble Marquess opposite is prepared to advocate a relaxation of the duty as regards school books; but the noble Marquess will agree with me that while we should be glad to see school books cheapened, and they have a better right to be exempted from duty, than books in the northern languages, which are now so by law, it would not be advisable to add to the list of exemptions by which the law is already broken down, or to the difficulties of the book last issued by the Privy Council. I am afraid I am wearying your Lordships, but you can hardly imagine the immense mass of materials I have before me all tending to the same point—the condemnation of this most vexatious and unjust tax. But I shall spare your Lordships, and shall assume that the main objection to the repeal of the paper duty is one of a financial character. Some of your Lordships may think that we ought to have reduced the tea and sugar duties instead of repealing the duty on paper. That is a matter of opinion which it is perfectly competent and perfectly fair for any noble Lord to express. All I can say is, that after mature consideration the Government came to the conclusion that the repeal of the paper duty would afford the greatest amount of relief to the trade and industry of the country. I must add that they were peculiarly urged to that conclusion by the Report of the Excise Commissioners, stating that the tax was untenable in its present shape and that it could not be improved. Again, some of your Lordships may be of opinion that we ought to have taken a less income tax and to have retained the paper duty. That question was started in the other House of Parliament, it was discussed there at considerable length, and decided in the negative; therefore I need not trouble your Lordships with any remarks upon it. I am not aware that there can be any other financial objection to our proposal except this, that the Government have been improvident in arranging for the financial necessities of the year; which must mean either that we were improvident at the time our Budget was produced, or that the circumstances which have since occurred have stamped that character upon our propositions. Now, I am not going to make a long financial statement to your Lordships. There has never yet been a case of that kind recorded to have taken place in this House, though from the precedent proposed to be set to-night, I am not sure that it will not become the custom to trouble you with elaborate financial expositions. In that case I trust that a Vice-Chancellor of the Exchequer will be appointed for the purpose of supplying you with that information which must be requisite to enable your Lordships to adjust the balance between income and expenditure. Meanwhile, as that course has not yet been adopted, I feel myself entirely relieved from the obligation of inflicting upon your Lordships the intolerable tedium of a Budget speech from my mouth, and shall content myself with merely stating the general principles upon which the Government have acted in dealing with the finances for the year—a year, be it remembered, so difficult that I believe it was looked forward to by the late Government under the awful designation of “the year of immortal smash." Well, my Lords, this year of immortal smash presents, at all events, one remarkable peculiarity. Our Naval and Military Estimates are larger than has ever before been known in a time of peace. To provide for that vast outlay the Government were not content to frame a plan which should only just make the two ends meet, but they proposed, while raising an adequate revenue, to continue those commercial reforms and improvements which not only have conferred enormous benefits upon the nation at large, but which have produced a peculiar and extraordinary strength and elasticity in our revenue, especially in our indirect taxation. I do not know what your Lordships can see improvident in our Budget arrangements. The only possible objection to our financial policy in this respect must be connected with the question which has already been put to me this afternoon—the probable expense of the Chinese war. Now, when we made our Budget arrangements, we did not know whether we should have war with China or not. [Earl GREY : Hear, hear !] The noble Lord gives a most insulting cheer upon a matter of fact; but it is a fact that up to ten minutes ago the Government have continued to be—and necessarily so—ignorant whether there was war or peace. We had given orders for the fitting out of an expedition; but we did not know whether that expedition would end in a war-like or an amicable way—a question, indeed, which I could answer ten minutes ago from private information only. The noble-Earl's cheer, therefore, was quite uncalled for. No doubt an expedition was ordered to be prepared, and some of your Lordships seem to think that we did not provide for the expense of that expedition. That was not the case. Last year there was taken a Vote of credit for £850,000—a Vote of credit only applicable when all supplies in connection with the ordinary service is exhausted—and this year a similar Vote of £500,000 was put in the Estimates. In addition to this, the Army Estimates include, for the purposes of the Chinese expedition, a sum of £454,000, and the Navy Estimates a sum of £680,000, forming altogether, as nearly as possible, a sum of £2,500,000, provided for that expedition. Do your Lordships think that it would have been wise to make an enormous provision on that account? We have generally been accustomed to do too much in that direction. What was the case in the Crimean war? That we so much exceeded what was necessary for the purposes of the war that we ended by paying back £1,600,000 into the Exchequer. If there is any one principle in finance which appears to me to be sound and indisputable, it is that you should either have a war Budget or a peace Budget. If you have a war Budget, everything is exceptional; but if you have a peace Budget, it should be founded upon peace principles, to this extent—if there is any danger, if there is any cloud upon the horizon, it rests with the responsible Government to provide those armaments, those numbers of men on land and at sea, and those stores which may, in their opinion, be necessary to provide against contingencies, and also to provide for the raising of the sums of money required to meet the expenditure occasioned by such preparations; but if you go beyond that, and take large and undefined sums for large and indefinite contingencies, you act contrary to sound principles, and you become liable to this great practical inconvenience—that if, fortunately, you should be disappointed in your fears, you have a sum of one, two, three, or four millions, whichever it may be, which, according to the spirit of the law, should, at the end of the year, be applied to the reduction of the National Debt. Now, I ask your Lordships whether it would have been wise at the beginning of the year, when you were asking for an enormous revenue of an almost unprecedented character, to burden the people with additional taxes, the product of which might possibly be applied merely to the discharge of debt? My Lords, I am aware of no other charge of improvidence which can be made against the original Budget; but it may be said that since its publication circumstances have altered. I know of one circumstance, which I will mention, and which tells against me in this argument; other matters have been referred to as to which we were informed at the time the Budget was framed, and which were amply provided for. There was the question of the national defences. A Commission had been appointed to inquire what was necessary to be done to defend our principal arsenals. We knew of the Report of that Commission when the Budget was framed; we know of it now, and I am happy to say that we have at last got all the collateral information which will enable Her Majesty's Government to come to a decision upon it. Well, one of these things will happen—

either we shall reject that Report, and the finances will be completely untouched, except as regards the large and unusual sum taken for current purposes of fortification; or we shall adopt it in one of two ways. If we adopt it and come upon the current revenue to provide the means necessary for carrying it out, it is clear that it will require a greater provision than the £800,000 included in the Estimates, or than the £1,500,000 which the noble Earl stated to the deputation the other day was the amount of revenue which he was going to save the country—and really when the noble Earl undertakes to teach the Government their duty, in finance it is no light matter to state Estimates at half a million more than their actual amount. If, on the other hand, we determine to adopt the Report, and to borrow money for the purpose of carrying out its recommendations, then the large Vote for fortifications which is already before the House of Commons is sufficient, at any rate, to pay the proportion which will be required during the present year. Since the month of February the question of the China war has remained in the same position in which it then stood, and until this afternoon we could not tell whether there would be peace or war; nay, we now know nothing more, except that, from the tenor of a private telegram, there is reason to fear that hostilities are likely to take place. We cannot, however, tell whether the war will be short and successful, and therefore rather a benefit to the finances of next year than otherwise, in consequence of an indemnity to be obtained from China; or whether it will be prolonged over next year, and, therefore, require a Budget for war. I am now going to state a circumstance which I feel tells against me. The estimated surplus amounted to £460,000. Owing to there being an error in the calculations of one of the departments of the revenue amounting to £230,000, and to the abandonment of taxes to the amount of £180,000, that surplus is very nearly gone. [Earl GREY: Hear, hear!] I am glad to hear my noble Friend cheer in a more cheerful manner this time; but has my noble Friend any reason to suppose that it is a perfectly unusual circumstance that during the passage of a Budget through the Houses of Parliament the surplus should disappear? I think that if he will refer to the records of our proceedings he will find a great many instances in which that has occurred without the Government thinking it necessary to modify their financial proposals in consequence. I will give an instance. In the year 1853 the estimated surplus, and more than the estimated surplus, utterly disappeared before the financial measures were passed through this House. I remember that two noble Earls opposite in the strongest language the remission of the soap duties. They pointed to the probability of our becoming engaged in war with Russia, and said that under such circumstances they could not allow such a Bill to pass. But they did allow it to pass, and partly upon my representation. I begged them not to alarm the country, not to disturb the trade of the country, but to leave the responsibility where it ought to fall, until you turn out the Ministry, upon Her Majesty's Executive Government. And what was the result? Why, at the end of that very year you had a surplus of £3,500,000. And will any one tell me that when the Russian war did arrive, and two successive Governments had to appeal to the people of this country, they found them less able or less willing to give the lavish supplies which were asked of them, because the year before we had remitted taxes which pressed upon the trade and commerce of the country? My Lords, I do not know whether or not my noble Friend will cheer what I am going to say, but I am authorized by those most competent to form an opinion to state that looking at the principles upon which the estimates of revenue and expenditure for the year have been prepared, looking at the fact that on the 31st of March of this year there was a surplus of £1,250,000 which was not taken into account in the financial statement of February, and looking at the fact that the balances are now £2,000,000 higher than they were at the same period of last year, although at the end of that year there was a surplus of £1,250,000—taking all these circumstances into consideration, they see no danger of any deficiency in the revenue of the present year. I now come to the question of the prospective deficiency. In very quiet times there is no great objection—although it is a new system, and one which sprung up with the income tax—to making prospective arrangements; but when you have to deal with very uncertain circumstances, the adoption of such a course is utterly impossible. The noble Earl, in that speech to which I have already alluded, said that if Her Majesty's Government could show that there would not be a deficiency of

£2,000,000 next year he would not vote for the Motion of my noble Friend. I am afraid that I have no chance of obtaining his vote, because I utterly decline to make any estimate for next year. There would be no safety in doing so. No doubt if you compare the two years, allowing for the loss of taxation by the expiration of laws, what with the arrears of the malt and hop duty and other fallings off, there will be a deficiency of £2,000,000; but if you take the normal increase of revenue, and add to that the increase which has always arisen upon any large remission of taxation, though I make no estimate of what that may be, yet past experience shows that it is impossible to put it at less than £1,000,000, and when you add to that the £250,000 saved by the falling in of the Long Annuities, your deficiency, without going into any other calculation, instead of being £2,000,000, will be reduced to something like £750,000. I saw it stated in a leading article of the The Times the other day, that my noble Friend the noble Baron (Lord Monteagle) is the pivot upon which the British Constitution turns. I was not aware of the fact before, and I venture to think, for reasons which I will state, that he is not even the pivot upon which this question turns. My noble Friend is well acquainted with financial subjects. Formerly a Chancellor of the Exchequer himself, he has great knowledge and great love of finance, and has been in the habit of bringing his views upon it before your Lordships, as it was natural that he should do; but with regard to the conduct of this House, as a House, my noble Friend is nothing more than any other able and distinguished individual among your Lordships who sometimes takes part in your debates. He has no pretensions to lead a great party; he can only attract those whom his reasoning, his arguments, and his eloquence convince. With respect to the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) the case is entirely different. I was surprised that, in addressing the deputation to which I have so often referred, he seemed to dwell upon a distinction which he supposed to arise from the Motion for the rejection of this Bill being made, not by himself, but by the noble Baron. Why, surely this is not a question so insignificant that the noble Earl was waiting to see whether or not some independent Member of your Lordships' House took it up. He must have had in his own mind clear views as to whether it was of sufficient importance for him to undertake it himself, or whether he should leave it entirely to Well, my Lords, I have the greatest possible admiration for the ability, the character, and the position of the noble Earl am not sure that I have not almost I wanting in good taste in too often allude to the admiration which I have felt those qualities; but that feeling is without exception. I have the great respect for his gifts and attainments, there is one gift which he does not possess. That one gift is the gift of prophecy, which no human being will say he possesses. has indulged in prophecies with regard to trade, navigation, and always without success, and in every question of finance predictions have been signally null. I have alluded to the alarm he expressed with respect to the remission of the duties. In the same year another question arose. My right hon. Friend (Gladstone) has been incessantly taunted with the mistake he made as to the amount which the succession duty would produce. He intimated that it would produce more than it has actually done. He has satisfactorily explained the cause of this in another House this year. My right Friend was not alone in his expectation of a large return from the succession because the noble Earl himself produced figures and details that that impost would extract from the pockets of the unfortunate landowners a sum of £4,000,000 sterling per annum, or quadruple the amount which it has actually yielded. In his speech on the Customs Duties Bill, on the 22nd June, 1846, the noble Earl said—

"I am about to deal with this measure of the score of revenue; for I beg your Lordship to observe that you have at this moment a calculation of only a very small surplus revenue, with things as they are, for the service of the next year; and if the calculations respecting revenue which I have made are accurate (I have taken every pains they should be so), who are in office this time twelve months, who they may be, will be in great danger of expecting a deficiency in the revenue. Yet, my Lord, it is under these circumstances that the Government think it wise and politic to introduce for the purpose of reducing or repealing duties on numerous most important articles, aware that a certain increase in the consumption will make up part of the loss, but that there will be a serious defalcation of revenue arising from the reductions proposed by this Bill will be admitted on the part of Government themselves."—[3 Hansard, lxxvii. 786.]

That was spoken by the noble Earl opposite in 1846; and what is the answer given to it? On the 22nd of February the following year, the then Chancellor of the Exchequer said—

“The right hon. Gentleman who preceded me in office made his financial statement on the 9th of May last year. He stated that he anticipated a surplus from the ordinary revenue of £76,000, and from extraordinary sources—namely, money from China, of £700,000, making a total of £776,000. By subsequent legislation foreign sugar was made admissible into this country, and in nine months, from April to December, the duty paid on the foreign sugar imported amounted to £304,000. That, of course, is an item which the right hon. Gentleman could not calculate upon when he made his financial statement, but adding the sum derived from the sugar duties to that which the right hon. Gentleman anticipated, it would give a surplus of only about a million of money. If, however, hon. Gentlemen will refer to the balance-sheet of the 5th of January, they will find that the produce of the revenue far exceeds that calculation, for the surplus amounts to £2,846,000. The progress of the revenue since the 5th of January has exceeded again, beyond all expectation, the produce of the corresponding quarter, and I think the probability is that I should be fully justified in stating that when the period comes to which the calculations of the right hon. Gentleman referred his calculations will be still more exceeded, and that the surplus of the 5th of April will be even still more considerable than that which I have stated as the surplus on the 5th of January.”—[3 Hansard, 10, 321.]

I say, then, that the noble Earl, when he comes forward as the head of the great Conservative party, and proposes to support with all his influence the Motion of the noble Baron, by which this House will in effect take upon itself the financial duties that properly belong to the Executive Government and the House of Commons, surely ought to show that he has some fitness for the task. The same noble Earl, I find, stated to the deputation—

“We know nothing with regard to the question of any substitute at all. I was not aware that this repeal was taken as a substitute for any tax which was imposed. It is part of the general financial statement made by the Government, but I have never seen in any quarter, and certainly not before the House of Lords, any proposal of an alternative tax.”

My Lords, it seems perfectly incredible that the noble Earl, taking these duties upon himself, does not appear to have read the debates of the House of Commons upon those matters of finance which we are to correct, and should not even be informed by his political Friends in that House that Motions were made there by Conservative Members and supported by all the Conservative leaders, but which were rejected after long debate by a decisive division. I now come to a more extraordinary statement of the noble Earl. He is reported to have assigned, as a reason for not giving mentally fitted to deal with financial questions, and no doubt there are noble Lords opposite who possess the same qualifications, although I am not so well acquainted with them. But there must be others who have come up to-day from the extreme end of the kingdom, and who are too attached to hunting, literature, and other pursuits that are best carried on in the country, to attempt to master the principles or the details of finance; these noble Lords, knowing the vast information and experience of the noble Earl opposite upon all other matters, may think it perfectly safe on this occasion to put their consciences in his hands. But if the noble Earl's prophecies, as nobody will deny, have always failed—if his knowledge of finance is of the most limited description—if, indeed, that subject is so repugnant to his capacious and well-stored mind that he cannot for two consecutive years remember, but, on the contrary, jumbles and confuses together all the facts and figures of his own department as Prime Minister and First Lord of the Treasury, then I think he places noble Lords on his own side in a difficult and even false position in respect to how they are to vote to-night. My Lords, I believe the Amendment of which notice has been given is not in accordance with the spirit of the constitution; nor do I think it consistent with the dictates either of justice or wisdom. I shall very briefly state the grounds of my opinion why it is not in accordance with the spirit of the constitution. The greatest of our debates since I have had the honour of sitting in this House was one in which a noble and learned Lord (Lord Lyndhurst), whom we all rejoice to see as strong and vigorous now as then, took a leading part in advising your Lordships as to the course you should adopt. That noble and learned Lord then laid down the principles of constitutional law, and those principles were sanctioned by this House. I of course allude to the discussion on the question of life peerages. He told us it was of no use going back to ancient precedents—it was of no use telling us that Coke and Blackstone and other learned authors laid down the law of the subject in the most distinct manner. They were of no authority. We must come to the usage and practice of the Constitution since it has been defined and settled in its best days—namely, from the date of the Revolution downwards. Well, this House adopted that reasoning. It is unnecessary, therefore, now to quote any learned writers. I myself rather regret this, because the other day I took occasion to read Blackstone, Hatsell, and Hall for the law on this subject. I did not find anything that really applied exactly to the case. I found they all admit the technical power of rejecting a money Bill, but they go further, and speak of an unreasonable extent to which the jealousy of the House of Commons was carried in respect to small and trifling alterations. This showed more than any rule the usage and custom of the House of Commons. They also give as a reasonable ground of jealousy on the part of the House of Commons that this House could not originate a tax or indirectly charge the people of the country. I myself, not being learned, cannot give an opinion upon these matters, but it seems to me that if your Lordships cannot alter the law so as to make a most trifling charge upon the people, cannot be said that by rejecting a Bill for the remission of taxation you do not technically charge the people. I know there may be a technical difficulty, but as to the spirit of the thing, I conceive, if you follow the noble Lord's advice to-night, you will to all intents and purposes impose a burden on the people. The legal technical right of rejecting I do not deny. The very preamble of the Bill shows it. The question being put four times to your Lordships' House shows it. Legally and technically the Crown may reject a Bill passed by the other two branches of the Legislature. That, to a certain degree, is guarded by the responsibility of the Ministers. The Crown undoubtedly has the technical right or prerogative to create 100 Peers to fill this House; but for the Crown to exercise that right would be a gross and flagrant violation of the Constitution. The House of Commons has, I should also say, the power of stopping the Supplies, a rigorous power both to this House and the Crown, but in all these instances the power is tempered by constitutional usage, and tempered by prudence. In every one of these instances, not excepting that in consideration, it has been tempered by usage and custom. The noble Baroness will produce certain meagre precedents with regard to the rejection of Bills certainly affecting taxation and trade of one kind or another; but are these similar to what he proposes to-day? He proposes now, on mere fiscal grounds, to understand, to reject a Bill repealing a tax, which Bill formed part of the 1

cial scheme submitted by the officers of the Crown; and therefore with the consent of the Crown, to the House of Commons, and adopted by that House. I say. I know of no precedent for the rejection by this House of a Bill remitting taxation, or even revising taxation, which formed part of a whole financial scheme so approved and recommended. If the noble Baron can produce such a precedent, I hope he will do so. -My Lords, even if I were to grant, for the sake of argument, that the noble Baron is not only technically and legally right, but that in proposing such an unusual course to your Lordships he is within the pale of the Constitution, I ask, is the course he proposes a just one? Is it just to the people of the country when a remission of burdens affecting trade and industry is proposed by the Government and assented to by the House of Commons—is it just to the people after the remission and imposition of taxation have been balanced, that your Lordships should reject one portion of it, so as to saddle them with additional taxation? I think it the most unfortunate course your Lordships could adopt. I had a letter from a very intelligent tradesman of the town of Carmarthen, who stated that the tax on the paper he consumed would more than enable him to pay his income tax. He was well satisfied with the Budget, and hoped by his savings to be able to drink a little cheap French wine, but he was now to be exposed to a double tax. I will tell you another set of individuals to whom the conduct recommended by the noble Earl is unjust—I mean the Board of Inland Revenue. Is it fair to gentlemen whom you clothe not only with administrative but with judicial attributes, and on whom the whole onus of the collection of taxes depends, is it fair to impose on them the administration of a law which they tell you they cannot suggest any means of amending, but which if carried out must be unjust and unequal to a large portion of the taxpayers? I say it is not just. Then, is it wise in your Lordships, of all branches of the Legislature—admitting the constitutional right, is it wise of your Lordships to set the example of stretching your constitutional right to the utmost? Is it wise to take the people by surprise as much as you have taken them? You have taken them by surprise, but—perhaps that comes more under the head of justice than of wisdom—is it fair to persons in every branch of the paper and publishing trade, which, if it were disregarded, would destroy the very essence of our constitution."

["Hear, hear."] That the noble Earl should cheer that observation I can understand, but that any other Member of the House should cheer it utterly takes me by surprise. [A laugh.] This is no laughing matter. The noble Earl goes on to state:—

"There are certain great departments to be maintained, certain great services to be performed, which it is absolutely essential should not depend upon the annual vote of Parliament, and which the Lords and Commons, feeling together that they ought not so to depend, have placed out of their own power and have passed permanent Acts for supplying the means of defraying the expenses of those departments, and have also provided that the appropriation to those departments should not be interfered with by annual vote."

What does that mean? Does it mean that you are to take away the right of the Commons to stop the supplies. ["No, no."] What else does it mean? If it be the duty of the House of Commons to keep permanent taxation for the purpose of keeping up certain departments? I hope the noble Earl will take the opportunity in his speech to-night of explaining this part of his address, and that there would be a mistake in coupling the rejection of the Bill with such a declaration. There is, my Lords, another view of our position which may very properly be taken in dealing with this great question—I allude to the internal state of the country. The noble Earl and those who act with him, I apprehend, feel no apprehension in reference to the internal state of the country, for never did greater order—never did greater tranquillity prevail throughout the land than at the present moment. At no period, I may add, did a greater degree of soundness manifest itself in its trade, its agriculture, and its manufactures, while it is, as I speak, rich with the glorious promise of future production. The employment of the poorer classes, too, is in a state the most satisfactory, causing the diminution of poverty and crime. What ground for financial alarm is there, I should like to know, to be found in such a position of affairs? None; and I shall not, therefore, touch the matter, but shall take it for granted that many among your Lordships look with some anxiety to foreign countries, and see certain signs in Europe which you think may possibly lead to war, and to complications which may result in dragging England into the contest. You take this view, and you seek to make due provision against the contingency which you apprehend. Heaven forbid, my Lords, that should give expression to a single syllable which would tend to encourage such an apprehension in the slightest degree; but unhappily, such a consummation as to which I allude should arrive, what we ask, would be the best position in which we could stand to meet its approach. Which would be more desirable, the advent should find the two Houses of Parliament acting with cordiality together without a particle of jealous feeling towards one another, under their beloved Sovereign, directing in unison the energies of the wealthiest and the most spirited nation on earth; or that it should come upon us at a moment when a war of recriminations between the two branches of the Legislature had sprung up—nobody can tell how soon they might in a certain state of things break out—affording a scandalous spectacle to the nations of Europe? Do you suppose, my Lords, that you would in the latter find yourselves in a better position to carry on diplomacy or to prosecute than you would in the former, even though you had to aid you some few hundred thousands pounds extracted from a source which no one among us desires to see permanent, and which is now seriously engaged as a source of revenue? The one other consideration which I would suggest to your Lordships' notice before I go down. Is it wise for yourselves, or for the interests of this House—which I believe stands as high now in popular favour and esteem as it did at any period of its existence—to take the course which the noble Earl opposite asks you to pursue? The great proof, my Lords, that I am right in saying you do hold such a position in public opinion is to be found in the fact that your writing, speech, or declaration hostile in spirit to this House can be made the attack does not immediately fall flat to ground, being devoid of any substantial foundation. Is it prudent, then, for our own sakes to afford what, in accordance with my view, might be construed into a reasonable ground of complaint against us, and to do that which in accordance with the view of almost every one among us must appear to be calculated to furnish food for declamation to those who seek to injure this branch of the Legislature as one of the institutions of the country? It was, I think, Mr. Burke, who said one of the most critical and inv hand was felt and seen in every burden that pressed upon the people. This system has, however, hitherto worked well, connecting as it does taxation with representation. Would it be wise for your Lordships to introduce a new system, and to have your hand, instead of that of the House of Commons, felt in every burden which presses upon the people, thus virtually and practically severing taxation from representation? My Lords, I have done. It remains for me simply to thank you for your unexampled kindness and indulgence, and to assure you that the observations which I have just offered to you have been made with feelings as earnest and sincere as any by which I have at any period of my life been animated, and with a strong hope that your Lordships may see the expediency, independent of all party considerations, of avoiding, by your decision to-night, the occurrence of a state of things the direct or indirect consequences of which it is impossible for any one among us to predict.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

LORD LYNDEHURST: My Lords, the noble Earl who has just spoken, has done me the honour to refer to certain opinions which I expressed on a former occasion; but I trust that I shall before I sit down be able to satisfy your Lordships that the remarks to which he alludes have no bearing upon the present case. I hope, therefore, I may be allowed, even at this early stage of the argument—not proposing to myself to enter into the whole question under discussion, confining myself to the preliminary and most important question of the privileges of this as contrasted with those of the other House of Parliament—to trespass for a short time on that indulgence which you usually exhibit to those who address you on subjects of this nature. There can, my Lords, be no party question—no possible party question—involved in the consideration of the privileges of your Lordships' House. All we have to do in dealing with the subject is to ascertain what those privileges are, and then to act in accordance with the conclusion at which we may arrive. The noble Earl opposite alluded in the course of his speech to some meeting which took place lately, and which was presided over by a great number of the Members of the other House of Parliament. [Earl GRANVILLE intimated dissent.

cases in which this House exercised the right of amending money Bills brought up from the other House of Parliament with little or no dispute on the point. Controversies, indeed, sometimes took place which were carried on with no small degree of acrimony. All the cases on the subject are to be found collected in the 3rd volume of Mr. Hatsell, who I may fairly represent as being the advocate of the privileges of the House of Commons. I may observe that the result was that this House abandoned the claim. Why? Because they had no power to enforce it. If we amended a Bill which was sent up from the other House of Parliament, the House of Commons had the power of rejecting the Amendment. With them the Bill originated, and it was idle for us, therefore, to insist on a right which could not be enforced. But that principle does not apply to the rejection of money Bills. I take leave to say that there is not an instance to be found in which the House of Commons has controverted our right to reject money Bills. Over and over again, I repeat it, nothing can be found in the Parliamentary Journals or in any history of Parliamentary proceeding to show that our right to reject money Bills has been questioned. There is a curious anecdote to be found in Roger North's Examen, which bears upon the point. A money Bill came up from the other House, in which there was supposed to be something or other informal or improper. There was a payment to be made of some money on account of the past year, and great difficulty existed as to what course should be taken. Roger North, who knew well the privileges of both Houses, states that it put the House of Lords in a dilemma. He says we could not mend the least punctilio in a money Bill; but he admits distinctly in terms that we had a clear right to throw it out altogether, although we did not like to exercise that right on that occasion, because we were afraid that a similar Bill would not come up, and we were anxious to pass the Bill. They got out of the dilemma in rather a curious way. After two days' discussion, some noble Lord, a little behind the scenes apparently, asked to see the Bill, to have it laid on the table, and when it was produced and examined it was found to be perfectly correct; there was an end of the difficulty, and the House passed it. Still, I do not mean to rely on the authority of Roger North, well acquainted though he was with the privileges of both Houses; but before going to the authorities which established those privileges will consider the arguments and authorities of those persons who oppose our privileges. I find there is a Resolution of the House of Commons in 1671, which I will read to your Lordships. On a Bill for an Imposition on Foreign Commodities the Commons resolved,—

"That in all aids given to the King by the Commons the rate or tax ought not to be altered by the Lords."

Your Lordships do not dispute it. That an authority on which our adversaries rely. Another authority on which they rely is a Resolution of the Commons in 1678, which I will also read to your Lordships. On the 3rd of July in that year they resolved:—

"That all aids and supplies, and aids to His Majesty in Parliament, are the sole gift of the Commons; and all Bills for the granting of any such aids and supplies ought to begin with the Commons; and that it is the undoubted and sole right of the Commons to direct, limit, and appoint such Bills the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations, and qualifications of such grants; which ought not to be changed, or altered by the House of Lords."

These are the two authorities which are relied upon by the adversaries of our privileges, and they deduce from them that the Lords have no power to reject money Bills. These authorities say that we have no right to amend a money Bill and that we have no right to originate a money Bill, and, in a curious kind of logic, they conclude that we have, therefore, no right to reject a Bill of that kind. That is a logic peculiar to themselves, which certainly would not meet with the approbation of the great Stag-horn. My inference from these documents would lead to a directly contrary conclusion; but that I pass over. But what I complain of is this,—I complain of the want of fairness, the want of candour,—will not say of honesty, because that is too strong a word—displayed in quoting the passages, and omitting to quote others which are to be found in the self-same book, and which lead, as far as inference can lead, to directly the opposite conclusion. Is this fair? Is this candid? Can you place any reliance upon persons who adopt this style of argument. In fact, it is destructive to the case which they endeavour to set up. In the very book whence the quotations I have read are drawn you will find what I am now about to read. In 1689—one of the best periods in our history—the Lords amended most minuteness, and with a kind of superabundance of words which seems to show that they meant to sweep everything into their net, they admit in the most unqualified manner, not only the power but the right, the constitutional right, a right equal to that of the House of Commons, to reject money Bills when they think proper and when they think the interests of the country require it. I defy any person at all acquainted with the law and constitution of this country to entertain a different opinion after having sifted and examined the subject even in a superficial manner. I have some scruple in reading the Reasons stated by the House of Commons, on account of the superabundance of words; but still they will show how earnest the Commons were on the subject—how eager they were to state their own privileges—and then you will see the value of the admissions they make as to the authority of this House. On the 9th of May, 1689, they sent up their Reasons for desiring a conference on the Amendment of the Po Bill by the Lords. Among them are the following—and this extract, I beg your Lordships to observe, is taken from the same book as those I read before, which are relied on by our adversaries:—

“All money aids and taxes to be raised or charged upon the subjects in Parliament are the gift and grant of the Commons in Parliament and are and always have been, and ought to be by the constitution and ancient course and laws of Parliament, and by the ancient and undoubted rights of the Commons of England, the sole and entire gift, grant, and present of the Commons in Parliament, and to be laid, rated, raised and paid, levied and returned for the public service and use of the Government, as the Commons shall direct, limit, and appoint, and modify the same. And the Lords are not to alter such gift, grant, limitation, appointment, or modification of the Commons in any part or circumstance.”

Nothing can be more full, nothing more precise, than this phraseology; nothing can show greater anxiety to state what their rights are. So far they are not disputed by your Lordships; and then the extract goes on:—

“Or otherwise to interpose in such Bills, that to pass or reject the same for the whole, without any alteration or amendment, though in ease of the subjects.”

Nothing can be more distinct than this admission. They state their own right more pugnacious than the rest took a long and lingering look behind, and endeavoured to draw my noble Friend into a conflict, the noble Earl wisely and prudently refused to be entrapped into any admission. My noble Friend put the question very clearly when he asked—"What is the use of our discussing Money Bills when they come up to this House, if we have no right to reject, as we admit we have no right, to alter them?" Noble Lords will recollect when the Succession Duty Bill was sent up from the other House, it was very warmly discussed and debated by your Lordships. My noble Friend Lord Aberdeen—whose absence on the present occasion I greatly deplore—was then at the head of the Government; a man of high talent, and, if possible, of still higher character, and of great reputation, not alone in this country, but throughout Europe and the world. That noble Lord has been a Member of your Lordships' House for sixty years, and from his station, character, and acquirements, no one can be more conversant with our privileges. What was the language held by Lord Aberdeen in 1853?—

"Now your Lordships cannot alter a tittle of this Bill; not a particle. You may—and this you have a full right to do—throw it out on the second reading. That is perfectly within your Lordships' competence to do."—[3 Hansard, cxxvii. 671.]

It is for your Lordships to consider, in this particular case, whether it will be prudent and proper, having regard to the interests of this country, that you should adopt such a course. My Lords, my noble Friend opposite (Earl Granville) has done me the honour to cite my authority. What was the nature of the circumstances which led to the decision he has referred to? It was stated that 400 years ago the Sovereign had created a life peerage, but no instance had occurred since that time. The argument I made use of, which was supported by many noble Lords, was that everything in this country depends on long usage and prescription; when, therefore, no such right has been exercised for 400 years, and no claim has been put forward during that period, it ought not to be acted on, and cannot be considered as part of the law and constitution of the country—particularly after the many changes, including a revolution and a restoration, which have since taken place. That was my argument; but does it apply to the present case? My Lords, I shall be able to show that within a recent period this right which we claim has been acted on without dispute, not in one, two, or three cases merely, but in numerous instances. I hold a list of these cases in my hand, and I have selected the more modern. In 1807, a Bill came up to this House for continuing and granting certain duties on malt. It was rejected. I am not prepared to say whether the Bill was rejected in form, or whether, according to the usual course, the Motion was that it be read a second time, or committed, that day three months. Again, in 1789, a Bill was passed through the House of Commons, and came up to your Lordships, for imposing a duty on cocoa-nuts. It was rejected on the 6th of August in that year. A similar Bill was brought up in 1790, and again rejected. So that not only are there admissions of our right by the House of Commons over and over again, in the most distinct terms—not only has there been no instance in which they have disputed that right—but cases have occurred in which it has been directly affirmed and exercised by this House without any complaint on the part of the Commons. But a distinction is drawn by my noble Friend opposite, who says that those were Bills for imposing taxes; whereas this is a Bill to relieve from taxation; and my noble Friend alleges that a wide distinction is thereby created. That is certainly a novel doctrine; I never heard it broached before; there is no precedent for it; no authority can be cited in its favour; no dictum even is given. But how is the practice? I hold in my hand a list of certain Bills for relief from duties, which were rejected by your Lordships' House. I select a few. In the year 1790, a Bill was passed through the Commons to relieve the coasting trade of Great Britain from stamps on certain documents, and abolishing bonds respecting the Isle of Man. This Bill, which I believe had reference to smuggling, was rejected by your Lordships; and there was not a murmur of complaint that I can find even a trace of. What becomes, then, of my noble Friend's distinction? What becomes of his 400 years' prescriptive right which he cited against myself? But I should be sorry that the case rested even here. In 1805, a Bill was sent to this House for abolishing certain fees payable to Custom House officers in England; that was a Bill for relief from taxation, and it was rejected by your Lordships without complaint. In 1807, a similar step was taken with respect to a Bill which proposed to abolish payments to Custom House officers in Ireland, and so complaint followed. In 1808, a measure was carried through the Commons to repeal duties on coals carried coastwise in Wales, and grant others in lieu thereof. Here was a Bill to remove and to impose taxation, embracing consequently both alternatives, and it likewise was rejected by your Lordships. So much for the authority and antiquity of the claim which is said to be obsolete! Then, my Lords, in 1811, there was a Bill passed by the other House to suspend for one year the duties on corn-wash for distillation of spirits in England, and to permit the distillation of spirits from sugar. That was a Bill for the relief of duties, and the amount of those duties was considerable. That Bill was discussed in the House of Commons at great length. All the agricultural interest took part in the discussion, and when it came down to this House it was again discussed at great length. Lord Liverpool was then Minister. He took part in the discussion, as did also Lord Bathurst, the Minister for the Colonies. After a long debate the Bill was thrown out. Did Lord Liverpool—the Minister of the day under whose authority the Bill was introduced—did he make any complaint? Did the House of Commons make any complaint? Not a single syllable was uttered on the subject. So far from that, when a few days afterwards the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought in a Bill to make amends for the loss of duties, he merely said, “I introduce this Bill in consequence of the rejection of a Bill by the other House.” Never was a subject more fully discussed than that was, and no complaint whatever was made by the Lower House. But, my Lords, this case is still stronger. It is a case of a tax in progress. The moment a Bill has passed this and the other House, and received the Royal Assent, it becomes the law of the land. All individual authority on the part of the House of Commons is at an end—has terminated, and the House of Commons has no more authority over it than your Lordships have. It is law, and, like any other law, can only be revoked by the joint action of the two Houses of Parliament and with the consent of the Crown. I was surprised to hear my noble Friend the other day admit as I understood it, that the whole permanent revenue of the country can be touched by the House of Commons without the consent of this House. However, I think I have gone sufficiently, if not too much into this matter; but the question is of imam satisfied what your answer will be, my Lords, as I said I would confine myself to this question of privilege, I will further observe that the illusions, perhaps I may say the delusions, created by introduction of the Budget seem to have passed away, and we have learnt that, though brilliant eloquence has charms, like other seductions, it is not without its dangers. The same schemes may impress the genius, of imprudence, rashness. Satis eloquentiae, sapientie parum is not an irreconcilable combination. If my noble Friend should move the amendment of which he has given notice, I shall give him, for the reasons I have stated, my cordial support.

LORD MONTEAGLE: My Lords, I have heard with equal gratification and conviction the arguments and the authorities cited by my noble and learned Friend. They set at rest conclusively the objections raised against my Motion, at least that objection which has been relied on most strenuously out of doors, a denial of the strict Parliamentary right of the House of Lords, as proved by law and usage, to reject this Bill. This is rashly stated to be unconstitutional on the part of the House of Lords. As such it is denounced to be an usurpation of the privileges of the Commons, and is described as constituting the "head and front of our offending." This assertion constitutes the main stay and prop of the adverse argument. But after my noble and learned Friend's speech I do not think any one will be disposed again to question the full and unqualified right of the House, admitted by high authorities and sanctioned by uncontradicted practice, to deal with any Money Bill, as a whole, either by accepting or rejecting it. If the arguments you have heard have carried conviction, as they must have done, not only to your Lordships' minds, but conviction to the public mind also, there is an end put at once and for ever to those charges that have been so loosely and, I will say, unpardonably brought against this House. It is but a small matter that one of the humblest Members of this House, like myself, should have been made a special object of animadversion for the course I am about to take. But charges against your Lordships' House as a branch of the Legislature cannot be so lightly passed over. Before going further allow me to say that the responsibility for this Motion rests with myself alone. Permit me to say that, however gratified and honoured I may feel by finding that on this question my opinion is supported by the earnest approval of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby), still I make this Motion as a matter of duty to myself and I may add to the country, without concert with him. In doing so I disclaim any possible attempt, by association, combination, or confederacy of any kind, to deal with this question either in an uncandid or an unparliamentary manner. The resolution I formed and announced of inviting your Lordships to reject this Bill was exclusively my own. The noble Earl, I believe, was as ignorant of my intention to give my Notice as I was unprepared for the unqualified cordial declaration of opinion on the part of the noble Earl by which my Notice was honoured. If it be true that what I claim is our right and privilege; if it can be proved that it does not rest upon our own assertion of the right, but on the admissions of the Commons themselves, there is at least an end of all the charges of seeking to interfere with the privileges of the House of Commons. I must say for myself, and though it may be presumptuous in me to use the expression, I assert for others as boldly that the Members of this House are as little minded to violate or undervalue the privileges of the House of Commons as they are unwilling to abandon their own. I believe such a privilege to be as useful to the other House of Parliament as to ourselves. In respect to both Houses I believe that the privileges of Parliament form an essential part of the Constitution of the country; they had not been the work of accident, nor the creation of a moment. They had been carefully elaborated, and, at length, happily fixed. Like the rest of the Constitution, those privileges have grown up by degrees; and I agree with the noble Earl the President of the Council that it is to comparatively recent times, after our Constitution had passed through the throes of civil war and revolution, that we must really refer for guidance upon this question, rather than to times long antecedent. It was not till the seventeenth century that the Constitutional privileges of the two Houses were matured and consolidated, though debated and asserted long before. Even those who are but slightly acquainted with the Parliamentary history of England must know that in earlier times the Lords exercised a distinct and separate power with respect to Money Bills and taxation.

"Distinct grants (observes Mr. Hallam) were made by the Lords and by the Commons; of these the latest was in the reign of Edward III. The language used in the reign of Richard II. was, 'We the Commons grant with assent of the Lords.'"

And Mr. May, our latest authority, admits further (p. 324) that—

"The Lords were not originally precluded from amending Bills of Supply; for there are numerous cases on the Journals in which the Lords' amendments to such Bills were agreed to."

But, as I have said, it is unnecessary to go back to remote history. We may more safely refer to the period when our Constitution was matured, and if we do so we shall find that in this essential question, of the authority to reject a Money Bill, though neither to originate or to amend one, the right of the House of Lords has never yet been brought into doubt. This part of the argument has been so conclusively dealt with by my noble and learned Friend that it would be unbecoming as well as unnecessary in me to advert to it at any length. I do not therefore intend to refer to that part of the question in detail, except to point out in addition to what has fallen from him and in re-assertion of the main principle—not in corroboration of it, because no corroboration of mine is needed—some instances in which this matter has not been left in doubt, but has been decided after solemn deliberation. In the great case of 1671, for example, when on conference the Lords resolved—

"That by a new maxim of the Commons a hard and ignoble choice is left to the Lords, either to refuse the Crown Supplies when most necessary, or to consent to ways and proportions of aid which neither their own judgment nor the good of the people can admit."

The reply of the Commons was—

"Your Lordships' first reason is from the happiness of the Constitution that the two Houses are mutual checks on each other. Our answer is, So they are still, for your Lordship have a negative to the whole."

In 1689, when on the Poll Bill amended by the Lords the Commons asserted their own privileges with legal precision, they also concede to the Lords the whole privilege claimed by the present vote—

"The Lords cannot alter the grant proposed, or otherwise interpose in such Bills than to pass or reject the same without alteration or amendment, though in case of the subject—."

I repeat these solemn and indisputable judgments pronounced by the Commons themselves as laying the foundation for the more recent precedents to which it is ne-

lost. In 1783 a Bill to repeal certain Acts and to lay an additional duty on brass exported, was lost in the Lords by a Motion of postponement for two months. The third reading of a Bill for repealing duties on coals, culm, and cinders, carried coast-ways from South Wales, and granting other duties in lieu thereof, reached its third reading in the Lords. In this case the Lords were summoned to consider the Bill. A Motion was carried to postpone the Bill for three months, and the Bill was lost. In 1811, during the Government of Mr. Spencer Percival, (which in this House was most powerful), a Bill for suspending the duties on corn-wash used in distillation in England, and on sugar for distillation in Scotland, and charging duties according to the prices of materials, was brought before this House the Lords being summoned. The Bill was ordered to be read that day six months, and thus rejected. I have thus laid before you a succession of precedents, to which other might have been added, all illustrating and confirming the great principles laid down in 1671 and 1689. Those who maintain the opposite doctrine cannot pretend to point out one single conflicting judgment, or Resolution, during the last two centuries. As an officer of the other House—I mean Mr. May—is reported to have expressed an opinion to the contrary of that which I am now advancing, I wish to read a passage from his very able text-book on the Law and Practice of Parliament. After alluding to the sole and indisputable right of the House of Commons to originate taxation in these terms:—

“The legal right of the Commons to originate grants of money cannot be more distinctly recognized than by these various proceedings, and to this right alone their claim appears to have been confined for nearly 300 years. The Lords were not originally precluded from amending Bills of Supply: for there are numerous cases in the Journals in which Lords’ Amendments to such Bills were agreed to. But in 1671 the Commons advanced their claim somewhat further by resolving nem. con. ‘That in all aids given to the King by the Commons, the rate or tax ought not to be altered—’”

He proceeds to quote the Resolution to which my noble and learned Friend adverted, and which I have subsequently quoted, which, while it affirms the right of the Commons to originate Money Bills and send them here, clearly reserves to the House of Lords the fullest power of rejecting as well as of accepting them. Mr. May concludes as follows:—

“The functions of the House of Lords in matters of supply and taxation are thus reduced to a simple assent or negative.”

And again,—

“Thus the Crown demands money, the Commons grant it, and the Lords assent to the grant.”

But I wish your Lordships to consider further, that, by law and Parliamentary usage, the rights of the House of Commons are not merely limited to the origination, the framing, and the passing of Money Bills: another and an equally important right which they exclusively possess is the appropriation of the sums so raised. This right is uncontested. Your Lordships have nothing to say to the passing the Votes of Supply and to the framing of the Appropriation Act; we cannot alter a single grant which appears in any one of those Acts of Parliament; but with regard to one and all of them we have full and entire power to deal with them as a whole, and to adopt or reject them. This power of appropriation is not affected by my Motion. God forbid it were interfered with by your Lordships. I only wish it were more vigilantly superintended by the Commons, and that the memorable Appropriation clause of Lord Somers were more rigidly enforced. Now, when it is said, “If you reject this Bill, you create a surplus of £1,400,000 in addition to the Supplies which have been already voted, and how is it to be expended,” I wish to point out that not one farthing of this surplus can be issued or applied to the public service, except upon a legislative authority derived from the House of Commons—originating with them, one which it is peculiarly their function to frame, to which our assent is essential, but in which we are not entitled to make the slightest alteration. I said just now that a sum of £1,400,000 was affected by this Bill. But that does not sufficiently express the real fact. In truth, the amount on which you are called upon to decide by your vote to-night, is not £1,400,000 for one year, but £1,400,000 for an undefined term of years—it is a perpetual annuity to that amount. If you adopt the suggestion of the House of Commons and pass the Bill repealing this tax you will practically part with a sum of £36,000,000 sterling, that being the capitalized value of the annuity which you are now invited by the other House to repeal. The success of my Motion will preserve this sum for the Consolidated Fund, where it must come under the power of the House of Commons itself. For let me

ing to diminish the power of the House of Commons, it should be recollected that not one single farthing of the tax which I propose to preserve can be appropriated except by a statute originating with the House of Commons. This enormous sacrifice of revenue becomes a very serious question when it is remembered—as has already been hinted at in debate—that a desire has been expressed on the part of some persons to diminish the security now afforded for the payment of charges placed on the Consolidated Fund, and that it has been suggested, in a quarter that certainly may not add to its authority with your Lordships, that the same course should be taken with regard to the expenditure for the Army and Navy—indeed, it has been suggested that it should be so contrived to make the taxation of the country distasteful to the whole community, thus rendering the payment of taxes hateful to the people, that they in their turn may insist upon cutting down the public civil and military establishments as the only means of ridding themselves of taxation. Your Lordships, I have no doubt, are fully aware of the perils of such a course. Every step taken toward diminishing the security now existing for the payment of charges on the Consolidated Fund strikes essentially at the credit of this country. That security is the foundation on which our public credit rests; that gives to our public securities the value they now so deservedly possess and every step by which the national credit is struck at, or even by which a disposition is manifested, a desire shown, or an intention avowed of that character, lessens to a corresponding extent the security of the public creditor. In the security of the public creditor public and private interest are inseparably bound up. With respect to the allegation that it is your Lordships who are about to reimpose the paper duty which it is said will be levied and applied by authority of this House, I would observe that it is not your Lordships' vote that re-imposes that duty, supposing you should reject the present Bill; that annual revenue of £1,400,000 will still rest, not on your act, but on the statute law of the land, on the right of the Queen, Lords and Commons to grant the sum; and on the legal appropriation of that sum by the utmost importance. I wish to call your attention to a further effect that the repeal of the paper duty will, under our present circumstances, produce on the public credit. I ask those most conversant with mercantile affairs, whether it would be thought creditable (I might say decent) for a private individual to place himself in the position in which this Bill, if carried, would place the country. You have incurred a debt which you have promised to pay on a fixed day. In the month of November you are bound by law to pay to the owners of certain Exchequer bonds the sum of one million sterling. But what was the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on this subject, made in his place in Parliament? He stated, at the very time that he was voluntarily diminishing the annual revenue by £1,400,000 a year, that "he was not in a position to make provision for the payment of the outstanding bonds." The fairer statement would have been that he was putting himself, and wilfully putting himself, into a position where he made it impossible for him to discharge this debt. Neither is this the first time you have postponed the payment of a debt of this kind, nor will it be the last, if you persevere in the proposed reckless sacrifice of productive and improving revenue. There are already outstanding two further sums of £1,000,000 each, which, in place of being paid off in the terms of the original contract, have been carried on and made charges on the income of 1862 and 1863. For those you will also have to provide. Parliament is thus establishing a precedent on which a private merchant could not venture to act without forfeiting his credit and seeing his name in The Gazette. Would such a trader obtain a certificate if made a Bankrupt? It is nothing less than this—you have a debt of three millions to meet, yet you are throwing away gratuitously an income equivalent to a capital sum of £36,000,000 which would much more than enable you to pay every shilling as it falls due. In the case of the private trader would not such conduct amount to a criminal misappropriation of assets. Let me add another observation on the condition in which we stand. It has been said elsewhere that the great object of the present provisional arrangements is to leave everything, as far as possible, free and open for the decision of the Parliament which will assemble next year. In that master-piece of oratory, the Budget speech, the Chancellor of the Exchequer declared that he wished to reserve for Parliament the fullest and freest discretion. How is this consistent with the proposed sacrifice of £1,400,000 paper duties? You are now pressed to take a step which prejudices the case to be decided in 1861, and compel you to two propositions—one being a less substitution of direct taxation levied on property, for indirect taxation imposed upon articles of general consumption. Such a step can not be taken perilously, and on a system, without the greatest peril. I am unfortunately old enough to remember, and Lord Brougham, were present, could give your Lordships a striking reminiscence, of what took place in 1816 in reference to the property tax. That tax had been imposed by Mr. Perceval expressly as a war tax. In 1816, Lord Liverpool's Government proposed to continue the tax for one year after the peace in order to pay outstanding engagements which it was argued had been incurred for war. Lord Liverpool's Government, a strong Government, yet not only unable to carry his proposition, but detestation of this tax, in time of peace was so strong and general that on its rejection a Motion was made in the House of Commons by Mr. Brougham that all documents relating to the hateful income tax should be burnt, in order to give a lesson to the country against its future recurrence. We have had further experience since that time. Have your Lordships forgotten the memorable Resolutions which were moved in your House in March 1841 and which state, in powerful language the dangers and objections to an income tax in time of peace? Again, when my hon. Friend, now Secretary for India (Charles Wood), was Chancellor of the Exchequer he proposed a renewal of the income tax for three years. But he was unable to succeed in inducing the House of Commons to agree to his proposal. House interposed, a Committee was appointed to inquire into the case, and by that Committee had made its Report proposed increase of the income tax was swept away; it disappeared as rapidly as Mr. Pitt's tax had done. But the case as it stands this year is worse than on former occasions, because the tax is proposed for a portion of the year only. No man can maintain that it is bad in principle to propose a tax like this for one single year less for a fraction of the year. Sir Charles Wood was compelled, as the price of a grant, to propose to Parliament that in

Paradoxical as it may appear, in one important respect a perpetual property tax is less unequal than one for a short term of years. Compare with this curtailed property tax one unlimited in duration. The latter falls on the owners of property whether possessed for one year, five years, one hundred years, or for ever, in the exact proportion of the duration of their estates, and is so far just. But a property tax imposed for a single year only compels the owners of incomes for one year to pay equally with an owner for 5,100 years, or for ever. The recommendation which is now urged is to substitute a property and direct taxes for carefully selected and well apportioned taxes on consumption. This is founded on a specious and dangerous fallacy. The people are called on to adopt it with a view of throwing the bulk of taxation on the rich, and exempting the poor. This rests on an unsound foundation. It is in truth to me a most fatal mistake. It assumes that the rich and the poor, the capitalists and the labouring men, constitute two separate classes with adverse interests. No doctrine can be more dangerous and untrue than this. What would become of the working classes were it not for capitalists, as givers of employment; and how is capital to be made productive, except by providing employment for the labouring classes in a way eventually to increase wages? Now, I pray your Lordships to observe how this system of taxation will act if the Customs on foreign paper is repealed, whilst the impost of the raw material is prohibited or highly taxed. You are making fiscal arrangements by which inducements are afforded to English capitalists to transport their capital to France, where the means of manufacturing paper will exist in greater abundance; and though we have been warned against venturing to indulge in prophecy, yet I will take this opportunity of saying that if these alterations on the paper duties are made, they must lead to the transfer of the capital and industry engaged in the paper manufacture from England to foreign countries. Great complaints have been made against my Motion on behalf of gentlemen who are said to have purchased steam machines for the extension of their manufacture if the Excise duty on paper is re-evasions an attempt has been made to show that there is a favourable balance between the income and expenditure of the present year; and no attempt has been made to explain the condition in which we shall stand in the year that is to come. Even if we limited our consideration to the present year, there is nothing to justify us in repealing this tax. The balance upon an estimated income of £70,000,000 is at best calculated at £474,000. Such a surplus, if it existed, cannot inspire much confidence in our financial position; but have we really got this assured? No such thing. Even during the short interval which has elapsed between the opening of the Budget on the 10th February, and the present time, that £474,000 has disappeared in the same manner with the £2,000,000 of Annuities—it has vanished into thin air. Nor is that all. How, let me ask, was this insufficient balance of £474,000 produced? It has already passed away, but it was created by the most extraordinary combination of discordant fallacies for the purpose of appearing rich, without being so, that ever was exhibited, either in public or in private life. Thus we find one sum of £1,400,000 brought in as additional income, but which in reality was only produced by anticipated income unexpectedly called up, but really belonging to the next year. I allude to the repeal of the malt and hop credits. This no more belongs to the income of the present year than do the rents of any of your Lordships' estates for the year 1861 properly form part of your income in 1860. I think, therefore, you will see that even if we went no farther, instead of a surplus of real income, we should have to deal with a deficiency. A similar observation applies to the calling up of the property tax. But is this all? In the case of the charges for the China war every attempt has been made to transfer these charges from the present to the following year—to say nothing about the matter until the Parliamentary pressure became irresistible, and in the meanwhile to leave your Lordships to imagine that no such charge really exists. I think that I have accurately ascertained this to be the fact, as the result of the answers given most reluctantly by the Government this evening to the questions put by my noble Friend near me (Earl Grey). The Native troops sent to China are, it would seem, to be paid out of the military chest; but that chest was not provided for this Chinese war, and cannot properly furnish means to defray its expenses unless Parliament votes a further sum to replace that which is taken from it. If such a sum is voted you must ultimately place it in your balance-sheet, and it will make your position still more desperate than it appears to be at present. Any sum so borrowed is left without the provision of any means of repaying it. Both the debt and the means of repayment are kept from the knowledge of Parliament; and I say it will be unpardonable if, even at this period of the Session, a Vote is not taken with a view to replacing in the military chest the sums which have been so advanced without Parliamentary sanction. No provision is made as yet in the Army Estimates for the pay of the Native troops serving in China; the Vote of Credit granted this year is for the expenses of the past one. No Estimate is presented for the further expenses of the China war during the current year; the Army Estimates cover only part of the expenses of the British force in China, and no part of the expense of the Native force; and large charges under these heads must necessarily have to be provided hereafter; I have heard that these costs of the China war will amount to many millions. There is also another unprovided-for charge, more than sufficient for the destruction of that which has already been destroyed—this imaginary balance. Another questionable receipt has been credited to your account of income. You have had a debt paid unexpectedly. The Spanish Government has been both sufficiently rich and sufficiently well disposed to pay its debts; and the sum so received you have, in part at least, carried to the credit of this balance-sheet. This sum is not income in the true sense of the word. Even in this year financial reductions have been already made since the Budget was first announced. During the progress of the debates there has been an extra loss upon the wine duties of £171,000; many of those strange penny duties imposed upon trading operations have been abandoned upon compulsion, attended with a further sacrifice of £110,000. It is under such alarming circumstances that without any full, clear, and distinct explanation, showing your true and available income, and the real charge upon it, your Lordships are called on to abandon a tax, to which little or no objection has been suggested, and you are pressed to do this without knowing whether you are parting with your own money or that which belongs to others, for whom you should consider yourself as trustees. A. I may be supposed, from old habit, to view taxation with a more favourable eye than can be expected from those who have not held the ungracious office of national tax-gatherer, I can assure your Lordships that I am not going to praise either the paper duty or any other tax. No doubt it would be better if you could abolish both that and many other duties; but I respectfully warn you that you cannot afford to do so. I remember that Mr. Hunt, when a Member of the House of Commons, a man of no great education, but of considerable shrewdness and common sense, observed in debate with much truth and point, that you could not raise millions without taxing the millions; you may hold out delusive expectations that by substituting direct for indirect taxation you will relieve the lower classes, but you do not venture to tell them how that change may influence wages, and thus affect the interests of the working classes. One of the most extraordinary commendations which has been passed upon this Budget, is that you are now bent on reducing the subjects of taxation to a very few articles, and propose ultimately to place all our Custom duties, so far as I recollect, on fifteen articles. Why, that change augments the danger of your position by exposing your revenue to increased risk of casualty! It is a practice contrary to the old principle of taxation; it is entirely at variance with the system of Mr. Pitt, than whom, in his commercial policy and general views of finance, there seldom has been a greater, wiser, or more successful Minister. It has up to this time been admitted by all writers upon the subject of taxation, that if you wish to diminish pressure and lessen danger you should extend the surface over which that pressure is to rest. Any other doctrine may be plausible and may be popular for a time, but unless it tends to the general security and credit of the country the poorer classes as well as the richer will eventually suffer. If I have reluctantly but successfully proved that there can be no surplus this year, but on the contrary a great deficiency, occasioned too for the most part by voluntary acts of the Government, I again ask you to reflect how will you stand next year? All this time you have heard nothing from the Government as to that. Let us suppose that all is right for the present year, suppose that everything has been so carefully adjusted that there is no anxiety for the present engagements of the country.

be collected. To that assertion, however, there is this conclusive and triumphant answer, namely, that this tax is the very best and most economically collected portion of our old revenue. It is also increasing annually. The following account will show its satisfactory progress:—

Paper Duties.	Gross Duty.
Average 5 Years ending 1829 . . . 88,800,000 lbs.	£ 715,000
Average 5 Years ending 1859 . . . 217,000,000	1,414,000

The amount exported has also increased from 1844 to 1859 from 4,900,000 lbs. to 20,148,000 lbs. This much decried duty is also most economical in its collection. The total expense of collecting an annual sum of a million and a half is only £6,250. If any noble Lord should doubt that statement, he will find it supported by the authority of Sir Henry Parnell's Commission of Inquiry in 1835. The Report of that Commission contains returns showing that no greater a reduction than the sum of £6,250 could be effected in the charge for the Excise establishment by the total repeal of the paper duty. Compare that charge with the cost of collecting your other Excise and Customs' duties, or even with the cost of collecting your property tax, and you will see that you are now asked to part with the easiest and cheapest collected part of your entire system of taxation, and that which exhibits the steadiest increase. I had the honour myself, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, to recommend to Parliament the remission of one-half of the paper duty, as well as simplify and amend the law affecting the manufacture. Since that measure was adopted, the revenue received at the diminished rate of duty has increased from £715,000 to £1,400,000. In referring to the reduction of duty I allude only to the first class of paper, but including all used for writing and printing, the augmentation has been steady and continuous. I ask your Lordships by agreeing to my Amendment, to reserve to the House of Commons the opportunity of dealing with this source of taxation next Session, when avowedly the whole of our system of finance must be brought under their review. Do not, by a rash assent to this Bill, practically decide the fate of British finance for years to come by one hasty and ill-considered vote. I should freely appeal to the House of Commons to preserve to itself in the next year that freedom of action solemnly promised to them by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I appeal to their own good sense to leave this part of the revenue to be discussed hereafter in connection with all other branches of the public income, when it can be seen whether we really have a surplus to justify us in dispensing with this tax, and if we have, which however I consider nearly impossible, whether the reduction of other taxes may not then be shown to involve smaller loss to the Exchequer and to afford greater relief to the community than the remission of the paper duties reduced as they already have been by myself to the amount of 50 per cent. Reject the fallacies which have been forced on your attention. My Motion does not ask the House of Commons to surrender any of its valued privileges. I do not even call upon your Lordships to affirm that circumstances may not yet arise when under more favourable circumstances it might be shown expedient to abolish the paper duty; but I hope by our vote to-night we shall induce the House of Commons to claim for itself what it is well entitled to claim in prudence and sound policy—namely, an opportunity of wisely and dispassionately considering the whole question of our taxation, and not the paper duty only, but of that duty as compared with all the other taxes which press upon the trade and industry of the country. My noble Friend the President of the Council referred to the cause of education, and the advantage which it would derive from a repeal of the paper duties. I was really astonished that his good sense did not lead him to discard that threadbare and clap-trap argument. He well knows how much of the duty is paid for packing, not printing, paper. The Chancellor of the Exchequer himself admitted that the paper duty charged on books was scarcely felt. He was candid enough to state, as an example, that Bishop Colenso's Arithmetic was only raised a small fraction in price by the tax—I think the amount of the tax was but three farthings—a sum that would scarcely be shown in the price at all. If the President of the Council will only take any one of the excellent schoolbooks circulated under his administration, in the National schools, and weigh the small fractional part of the price which the paper duty represents at 1½d. per pound, he will find himself compelled to agree with me sacrifice benefit the consumer. So long as there is a deficiency in the raw material of paper, a repeal of the tax will produce no reduction of price. If the duty on Constantia and Johannesburg wines were repealed, no fall of price would ensue. The wine is a monopoly from the natural limitation of its quantity. Under the French treaty we are in this position, — you have either to submit to a prohibition or a prohibitory duty on the exportation of foreign rags; and I should like to know how any reduction of duty without an increased supply can give a real relief to the consumer. It is only when you can get the power of making more paper that the price will be diminished in the market. It was not for the noble Earl, then, to use the hackneyed, worn-out argument that the Excise on paper was a tax on knowledge, and that the diffusion of knowledge was a reason for throwing away a million and a quarter of revenue. But I have detained your Lordships too long. I have endeavoured to state the case in no adverse manner to the Government. The course I have adopted upon this occasion is the same I have taken every year whenever I thought the financial arrangements objectionable. The noble Earl opposite knows well that on former occasions when he was in the Government I commented with equal freedom on his financial measures. I have felt it right, from the position I formerly held, and that which I now hold, to pay some attention to questions of this kind, and to state my opinions on them, though financial questions are, I fear, somewhat distasteful to many of your Lordships. I am the more bound to thank you for your indulgence, and I now beg to move that this Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment moved, — To leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Six Months").

LORD DUFFERIN: My Lords, having formerly had the honour of being connected with the Government, but being now released from the obligations which that relationship is supposed to entail, I might take the opportunity of criticising the present measure and illustrating that criticism by a hostile vote. But I confess that, after

Lord Monteagle

Parliament for the Supplies to meet the necessary expenditure of the year, it is not your Lordships who are called to undertake the responsibility of deciding how these Supplies are to be provided, or the delicate, difficult, and invidious task of determining how, and in what manner, the necessary taxes of the year may be best adjusted, so as to bear with the least severity on the shoulders of the people. It is the people of this country who themselves have the right of determining how those burdens which they must bear may be most conveniently borne. My Lords, I should be very sorry for one instant to deny your right to deal with any Bill, of whatever kind, to which your assent is asked. The very fact of your assent being required is a sufficient proof of your power of rejection, and I can quite conceive that the occasion may arise when it would be your duty to exercise that power. I do not mean to say, my Lords, that any amount of popular clamour ought for a single moment to be urged as a ground for dissuading you from exercising those powers with which, in accordance with the principles of the Constitution, you are invested. I cannot, however, but think that we should be acting contrary to usage and to the spirit of the Constitution in resorting to the extreme exercise of any one of those powers except upon the most urgent and solemn occasions. The noble and learned Lord opposite, as well as the noble Baron who moved the Amendment, insisted with much earnestness on certain precedents which they quoted in support of their views in this discussion; but, with all deference, I doubt very much whether there has been a single instance in which a financial scheme initiated in the House of Commons has been interfered with in this House, except on political or economical considerations, with which we are not in the present instance called upon to deal. The noble Baron who moved the Amendment laid great stress on the loss to which the revenue would be subjected if the Excise duty on paper were repealed, and even went so far as to capitalize its amount. Now, I cannot help thinking, with all due deference to the authority of the noble Lord, that, to found any argument on the capitalization of the tax, is most unjustifiable. A tax which has been condemned by a Resolution of the House of Commons is like a tree which has been scathed by lightning, and which, though it still may live, puts forth only a sickly vegetation; but a tax upon which is actually done is close to the point which I ships' attention. During the last great change in the representation; sensible men whose studies their great country than these persons sentation and guage, sought looking with House; but I effect of the in regard to been to induce to regard with the time-honoured and I am personally wish to confirm always existed ed more strenuous violence with present occasion accordance with justify the exigive another Lordships' confidence of

I do constitutional eat doubt but provinces to There exists, between the and the last, can doubt the ditional penny of the income ciated with the and I count honour or he passed the C Bills, justified to the measure must confess, the noble Baronment speak in End proposes expediency of the measures of Sir Robert Peel and those of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but in the manner in which they have been carried. Sir Robert Peel was enabled by means of enormous majorities he commanded in the House of Commons to carry the repeal of the corn laws. No one but Sir Robert Peel could have done that. He did so from the highest and most honest convictions, I am sure. So also I am convinced the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, acting from similar motives, has been enabled by the power and popularity he obtained in 1853, by his promise that the income tax should cease in the present year, been enabled to double the tax which he was pledged to repeal. Now, as to the question before the House—the paper duties—I will not attempt to argue the constitutional branch of it after the brilliant and argumentative speech of the noble and learned Lord (Lord Lyndhurst), but with regard to the paper duty—I will only observe, that even if you have a surplus, there are other duties which I think should be repealed in preference. I do not desire to defend Excise duties. They were introduced by the Whigs, and they do undoubtedly press upon the industry of our own country; therefore I am not at all an advocate for their continuance. But I repeat, that if any are to be repealed, there are others which deserve a prior consideration to the paper duty. The noble Lord who spoke last referred to the Report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, but I will, with your Lordships' permission, quote a paragraph from the Report:—

“These simple regulations leave the paper-maker comparatively free to adopt the best and most economical modes of working, and he can scarcely assert, as the maltsters and distillers do, that the cost of production is increased, or the quality of the manufactured article impaired, by the fetters imposed upon him for fiscal purposes.”

If you wish to repeal an Excise duty I think the first for your consideration ought to be the malt tax, which increases the price of beer, a beverage far more to the taste of the poorer classes than any of the cheap wines which it is now proposed to introduce; but I question whether paper will be cheaper even if the duty be removed. The noble Earl opposite has alluded to the benefits conferred upon the consumer by the abolition of the duty on glass; but I remember the same advantages were held out when the duties on leather were removed—but I do not find that boots and by this House as to refuse to concur in the repeal of a tax in circumstances such as now exist. I will deal with the meagre precedents quoted by my noble and learned Friend presently. Let the House observe in the first instance, what we are now asked to do. The Crown has, in accordance with its constitutional functions, communicated to the House of Commons what are the wants of the State. Those wants have been discussed, modified, and approved, and in the exercise of their constitutional functions the House of Commons have found ways and means wherewith to carry the recommendations of the Crown into effect, and have come to the conclusion that this particular tax is not necessary for the wants of the State. Now, I am bold to say that a Bill founded upon such considerations having been passed by the House of Commons and brought here, there never has been since the Revolution an instance of this House rejecting such a Bill. My noble and learned Friend, treating the subject with great dexterity, has mentioned a few precedents, and stated that he had many others, to which, however, he would not refer; and until he stated them I was under the belief that my search, although laborious, had been imperfect; but when he told us what those precedents were I found that I was justified in my opinion that there had been no deficiency in my research, and that there are no substantial precedents to justify such a course as we are now asked to take. The first instance given my noble and learned Friend was in 1790, when this House rejected a Bill to relieve the coasting trade by removing stamps from certain documents. I do not mean to say that there are not instances where, upon collateral grounds, the repeal of some tax has been thought undesirable, and the Lords have exercised their right of refusing their assent to the repeal. But in this case there is a most important distinction which I must be allowed to point out without exposing myself to the charge of raising a mere lawyer's quibble. My noble and learned Friend, in referring to the precedent on which he relied, omitted—no doubt inadvertently—one little word which makes all the difference in the world. He described the Act as one to relieve the coasting trade by removing certain stamp duties. But the Act had several objects. It was to relieve the coasting trade, to remove certain stamp duties, and to abolish the necessity of giving certain bonds to the Crown.

Now it is matter of A B C that if anything is tacked to a money Bill, this House has a constitutional right to deal with it and to reject the whole if it thinks proper, and in this case what was proposed was not merely to abolish a tax, but also to obviate the necessity of giving certain bonds. The Bill, therefore, had another object besides that of repealing a tax. The instance cited by my noble and learned Friend is open also to another observation. This House was moved to go into Committee on the Bill on Tuesday, June 8. They determined not to do so, and the prorogation came the next day but one. Now, the Lords might very well think that was not the way to treat them. The measure probably came before them at a time when there were not many in attendance; and this of itself would furnish sufficient grounds for rejecting it. Well, then, the two next cases quoted by my noble and learned Friend seemed to me not to touch the question. In two consecutive years, it appears, the House of Commons passed Bills to abolish the fees payable to certain Custom House officers. This House rejected them. Did those Bills affect the annual revenue of the country? Technically it may be that the Lords on those occasions refused to repeal a tax, but in substance they did not; and in these matters it is the substance, and not a mere technical analogy, to which we should look. The only precedent which seemed to me to possess any weight was that of 1811—I mean the Bill respecting molasses. But even that precedent was a good deal strained. In 1811 the price of wheat was enormous, averaging, I think, from 111s. to 120s. the quarter; and, of course, barley was dear in proportion. For the purpose of relieving the pressure occasioned by these high prices, the House of Commons introduced a Bill to reduce the duty on molasses, in order that distillation might go on mainly from sugar and not from corn. That Bill came up here on the 6th of May. Now, the important point in the case is, that the financial statement of the Government that year was not made till the 20th of May. No doubt, therefore, the Government wanted to know, before introducing the Budget, whether the Bill would be approved by the great landowners in this House; and in the debate, the Earl of Suffolk, who led the opposition to the Bill, gave a clue to the whole case when he said he was happy to find that the Motion was not to be made a party question. The ment were, no doubt, sounding bells to see whether they would or would not adopt this measure as part of their scheme. The House, very likely, regarding it as a covert way of interfering with agricultural interests for the benefit of the West Indian interest, refused the Bill; and a Budget was afterward introduced in accordance with that refusal. It differed entirely from the one now proposed, and the course of the Government was open to objection upon totally different grounds. It furnishes no precedent for the course which you are now about to pursue. Here the Budget has been introduced and has been confirmed, its provisions being the repeal of a tax which is declared to be no longer for the public service; and you are now to say, "Though the tax is no longer for the public service, it shall still be levied." These are precedents of my noble and learned friend. My noble Friend (Lord Montagu) who moved the Amendment, alluded to two others, one of which occurred many years ago. From the nature of the tax, it was evidently one which this House rejected not upon any financial grounds, but because it was an interference with one industry in favour of another. In 1758 there had been Bills to allow the importation of cattle from Ireland, and there had been the Tallow Bill. These were two Bills having relation to Irish and English produce, and for some reason or other the House thought they ought not to pass, because they would only furnish a partial relief, and not a substantial precedent. Again, in 1816 this House rejected a Bill for taking off the duty on stone bottles. At that time the duty on stone bottles was a complicated one; there was one duty on bottles introduced from Ireland, and another on bottles manufactured in England, the general duty being one penny per cwt. All we know is that a Bill for repealing the duty passed the House of Commons, and was brought up in the House, and that five days before prorogation, this entry occurs in the Journals:—"Present, so and so:—Ordered, That the Bill for going into the Stone Bottle Act be taken off for Six Months." The Government appear to have been misled into proposing something which ought not to have been proposed; for in the next Session they introduced a Bill, not for taking off the duty, but for doubling it, and the Bill accordingly became 5s. instead of 2s. 6d.

privileges of the two Houses of Parliament with respect to money Bills. We are agreed in reference to Bills of supply and taxation that your Lordships have, at all events, the power to reject them. You have to a certain extent admitted that you have no power to alter money Bills. A Resolution of the Commons to that effect was passed in 1678; your Lordships, however, have never absolutely admitted that you have no power to alter money Bills, though you have acquiesced to a certain extent in that Resolution, and have taken care not to exercise that which may still be the privilege of your Lordships' House; or if you have exercised it, the other House has taken care to assert its own privileges in such a manner as not to violate the constitutional rights of the other House of Parliament. There are many instances since 1678, in which your Lordships have made Amendments in money Bills. Those Bills have then gone down to the Commons, and supposing the Commons have not thought those Amendments improper, they have preserved their privileges and asserted their dignity by refusing to assent to those Amendments, but have introduced another Bill embodying the Amendments proposed by the Lords. In that way the privileges of both Houses of Parliament have been maintained. I understood my noble and learned Friend who has just spoken, not to deny the principles asserted by Lord Lyndhurst; but he says that the course which the House is called on to pursue, is entirely unprecedented and dangerous, therefore, to be adopted. My noble and learned Friend stated that Lord Lyndhurst had treated the subject with great dexterity by stating that he would mention a few precedents, and that he had many others to which he would not refer — insinuating thereby that that noble and learned Lord had in reality brought forward all the precedents he had been able to discover; and my noble and learned Friend then proceeded to maintain that the precedents which had been brought before the House are not at all like the present case. I, however, ask whether they are cases of money Bills or not? Lord Lyndhurst, however, gave us two instances, not of Bills imposing taxation, but of Bills for the relief of taxation, which were rejected by your Lordships' House. It has been stated that those Bills were rejected partly for political and partly for economical reasons. But what does it signify what were the reasons for rejecting them? If they were rejected by your Lordships for economical reasons, that is a proof that in dealing with money Bills this House exercised a power which would hardly be contended for by those who say that your Lordships have no right to interfere in these matters. The precedent of 1811, which my noble and learned Friend tries to disable, he has, I think, found too strong for him. That was the case both of the remission and imposition of taxation; and on that occasion this House rejected the Bill. The Commons, instead of making any complaint that there had been an infringement of their privileges, silently introduced another Bill, and that Bill became law. My noble and learned Friend appears to have been reading the journals of the day, and to have adopted the argument which I saw in the leading article of one of them, to the effect that it is the duty of the Commons (as undoubtedly it is) to provide the ways and means for the supply of the year, and that this House has no right to interfere at all with those ways and means, but is bound to adopt them. Now, suppose one of the ways and means devised by the Commons should be a tax highly objectionable and known to be one which the people at large regard with no favour or satisfaction; though it is admitted that the assent of this House is required for the Bill, and, though it is equally admitted that this House has the power not to assent to it, yet we are told that we must not touch the ways and means provided by the Commons. So that in the same breath we are told that we have the power to express concurrence or dissent, and that we have no such power. Is it possible that such an argument can prevail with your Lordships, and yet what other arguments have been advanced by the noble and learned Lord? But it is admitted that we have the power and the right to dissent from a money Bill. If then your Lordships have the power and the right you have also the corresponding duty to decide upon this Bill; the one cannot be without the other. And if, as I believe, not one in a thousand of the people if polled would vote in favour of the remission of this tax while the tea and sugar duties are maintained, then I ask your Lordships whether, having the power and the right, you are not bound to reject this Bill, seeing that the taking off of this tax will render necessary an increase of the income tax and the maintenance of the duties on tea and sugar. If we have the right, what better opportunity can there be for its exercise than the present? If we forbore to exercise it now, when there is a necessity for such a step, then indeed it will be said that we have established our inability ever to exercise it. Then a precedent will be surely established. It will be said that when an occasion arose which called for the interference of this House, which imperatively demanded that we should not pass the Bill and we refused to do our duty, we showed in the strongest way our impression that we had not the power, the right, the duty to interfere. I cannot understand what my noble and learned Friend meant by the solemn warning with which he concluded his address to your Lordships. He seemed to think that a great peril was impending over us which we would draw upon our heads by the rejection of this Bill. In my opinion we shall incur an infinitely greater danger by refusing to take the course that has been suggested to us, because we shall then show that we are cyphers in the constitution—that we had no power on any occasion where the public interest is most deeply interested—that if they, the Commons, choose to stamp their work with the magic name of a money Bill, you had no power to exercise your most important constitutional functions. I say, if you lose this opportunity of showing you have the power of interference on an occasion when you would do the greatest possible good to the public, you depose yourselves from the exercise of those important functions which belong to you by the constitution, and will certainly thereby bring down on yourselves infinitely more mischief than that which appears to be threatened by the noble and learned Lord as the result of the adoption of the Amendment.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: * My Lord, however great may be the importance which attaches to the constitutional argument, which has been so ably dealt with by my noble and learned Friend on the bench below (Lord Cranworth), I am bound to say I do not think it would be consistent with our duty—hardly respectful to this House—to rest our case upon that argument alone. I do not mean to say that the constitutional argument is not of itself broad enough to sustain the vote which we are now asking the House to pass; we have reason to believe and know that there are many noble Lords who will vote with the Government to-night who, if they had been Members of the Government, would have objected to the repeal of the paper which has elapsed a remarkable fact that first imposed the income tax only for the purpose of raising money. In his great speech he put relatively little stress on the necessity of commercial reforms. He went to show that the income tax was the only way with which he had to come round, so successful commercial policy been that the Government of Parliament that in addition to dispense with the income tax Parliament so desired that he advised Parliament to take that course; he recommended the income tax with its continuance and extension of commercial reforms and given indication of its necessity. But when the next year came round, mark what appeared the great danger of the income tax when used as a means of finance. The Duke of Argyll, in 1848, spoke of that tax in time of peace as a proposal without any other object than providing for expenditure. I believe that was a great mistake; but I am sure the Government ever had a better reason for its proposition. There had been a succession of calamities in the world, the consequent failure in the production of income. There were the Irish famine; there was a war raging at the Cape; there was a financial crisis; and last, not least, the revolution in Europe, which to some extent, excited the minds of the people of this country, and for some time led to the breaking out of that war. The attention of the country had been directed precisely as it has been lately directed to the question of fortifications and the defence of the country. It was to enable the Government to deal with this position of affairs that Lord J. Russell's Government proposed the increase of the income tax. Now, let me again observe, notwithstanding that it was not connected with any commercial reform. Now, what was the income tax? The proposal of the Government was resisted with indignation; they had to introduce it in a new Budget, and it was a great difficulty that they even secured the continuance of the income tax at the far end of a further period of three years. This is the lesson that I wish to draw from the Duke of Argyll livered by Mr. Disraeli upon this very question of the paper duty at the time that a Resolution upon the subject was assented to by the Government of noble Lords opposite. In June, 1858, Mr. Disraeli made a speech, in which he stated to the House of Commons the reasons why he deprecated the passing of that Resolution in the form in which it then stood, and he said:—

"I agree with the right hon. Gentleman 'that the maintenance of the Excise on paper as a permanent source of revenue would be impolitic,' but I cannot agree with him 'that such financial arrangements ought to be made as will enable Parliament to dispense with that tax.' I think that if a Resolution such as that contained in the latter part of his Motion is carried, you will only cripple and hamper the Government; and I do not think it is fair to hamper the Government with any such declaratory Resolution on this particular tax, as we entertain very little difference of opinion on the topic with the right hon. Gentleman who proposes this Resolution."—[3 Hansard, cli. 125.]

Now this is the passage to which I wish to direct the attention of the House:—

"The paper tax alone, however, is not the only tax forming one of the great sources of revenue derived from indirect taxation that requires our consideration. Whether we look at the revenue derived from our Customs, or at the various branches of our inland revenue, there is no doubt that notwithstanding the great changes and the great improvements which have occurred with respect to the mode of raising the revenue in these two particular departments during the last ten years, or I might say, generally speaking, during the last twenty-five years, still there is a great deal that deserves our consideration, and still there is great room for improvement in both these branches. Now, there are many duties in our Customs that really do not pay the cost of collecting and receiving them. That is a state of affairs which, in my opinion, it is not at all desirable should be maintained."—[Ibid.]

And he concludes:—

"I am not prepared to say that the tax upon paper itself is not one which requires, if not immediate, yet early consideration; but the subjects are so numerous, both in the Customs and in the Excise, that I think it is the duty of the Government to submit both these branches of the revenue to an early and severe revision."—[Ibid., p. 126.]

Now, if we had come to Parliament and said, "There are no more reforms that will pay as well as those which were initiated by Sir Robert Peel," we should have been met by this declaration—that both in the Customs and Excise, and in other branches of the Revenue, there were many duties which actually did not pay the cost of their collection, and I have no doubt that that argument would have been used successfully in Parliament.

In passing, let me remind your Lordships of one special danger connected with the maintenance of a high rate of income tax in time of peace, if it be not used as an instrument of reform. I mean the danger of breaking down the structure of the income tax by reviving the agitation for a different scale of duty upon different kinds or sources of income. When did that danger arise? Precisely at that period when commercial reforms had ceased to be connected in the minds of the people with the continuance of the impost. It was with some surprise that I heard the noble Duke (the Duke of Rutland), who spoke a few minutes ago, allude to the speech of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) in 1853, for no other purpose than that of blaming him for not having fulfilled the promises which he then made. I think that the noble Duke ought to remember that great effort of Mr. Gladstone with reference to a very different question. He ought to remember that when, as I think, by the mismanagement of the Government in which the noble Duke placed confidence, the question of the income tax was approaching a very dangerous solution, when those who were the natural leaders of the owners of real property had given up the sound financial principles which had hitherto been maintained by every finance Minister in this country; when a Conservative Government had announced that they meant to establish a different rate of taxation against the owners of real property, compared with those who derived their incomes from trades and professions, it was by the individual efforts, by the genius, the eloquence, and, let me add, the public virtue of my right hon. Friend, that that great danger was averted, and an equal rate of income tax was maintained. Then, I say, my Lords, that every consideration impressed upon the Government the absolute necessity of maintaining the connection between a high rate of income tax and the continuation of the great commercial reforms which were commenced by Sir Robert Peel.

The noble Duke has said that the reforms which we are proposing are wholly different from those of Sir Robert Peel. I venture entirely to dispute that proposition. I remember that during a former debate in the course of the present Session, the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) said that we upon this bench were perpetually endeavouring to confound our reforms with those of Sir Robert Peel, but that in reality there was a very wide distinction between them. the duties which necessitate the employment of a skilled and experienced officer the silk duty and the duty on soap. And this for the reason that a large class of articles are employed in protecting the country by watching other duties, but of which the duty on soap is the sole material. It is a trid of that class of duties which cannot be dispensed with. The duties are repealed. It is only one instance of the fact that these taxes have been repealed. It brings me to a point of reference with reference to the direct taxation. It is an error to suppose that any items in our Customs are the effect of dispensing with a great number of articles. It is the basis on which we rest. I hold in my mind the tariff of Mr. Gladstone's greatly alarmed some one. It is only forty-eight articles retained in it. That is the hair of many of our duties. What a revolution they say. How it strikes the system of our industry. We have those noble Lords who many of the existing bulk of our revenue is required into this matter. It is a surprise, surprised me. The Customs' revenue for the year 1858. There were duties on the tariff, yielding £1,570, and I found that a vast sum, with the rest £50,000, was raised from me! Is it, then, regrettable from a long list of such produce on an average £2,000 a-piece, and a considerable proportion of collection? Now, how is it treated the eleven other shown, contribute almost to your entire Customs revenue. It is abolished only two of the smallest—however the same time be less important addition to the various reductions made, that which appears in respect to the revenue is the reduction of it. Several reasons have signed for this, but the principal one is that coffee has become adulterated to a very large extent with chicory. Now, so careful has Mr. Gladstone been, not only to strike off unproductive duties, but to select for retention those which really pay, and to build up others which appeared to decay from causes capable of being removed, that he has endeavoured to aid the revenue from coffee by imposing a new duty on chicory calculated to yield from £90,000 to £100,000 a year, an amount, as the House will see, that will fully compensate for the disappearance from the tariff of many dozens of trumpety articles hitherto included in it. I mention this case, my Lords, as an instance of the care and the knowledge displayed by Mr. Gladstone in his revision of the tariff, a care and knowledge which stands in marked contrast with the vague fears and loose assertions with which my right hon. Friend has been assailed.

The noble and learned Lord (Lord Lyndhurst), who himself spoke with such eloquence to-night, praised the eloquence of my right hon. Friend's speech in proposing the Budget; but he ended by drawing a marked, and, I thought, somewhat invincible, distinction between the eloquence of Mr. Gladstone and his prudence or wisdom. Now, I venture to maintain that, if ever there was a speech delivered in Parliament free from anything like mere declamation, it was the speech with which my right hon. Friend introduced his financial scheme to the consideration of Parliament. With the exception of the last sentence, in which some play of fancy is usually allowed to an orator, it was strictly and exclusively a clear statement of facts combined with close reasoning and the distinct enunciation of principles. There was not a single word calculated to carry away the imaginations even of the most popular assembly; although, indeed, the whole address went to the heart and intellect of those who listened to it.

It seems, my Lords, to be a general agreement on both sides of the House that there should be very little debate on the subject of the paper duty itself. Although we are now nominally discussing the repeal of those duties, yet that question has been mainly considered with reference, not to its own merits, but to its connection with the general financial affairs of the country. I wish, therefore, to solicit attention to only one or two observations bearing upon this particular tax. In the first place, I think that nobody will deny that the paper duty stands very much in the same category with the Excise duties upon soap, upon glass, and upon bricks. These are the three great branches of Excise which have been successively abolished either by Sir R. Peel or by Governments which have succeeded him; and the paper duty is the only remaining branch of the Excise which stands in the same class and rank. I think it is quite impossible to dispute that this tax does interfere with trade and production. Among the petitions presented by a noble Earl opposite on this subject was one from the town of Leeds; and, as that petition was introduced with some remarks that led me to believe it possessed some importance, I have taken the trouble to read its prayer and look at its signatures. I confess, my Lords, that I was rather astonished at the arguments used by the petitioners to influence your judgment. They say that "the increasing expenditure for the national defences has imposed on the middle and upper classes a largely increased burden of taxation." I venture entirely to dispute the proposition that the burden of taxation has rested exclusively or even mainly on the upper and middle classes, as distinguished from those below them. Without going farther back than this very Budget, it is surely a fact not undeserving of consideration, that, although the Tariff Bill which was passed a few nights ago was condemned by the noble Earl opposite as involving a reckless sacrifice of revenue, that measure actually imposed more duties than it took off. It reimposed duties comparatively high on tea and sugar. Those duties are not raised exclusively from the higher classes, but the great bulk of them are paid by the middle and lower classes. I am not now supporting the assertion, which however is frequently made, that these duties on consumption are levied substantially on the working classes. This may be an overstatement of the case. But undoubtedly the working classes contribute a very large share of the total revenue derived from those sources. Therefore, it is not true to say that the taxation imposed on the country for the national defences is, even as respects the Budget of this year, entirely or mainly thrown upon the upper and middle classes. The Leeds politicians, speaking, I presume, of the income tax, say, "that by diverting capital from its natural channels, it must, if it is long continued, impede the development of the industrial energies of the people." I have no doubt that the income tax is a serious inconvenience ; but how it can divert the capital of the country from any particular channel I am at a loss to conceive. At least, I am prepared to maintain that it cannot have that effect to anything like the same degree as taxes levied from special branches of industry or modes of production. The petition goes on to say, "that under these circumstances your petitioners have viewed with alarm the fact that the House of Commons has passed a Bill for the repeal of the paper duty, the collection of which has been a fruitful source of revenue, bearing with equity upon all classes, and protecting from foreign competition a large and important branch of manufacture." There, my Lords, we get at the true argument ; and I am bound to say it has been frankly avowed by certain noble Lords, who admit that the paper duty is to a great extent a protective duty. The fact is, that all these Excise duties on one particular trade tend to concentrate that trade in the hands of a few great capitalists, who prevent other capitalists from entering the field. Thus they most seriously interfere with trade. And how is it that we have interested persons coming forward to ask your Lordships not to repeal this tax ? Why, some of these large papermakers know very well that the moment this duty is repealed a very considerable number of mills, requiring a small capital to establish them, will spring up and enter into competition with them ; or, on the other hand, they apprehend that foreign paper will be introduced more cheaply.

I say, then, that if these persons dread the rivalry of their own countrymen at home, or of the manufacturer abroad, in either case that is an argument why, in strict consistency with the principles you have adopted for the regulation of your finance, you should press forward in the abolition of these taxes, rather than suffer them to continue. Several noble Lords have spoken to-night as if the paper duty could be maintained as a permanent source of revenue. The noble Mover of the Amendment has, indeed, gone so far as actually to capitalize the produce of this duty, valuing it, I believe, at thirty years' purchase. Now, I will strike a bargain with the noble Lord. I will give him long odds that the paper duty will not last much more than another year. If he will give me only one more year's produce from it, I will give him his chance of all the rest.

is that the danger of it does not lie in technical grounds—it lies on substantial grounds. In opposing the repeal of this duty you are going to the very heart and root of the constitutional powers of the other House of Parliament. You are not invading their technical privileges; you are not transgressing your own technical privileges; but in truth and in substance you are striking at the very root of the constitutional usage which has hitherto regulated the relations between the two Houses. It is not that this is a money Bill merely. We have rejected many Bills which involved taxation. But there is a plain distinction between a mere money Bill and a Bill of Supply. There are money Bills of every kind and degree, from those partaking of the nature of a "Tack," against which this House has always protested as an invasion of your own privileges—to others, which, though involving taxation, involve also questions of general policy. I believe if you examine the precedents brought forward to-night by the noble and learned Lord, it will be found that, although they were all money Bills, not one of them was, in the proper sense of the word, a Bill of Supply. I happened last week to see the same list; I went with some care over each of them, and I believe I am correct in saying that not one of them was in the nature of a Supply Bill. I beg to direct the attention of the House to the peculiar nature of what are called Supply Bills. I will take the very Bill we are now proposing to repeal. This is the preamble of a Supply Bill, entirely different from ordinary Money Bills, which belong to a different class.

"Most Gracious Sovereign,—We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Great Britain in Parliament assembled, finding it absolutely necessary to raise large supplies of money to carry on the war, until your Majesty may be enabled to establish a good and lasting peace, and to defray your Majesty's extraordinary expenses, do by this Act give and grant to your Majesty the several and respective duties in this Act mentioned," &c.

I believe there is not one of the Bills referred to by the noble and learned Lord which was in the nature of Supply, or had that paragraph in the preamble. I believe farther, though this I must to a considerable extent state on the authority of others, that there is no instance on record since the Revolution in which your Lordships have thrown out a Bill strictly in the nature of Supply—that is, a Bill either granting, or repealing a grant of taxes, in strict connection with the finance of the State as declared by the House of Commons. A course runs against the Constitution. Not only does it invade the peculiar province of the Commons, but to a very great extent it is at variance with the relations of both Houses to the Crown and its officers. In Mr. Erskine May's Principles and Usage of Parliamentary Procedure, a distinct doctrine is laid down distinctly:—"The duty of all Parliamentary taxation for the public service of the Crown through its officers." And thus—no instance of the House of Commons throwing out a Supply Bill of this nature consistently with the principles of the Constitution is unusual, and almost impossible even for the House of Commons to throw out a Bill of this nature by the responsible advice of the Government except in cases where the Budget altogether has been thrown out.

The noble Lord mentions another circumstance, which I will admit it has no technical ground in the House, constitutes a strong moral obligation. It is that as the Government is not set at liberty to add to the tax, it does so happen that the House of Commons a distinct Motion on this subject by a distinct Motion of the Opposition, and an instance was taken on that occasion that the addition of the tax should be imposed, and the repeal of the paper duty should be done. But if the House foresees the decision now called upon to propose, have taken another course, they did take, not doubt the practice of Parliament. I do not say that is a fair, when the House of Commons a distinct and decided vote as compared with another side, consider it an additional of the question before us a reference to the constitution of the two Houses.

And now, my Lords,

the only remaining point—I mean the question of the deficit. I need hardly remind the House that there have been many occasions on which a deficit has been threatened by the Opposition. There was a very recent case in 1857; your Lordships will no doubt recollect that on that occasion the whole pressure of the Opposition was directed to show the necessity of farther reduction, and that there would be an enormous deficit in 1858-9. It was quite in vain that Sir George Lewis maintained that he was not bound to go into any year beyond that for which he had immediately to provide; Mr. Disraeli would insist there was a large deficit ahead; and, as a specimen of the danger of these figures, I would for a moment direct your Lordships' attention to the actual results. On the 20th of February, 1857, Mr. Disraeli insisted that in the following year it would be impossible to take the income higher than at £61,404,000, and the expenditure at £62,804,000, showing a deficit of £1,400,000, without taking into account the Exchequer bills, of which we have again heard to-night. Sir George Lewis endeavoured to prove that a more favourable result might fairly be anticipated, and in particular that the Revenue might be estimated considerably higher. He placed it at £62,300,000. It so happened that before the year was out the noble Earl was in office, and Mr. Disraeli had to deal with the finances of the country. In happier mood Mr. Disraeli, in April, 1858, was able to announce to Parliament that, instead of the Revenue being at the outside £61,404,000, it amounted to £63,120,000, a sum which exceeded the estimate of Sir George Lewis by £820,000, and Mr. Disraeli's own by £1,716,000! Let us beware therefore of the oft-paraded proofs of deficit. There is a very large margin you must allow for the ordinary increase of revenue in the country, an increase which is likely to be all the greater if important commercial reforms such as those which are now under the consideration of Parliament should be carried into effect.

I may now be allowed to offer to the House one or two observations on that portion of the brilliant speech of the noble and learned Lord who spoke at the commencement of the evening, in which he indicated that the popularity of the financial proposals of the Government was now somewhat on the wane. In answer to that statement, I am perfectly prepared to admit being carried to their final triumph by my right hon. Friend, have been irrevocably sanctioned by public opinion. So far as the individual tax with which we are immediately dealing is concerned, it is, I believe, impossible even for the authority of this House to maintain it as a permanent source of revenue, and I have no doubt that one of the effects of our coming to the decision at which the noble Baron asks us to arrive to-night would be at once to revive that interest in the financial scheme of the Government which to some noble Lords of late appears to have flagged. Any such revival of interest, would, however, in my opinion, be very dearly bought if the Act which led to it should contribute to create any doubt in the minds of the people of England as to the spirit of wisdom and moderation in which your Lordships' House is disposed to exercise the legal privileges which it enjoys.

THE EARL OF DERBY: However important, my Lords, may be the subject which occupies your attention this evening, it is, I am afraid, one to which it is difficult to impart an amount of interest at all proportionate to its intrinsic magnitude. I feel, also, that I labour under considerable disadvantage in rising to address your Lordships at this hour of the night (a quarter to twelve), and at the close of a lengthened debate, more especially as my observations must be mainly directed to dry financial details, which are in themselves of a character not very inviting. I may, however, be permitted, before passing to those details, to say a few words with respect to the constitutional question involved in this discussion, which—notwithstanding what has just fallen from the noble Duke or from the noble and learned Lord opposite, who formerly occupied a seat on the woolsack, or from a Member of your Lordships' House who came forward as a friendly critic, but not in the capacity of a voter hostile to the Government on the present occasion—I should be perfectly satisfied to allow to rest on the footing on which it has been placed by my noble Friend behind me, and by my noble, learned, and venerable Friend who spoke early in the debate, and who has signalized the close this day of the eighty-eighth year of his honoured life, by a speech combining the utmost clearness and power of statement, with a knowledge the most complete of the details of constitutional law and practice. Now, the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Argyll) did not, I must say, in dealing with this point of constitutional usage, succeed in establishing the position which he laid down upon the subject, or at least did not materially strengthen the argument by the position he took. He said that there was no instance in which your Lordships' House had rejected a Supply Bill, and he quoted the ordinary language of a Bill of that nature. I, however, hold in my hand the very Bill to which my noble and learned Friend near me has already alluded—namely, an Act granting Her Majesty certain duties to be levied on wash and other liquors used in the distillation of spirits, and which begins with precisely that form of expression, "Most gracious Sovereign, we your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects," and so forth. This, therefore, is a Supply Bill, and yet the Bill, so distinctly marked with that character, was absolutely rejected by your Lordships' House, notwithstanding the statement of the noble Duke, to the effect that there was no instance in which such a course had been taken in reference to a measure of Supply. But this is not all. The argument drawn by the noble Duke from this source completely fails in the present instance; he contended that we cannot reject this Bill because it is a Supply Bill, whereas the Bill under our notice is, as it happens, not a Supply Bill at all, but a Bill for the repeal of a tax. There was another argument of the noble Duke which certainly carries this constitutional argument rather further than it has hitherto been considered to apply. He says that almost all money Bills have a twofold character—that they have a political as well as a financial side. Does he see what is the natural inference of that? If we are unable to amend a money Bill, or to reject a money Bill—that is, if we are unable practically to express any opinion at all upon a money Bill, and if all these money Bills have a joint political and financial character, by the assumption of the noble Duke your Lordships' House is deprived, not only of the power of dealing with matters of finance, but also with those political considerations involved in the Bill. Surely Her Majesty's Government are not contending for a limitation of the power of your Lordships' House so extraordinary, and I will, with all respect to the noble Duke, say so absurd, as that contended for by him. He says again, that though what is proposed is not technically a violation of the privileges of the House of Commons, yet it is practically a violation, inasmuch as they have assented to an income tax increased by one penny in the pound, which they would probably not have assented to if they had not relied on our passing this Bill. If you are not to exercise any discretion, in what position are your Lordships? We could not, when the Income Tax Bill was brought up, do more than give notice that we intended to object to the paper duty; we had no power to do more, for we could not make such an Amendment on the Income Tax Bill as would enable us to deal with this Paper Duty Bill. We might have rejected the Income Tax Bill, or have passed it for the full amount of the tax, and what we did do was to adopt a course which we thought entitled us to credit. We said, however we might object to an Income Tax, or to a portion of the Budget, or to the Treaty, we should not interfere with the provisions of the Bill because we would not embarrass the finances of the country and the general arrangements of the Government; but on that occasion I guarded myself by stating that there was a broad distinction between that and another Bill, the rejection of which would not embarrass the finances of the country, but would put a larger sum at the disposal of the Government, I should reserve to myself full liberty to deal with it. Leaving the constitutional part of the question where it was left by my noble and learned Friend, and by the noble Duke who spoke last, whose advocacy does not seem to have very much improved his case, I proceed now to the main point, the abolition of the paper duty, and the grounds on which we object to that abolition. The noble Earl who opened this discussion occupied a considerable part of his speech by doing me the honour to refer in great detail to an address which I delivered to a deputation a day or two ago. He called it an unfortunate speech; but, however much it may deserve the term as regards myself, it certainly is a fortunate one in this, that it furnished my noble Friend with matter for almost the whole of his speech. He commented on the statement I made, that I thought it was a fortunate thing that this Amendment was brought forward without any concert with me by the noble Baron opposite, who is generally a supporter of the Government; and he says that it surely is a question of such importance that I ought not to have waited for its being taken up by an independent Member of the House, but that it ought

war because I believed that your Lordships' interference is necessary to save the country from great present and much greater future financial difficulties. With regard to the paper duty, the noble Earl was right in conjecturing that it was not my intention to rest my argument upon the intrinsic merits or demerits of the tax. I shall, consequently, follow the example set me by the noble Earl, and abstain altogether from discussing the objections to the duty on the one hand, or the advantages which it may offer on the other. I may be permitted, however, to correct one misapprehension of the noble Earl in reference to what he imagines me to have said the other day—still in that unfortunate speech—as to the course pursued by the Government in 1858. Your Lordships are aware that that Government was one not very strong in Parliamentary support. We had brought forward a Budget which had given general satisfaction. We did not find ourselves in possession of a large available surplus. The noble Duke stated that whereas the revenue was estimated at £61,000,000, it actually was £63,000,000; but he omitted to mention that the estimated expenditure was £67,000,000; and that, consequently, there was a deficiency to make up of £4,000,000. What I said the other day in reference to this paper duty was this:—

“Resolutions were brought forward in the other House of Parliament that the paper duty was not a fit source for a permanent revenue; and, next, that it was desirable so to frame the financial arrangements as to enable Parliament to dispense with it. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that in the abstract he agreed with the Resolution—as I do—that if the country could afford the loss, the paper duty was not a desirable source of permanent revenue; but he objected to the further Resolution. That, he said, was not the fitting time to take it off. We had proposed a Budget which remitted a certain amount of income tax in conformity with the provisions of the existing law—next year we shall have to deal with the tea and sugar duties, upon which there will be another fall, we shall have to provide for the gradual extinction of the war duties and for the entire lapse of the income tax, and we cannot give the income tax the preference over these two great objects.”

That was the argument used then, and that is the argument I use now. I do not defend the paper duty theoretically as a desirable source of revenue; but if the Exchequer were full, if the finances were flourishing, if the prospects abroad were more certain, and if your income tax were at a less exorbitant rate than that at which your necessities have compelled you now to place it,—if you had relieved a condition which presses on the labouring man by the remission of the tea and sugar duties—if circumstances, in fact, together different, it might be desirable to repeal the paper duty; but, while main as they are, you are only a temporary relief of the financial embarrassments of the country by this improvident and reckless proposal. Proceeding now to the part of the question—I am obliged to the noble Earl need not have reminded me of my own inadequacy to deal with a financial question, and of the reason with which the House will listen to me even at the period of the evening—he spoke, much more now. Thou shalt not pretend to the character of a statesman—in financial matters more especially have this satisfaction, that I found the statements and all my figures on the Chancellor of the Exchequer's side, the objections which I shall offer to the present scheme of finance, there is no high authority of the same right honourable gentleman. Whether I refer to the promises, strict binding pledges, which have been given by the Government that the tax should finally expire in 1860—I look to the feeling that the fall of the Long Annuities should be a means of affording relief, not in the way of indirect taxes, but to contribute to the abolition of the income tax—we look to the necessity of looking beyond the present year, and not being content to deal with the finances of one year—whether I look to the necessity of postponing the abolition of the paper duty to the necessity of abrogating the duties on tea and sugar—upon all these points I am happy to say I have the authority of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has recently placed his direct opposition and hostility to the financial schemes of the right hon. Gentleman who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, and who is now his Colleague and head of the Home Department. In the first place let me deal with the finances of the last and present year, according to the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In looking at the revenue and expenditure of 1859-60, the right honourable gentleman was anxious to show what would have been the surplus for the year if unexpected causes had not arisen to increase expenditure on the one hand, and to diminish the produce of taxes on the

Even by taking advantage of a very unexpected sum received from Spain in payment of an old debt—for which, I believe, he was mainly indebted to the exertions of my noble Friend, who the year before filled the office of Foreign Secretary—the right hon. Gentleman made the expenditure and income exactly alike. This year the estimated revenue is £60,700,000; the estimated expenditure, £70,100,000, —you might call it £71,000,000, because there is 1,000,000 of Exchequer bonds which have to be provided for in some way this year. That leaves a deficiency of £9,400,000. The Chancellor of the Exchequer offered us various modes of filling this up; for instance, there were the tea and sugar duties which might be kept on, which would make £2,100,000, or we might have a 9d. income tax. He says an income tax at 9d. will produce £9,772,000, and will give a surplus of £372,000. Well, my Lords, in the circumstances in which this country was placed, and looking to the causes which necessitated such great expenditure—which was not an outlay of the ordinary character, but a war expenditure in the time of peace, which became absolutely necessary for the security and for the safety of the country—I do not believe the slightest objection would have been raised to the imposition of the 9d. income tax, providing it was shown to be necessary for the safety and security of the country. And, although, it would not have been as striking and as brilliant a Budget as that brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman, in my opinion it would have been one more likely to receive the general assent and sanction of Parliament. But the right hon. Gentleman thought this was a fit occasion for a display of his matchless rhetorical powers. Having had the pleasure of listening to that most eloquent and most able speech, I came away with the fullest conviction that such a Budget as was then proposed, such a financial arrangement, combining so many difficulties and so many dangers, never could have commanded the consent of any legislative assembly if the listeners had not been so dazzled by the brilliancy of the rhetoric of the right hon. Gentleman as to be willing to blind their eyes to the dangerous consequences of that reckless course on which he was urging them to enter. With a deficiency of £9,400,000, the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to make his statement, and, adopting the principle which seems also to have been followed by the

Customs establishment he would realize £982,000; he continued the war duties on tea and sugar, from which he derived £2,100,000; he put on an income tax of 10d. in the pound, producing £8,472,000; and carrying out the principle which pervades the whole of this Budget, by a new arrangement of the income tax he managed to get in for the present year a larger amount than would be yielded by the ordinary mode of imposition. Instead of half a year's proportion of the tax he is to receive three-quarters of the amount in the present year, in addition to the one-fourth which remained for the service of the year, arising from the previous 5d. income tax. Even this would have left him in a deficiency of something like a million after taking his new charges; and so, after he had continued the present war duties on tea and sugar, after he had saddled the country with an income tax of 10d. in the pound, three-fourths of which was to be raised in the first half-year, he found it necessary to take for the year 1860-61 the malt and hop credits, amounting to £1,400,000, which properly belong to the service of the years 1861-62. And thus, by anticipating revenues, he converted his large deficit into an apparent surplus of £464,000, at the expense of the year 1861-62, and without making the slightest provision to meet the difficulties which in the year 1861-62 must come upon the Exchequer. My Lords, I said an apparent surplus of £464,000; but the noble Earl opposite has admitted in the first place one very manifest error, arising from a very simple cause. The Budget estimate for the collection of revenue was £4,700,000, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer in bringing forward this brilliant Budget forgot that the cost of collecting the income tax was by poundage; and consequently the increased production of the income tax must be acquired at an increased charge; so that when the Estimates are brought forward the amount no longer stands at £4,700,000, but at £4,932,000, being an increase of £232,000, or exactly half the estimated surplus. The noble Duke behind me pointed out—and it has not since been denied—that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been compelled to admit drawback to the extent of £250,000 on this very paper duty. That of itself would be sufficient altogether to exhaust the remaining surplus for the present year, and to leave the Chancellor of the Exchequer with a deficiency. My noble Friend the President of the Council, in his opening speech, stated that some further concessions, which were estimated at £100,000, had been made. When we come to look at other matters, I think it will be manifest that even in the present year the Chancellor of the Exchequer has landed us in a most formidable deficiency, and to that you wish voluntarily, spontaneously, and unnecessarily to contribute to the amount of a million by the abolition of the paper duty. The Miscellaneous Estimates are seven in number, and they were taken at £7,500,000. The six already presented amount to £6,644,000. The seventh has not yet been presented, but if the estimated amount for the whole be £7,500,000 it follows that for the seventh there is only left the sum of £855,000. The similar article in the Miscellaneous Estimates last year amounted to £1,128,236, and, therefore, to bring it within the seventh estimate with the stipulated amount of £855,000, you must accomplish a saving this year of £272,000. But on the whole of the remaining £6,644,000 you have only effected a retrenchment to the extent of £107,000; and I therefore leave your Lordships to conjecture what chance there is of your saving £272,000 out of a total sum of £855,000. We are told that in the Budget credit was taken for a Vote of £500,000, which, I suppose, must be taken in addition to the sums voted for the military and naval forces engaged in the Chinese war. And, therefore, by whatever amount the expenses of the war in China exceed that Vote of credit of £500,000—and we may be sure that it will not be a trivial excess—by so much will there be, on the showing of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, an addition to the deficiency in his Budget for the present year. There is one point on which I should like to hear some explanation, and perhaps the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for the War Department will enlighten me on the subject. He will remember that the Army Estimates were taken back and altered after they had been laid on the table of the House, in consequence of the arrangements of the Government having been materially interfered with by a number of troops which were sent back from India. They were altered, but they were increased by a very small amount indeed. I want to know the meaning of this phenomenon. The establishment was added to by 1,900 men, in addition to those charged on the previous Estimates, and those men had, I suppose, to clothed, provisioned, and stores found them; and yet, although a slight addition was made on account of the men, I no addition made for any articles of hing, provision, or storage. I want to w how this additional expenditure is rided for, since it does not appear in Budget. I believe the Vote of credit £500,000 will be mainly absorbed by se items; but at the present moment are unable to obtain the slightest ination on the point. In the Budget the present year no reference is made ny contemplated outlay for fortifications a view to the defence of the country, yet we are given to understand that it be necessary to expend a large sum of ey in this manner. Any portion of this rge which may be incurred in the pre-t year must increase the deficit which have to be encountered in the year 1861-62. Then the Foreign Office and the onial Office had been found to be too igerous for habitation. Plans have been med, and everything has been got ready, I expected that this year we should e seen the erection of a new Foreign ice, if not also of a Colonial Office. But no Estimates have been taken for any-ng of the kind; but if the expenditure s not fall upon this year it must fall n the diminished resources of 1861-62. erefore I say that, following the Chan-or of the Exchequer's own figures, and y allowing for those corrections which absolutely necessary to make, and ich have not been denied by the right n. Gentleman's Colleagues, even for the sent year there will not only not be a plus of £464,000, but there will be no plus at all; and, as it does not need the of prophecy to show, there will be a siderable deficiency, even supposing the ancendor of the Exchequer's calculations be correct. Again, we must remember ther element of danger. The Chan-or of the Exchequer calculated upon a s upon French wines of £1,700,000; , in consequence of increased consump- n, it would be only £1,100,000. To make that less the consumption of French ie must increase in the course of three-rters of a year no less than 35 per cent, l that without affecting—for if it did it old alter the whole balance—without eting the consumption of beer or spirits. en, again, as to the trifling articles ounting to £910,000, a nett estimate of : upon a gross loss of £1,040,000; and I do not know where the great increase nerve should be strained, to take off the income tax in 1860. I am not finding fault with him for not taking off the income tax in 1860, because I know circumstances have been too strong for him; but what I am contending for is this, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had no right to say that the large falling in of £2,400,000 afforded him means, or could be made a justification, for taking off a corresponding amount of indirect taxation, inasmuch as that very sum was known to be about to fall in during the present year, and had been estimated by him as one of the principal means for removing the income tax in 1860. Listen to the statement of Mr. Gladstone in 1853:—

"How are we to obtain a rational prospect of being able to part with the income tax in 1860 . . . estimated tax, £6,140,000; new sources of income, £3,549,000? Then we come to the anticipated reductions of charge, which of course will be as effectual to the purpose in view as positive additions to the revenue. The first of these reductions of charge is that on the Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent, which we owe to the wise measure of the right hon. Member for Cambridge in 1844. That measure will bring to the account £624,000. . . . Then in 1859-60 there will fall in the heavy burden of the Long Annuities, and of another large portion of our terminable annuities. The first of these is £1,392,000, the second £854,000; together they will operate a relief of £2,146,000. Adding this amount to the sum of £3,813,000 . . . there will be an available increase of means of no less an amount than £5,959,000 against the £6,140,000 of income tax, which will be the total amount of that tax at that period. In the years 1860-61 half of the income tax at 5d. will be available. The balance will be applicable as respects the following year. The Committee may now judge whether I have been justified in the language I have used with respect to the surrender of the income tax.—[3 Hansard, cxxv. 1420.]

The Motion then made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was, that in April, 1860, except as to the collection of moneys then due, the said rates and duties shall cease and determine. That was in 1853, and, no doubt, the circumstances have since altered. But, in 1857—and this supports me in another argument,—namely, as to the necessity of looking ahead and providing not only for the service of the present year, but for future years—the following Motion was made by Mr. Disraeli, as an Amendment to the financial statement of the right hon. Gentleman now Home Secretary:—

"That in the opinion of this House it would be expedient, before sanctioning the financial arrangements for the ensuing year, to adjust the estimated income and expenditure in the manner which shall appear best calculated to secure it against the risk of a deficiency in the year and 1859-60, and to provide for such a revenue and charge respectively in the as may place it in the power of Parliament period, without embarrassment to the together to remit the income tax."—[3 Hansard, 971.]

That Motion was strenuously supported by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I must say in the speech he then made he bore somewhat hardly upon my Colleague, who then filled the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer. I do him the justice to say, that the he has now brought forward is in accordance with the views he expressed; but if he had endeavored to frame a Budget in such a manner as to negative item by item and point out the principles laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer he could not have done so more faithfully and successfully than he has done. What were the points of Sir George Lewis's Budget in 1857? That it was not expedient to abolish the paper duties; that it was not expedient to do away with the wine duties, and that it was of great importance you should not so reduce the tax as to diminish the number of articles as to the permanence of the revenue from that source. The Budget of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer goes to the principle that you should abolish the paper duties, that you should abolish the wine duties, and that you should reduce the tariff so as to make it consist of the smallest number of articles possible. His predecessor in office had the reputation of sitting behind him and those principles enunciated, and of adhering to them, of course, his cordial approval. As I am going back to the question of pledges, your Lordships will observe the language in which Mr. Gladstone mentioned his speech on that occasion

"I have stood at that box, Sir, and addressed the House of Commons, and I advised on the part of the Government to belong to the assent of the House of Commons financial plans which were in every point contradictory to those which are now proposed. Is that hon. Gentleman still sitting on the Treasury benches find such facility for going to contradictory propositions it is no wonder to say, but of this I feel convinced, that the same feelings which existed four years ago do not mean as to questions which were the subject of party contentions, but as to the duty of balancing income and expenditure—the pledges which were given to the country subject of the income tax will be rigorously maintained."—[3 Hansard, cxliv., 985.]

Well, my Lords, it was hinted—meekly hinted—that there were circumstances previous to 1857 which might modify these pledges. No. He would not listen to any such proposal. True, he did own that he had been deceived in his estimate of the Succession Duty, respecting which I may say that there has never been a more gross and signal failure in a financial point of view, while, at the same time, upon those luckless individuals who have become subjected to the tax it has pressed with the utmost severity. In 1857 there had been a failure in Mr. Gladstone's expectations respecting the Succession Duty, and there was also the trifle of the Russian war. Mr. Gladstone was not then Chancellor of the Exchequer, but Sir George Lewis was. Then, with fervid eloquence, the right hon. Gentleman exclaimed that those circumstances were not sufficient to absolve the House from those pledges, and that, as the person upon whom they most pressed, he should not feel absolved, in honour, or in conscience, from the duty of straining every nerve still to uphold and carry out those pledges. Was 1857 the last occasion on which this language fell from the Chancellor of the Exchequer? By no means; for when my right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli), being then Chancellor of the Exchequer, brought forward that comprehensive scheme which came to its final termination in 1860, proposing not to interfere with the fall of the income tax, the right hon. Gentleman quite concurred with him. He said—

"It is perfectly true that the war has made a permanent addition to your burdens of about £1,250,000 per annum; but no one will say that a change in the circumstances of the country to that extent is of itself sufficient to cause an abandonment of the expectations which the country has been taught to entertain with regard to the extinction of the income tax."—[3 Hansard, cxlix. 1814.]

Up to 1858, therefore, we find the Chancellor of the Exchequer declaring that he was bound by the most solemn pledges, that he must positively redeem those pledges, that he depended on the falling-in of the Long Annuities to enable him to reduce the income tax; and now, when these annuities have fallen in, he feels it to be his first duty to apply the amount in the remission of indirect duties, and not of income tax. There is something more. The right hon. Gentleman says, in refer-lament he has not asked for one farthing for the Chinese war, while, with respect to the Persian war, he finds it the most convenient course to keep it as long as possible out of sight—can you believe, with these considerations before you, that the right hon. Gentleman is correct in his estimate of £900,000 surplus? He confines himself, as to the Persian war, to covering the expenses of last year, and does not call upon us to vote any money for its charge in 1857-8. If there be any life in the House of Commons, any sense of its constitutional duty, it will not allow the Persian war to be conducted on those principles. I give the fullest notice that I do not understand it to be the function of the representatives of the people, while attending in this House, to allow wars to be begun by the Government, to be carried on by the Government, without any explanation or estimate of the charges being submitted to us: until after the conclusion of the war, after the money has been spent and the lives of our countrymen sacrificed the little Bills are presented, and we are told by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that we have nothing to do but to consider how they shall be paid. That is not my understanding of our duties as representatives of the people. If the Government form such an estimate of our duties, I tell them that I, for one, will never conform to that estimate; and if the House of Commons shall be of the same determination as myself, we shall invite the Government to give us a distinct explanation of the character and expenses of those wars. If they decline our invitation, we shall urge them to do so; and if they still refuse, we must coerce them by our votes to give us an estimate of the expenses of the Persian war, that we may know precisely what it is before the war goes further, and not allow ourselves to be kept in ignorance of it until the war is over.”—[3 Hansard, cxliv., 991].

One point more. The Budget is proposed to be taken, not for a period of three years, which has the high approbation of the noble Duke opposite, and which, according to him, would give time for the great commercial change which he thinks very desirable, but it holds good for one year only; and it is to be taken for that period for the purpose of enabling the future Parliament, however constituted, to deal freely with the finances of the country at a moment when you have created a deficit of £12,000,000, and by repealing the paper duties have dried up that source for supplying the deficit. What did Mr. Gladstone say in March, 1857?—

“The hon. and learned Member for Newcastle (Mr. Headlam) says that the only way to keep the income tax under our control is to vote it from year to year. Now, I beg leave to differ in opinion altogether from the hon. Member. I believe that the transition from voting it for a term of years to that of voting it from year to year is the sign of another transition which we should endeavour by all means to shun—namely, a transition from a solid and steady system of finance to a vacillating and merely provisional system of finance.”—[3 Hansard, cxliv. 3067.]

I leave it to the right hon. Gentleman, with all his eloquence and ability—and no one admires them more than I do—to reconcile these two principles. One more declaration on the subject of finance was made by the right hon. Gentleman in 1857. He said the House was called on to take a burden off the shoulders of the wealthy classes in order to impose taxes on tea and sugar, which were articles consumed by the poor man; that he entertained a decided opinion against such a proposition; and that before the Speaker left the chair, if health and strength remained to him, he should endeavour to induce the House, whatever taxes were proposed, not to levy more on the tea and sugar of the poor man. Yet the right hon. Gentleman himself now takes off the wine duties of the wealthier classes, and continues the war duties on the tea and sugar of the poor. I have endeavoured, my Lords, to show, and I said I would at the outset, that whatever objections I entertain to this Budget—namely, because of its improvident character; because of its rendering it absolutely impossible to take off the income tax; because of the necessity which I conceive we are under of looking forward to our resources for the supply of future years; and because of the impropriety of reducing the taxes on the rich man's luxuries, while we retain those on tea and sugar—in these objections I am supported by the recent, repeated, eloquent, and energetic declarations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in opposition to his own Budget. Once more, following his example, I do not object to the repeal of the paper duties if you can afford to do so; but I do object, when our finances are in an undus, or rather in a hopeless deficiency in 1861-2, and when, with the prospect of foreign disturbances, of greatly increased taxation, of a large military and naval expenditure, with the necessity of incurring great expense in fortifications and in the national defences, you voluntarily deprive yourselves of a source of permanent revenue, collected without difficulty, and yielding £1,400,000 a year. I was charmed to hear from the noble Duke opposite a declaration on the part of the Government that they have nothing in common with the principles announced by those who are described as forming the Manchester school; but, whatever may be the intentions of the Government, they are by their acts playing into the hands and furthering the avowed objects of that party. What is the announcement of that party? The announcement made—not concealed, but openly proclaimed—is, that they will effect a change of taxation, and so cut down the indirect taxes as to make the whole dependence of the country be upon direct taxation; and the pressure of that direct taxation, they anticipate, will be so grinding and so odious that, whatever the circumstances of the country may be, war will be avoided, because no party will be willing to defray the expense necessary for carrying it on. That is the avowed object of those persons. They say, “We will secure peace by taking away the power of making war, by throwing the whole burden of taxation on direct taxation, and making the pressure odious.” The Government have quite different views, I have no doubt; but if they had the same objects they could not more effectually promote them than by the system of finance they are encouraging. My Lords, it is not, therefore, solely on account of the amount, though that is considerable, that I object to the abolition of the paper duty; but because you are taking away an important branch of revenue, and establishing principles and promoting objects contended for by those parties who, by weakening the financial condition of the country, desire to effect the purposes they have in view. For these reasons of political as well as financial importance I object to the proposition of the Government, and shall not feel myself justified in giving my assent to it. I have troubled your Lordships at greater length than I desired, and in closing my observations I will again avail myself once more of that valuable speech to which I am already so largely indebted, and I will read the passage in which the right hon. Gentleman sums up his objections to the Budget of 1857 in language more eloquent and forcible than any I could use. I shall not, therefore, add a single word to the concluding observations of the right hon. Gentleman. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer on the 20th of February, 1857, used these eloquent words:—

“I feel strongly upon this subject, and I dare say I have expressed myself in strong language. I hope it has not been stronger than the occasion demands. I confess I do feel strongly the nature of these propositions. I will conceal nothing. I may be wrong, and my judgement may err, like that of other men; but this is the first time—I will not say, that I have heard a deficiency recommended and sanctioned by the Government, for, and unfortunately, I have heard that, and in principle it was quite as bad as this proposition, led away by the calculations of the noble Earl with respect to next year—calculations in which he had refused to take into account a sum of £1,200,000 which would then be available.

PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

The EARL OF SHAFTESBURY moved,
That the Bill be now read 3^d.

NAVAL FREIGHT MONEY.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if any steps have been taken (on the recommendation of the late Naval Commission), to abolish the present system of sharing freight money for the conveyance of specie, jewels, or treasure, on board Her Majesty's Ships; one-fourth share being paid to the Admiral on the station, two-fourths to the Captain of the ship who signed the bill of lading or receipt for the same, and the remaining one-fourth share only being paid to Greenwich Hospital for the use of the institution.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, in reply, that an investigation had been instituted into that subject, among others, by a Commission appointed to inquire into the state of Greenwich Hospital, and the Admiralty did not wish to come to any decision upon the matter until they should have learnt what was the result of that investigation.

PROTECTION UNDER THE BRITISH FLAG.—QUESTION.

MR. DALGLISH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Officers commanding British Ships of War on the coasts of Naples and Sicily have received special instructions to extend the protection of the British Flag to all persons, refugees or others, who may require it?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, in reply, that he had laid on the Table of the House that evening a correspondence on the subject of the reception of refugees on board Her Majesty's Ships; and he had to state that on referring to what had taken place upon former occasions he found that there was a letter written by Mr. Addington under the direction of his noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston), in the year 1849, which seemed to him (Lord John Russell) to convey the orders and instructions applicable to that or to any other cases of the same kind; and he believed the best answer he could give to the question of the hon. Gentleman was to read an extract from that communication. The noble Lord then read the following extract:—

"I have laid before Viscount Palmerston your letter of the 30th of July last, requesting, by direction of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, his Lordship's opinion on a question which has recently occurred at Naples, as to the extent to which British ships-of-war in a foreign port are entitled to receive on board and shelter the subjects of a foreign Government who may be apprehensive of being persecuted if they remain on shore.

"Viscount Palmerston directs me to request that you will acquaint the Board of Admiralty that his Lordship is of opinion that it would not be right to receive and harbour on board a British ship-of-war any person flying from justice on a criminal charge, or who was escaping from the sentence of a court of law. But a British man-of-war has always and everywhere been considered a safe place of refuge for persons of whatever country or party who have sought shelter under the British flag from persecution on account of their political conduct or opinions; and this protection has been equally afforded, whether the refugee was escaping from the arbitrary acts of a Monarchical Government or from the lawless violence of a Revolutionary Committee.

"There seems to be nothing in the present state of affairs at Naples or in Sicily which ought to make a British ship-of-war stationed in a Neapolitan or in a Sicilian port an exception to the general rule; and therefore, although the commander of such ship-of-war should not seek out or invite political refugees, yet he ought not to turn away nor to give up any who may reach his ship and ask admittance on board. Such officer must, of course, take care that such refugees shall not carry on, from on board his ship, any political correspondence with their partizans on shore, and he ought to avail himself of the earliest opportunity to send them to some place of safety elsewhere."

That letter appeared to him (Lord John Russell) to be applicable upon the present occasion, and he had directed the Admiralty to adopt that rule.

THE INDIAN ARMY.—QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for India, what amount of truth there is in certain statements made in The Times newspaper of Saturday, the 19th of May, that the regular Native army of India under British authority consisted of 250,000 sabres and bayonets; that this great Sepoy army rose in mutiny, and it has all vanished; that the army of the East India Company has dissolved, even as the Sovereignty of the Company has dissolved; and that "a quarter of a million of disciplined Native soldiers has been destroyed;" that the Company's European army has, with a strange fatality, followed the fate of the Sepoys, and disbanded themselves. Further, he wished to ask whether it is not the fact that about 11,000 of the late Company's European troops are not still embodied, comprising European regiments that have gloriously distinguished themselves in numerous battles: together with a body of artillery equal to any in the world; and whether fifteen regiments of the old Bengal army, eight regiments of Regular Light Cavalry, and fifty-two regiments of infantry of the Madras Native army, and three regiments of Bombay Light Cavalry, and thirty-one regiments of Infantry, all regular Native troops. do not still continue embodied in a state of loyal efficiency?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he had no objection to answer the question of the hon. and gallant Member; but he wished to observe that if, in addition to the multifarious subjects on which he and his Colleagues at present were expected to give information, they were to be required to enlighten hon. Members on what were really matters of history, a serious impediment would be caused to the transaction of public business, which did not go on with so much speed even at present as was desirable. It was, he thought, a historical fact that almost the whole of the Bengal Native Army mutinied. Out of seventy-four regular regiments, only eleven remained faithful; four were disarmed, and had since had their arms restored. The other fifty-nine had disappeared. As to the Madras Army, insubordination broke out in one regiment; but the remainder of that force and the Bombay army had exhibited no general signs of open mutiny. It would, he held, be an act of madness to re-establish the Bengal Native Army in its former dimension. As regards the European troops, 11,000 and upwards remained in India, more than 10,000 having taken their discharge—in other words, about half went away, while the other half remained. The whole Native army of India, he might mention, amounted to the number mentioned by his noble Friend—namely, to 250,000. He hoped the reductions would proceed more rapidly during the present year.

COUNTY RATES EXPENDITURE BILL. QUESTION.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he wished to know from hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, whether it is their intention to oppose the introduction of a County Rates Expenditure Bill, which he intended to introduce to-morrow?

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, that the hon. Gentleman might be pretty sure that the usual courtesy of the House would permit the introduction of the measure, but as he had not yet seen it he could not give any pledge that it would not be opposed in its future stages.

Colonel Sykes

THE SICILIAN INSURRECTION. QUESTION.

MR. A. W. KINGLAKE: Sir, I wish to ask the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which I have given him notice privately. I can assure the House that I ask the Question not from any motives of curiosity, but for a very cogent reason. The question I have to ask the noble Lord is, Whether he can give the House any information as to the light in which the Sicilian insurrection is regarded by the other Powers of Europe, and especially as to the light in which it is regarded by France?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I cannot undertake to answer the question which the hon. Member has put to me as to what the other Powers of Europe think of the Sicilian insurrection. I can only say that I am told that the vessel sent by the Austrian Government to the waters of Naples has been despatched entirely for the protection of Austrian subjects. I do not find that any of the Powers of Europe—certainly neither Austria nor Spain—intend to take any part against the Sicilian insurgents on behalf of the Neapolitan Government.

REFRESHMENT HOUSES AND WINE LICENCES BILL CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it would greatly expedite the despatch of public business if the House would consent to consider the Amendments on the Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Bill. If there was any desire on the part of any hon. Gentleman that the Bill should be recommitted he would not oppose the Motion, but there was great delay and inconvenience attending that course. All that he had to propose was a small number of Amendments of a verbal character, together with one, the object of which was to assimilate the notice to be given by applicants for wine licences to those now given by persons applying for licences to become licensed victuallers, and these might be considered with equal convenience on the Report. He moved that the Amendments be now received.

MR. AYRTON expressed his surprise at the course which the Chancellor of the Exchequer asked them to adopt. A number of important clauses were agreed to at a late hour the other evening, pro forma, which required discussion. The Bill, as it stood, was full of errors and anomalies. For instance, the duty to be levied on the sale of wine to be consumed on the premises was mentioned in the clause as if applicable only to foreign wines, while the licence included both British and foreign wines. It was also necessary that the House should know whether the measure was to extend in any respect to licensed inns and ale-houses, and if not, how the duties now applicable to innkeepers' licences were to be harmonized with the new duties payable under the Bill.

SIR GEORGE GREY said his right hon. Friend was ready to go into Committee to discuss the new clauses, but it would not be desirable to rediscuss all the clauses which the Committee had already adopted.

House in Committee. Mr. DEASY in the Chair.

Instruction to the Committee on the Bill, that they have power to make provision for the amendment of the Acts 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 39, and 10 and 11 Vict. c. 89.

Clauses 1 to 3 inclusive agreed to.

Clause 4 (Who shall be deemed to keep a Refreshment House),

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT wished to know whether shops at which tobacco was sold would come under the operation of the Bill, as houses for the sale of refreshment and places of public resort?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought that tobacco-shops ought to be included, as they would thereby be brought under the superintendence of the police, in common with other shops open at night. The Bill would be, in his opinion, defective if it did not include tobacco-shops; but the clause had better be left as it stood, without expressly naming these shops.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 (Confectioners and Eating-house keepers entitled to take out Licences to sell wine to be drunk on the premises).

MR. AYRTON said, there were persons who might wish to take out a licence to sell foreign wines whose rent was under £20 a year. He did not gather from the clause whether they were permitted to do so, or whether if they did so, they would have to pay the same rate as those whose rent was above £20 and below £50.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER was understood to say that there was nothing in the Bill to forbid such persons selling foreign as well as British wines to be consumed on the premises. The rate would be according to the rent—namely, £3 13s. 6d. under £20; £4 4s. between £20 and £50; if above £50 of course they would have to pay £6 6s. the maximum rate.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 6 and 7 agreed to.

Clause 8 (Penalty for keeping Refreshment House without Licence, £20).

MR. HENLEY suggested, with reference to the powers of mitigating a penalty, the addition of the words "a sum not exceeding £20."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill, as were also Clauses 9, 10, 11.

Clause 12 (Notice of First Application for a Wine Licence for a Refreshment House, to be given to Justices, who may object to the granting thereof, on grounds to be stated).

MR. HUNT moved the insertion of words providing that the applicant should not within three years preceding have been convicted of any offence, or have been refused the renewal of his licence for any common inn, ale-house, or victualling house.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER begged to assure the Committee that the clause had been drawn in as full and effectual a manner as was possible to embrace the views of the Committees of both Houses of Parliament which had sat upon the subject, who had held it to be of consequence that the characters of the keepers of these houses should be looked into. The clause, he believed, would supply all reasonable tests of character, and afford such facilities for rejecting persons of bad character as were capable of being practically applied.

MR. HENLEY did not believe the clause was worth the paper it was written on. Any person happening to fall within the personal disqualifications which it contemplated, and being what was called in "Queer Street" would feel some difficulty in forwarding his real name and place of abode, and would therefore be just as likely to send in "John Man-in-the-Moon, of Wakefield, Sudbury, Gloucester, and elsewhere," as any other. But he would be sure to look out a "mother;" such persons were always to be had for a consideration, who would manufacture pork pies one day, beef pies the next, and tripe and onions on the third. With a couple of "nice young ladies" to hand the pies, the establishment would make quite a respectable appearance; but he feared that whenever the policeman sent to make inquiries, pressed to see "the son" who had applied for the licence, he would be told that he had just stepped out, or perhaps that he had gone to the funeral of one of his wife's father's family, "either in or near Birmingham." Under such circumstances how would it be possible for the Magistrates to be certain of the identity of the man who had presented the requisition? He thought it would be a great advantage if this clause were expunged altogether.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH approved the view taken by the right hon. Gentleman. He thought there was too much magisterial influence in the Bill already.

MR. AYRTON said, as the clause stood a man might be a ticket-of-leave man, and yet obtain a licence under this clause. He concurred with the right hon. Gentleman opposite in thinking that this clause was perfectly illusory, and that it was intended to be illusory by the framers of the Bill. He should be sorry it should go forth that the justices of the peace were only disposed to do that which was convenient and agreeable to themselves.

MR. BENTINCK said, it appeared to him, so far as he could understand the discussion, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) in remarking that the clause was illusory, had rather understated the case. He (Mr. Bentinck) believed the clause as it was framed to be one to enable persons of the worst description of character to open houses of this kind, which would lead to all sorts of disorderly practices, and tend to the discredit and immorality of the country. It appeared to him that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had rather anticipated those objections, inasmuch as he understood him to say that it was a mere matter of opinion whether the man obtaining the licence be a man of good character or not. At all events, the right hon. Gentleman was bound not to leave the question in so vague and uncertain a state as it then was, but to take care that the class of men to be licensed must possess a character not dependent altogether upon mere opinion, but upon fact. What was wanted was some effectual check upon men of bad character being allowed to obtain licences for those refreshment-houses. If any hon. Gentleman chose to move the omission of the clause he should be glad to support him.

Mr. Henley

MR. LIDDELL considered that the clause, as it stood, would be perfectly useless.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets had not done justice to the magistrates in supposing that they were only inclined to act in cases that gave them little trouble. The magistrates were not a body who were disposed to shrink from any duty because it might be a little unpleasant. What they complained of was that duties were placed upon them which it was next to impossible they could perform. How was it possible that they should obtain such a knowledge of every applicant for a licence, as would enable them to exercise their veto with propriety and justice? Then if anything went wrong great blame would be thrown upon the magistrates for a state of things it was impossible they could provide against. He thought it would be much better if these houses were put on the same footing as regarded their licences as beerhouses.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, as were Clauses 14 to 19 inclusive.

Clause 20 (What shall be deemed Foreign Wine, and what deemed Spirits).

MR. AYRTON said, this was a clause which afforded a remarkable illustration of the difference between the Bill and the reasons given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for its introduction. They had been told that the object of the measure was to encourage the consumption of French wines, and thereby to promote temperance amongst the people. But the clause now under consideration referred to an article it called wine, containing 40 per cent of proof spirits. There was no such wine manufactured from the grape. There were compounds made abroad composed of wine, brandy, elderberries, and sugar, and which came back to this country under the name of wine; because the duty was so high it was thought desirable to have the spirit as strong as possible. The clause, therefore, would have the effect of introducing into this country compounds of a vile character, and calculated to produce intemperance rather than to discourage it. He thought that, instead of 40 per cent of proof spirit, the clause ought to say 18 or 20 per cent of proof spirits, so as to accord with the natural production of wine.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought the hon. Gentleman suggested rather an arbitrary Amendment when he spoke of 18 per cent. The old law of England with regard to wine was, that it should have 23 per cent of spirit ; but the limit had now been raised to 40 per cent in the Customs. The hon. Gentleman must see that it was impossible to have one law for the Customs and another for the Excise.

MR. BENTINCK said, that the professed object of the right hon. Gentleman—namely, that of encouraging the sale and consumption of light wines—had been totally lost sight of, because the required per centage of proof altogether did away with it. He (Mr. Bentinck) had no doubt that the Bill would increase the profits of the vendors of liquors ; but he felt convinced that it would not promote the health and morality of the people. On the contrary, he believed the effect of the measure would be to increase drunkenness and immorality. The right hon. Gentleman had shown, with the perspicuity which distinguished all his proceedings, that he, too, foresaw clearly what the result of his scheme would be ; but he seemed to be perfectly indifferent to those results so long as it was successful in producing an increased revenue. The substitution of the word “liquor”—which substitution the right hon. Gentleman had agreed to—would cover the Bill with disrepute. It would be a disgrace to the statute-book.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH hoped the right hon. Gentleman would pledge himself that he would at the earliest moment reduce the maximum amount of proof spirit to 30 per cent. Even that amount seemed high, and he should be surprised to find that naturally so much would be produced by any grapes.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 21 (Licences to be void on Conviction of Felony, or selling Spirits without Licence).

MR. PACKE said, he thought that no man who was well known to be of bad character ought to be permitted to have a licence under this clause. He would, therefore, propose to introduce the words, “or be of notoriously bad character,” after the words “convicted of felony.”

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought this question had been disposed of in an earlier part of the evening. If the Amendment were agreed to, there would be no locus penitentiae to any man who might have been a bad character, but who had become reformed.

Amendment negatived.

MR. HENLEY then proposed that before the words “clerks of the peace,” the words “clerk of assize or” should be inserted.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 22 to 25 agreed to.

Clause 26 (Hours for opening and closing Houses licensed for Sale of Wine by Retail),

SIR MORTON PETO made a suggestion that words should be introduced placing shops licensed to sell wine in bottle under the same restrictions as public-houses in respect to opening on Sundays.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the statute of Charles, prohibiting the sale of commodities on Sundays, would apply to wine sold in bottle, which was a commodity. If the special restriction suggested by his hon. Friend were inserted in the Bill now under discussion, such restriction would have the effect of giving the keepers of refreshment-houses an advantage over persons who would sell wine in bottle.

Clause agreed to, as were also Clauses 27 to 30, inclusive.

Clause 31 (Penalties for Offences in Refreshment-houses).

MR. AYRTON moved the insertion of words which would have the effect of leaving eating-house keepers not having spirit licences in the position in which they were now placed as regarded being obliged to send out for any wine which a customer might call for.

MR. HARDY thought that if the Bill was to pass, it would be better to leave it as it now stood in this respect.

MR. AYRTON mentioned that one of the largest eating-house keepers in the City had been asked why he did not take out a spirit licence. His reply was, that he preferred being without one. He did not want young men to remain after their dinner to drink, and his telling them that he had to send out for wine or spirits had the effect of making them leave immediately after dinner.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn ; Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 32 to 39 inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 40 (Covenants against Houses, &c., being used as Public-houses to extend to Persons licensed to sell Wine under this Act).

MR. AYRTON said, he believed it was the constant practice in leases granted by the highest personage in the realm, and by such large landowners as the Duke of Bedford, Earl Fitzwilliam, and Viscount Palmerston, to insert covenants that public-houses should not be erected upon their property. That was, in his opinion, a very proper proceeding, and as the clause before the Committee confirmed these distinguished persons in its exercise, he saw no reason why a corresponding power should not be vested in the country at large. He therefore proposed to strike out this clause and to insert one of a more comprehensive character, giving the power of preventing public-houses being opened in any locality to the rate-payers of the district.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, there was nothing in the present clause incompatible with such a clause as the hon. Gentleman suggests, if he thought proper to propose it to the Committee.

MR. NEWDEGATE expressed a hope that the hon. Member would not oppose a clause which was inserted in the Bill for the purpose of preventing the violation of covenants.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER proposed that, as they had gone through this Bill, and they were pledged to give consideration this evening to another very important Bill—the Bankruptcy Bill—the new clauses should be discussed on bringing up the report.

Upon the Question that the Chairman report the Bill to the House,

MR. JOHN LOCKE asked the opinion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with reference to a clause he wished to introduce, repealing section 7 of the statute of the 5 & 6 Will. IV., chap. 39. It was introduced into an Act for a totally different purpose, and was never acted upon till the year 1858. The Act in question was passed to meet a legislative error with reference to spirits.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON rose to order. It was not then competent for the hon. and learned Member to discuss the clause. He must do so on the bringing up the Report.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he was in an unfortunate position, because when he was just now about to rise to put his question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer relative to the clause, he was told he could not say anything then, but must wait till the Chairman moved that the Bill be reported, and immediately on his proposing to do so, he was again stopped. He wished to ascertain the views of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the clause he wished to propose.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. and learned Member was not at liberty then to discuss the provisions of his proposed clause. He must give notice of it if he wished to bring it before the notice of the House.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, the clause he complained of crept into a former Bill, and it gave powers to the Excise to grant licences without the intervention of magistrates to theatres. Great abuses had arisen from it, and former Governments had consented to an alteration of the law with respect to that power. He therefore wished to know if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would oppose the introduction into this Bill of a clause repealing the one he had referred to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the question involved in the clause the hon. Member sought to repeal was really one of police and good conduct, not of revenue, and therefore came under the consideration of the Home-office. If it was the opinion of the Home-office that the clause ought to be repealed, he should offer no objection. But whether it should be repealed by a clause introduced into the present Bill was another matter. He did not think it germane to a Bill that dealt with wine licences.

House resumed ; Bill reported ; as amended to be considered To-morrow.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY (SALARIES) BILL. — COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE wished the Attorney General would give some fuller explanation of the financial part of his plan of Reform in the Bankruptcy Law, and state what were the prospects of a revenue being derived from the Court itself, and what would be its ultimate effect on the Consolidated Fund. The Bill placed on the Consolidated Fund a charge of £20,000 a year; it then dealt in a sweeping manner with the existing sources of revenue from the Court; and he should be surprised if in the end the rest of the charges of the Court were not thrown on the Exchequer. Many complaints were made of the constant increase of the expenditure. A chief cause of the increase was the practice of the House itself, in continually passing Bills throwing additional charges on the Consolidated Fund, which, collectively, amounted to enormous sums. Exclusive of the compensations now charged on the Revenues of the Court, amounting to more than £20,000 a year, the expenses of the Court of Bankruptcy were £58,000. To meet this, at present there were three sources of revenue,—the percentage fees, paid in by the official assignees, amounting to £30,000 a year; these fees the Bill swept away. Then there were the stamp duties, amounting to £14,000 a year; and lastly, the main source of the revenue of the Court, the interest of the Bankruptcy Fund Account, being the interest of £1,500,000, money in the Court, belonging to bankrupt estates invested in Consols. It amounted to about £46,000. But the new charges of the Court would be £106,000, or nearly double the existing charge of £58,000. On one hand the charge was doubled, and on the other some of the sources of income were swept away, while the Consolidated Fund would be called on to make up the difference. By the operation of the Bill, the revenue from the Bankruptcy Account Fund would probably dwindle away, and become comparatively small, as the fund was no longer to be collected and paid in by officers of the Court, but by the creditors' assignees. He thought there was cause for alarm, and he objected to the possible prospect of placing such a heavy charge on the Consolidated Fund.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the whole matter was fully discussed on the second reading of the Bill, and it was with the approbation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he proposed to transfer the retiring annuity and compensation fund to the Consolidated Fund. It was quite true that in consequence of the changes which had been made in the Bankruptcy Laws and the adoption of a new system the compensation fund had increased. Hitherto that fund had been charged on the future revenue of the Court; but that was an error which he had attempted to rectify by transferring that charge to the Consolidated Fund. The change which had taken place in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Committee by which trust deeds were registered produced a large sum, and if they took the average every year of those trust deeds and composition deeds, which he now proposed to bring within the range of the Bankruptcy Law, they would find that an additional revenue was produced of at least £60,000 a year. The augmentation of salaries would come out of the suitors' fund, and if any one took the trouble of looking at the returns, they would see that the augmentation of revenue was placed very much below what the additional income would actually be. He did not think that any apprehension need be felt, because putting the augmentation of revenue at £50,000 instead of £60,000 a year, there were other items which would give a sum of £80,000 a year; after abolishing the charges in the shape of per centages and stamps, there would still be a surplus of £15,000 a year. There was, he therefore thought, no fear on the score of financial grounds.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE observed, that if the principle on which the hon. and learned Gentleman had based his calculation was right, there could be no necessity whatever for charging the Consolidated Fund with the £20,000 for compensation, because there would be an actual surplus of £15,000 per annum.

SIR FITZROY KELLY observed, that a sum amounting to upwards of £20,000 a year had been charged by former Parliaments, not upon any sound system of reason or precedent, upon what was termed the Bankruptcy Fund, and was awarded as compensation to persons for emoluments of which they had been deprived. He thought that Parliament should, in the first instance, have placed that charge upon the Consolidated Fund. He would beg the right hon. Member opposite (Mr. Bouverie) to remember what the Fund was upon which these charges were placed. If there was one Fund that ought to be left unfettered, it was the Bankruptcy Fund. He could not but express his astonishment that the House of Commons, consisting among others of so many mercantile men, should have allowed this charge to continue for so great a number of years. By its means a charge fell upon the very smallest bankrupt estate. One of the greatest benefits his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had proposed by this Bill was the withdrawal of this charge from the Bankruptcy Fund and placing it where it ought to be placed, on the general funds of the country. The right hon. Member for Kilmarnock seemed to have forgotten that, by a slight charge, which would scarcely be felt by any of the creditors who would come within its operation, the hon. and learned Gentleman had provided a fund large enough to meet any deficiencies that might arise. He hoped the Committee would feel that there was no objection to the transfer of this charge, which would only be an act of justice to the commercial interests of the country.

MR. W. WILLIAMS asked, if the hon. and learned Gentleman would consent to place this amount on the Civil Service Estimates, so as to be voted annually, and that the House might see exactly how the accounts stood? Because, if it was transferred to the Consolidated Fund, the House would have no control whatever over it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that what he desired to be done was, that Parliament should, year by year, be made acquainted with the state of these funds, and there was a particular provision requiring that a return of revenue and expenditure of the Court should be made annually, which should be in the most distinct form, specifying the various items. It was necessary that these payments should be made regularly, and therefore it would be inconvenient to have them placed on the Votes, but it would be competent to any Member of Parliament at any time to call attention to the Return, and to propose a Resolution with respect to it.

MR. BOWYER thought the charge ought to appear annually in the Civil Service Estimates. Everybody knew how difficult it was for Members to get an opportunity of bringing charges on the Consolidated Fund before the House.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that in cases of compensation the grants were generally made by Parliament, and therefore the cases must already have received the assent of Parliament, as it was at the will of Parliament such compensations were granted. He thought therefore these grants were fairly placed on the Consolidated Fund. He did not see how they could be put upon the Estimates as the parties were absolutely entitled to the compensation given to them.

MR. MALINS entered his protest against the doctrine of the hon. Member for Lambeth. Why was this to form an exceptional case? By the same course of reasoning they might make the salaries of the Judges and other high officials dependent upon the vote of the House year by year. He thought these compensations and allowances were properly placed on the Consolidated Fund.

1. Resolved,

"That the Salaries, Allowances, Remunerations, Retiring Annuities, and Compensations which may become payable to certain persons ap-

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

The House resumed.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read,

MR. CRAWFORD said, he had an important petition to present in favour of this Bill, signed by 1,000 of the principal merchants, bankers, and traders of the City of London. The petitioners stated that, having had time to consider the Bill of the Attorney General, they "anticipate such important advantages from the proposed changes in the law that they earnestly pray your hon. House not to allow any unnecessary delay to occur in the consideration of the measure, so that it may pass both branches of the Legislature during the present Session of Parliament." This petition was signed by nearly every mercantile house, banking firm, and large trading house in the City.

MR. MURRAY presented a petition, signed by a large number of solicitors and others, setting forth the claims of the messengers in bankruptcy, and submitting that they ought not to be dismissed without due compensation being awarded.

MR. FRANK CROSSLEY would take that opportunity of stating that his constituents felt much indebted to the Attorney General for having introduced this measure.

Motion made that the House do now go into Committee on the Bill.

MR. VANCE said, there was no department of the law which had undergone more frequent changes of late years than that relating to bankruptcy. The Bankruptcy Bills which had been successively proposed had each found considerable favour in its day, but had each proved a failure in its turn. None of them had acquired more popularity than the measure of the Attorney General, and he (Mr. Vance) believed the reason was that it extended the jurisdiction in bankruptcy and insolvency to the County Courts, which at present were very popular. He (Mr. Vance) however thought that this course would prove very unsafe, for he did not think that the County Court Judges had sufficient experience in that branch of the law. Another reason why the Bill had been received with favour was that it threw a heavy burden upon the Consolidated Fund, and relieved the suitor in like proportion. A bankruptcy could not be administered but at considerable expense under the cheapest administration, not only on account of the strict legal investigation which must attend it, but also it forced realization of the assets which under any system that might be established would entail heavy loss on the estate. They would shortly have to deal with the case of Ireland and of Scotland in connection with the question. At present the suitors in Ireland were burdened with a large amount of fees and other expenses; but after the Bill passed for that country those expenses would be charged on the Consolidated Fund in the same way as was proposed with respect to England by the present measure. This Bill destroyed the distinction between bankruptcy and insolvency. He did not object to that as a general principle; but in doing so it also destroyed some of the safeguards which the status of bankruptcy and insolvency possessed. The power of punishing fraudulent insolvents and bankrupts was now to be transferred to a criminal court by the machinery of a prosecution and a jury. He considered that we derived a great advantage from the simple process of a Judge being enabled, without the ordinary forms of a Criminal Court, to remand a fraudulent debtor for a certain period. But under the proposed measure the creditors would be compelled to proceed by a troublesome and expensive machinery in a Criminal Court against the party guilty of any offence deemed punishable by the Judge. He thought that few creditors would be found to follow up such proceedings, and consequently there would so far be a failure of justice. There were some other clauses in the Bill to which he objected. At present the Judge had the power to suspend or deny the certificate of a bankrupt. By the proposed Bill, if a prosecution took place, and if a bankrupt be imprisoned for even six weeks, the Judge had no power to suspend his certificate beyond the period of his imprisonment, he must grant his certificate at the end of his punishment. Now a great many bankrupts would rather incur not only the odium, but also the unpleasantness of a long incarceration rather than be deprived of their certificate for perhaps a period of twelve or eighteen months. He further objected to the denial by the Bill of the right of appeal in certain cases. At present if a Commissioner of Bankruptcy in London refused a proof or a certificate, the party had a right to go before the Lords Justices, who constituted a Court of Appeal, and there claim a reversal of the decision of the Commissioner, not only as regarded a question of law but also one of fact. By the present measure the appeal could only be made upon a question of law or the reception of improper evidence. This Bill also restricted the right of solicitors to practise in the Court—a right hitherto possessed by them. He could not understand upon what principle the solicitors should now be denied that right, which was to be confined exclusively to barristers. The measure was also, in his opinion, objectionable in regard to the matter of arrangements under the control of the court. He had no objection to those arrangements, believing that they were most desirable in many cases where the expenses of bankruptcy might be avoided; but what he objected to was the privacy under which those arrangements were to be made. He thought it was desirable that the public should receive full warning of a debtor's defalcations. By the present Bill a man might make ten successive private arrangements with ten different sets of creditors, without the public knowing anything about them beyond the circle of those same creditors. He proposed that there should be a certain publicity given to those arrangements at the time when they were effected. He further objected to the provision giving Friendly Societies an advantage over all other creditors in regard to obtaining their debts in full. He contended that the principle caveat emptor should be universally recognised in all commercial transactions. In objecting to the details of the measure of the Attorney General he did not wish to be considered an opponent of its principles, of which he approved; but if it were considered in Committee on those points to which he referred, he would rather allow the law to remain as it stood with all its acknowledged defects.

MR. BRISCOE said, he should cordially support the application for compensation to that valuable and meritorious class of public officers—the messengers in bankruptcy, who he considered had a strong claim upon the Attorney General in connection with the present measure. The principle had been fully recognized in the Bill introduced by the Lord Chancellor, as well as in the measure brought into the House by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London. Clauses were inserted in each of those Bills giving compensation to the messengers in the event of their offices being abolished. He was of opinion that it would be an act of the greatest injustice towards the holders of those important offices—offices which were far more important than this measure seemed to imply—if the Attorney General did not introduce clauses into his Bill giving them full and adequate compensation.

MR. LESLIE said, he thought that the measure in the main was one of a salutary and valuable character. He, however, suggested that the Chief Judge under the Bill should have conjoined with his judicial character that of Commissioner also. Such an arrangement was likely to work far more advantageously for the public. It appeared to him that the Bill would be much better, more simple, and less expensive, if that functionary, preserving his original jurisdiction, could look over the list of bankrupts in his department and demand explanations of the parties concerned as to whether dividends had or had not been given under certain circumstances.

COLONEL SYKES said, he had received several letters respecting the position of certain officers in bankruptcy, and their right to adequate compensation under the Bill of the Attorney General. He wanted to know from the hon. and learned Gentleman upon what principle of justice or equity the messengers were to be excluded altogether from compensation. He confessed he could not understand why the principle of compensation should be admitted as regards other officials, and at the same time be considered inapplicable to the messengers, who were as useful and as faithful a body of public servants in a relative degree. He trusted that the Attorney General would see the propriety of amending his Bill in this respect.

Motion agreed to; House in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Commissioners of the Court of Bankruptcy in London released).

MR. WALPOLE called attention to this clause, as regarded the provision at the end of it, and in connection with other clauses of the Bill. It was a clause directing the jurisdiction of the Commissioners. It enacted that these officers should cease, and that they should be relieved, and their duties, "subject, however, to the obligation of performing certain duties as hereinafter described." He suggested that the latter words should be omitted. The Commissioners of Bankruptcy in London were judicial officers, receiving a salary of £2,000 a year, being a larger income than that given to the country Commissioners. Looking at the clause as it stood in conjunction with Clause 5, it would appear that the Commissioners in London, whose functions were to cease, were still liable to perform duties in the country upon a lower income than they at present possessed. The Commissioners held their office under patent from the Crown, and the House had always acted on the principle that an office held by patent could in no case be taken away without full compensation to the officer whose office was to cease. There were other clauses of the Bill bearing on this point, enabling the Commissioners to retire upon a pension of two-thirds of their income. He objected to that, upon the ground that such an office should not be taken away, unless upon the principle that the holder of it should have the full amount of salary which he had received. He moved the omission of the words to which he had called attention.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it was incumbent on him to declare that officers of such long standing and possessing such acknowledged talent and ability, were entitled to the fullest consideration as regarded their salaries and their release from any further duties. The necessity for removing the Commissioners arose not from any complaint of the manner in which they had performed their duties, but from the defects of the system of which they formed a part. It was hardly possible to state the necessity for the change without employing language which would give some degree of pain to those eminent and able gentlemen. He could only express his regret that there should be anything in the Bill which could for a moment give rise to the idea that any reflection was intended to be cast upon them. He trusted, therefore, that this public acknowledgment of the respect to which he considered them to be unquestionably entitled for the long and valuable services they had rendered—for they had all held office he believed since 1832—would be accepted in the spirit in which it was offered. He believed them entitled to the highest consideration, and he begged at once to disclaim any intention to detract in the slightest degree from the merits of a class of men who were universally esteemed and respected. It was, therefore, with considerable pain that he wrote in the Bill the words which, if the Bill were passed, would invest the Lord Chancellor with the power of sending any one of those long-trying and eminent public servants from the scene of their official duties in London to the country; but he thought it right to submit to the House of Commons the full extent of all the judicial duties hereafter to be performed under the Bill, and to propose to make these learned Gentlemen liable contingently to the occasional discharge of those duties, leaving it to the good feeling and justice of the House to narrow the extent of those duties, if it were right that they should be narrowed. His own feeling was that not only would it be a great hardship, but that gentlemen would shrink from requiring any one of these judicial functionaries, who had been long employed in the administration of justice in London, to go down to some remote part of the country for a month or two. He was glad that his right hon. Friend had adverted to the subject, and he should propose to alter the clause so that the London Commissioners might be liable only to discharge extra duties of the same character and quality as now in, and not out of, London, such duties being of precisely the same character as they had with so much credit to themselves and advantage to the public discharged for so long a period.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he entirely concurred in the Amendment proposed by his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge. With respect to the learned Commissioners there was scarcely one of them with whom he could not claim a personal acquaintance. Some of them had been for a great number of years in the public service, and all of them had discharged their duties in the most efficient manner, and this, in some instances, under circumstances of great difficulty. The Commissioners had, in fact, discharged these duties in a manner which had secured for them the approbation, not only of the mercantile public, but of all who were competent judges of the proper mode of conducting an official administration such as that which had been confided to them. He had known Mr. Serjeant Goulbourn from an early period of his career. That learned gentleman at one time discharged the duties of a Welsh Judge to the satisfaction of the entire Principality; and all the tests—practice at the bar in London and the provinces, and success as a Judge—had proved that he was entitled to that public confidence which he so fully enjoyed. With regard to the clause itself he would suggest for the consideration of the Attorney General whether it was really necessary to throw on the Commissioners the new obligations proposed by this Bill. It appeared to him to be a departure from the implied contract between the public and these judicial officers to impose on them duties beyond those they had contracted to perform. He was sure that the Commissioners would perform any functions which Parliament might impose on them; but certainly they should not be asked to discharge duties of an inferior character.

MR. MELLOR expressed his satisfaction that the Attorney General had spoken in the terms he had done of the Commissioners, and had struck out of the Bill words that threw on them duties they had not contemplated. He quite concurred in the Amendment he proposed.

MR. WALPOLE said: after the statement of the Attorney General he did not think it necessary to press his Amendment.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 (Commissioners of the Insolvent Debtors Court released).

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE asked whether it was intended to release the Commissioners of the Insolvent Court, or to continue their services?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL was understood to reply, that as their duties would be performed in the Court of Bankruptcy, he did not propose to continue their services.

Clause agreed to; as were Clauses 4 to 7 inclusive.

Clause 8 (Appointment of Judge).

MR. BOWYER said, he could not let a Bill pass through Committee, constituting a New Court to be presided over by a single Judge, without entering his protest against courts of justice having only one Judge. He thought the time was not far distant when the Courts for the administration of justice would have to be remodelled. Courts having only one Judge were formed on a vicious principle. It was vesting in one man too much power, and caused the production of too much arbitrary judge-made law. The fundamental principle of the common law was that it was within the breast of the Judge; therefore the common law was that which the Judge decided, and thus they had what was termed "a vicious circle." This made it the more important that the judicial power should not be vested in a single Judge; for when several Judges sat together, one restrained the other. In former times it was a great object to secure the independence of the Judges, and that, so far as the Crown was concerned, had been accomplished. But he thought the Judges had been made too independent. Certainly it was said they were dependent upon public opinion and the bar. But the public knew not the law, and it was in such a state that lawyers knew little of it themselves. Then as to the bar, the influence of the Judges over gentlemen in practice was very great, and as their prospects in life depended upon being on good terms with the Judges, they did not venture to oppose the decisions which were come to. If an attack was made in that House upon the decision of a Judge, one barrister after another rose and said he was the most learned Judge who ever sat on the bench. If a Judge was popular with the bar he could do anything he pleased. He should have no difficulty in showing some decisions of Judges which were so monstrous that no man but a lawyer would believe them possible. He protested against the arbitrary power which was vested in single Judges, who were quite uncontrolled in court. He referred especially to the courts of equity. The system was extremely mischievous. ["Question."] It was the Question. He spoke upon a clause of a Bill which proposed to constitute a new court with one Judge. There was a greater chance of having sound decisions when three, or four, or five Judges sat together. He felt convinced the time would soon come when the whole system would have to be revised, and when the power of a Judge sitting alone and uncontrolled to decide important questions relating to the interests of fellow-creatures would be abolished. He would not propose any Amendment, because the subject he had propounded was not yet ripe for discussion; but he hoped the question would not be overlooked by the press of this country.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 9 and 10 agreed to.

Clause 11 (Rank of Judge).

SIR FITZROY KELLY proposed an addition, providing that the Judge, if a Privy Councillor, should be a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. That was following the rule adopted in the Testamentary Jurisdiction Act.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL thought the Amendment interfered with the Prerogative of the Crown. However, as it appeared that words to the effect now proposed were in an existing Act, he had no objection to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to; Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 12 postponed.

Clause 13 (Vacation Deputy).

MR. HENLEY said, that the Chief Judge would have £5,000 for working nine months in the year, whereas his Deputy would only have £400 for doing the Chief Judge's work during his vacation of three months. If that deputy was equal to do the work of the Chief Judge, why should the country pay £5,000 a year for a Chief Judge? The amount of the Chief Judge's work was not stated.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the duration of the long vacation would be, as in the Court of Chancery, from the 10th of August to the 26th of October; the duration of the Christmas vacation would not extend over more than fourteen days; and the vacation at Easter would extend over eight or nine days.

MR. HENLEY said it appeared, then, that the aggregate number of holidays would amount to about three months, so that the Chief Judge was to have £5,000 for nine months' work; while another person, who was presumed to be equally well fitted for the work, was to have £400 for three months. There might be good reasons for the discrepancy, but he confessed he could not see them.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL explained that during the vacation the sittings of the appellate Court would be wholly suspended, so that when the Deputy was presiding, the only business would be that which might properly be transacted by a subordinate judicial officer.

MR. MURRAY asked why, in that case, the duties of the Deputy should not be discharged by a Commissioner of Bankruptcy?

SIR HUGH CAIRNS had no doubt the Lord Chancellor would appoint one of the Commissioners of Bankruptcy to perform this duty. It was for the interest of the public to ensure the services of the most competent persons for the high office of Chief Judge; but the competition would be considerably diminished if the chief Judge were not to have the same vacation as the other Judges. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Henley) must not suppose that this sum of £400 would represent an aliquot part of £5,000, because the Judge, who would sit during the vacation, would put aside all the business that was not pressing and urgent.

MR. MALINS agreed that it was desirable in the interest of the public as well as of the Chief Judge that he should have the usual vacation. The present Commissioners could not, he thought, complain, if, once in four or five years, they performed in turn the work of the Chief Judge during the vacation.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE remarked that such an arrangement would be a species of tontine, which would press very hardly on those Commissioners who lived the longest.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY expressed a hope that some explanation would be given of the financial bearing of the Bill. They ought to know something of what it would cost the country in the shape of compensation. The charge upon the Consolidated Fund for compensations arising from alterations in the law courts was something alarming, and the Courts of Bankruptcy and Chancery took by far the larger portion of the charge. The sums paid as compensation to officers of these courts exceeded the total amount for judicial expenditure in some of the countries of Europe. He wanted to know when they would have the opportunity of discussing this point, as he was determined to take the sense of the House upon it when the proper time arrived.

MR. W. WILLIAMS hoped the Attorney General would adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member for Wallingford. The Commissioners ought to have something to do. He remembered that at the time the Commissioners were appointed at a salary of £1,800 a year each, it was said that not one of them earned £500 a year at the bar.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the proper time to object to these compensations was when the Resolutions upon the Bankruptcy Salaries, &c. Bill was under discussion. It was a great mistake to suppose that the Court of Chancery was indebted to the Consolidated Fund. If the balance were struck, and if the Suitors' Fund were emancipated from the burden thrown upon it, the Consolidated Fund would have £200,000 a year additional to bear. The accumulated fees of the Suitors' Fee Fund ought to be dedicated to the purpose of relieving the suitors from the fees of the Court of Chancery.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that he distinguished between the charge on the Consolidated Fund, the Suitors' Fund, and the Fee Fund. What he objected to was this wholesale system of compensations.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE suggested to the hon. Member for Evesham that as none of the salaries clauses had passed the Committee this evening, the best plan would be to raise the question on the Report of the Resolutions from the preliminary Committee.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL wished to inform the hon. Baronet (Sir H. Willoughby) that there was not a word about compensation in the Bill from beginning to end.

MR. BOWYER condemned the fallacy which seemed to be generally entertained that a Judge with £4000 a year was a superior man to one with £400, whereas, although the more fortunate, he was probably the less efficient of the two. He thought that three Judges with £5000 a year divided among them would be a far better arrangement.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 14 (Commissioner of London District Court).

SIR FITZROY KELLY urged that it was exceedingly necessary that the chief Judge should be appointed before the Act came into operation. He wished to know whether it was the intention of the Attorney General to extend the jurisdiction of the County Courts from £300 to £1,000 throughout the whole of England and Wales, with the exception of the London district; whether he proposed to give such jurisdiction up to £1000 to the Commissioner within the London district; and whether he was disposed to consider the propriety of constituting Norfolk and Suffolk, the outlying portion of the London district, a separate district with a Commissioner of its own.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he agreed that it would be better that the Chief Judge should be appointed before the Act came into operation, and would take power to make the appointment immediately after the Bill passed. The County Courts within the London district, but beyond the limits of the Metropolitan district, would have the power of dealing with any bankruptcy up to the extent of £1,000 assets, which the creditors, by a majority, might choose to delegate to them. He did not see the advantage of giving creditors the power of sending bankruptcies to the London District Court which exceeded £300, and were less than £1,000, because there would be no difference in the mode of administration, and very little in the amount of fees. His aim was to bring the County Courts into a state correspondent to the Sheriffs' Courts in Scotland, and he did not see that any other more satisfactory mode of local administration could be provided. With regard to the suggestion to furnish certain districts with a local Commissioner, it was impossible to accede to the proposition, unless they were prepared to put the whole provincial administration in the hands of district Commissioners.

The Attorney General

MR. WALPOLE said, that the clause gave power to appoint to the office of London District Commissioner any Commissioner of Bankruptcy or Insolvency, or any barrister of twelve years' standing. He wished to have an assurance that no new Commissioner should be appointed to the Chief Judgeship of the London district while the services of the present Commissioners could be obtained.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL informed the right hon. Gentleman that he quite agreed with him that the present Commissioners were, of all others, the best men who could be appointed; but he could give no such pledge as the right hon. Gentleman required. He was not consulted upon their appointment, nor had he been consulted on the appointments either on the Testamentary Jurisdiction Bill or the Divorce Bill. If his right hon. Friend addressed himself to the noble Lord at the head of the Government, he would probably receive a satisfactory assurance.

MR. WALPOLE thought, that of all others, the Attorney General should be consulted on those appointments. For instance, there was no one, as all the Commissioners agreed, more capable of fulfilling the office of Chief Judge than Commissioner Holroyd; and he thought they ought not to allow the Bill to pass without receiving from the noble Lord some assurance that such men would be appointed.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE hoped that his right hon. and learned Friend would give notice of a distinct clause on the bringing up of the Report, providing for the appointment of one of the existing Commissioners.

MR. HENLEY concurred that it was most desirable to move the insertion of such a clause, unless a satisfactory assurance should be received from the noble Lord.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 15 to 21 inclusive.

Clause 22 (Salary).

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE thought the original salary of the District Commissioners, which was £1,500, sufficient. When they were made Commissioners in Insolvency as well as Bankruptcy, £300 a year was added. But the insolvency business had since been taken from them, and given to the County Court Judges; but the Commissioners retained the higher salary of £1,800. As it was doubtful whether these Commissioners would be kept alive, he should move, as an Amendment, that the salary of £1,800 be limited "to the persons now discharging the duties of such Commissioners."

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 3, after the word "Commissioner," to insert the words "now discharging the duties of such Commissioner."

MR. BRISTOW thought the salary of the County Court Judges, £1,500, quite sufficient for the District Commissioners of Bankruptcy.

SIR FITZROY KELLY considered the Amendment premature, if the business of insolvency were to be again transferred from the County Courts. The District Commissioners had performed their duties to the satisfaction of the public for twenty-eight years, especially in the larger towns. Many of them had made considerable sacrifices in accepting these appointments.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, County Court Judges obtained £1,500 a year in what he might term a surreptitious manner. It was understood when the £300 a year additional was given to the County Court Judges that on all future appointments the salaries should be reduced to £1,200.

MR. MELLOR complained of the language employed by the hon. Member for Lambeth. He did not understand what the hon. Gentleman meant by the sum fixed as the County Court Judges' salaries having been increased surreptitiously. He complained also of an assertion made by the hon. Gentleman earlier in the evening that barristers had been appointed Commissioners who were not earning £500 a year by their profession before their appointment.

MR. W. WILLIAMS had merely stated what, at the time the appointments were made, was a notorious fact. He repeated his assertion that the higher salary was carried surreptitiously, when the question was under discussion.

MR. CLAY said, if the salaries of the County Court Judges had been increased the labour of the office had been increased also.

MR. HENLEY thought if the Committee did not agree to the Amendment the salaries of the County Court Judges would, hereafter, have to be brought up to the same level. It ought to be left open to consideration whether the successors of the present Commissioners should have £1,800 or £1,500 a year.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL believed the ordinary meaning of the word "surreptitious" would be, that a fraud had been practised on the House. On whom did the hon. Member for Lambeth fix that charge? As to the salaries of the County Court Judges, he thought they had been treated in a niggardly manner. Their duties had been augmented, and they had given great satisfaction. The hon. Member probably knew men who would undertake to do the work for £500 a year; but the salary in such a position should be suited to the talent, the respectability, and the independence required in it. By the Amendment the Committee was deliberately asked to reduce the scale of judicial remuneration; but he should object to putting the successors of the Commissioners on a lower scale of salary than those who now held the office. He earnestly entreated those of the Committee who were anxious to maintain the judicial institutions of the country not to assent to so insidious a proposal.

MR. MALINS observed that it was most important that all judicial officers should have independence secured in their various positions, and he denied that it could be reasonably said that £1,800 was too large a salary for the services rendered by the Commissioners.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, the only fault he found with the Amendment was that £1,200 a year was not proposed by it, instead of £1,500 a year.

MR. BRISTOW supported the Amendment, believing the Commissioners would be amply remunerated with £1,500 a year.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 68; Noes 68:—And the numbers being equal the Chairman declared himself with the Noes.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he hoped that the Attorney General after the division which had just taken place would reconsider this question. He should not have moved the Amendment if he did not think that the salary of £1,500 a year for all future Judges under this Bill amply sufficient.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, they would have other opportunities for the consideration of this question. He, however, objected upon principle to the reduction of the salary as proposed.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that the lower salary was only intended to apply hereafter to those who were appointed to any future vacancies that might arise.

Question put, "That Clause 22 stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 118; Noes 38: Majority 80.

Clause agreed to; as was also Clause 23.

Clause 24 (Appointment to Vacancies).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL moved a verbal Amendment rendered necessary by alterations in the previous clauses.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, that the proviso in this clause raised the question, whether the bankruptcy jurisdiction should be entrusted to the County Court Judges. This subject had been carefully considered six years ago by a Commission, at the head of which was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole), and which had among its Members Sir George Rose, Mr. Swainston, Mr. M. D. Hill, Mr. Bacon, Mr. Commissioner Holroyd, and Mr. G. C. Glyn, M.P. The Commissioners, after due consideration, recommended that the transfer of bankruptcy jurisdiction to the County Court Judges should not be made. They pointed out that there were several substantial distinctions between the two courts,—for example, that the County Courts were essentially contentious and ambulatory, while the Court of Bankruptcy was not essentially a contentious court, and ought not to be ambulatory, because its records and documents ought to be accessible. Lastly, the Commissioners urged with great force that the County Courts had only a limited jurisdiction up to £50, whereas the Bankruptcy Court had no limit to its jurisdiction, and decided most important matters without any restrictions, both in law and equity. He should, therefore, move the omission of the proviso at the end of the clause giving jurisdiction in bankruptcy to the County Courts.

MR. WALPOLE said, as the right hon. Gentleman had made reference to him as one of the Commissioners whose names were appended to the Report in question, he wished to assure him and the Committee generally that he continued decidedly of the same opinion as was therein expressed. He was strongly of opinion that the jurisdictions of the two Courts were of a wholly different character—the one being contentious, the other administrative. He thought that such a transfer of jurisdiction as was now proposed would destroy all the efficiency of the County Courts, which would then be unable to discharge their duties with that efficiency and propriety as had given such satisfaction to the suitors and the public generally. Looking at the 22nd, the 24th, and 25th clauses together, he would remind the Attorney General that the Committee was asked to establish different Judges with different salaries, and to mix up the duties of the one with the other in point of jurisdiction. By Clause 22 the hon. and learned Gentleman was appointing Judges to administer matters in bankruptcy at a salary of £1,800 each. By Clauses 24 and 25, he was going to transfer to the County Court Judges a new jurisdiction in bankruptcy, and to create, by Clause 25, new County Courts with bankruptcy jurisdiction added to them. To the County Court Judges who should receive this accession of jurisdiction, a salary of £1,500 a year was assigned: the other County Court Judges would receive a salary of £1,200 a year only. The greatest confusion would ensue by the mixing up of those jurisdictions which were perfectly distinct as to authority, functions, and salaries. He was convinced that such a system would not last for two years. In the first place, the efficiency of the County Courts would be impaired; secondly, their bankruptcy jurisdiction would not be well administered; and thirdly, Parliament would have to raise all the other salaries to the level of the Judges of the District Commissioners of Bankruptcy with salaries of £1,800. There was only one mode by which they could give satisfaction to the suitors and to the public with regard to the payment of these various Judges, and that was to keep the County Court jurisdiction entirely distinct from questions of mere administration. There could then be three classes of Judges; first, the superior Judges, then the Judges of the Metropolitan Districts, who, on the ground of greater expense, &c., might receive £2,000 a year; and, lastly, a third class of judicial officers, who should all have one rate of salary, whether Commissioners of Bankruptcy or County Court Judges, who should give their whole time to the public, and be put upon an equal footing. For these reasons, which would be found stated at length in the Report of the Commissioners, he supported the Amendment.

MR. EDWIN JAMES remarked that the great difficulty in the bankruptcy law was the administration of the country jurisdiction. He could not see any objection to transferring the bankruptcy jurisdiction in the country districts to the County Court Judges. They already had jurisdiction in insolvency.

MR. M. T. SMITH held that the County court Judges were at present fully employed in discharging duties totally alien from administering the law of bankruptcy; and were, from their present occupations and previous practice at the bar, totally unqualified to administer the estates of insolvent debtors, which in reality were the duties which under this Act would devolve upon them. As a matter of economy the proposition would be a failure, for if this function were superadded to their present onerous duties it would be necessary to increase the number of County Court Judges. The object of the Bill was to obtain a better administration of effects, and to carry that out it was necessary to appoint gentlemen acquainted with such matters, who were acquainted likewise with the principles of equity, and whose time was not taken up with other duties. If such officers were appointed it might be practical to make them ambulatory.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, it would not be obligatory on the Crown, under this Bill, to appoint the County Court Judges as administrators of the bankruptcy law. It would be lawful for the Crown to do so as vacancies occurred; but the exercise of the power would, no doubt, very much depend upon the circumstances of the district and the community. In such places, for instance, as Manchester and Liverpool a special Judge would be appointed, while in other parts of the country it would be found more convenient to commit the business to the County Court Judge. He, however, believed that if there was any one part of the Bill upon which more than another the country seemed to have set its mind, it was the scheme for transferring the administration of the bankrupt law from Commissioners to the County Court Judges. The County Court Judge was, it was true, itinerant; but he could be made as stationary, for the purposes of this law, as any other Judge—and indeed, there was a clause later in the Bill to meet that objection—while, on the other hand, if it was found conducive to the due and efficient administration of the law that the sittings should be held at different places, which would sometimes be the case, then the objection fell to the ground. It was urged as an objection to this transfer that the functions of the County Court Judges were now in contentious proceedings, while the proceedings in bankruptcy were non-contentious. This was true only to a certain extent. There were many contentious questions in bankruptcy. The County Court Judges were selected from gentlemen of ability and experience at the bar; and he felt confident that they would give as much satisfaction in administering the bankrupt law as they had given in discharge of their present functions. He should vote against the omission of the proviso, because he believed that they would by omitting it, disappoint the reasonable expectations of the public and impair the efficiency of the Bill.

MR. MALINS said, that the County Court Judges went a circuit, and generally gave only one day to each place. How, then, were they to undertake bankruptcy cases which might take three or four days to hear? Could his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General get over that difficulty, and show that the County Court Judges had sufficient time to discharge the new duty which it was proposed to impose upon them? If he succeeded in doing so he (Mr. Malins) should vote for the clause, for as it was not imperative, but merely gave the Crown the power of transfer, he did not like to vote against it. On the ground of economy, he thought the existing arrangement the better one. Let the House suppose the case of the commissionership of Liverpool becoming vacant. Well, if the jurisdiction of the Liverpool Bankrupt Court was transferred to County Courts it would be divided amongst no less than eleven of them. This would involve an expenditure of £3,300, the additional salary which would have to be given to the Judge of each of these courts being £300. The salary of the Commissioner was £1,800, so that there was an expenditure of £1,800, as against £3,300, in favour of a Commissioner.

MR. BAINES wished to say that the feeling of the mercantile community was not so generally in favour of the transfer of the business of the Bankruptcy Court to the County Court Judges, as the hon. and learned Solicitor General seemed to imagine. He (Mr. Baines) had presented a petition from the Leeds Chamber of Commerce, in which an objection was taken to it, on the ground that the Judges of the County Courts were at present fully employed, and that many of them were not adequately versed in mercantile law.

MR. HEADLAM said, the rejection of the clause would inflict the greatest disappointment on the public. His opinion coincided with that of mercantile men, that there was not the slightest reason to suppose that the County Court Judges were incompetent to exercise bankruptcy jurisdiction ; and, as it was the undoubted wish of the whole community that it should be intrusted to them, he should support the clause.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, that even if the feeling were universally in favour of the transfer of jurisdiction to the County Courts, it was not conclusive ; because it was their duty to determine what was best for the country, and to set aside the inconsiderate views of people out of doors. But he took issue with the hon. and learned Gentleman as to the universality of that feeling. The Committee of the Liverpool Law Society had drawn up a Report on this Bill, in which they said they considered that all matters of bankruptcy and insolvency should be brought under the jurisdiction of one Court ; that they quite disapproved of any jurisdiction in those matters being given to the County Courts ; that they had not the proper machinery to secure the due performance of the duties of official assignee ; and that the examination of the accounts of insolvents by those Courts had not been satisfactory. The City of London Committee appointed to inquire into that subject, stated that they were not prepared to give any opinion as to the competency of the County Court Judges to administer the bankruptcy law. It could not, therefore, be said that the mercantile classes were unanimous in favour of transferring that jurisdiction to the County Court Judges. The comparison drawn between the Scotch Sheriffs Courts and the County Courts was defective ; they did not at all resemble each other. He must persist in dividing the Committee.

SIR FITZROY KELLY suggested that the clause should be postponed, till some of the following clauses, having reference to the same subject, should have been considered.

MR. MELLOR also approved the postponement.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had no objection to postpone the clause, if such was the wish of the Committee, till the bringing up of the Report.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that could not be done, as an Amendment had been made in the clause.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the same thing could be effected in another way, namely, by negating the clause now, on the understanding that he should bring it up in another form on the Report.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he should take the sense of the Committee on that portion of the clause to which he had referred.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that in that case he should defend the clause, on the ground that it would greatly facilitate the attainment of justice. No one ventured to assert that the present state of the bankruptcy law was satisfactory. He did not charge this to the administration of the law, as far as the Court had powers ; but the defects of the law amounted to an absolute denial of justice. To the bankrupt it was ruinous, to the creditor iniquitous. But what remedy could be applied ? He approved the favourite modern principle—that of reverting to the old Saxon system of a provincial and local administration of justice. The County Courts were ambulatory. They could not have a better arrangement than that by which a Judge was kept itinerating in a small district, and compelled to act there according to the exigency of business. If they preserved the present system, they must continue all the subjects of complaint now made against the existing bankruptcy law. It was not the London administration so much as the provincial, of which complaint was made. What could there be better for the purpose than the County Courts ? The Judges of those Courts appointed during the last two or three years, were, he could undertake to say, gentlemen equal to the discharge of any amount of judicial duty ; and they had, besides, at their command an admirable local organization for administering the bankrupt law. He entirely deprecated this question being argued from a mere financial point of view. The average duties of the County Court Judges did not extend beyond fifteen days a month, and nearly half their time would be left vacant for the performance of the functions assigned to them by this Bill. The Committee must, he believed, accept the alternative of adopting the present proposal, or continuing the existing system, to which the greatest possible objection was felt by the mercantile community.

MR. HENLEY said, the hon. and learned Gentleman himself proposed to continue the existing system until the present district Commissioners should die off. A provision was made in this Bill by means of which the Lord Chancellor would have power to order the district Commissioners to go about to such places as he might think proper, and that would cure a complaint now very general in the country ; persons who have business to transact in those Courts would have a Court at their own doors instead of having to travel a considerable distance to go to those Courts. But as to the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman that the County Court Judges had so much spare time on their hands at present, he feared that if they were to leave their own particular Courts to attend to the business of those district Courts, and their own Courts were handed over to some inferior officer, the County Courts would not long continue to give such satisfaction to the public as they now gave. He was disposed to support the Amendment.

MR. CLIVE reminded the House that they had had a trial of migratory Commissioners in the case of the Insolvency Courts, and that the result was far from being satisfactory. It seemed to him unnecessary to appoint Commissioners to bring justice to every man's door when they had those who could do so ready at hand in the persons of the County Court Judges. He would advise the hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) not to put too much faith in law societies; they did not always desire cheap law, and generally recommended centralization.

MR. VANCE said, that so far from its being an advantage as was said, for the County Court Judges to go circuit, the creditors would very much prefer cases being settled in the county town.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that four years ago the sheriffs in Scotland obtained jurisdiction in bankruptcy, and the success of the experiment had been complete. There seemed to be an idea abroad that there was some mystery in matters of bankruptcy which ordinary Judges could not understand; but this was a mistake. Any Judge who was cognizant with the ordinary business of a Court of Law was able to discharge the duties of a Court of Bankruptcy. He might state that in Scotland the cost of proceedings in bankruptcy amounted to 11 per cent, while in England it was 30 per cent.

MR. MALINS said, that there was a general desire that further time should be given for the consideration of the matter, and he therefore moved that the Chairman should report progress.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, that no more contentious cases were ever brought before a tribunal than cases of bankruptcy. He trusted that the Attorney General would press the clause to a division.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL appealed to the hon. and learned Gentleman not to press his proposition.

MR. MALINS said, he had no wish to impede the progress of the Bill, and therefore he would not persist in his Motion.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he could not, as alleged by the Attorney General, be accused of having unreasonably opposed the progress of this Bill. But the fact was, the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed desirous of having so much power in that House that he would not brook any opposition to his proposition. He (Mr. Bouverie) would protest against any system of brow-beating independent Members into holding the same opinions as the hon. and learned Attorney General.

Clause agreed to.

MR. MALINS then moved that the Chairman do report progress.

The House resumed; Committee report progress; to sit again on Friday.

To expire on the 5th day of April following 2 0 0

MR. BRIGHT pointed out, that by a word in one of the Resolutions, a tax would be imposed on the shooting of rabbits, which was quite a new impost.

MR. LAING said, that he would postpone the Bill.

MR. KINNAIRD thought it of great importance that the query of the hon. Member for Birmingham should be replied to.

MR. LAING said, that the Resolution was not intended to have any such effect.

The House resumed ; Committee report progress ; to sit again on Thursday.

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^a Sale of Gas Act Amendment.

2^a Weights and Measures ; Adulteration of Food or Drink ; Consolidated Fund (£9,500,000).

3^a Bankrupt Law (Scotland) Amendment.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD OR DRINK BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD REDESDALE, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said its object was to prevent the sale of a vast deal of rubbish that was now sold as food for the people. The means by which it was proposed to effect this object was by making every person who shall sell any article of food or drink with which any ingredient injurious to health has, to his knowledge been mixed, or who shall sell with a warrant of its purity any article which he knows to be adulterated, liable to summary conviction before two justices of peace, who were authorised to inflict a penalty not less than 5s. or exceeding £5, and costs. The local authorities were authorized to appoint one or more "analysts," to whom the purchaser or the magistrates might submit the suspected articles for examination, and whose certificate was to be conclusive. The Bill proposed to give a right of appeal to Quarter Sessions—but this proposition he intended to extend and to make the appeal lie to the Court of Queen's Bench for patented articles in certain cases. For the second offence the magistrates were authorized, besides inflicting the recited penalties, to publish the name, place, abode, and offence of the offender in the newspapers or otherwise. In respect of the general scope and intent of the Bill, he would remind their Lordships that it was necessary to risk a little inconvenience if they were to effect any good at all by legislation. There was such a disposition on the part of traders to sell goods which were not what they purported to be, that unless the Legislature interfered effectually he was afraid the sale of adulterated and unwholesome goods would continue throughout the kingdom to the great injury of the community.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

LORD PORTMAN said, the Bill was not likely to effect much towards effecting the object which the promoters desired, and was certain to cause intense vexation and annoyance in every part of the country. He believed, however, the Bill would prove perfectly inoperative owing to the difficulties which would beset any attempt to carry its provisions into execution. For instance, it would require that the seller must know the article he sold to be adulterated. How were they to prove that? Then it was proposed, in the case of any person selling adulterated articles and convicted thereof, he should be liable to have his name, offence, and penalty published in one or more newspapers, which he conceived to be altogether a new principle in legislation. Then they were to be dependent on the proof of adulteration on the Report of analysts appointed for the purpose ; but as there was a great difference of opinion between analysts as to what was pure and what was adulterated, it would be very difficult for either the magistrates or the justices of the peace in quarter sessions to decide, with such conflicting testimony, as to who was right or who was wrong. This was no new subject, for he had heard it discussed ever since he recollected anything ; and about fifty years ago a work bearing on the matter was published entitled Death in the Pot. However, if the returns of the Registrar General were examined, great improvement would be found to have taken place in the health of the general population ; and, consequently, it must not be assumed that there was such an enormous increase in the adulteration of articles of food as to injure the health of the public.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE observed that it had been shown by evidence that so extensive and systematic was the adulteration of all articles of consumption that people hardly knew what they ate or drank. It would be very desirable if any enactment could be passed that would give protection to the poor man ; but his own opinion was that it would be difficult to do anything in the matter with effect. At the same time it was well worth consideration, whether some mode might not be discovered of putting a check on the habit of falsifying articles of consumption.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH said, that when the Act of the Irish Parliament against the adulteration of bread expired after the Union, powdered bone became no inconsiderable ingredient in the manufacture of that important article of food. The result was that a new Act had to be passed by the Imperial Parliament. It was so important that a stop should be put to practices so injurious to the public health that he thought it would be a great misfortune if any discouragement were thrown upon this attempt at legislation.

LORD TALBOT DE MALAHIDE strongly supported the Bill. The agricultural societies had done a great public service by analysing artificial manures, but they had had to encounter great difficulties in consequence of the litigation to which they were exposed if they published the names of the fraudulent vendors. They had found it necessary to form guarantee funds in order to bear their chemists harmless; and he regarded the provision for the publication of any names of those persons who might be convicted under the Bill as one of its most valuable features.

LORD TEYNHAM thought a clause should be inserted enabling a retail dealer to obtain an analysis for a much smaller sum than was provided for by the Bill. He also thought a provision should be made that no person should be subject to the charge of adulteration who sold articles in packets or bottles which remained, when he sold them, in the same condition as they were in when they came into his possession. The onus in such cases ought to attach entirely to the manufacturer, or, at all events, the wholesale dealer.

LORD WENSLEYDALE suggested that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee.

LORD REDESDALE accepted the suggestion, and said that if the House would agree to the second reading, he would on Thursday move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee. The manufacturers of an adulterated article must, of course, always be cognizant of the adulteration; not so, necessarily, the retail dealer. If, however, the retail dealer warranted the article he sold as being pure, he ought to be liable for the adulteration, if there were any, in regard to the article.

After a few words from the LORD CHANCELLOR,

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^d accordingly, and referred to a Select Committee. The Committee to be

ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.

RESOLUTION MOVED.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON, in rising to call Attention to the continued Disturbances taking place on each succeeding Sunday in the Church of St. Georges-in-the-East, and to move a Resolution that sufficient Power and Energy has not been displayed in putting down the same and bringing its Perpetrators to Punishment said, he believed he should meet with the universal concurrence of their Lordships when he asserted that the proceedings which had taken place Sunday after Sunday at St. George's-in-the-East were not only an abomination in themselves, but a scandal to religion, and a disgrace to a civilized community. Every succeeding Monday they saw in the newspapers accounts that were worse than those that preceded them, as having taken place every Sunday morning and evening preceding, and which, it appeared, the police had not the power to suppress or put down. He need not say that he did not stand before their Lordships as the advocate or champion either of the Rev. Bryan King or of his proceedings. That gentleman's conduct had been, to use the mildest terms, most culpably injudicious. It might be that he had acted in strict conformity to the rubric; but he ought to remember that many things which were sanctioned by the rubrics of the Church had become obsolete, and were opposed to the feelings of the public. It was, he thought, much to be regretted that the Ordinary had not power in all cases of differences arising between an incumbent and his parishioners, either as to the mode of celebrating divine worship or as to the decoration of the church, of pronouncing a decision which should be binding upon both parties. The conduct of the Rev. Bryan King, however, furnished no justification for the disgraceful riots which took place Sunday after Sunday, and which were occasioned not by the regular congregation, who he was informed had all left the church, but by a party of disorderly and reckless persons whose only object was to indulge in a scandalous pastime. Why, then, were not these riots put down? They would not for a moment be tolerated in any West-end church, in any Dissenting chapel, or even in a theatre, and why should they be allowed to continue in the church of St. George's-in-the-East? Had the Secretary of State omitted to direct the chief of the metropolitan police to use every effort to put down these disturbances? or was it the fact the chief of the police, or some members of that body, sympathized with the opponents of the Rev. Bryan King, and were therefore unwilling to exert themselves as they ought to do to put a stop to these rights? An impression appeared to prevail among the police authorities that although they would be justified in taking the strongest steps to check any disorder which might take place outside the walls of the church, they were differently circumstanced as regarded what occurred within the building. Nothing could be more erroneous, and he was at a loss to understand how such an impression could have been created. If it continued to be acted upon a precedent of the most dangerous and fearful kind would be established, and a rabble might assume they had a privileged right to disturb the service in our churches. A representation ought to be made to the Ordinary upon the subject; and if he had not power to pronounce a decision in the matter a measure ought to be introduced into Parliament to confer such authority upon him. Were the churchwardens doing what they ought, or were they not acting under the influence of prejudices entertained against the incumbent and his proceedings, forgetting their immediate duty, which was the maintenance of order in the church? No right-minded person could come to any conclusion other than that these disturbances had risen to such a height that it was absolutely necessary that there should be some decided interference on the part of Her Majesty's Government. If proper directions had not been given to the chief of the police they ought to be immediately communicated to him; because he was convinced that if ten or a dozen determined policemen did their duty these scenes would soon be put down. Several persons had been taken before the magistrate of the Thames Police Office charged with breaking the peace during the performance of Divine service. One of those individuals, who was stated to occupy a respectable position in society, told the magistrate that if he was sent to prison it would damage his character and ruin him in his business. The magistrate, acting doubtless from the humanest of motives, inflicted on the accused a moderate fine, instead of committing him to gaol for fourteen days. If the respectability of a man's station in life was to have any influence at all in such matters, surely it would justify the infliction of a severer sentence upon him when he was proved to have openly infringed the law. If a decided course had been taken in that case by the magistrate of the Thames Police Office, in all human probability an example of such a description would have put an end to these disorders. Far better that the church should be closed for some time to come, than it should be thus desecrated Sunday after Sunday. Surely the Government must see the necessity of remedying the evil, and must be able to remedy it. The fault could not but lie somewhere; whether with the chief of the police, or with the members of his force who were placed upon duty at St. George's-in-the-East on Sunday, he could not presume to determine. Hitherto the police had been little more than ciphers in this matter. These riots, he understood, were not occasioned by the inhabitants of the parish, or by any members of Mr. Bryan King's regular congregation, but by a parcel of mischievous boys and girls, aided by a few miscreants, who went to the church for no other purpose than to have what they thought a good Sunday's "lark." If such a disturbance of public worship was not forcibly checked, a dangerous precedent would be set, which might be imitated, they knew not how soon, in other parts of the country. He trusted, therefore, that Her Majesty's Government would at once interpose to repress this flagrant scandal, and would give such instructions to the Chief Commissioner of Police as would not again be disobeyed. The noble Lord concluded by moving a Resolution—

"That sufficient Power and Energy have not been displayed in putting down the continued Disturbances which have taken place on each succeeding Sunday in the Church of St. George's-in-the-East, and in bringing the Perpetrators of such outrages to Punishment."

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to say, he was not at all surprised that the noble Lord should have called attention to the subject, but was very much surprised to hear him charging the police with neglect of duty, and saying that it would be very easy for them to suppress these disturbances. The task was by no means so easy as the noble Lord supposed, and no facts had been adduced to show that the police had failed to discharge their duty as far as that was possible. If one or two individuals disturbed a whole congregation, the police would have no difficulty in taking them into custody and bringing them to punishment. But where a considerable portion of the assembly disapproved the mode in which the public worship was conducted, and confined the expression of that disapproval within certain limits, it was not so easy to obtain a conviction against them. The insinuation that the police evince a sympathy with the rioters was entirely unwarranted. The noble Lord said the rioters were unconnected with the parish; but he was informed that that was a mistake, and that a great portion of them did belong to the parish. There was a strong desire on the part of the Home Office that these disturbances should be put down, and instructions had been given to the police to give their best attention to the subject. A small body of police were placed behind the churchwardens to execute whatever orders they might give; while others were stationed in different parts of the church; and the police had orders to take before the magistrates any person guilty of committing any distinct act of disturbance. They were also ordered to take into custody all those against whom any person was found to bring a direct charge. If, however, nobody was found to make a charge, what were the police to do? The noble Lord stated that several individuals had been brought before the magistrates. So they had, and with what result? Why, in every case but one they had been let go.

LORD WENSLEYDALE said, he thought the statute of the 2nd of Queen Mary would be found to apply in the present case. That statute enacted that if any person in any way molested any preacher he might be taken into custody—not by the churchwarden or police officer—but by any one who was present at the proceedings, and brought before a magistrate, and the magistrate might imprison him for three months. He thought the magistrates had acted with too great leniency in the cases brought before them. If the Secretary of State looked to the words of the statute he would find it was clear that it applied to any kind of insult or obstruction; and he believed that if one or two cases were taken before the magistrates under the statute of Queen Mary these disturbances would soon be disposed of.

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to say that some practical difficulty had been experienced in enforcing the statute referred to by the noble and learned Lord.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW expressed his regret that proper steps had not been taken to put down these disturbances. He thought that the outrages in this church were of such a gross and infamous nature that it was utterly impossible that they could continue in any civilized country on earth, if the authorities had done their duty; and that they had not done their duty in this case was quite clear. He had been told by persons who were there, that while these outrages were going on in the most violent manner, the police, like so many automata, were standing by as mere spectators, and without taking the slightest notice. It also appeared from the proceedings in the courts of justice, that in every case where an offender had been brought before the magistrate he had been let off without any fine, or with a merely nominal punishment; whereas those gentlemen who, though not at the solicitation or desire of Mr. Bryan King, had attempted to interfere for his protection, and as it appeared they were authorized to do by the Act the noble and learned Lord had quoted, to put out of the Church the persons whom they saw transgressing, were heavily fined. He agreed that such things could not take place in any other church, or in a Dissenting chapel; and it was quite evident, therefore, that there was a prejudice against this unfortunate gentleman. He begged to say that he had no knowledge of Mr. Bryan King, neither did he approve of the course which that gentleman had pursued. Though he had not probably transgressed the law in any respect, yet he admitted that with a congregation like that in question it was exceedingly injudicious for the clergyman to adopt such practices as had been adopted. He held in his hand a letter which Mr. Bryan King had circulated among the Members of that and the other House; it was addressed to the Bishop of the diocese, and he had heard that it had been contradicted. If this letter were true it was most extraordinary, and he could not think that a clergyman would publish such a letter to his diocesan if it were not founded in fact. He said in this letter, in the first place, that he got the living from the late Bishop of London at the time when the Bishop had published a letter to his clergy requiring them to adopt uniformity of practice in their churches. He continued, that in conformity with the Bishop's order he put certain practices in force, and he did not feel justified in realtering the system because a portion of his parishioners disapproved of the change. Mr. Bryan King also stated that all these disturbances arose in consequence of the appointment of a person as lecturer, licensed by the present Bishop of the diocese. This was the Rev. Hugh Allen, who was an intimate friend of Mr. Spurgeon, and who had assisted Mr. Spurgeon in the establishment of his tabernacle. With regard to this Mr. Allen, there were alleged to be some other circumstances, which might have exposed Mr. King to an action for libel if they had been stated in his printed letter, but which he (the Earl of Wicklow), speaking in their Lordships' House, could mention. It was alleged that Mr. Allen had been obliged to leave another church in consequence of the intention of the authorities of that church to bring him before a court of justice for his improper conduct. He was then appointed to a neighbouring church; but the rector of that church protested and the Bishop refused to give him a licence. He was then elected by the vestry of St. George's, and the Bishop gave him a licence. Mr. Bryan King protested against his appointment, but ineffectually, and he then informed the Bishop of all the circumstances that had led to this gentleman's retirement from his former position; that he was a notorious drunkard and totally unfit for his position; yet notwithstanding this the Bishop gave him a licence. Having the Bishop's licence he took possession of the pulpit and was followed by a large crowd shouting "Bravo, Allen!" The statement might not be true, but Mr. Bryan King stated it to be the fact, and he said that all the disturbances had been in consequence of the conduct of Mr. Allen. He (the Earl of Wicklow) was glad to give the right rev. Prelate an opportunity of contradicting this statement if it were not true. If it were true, then the Rev. Bryan King was justified in his proceedings; and if not true he was a libeller and not fit to retain his present position. All that he (the Earl of Wicklow) required was that justice should be done.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he was surprised at the course taken by the noble

The Earl of Wicklow

Earl. He had read, with due attention, the letter to which the noble Earl directed his notice. The noble Earl brought forward a statement that a clergyman who, in a neighbouring diocese, had lately been appointed to a most important living, and who on that occasion of course produced testimonials signed by three beneficed clergymen, upon which he was instituted by the Bishop of the diocese to the charge of that living, was a notorious drunkard. He (the Bishop of London) did not find such a statement in the letter of Mr. King, though he now heard it in the speech of the noble Earl. He felt entitled to request the noble Earl to read the exact words of Mr. King's letter, so that if there was a libel in the statement their Lordships might know whether Mr. King was the libeller, or the noble Earl himself.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW said, the reason assigned by Mr. King was not in the letter; and why? Because Mr. King believed he could not publish it without being guilty of libel. But did the right rev. Prelate mean to tell him that Mr. King did not inform him of that reason when he requested him to withhold the licence from Mr. Allen? If the right rev. Prelate would say that Mr. King never informed him of those circumstances, he (the Earl of Wicklow) would at once admit that he had been wrong in going so far into the case. But Mr. King's statement was that Mr. Allen had been guilty of such faults that he had been obliged to abandon one church.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I shall be obliged if the noble Earl will read the statement—the letter.

EARL GRANVILLE:—I do not know whether your Lordships will agree with me, but I really think it is not desirable that this conversation should proceed any further. I must say it is not usual to impugn the character of a clergyman without any notice whatever. Besides, it has really no connection with the case before your Lordships. Whether there be grounds for censure of the authorities or not, cannot depend on the character or conduct of some other clergyman.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW said, he had been requested by the right rev. Prelate to read the letter; and if the House would allow him to read—

EARL GRANVILLE again appealed to the House as to whether it was desirable that this should go on or not. As far as he understood the matter he thought that it was a disorderly proceeding and ought not to be allowed to continue.

LORD CHELMSFORD thought it most desirable that the discussion, which was of an extremely painful description, and had nothing to do with the matter before their Lordships, should cease. He should now wish to make a few observations with respect to the Motion which was under the consideration of the House. His noble Friend near him was, he thought, perfectly justified in making that Motion inasmuch as—

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE:—The noble and learned Lord rose to a point of order, and I think he will agree with me that it is undesirable that he should—until that point is disposed of, and until some explanation is offered in reply to the charge which has been brought against a particular individual—proceed to discuss the question which has been brought under our notice by the noble Viscount opposite. It would be unfair to allow such a charge to go forth to the public without affording the right rev. Prelate near me the opportunity of showing its injustice as far as possible.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he quite concurred in the propriety of the observations made by the noble Duke. He might add that he was proceeding to address the House with reference to the Resolution of his noble Friend under the impression that their Lordships assented to the expediency of adopting the course which the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) had suggested.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON proceeded: Nothing could be more painful to him than such a discussion as this; but the whole subject was of such a kind that it must be painful. He could quite understand that the noble Earl did not intend himself to bring any charge against this clergyman, but he seemed to have viewed the words in his hand through some extraordinary medium that made them appear to convey a meaning they were not intended to convey. He (the Bishop of London) believed that Mr. Bryan King was totally incapable of saying what the noble Earl had imputed to him. If the House would allow him, he would now state what the noble Earl evidently knew nothing about, namely, the legal steps by which the Rev. Hugh Allen was appointed to the lectureship of St. George's-in-the-East. That was a matter which had not any great connection with the subject at present before their Lordships; but as the disturbances began about the time that gentleman was appointed, it was well for the public to know in what way he was appointed. Their Lordships were perhaps aware that, as a general rule, no lecturer could be appointed in any parish church without the consent of the Incumbent, and it was the duty of the Bishop not to license such lecturer without such consent. But there was hardly a parish in London that had not its own local act. The peculiar circumstances of this parish arose from the Act of Parliament relating to the parish. As the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack, who had sat as Judge in this case, was aware, the Act of Parliament which regulated the affairs of St. George's-in-the-East made it imperative on the Bishop, without any consent of the rector, to appoint the person who should be nominated by the vestry to fill the office of lecturer. If, therefore, he (the Bishop of London) had refused to institute to the office of lecturer the person who was nominated by the vestry, he would have been liable to be called to account before a court of law. Of course, if an improper person were nominated, it would be his duty, at whatever peril, to resist the appointment of such a person. The gentleman who had been, as he thought, so unfortunately named in this discussion, was nominated by the vestry. He (the Bishop of London) thereupon received from Mr. King a letter, which informed him that in his opinion that gentleman was an unfit person to be appointed to this lectureship, because he believed he had been to a tea-party at which Mr. Spurgeon was present, and also because it was supposed that there were certain reflections as to his moral character which required investigation. Immediately on the receipt of this communication, he (the Bishop of London) informed the gentleman nominated of the charges brought against him so far as they were of a serious character, and told him that he would require most satisfactory evidence that they were without foundation. On the next day that evidence was produced in the usual shape of testimonials signed by three beneficed clergymen of the diocese, testifying that they had opportunities of observing his conduct for the last three years, and that to their certain knowledge, he was a pious and good man, and a perfectly fit person to be appointed to this lectureship. Then what other course was left to him (the Bishop of London) than that which he pursued? This gentleman, whatever faults might be attributed to him, was a person who had a wonderful faculty of attracting large crowds of persons to hear his preaching. Of all the churches in the East end of London, his own parish church—the church of which at that time he was incumbent—was the one that was most filled, and it was perfectly true that the deserted parish church of St. George's became immediately filled when he was appointed. He (the Bishop of London) did not know whether that was attributed to this clergyman as any blame; on the contrary, he believed that the persons who went to hear him as lecturer went simply from their admiration of him as a preacher and because they expected now to hear what they thought they had not heard for a long time, such preaching as was likely to do them good. He believed, therefore, that the thousand persons who frequented the church at that afternoon lecture went there with no intention of creating any disturbance, but they went as they had been in the habit of frequenting every church where this gentleman preached,—it might be from mistaken ideas of the truth, or it might not, for he (the Bishop of London) would not enter into that—only because he was what they felt to be a preacher who they thought did them good. It was quite true that on the occasion of the lecturer taking possession of the office to which he had been legally appointed, an attempt was made—and he (the Bishop of London) did not blame the inexperienced curate who performed that act for the absent rector—an attempt was made to put in a protest, which caused some little disturbance. But that question had been brought to a proper and legal conclusion. The noble and learned Lord (Lord Campbell) then Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, decided the case, and settled that the lecturer was properly appointed, and settled by implication that he (the Bishop of London) had no alternative but to appoint him, and that he was entitled to the use of the church on certain occasions. That was all that he (the Bishop of London) had personally to do with the appointment of Mr. Allen. If the most rev. Prelate (the Archbishop of Canterbury) were now present in the House, he would have spoken of the character Mr. Allen bore when in his diocese. The most rev. Prelate had spoken to him (the Bishop of London) of Mr. Allen, as believing him to be a zealous and good clergyman, exercising a wide influence over the poor, when in the diocese of Chester.

The Bishop of London

He believed there were others of his right rev. Brethren who would say the same. But really all this had nothing to do with the question now before the House, and he regretted that it had been brought forward in a way which he was sure Mr. King, the writer of that letter, would regret. He might say in that House what he (the Bishop of London) had often said in private—that Mr. Bryan King was a person who would never allow himself, if he possibly could avoid it, to transgress the rules of propriety in speaking of a brother clergyman. As for the miserable state of things in St. George's-in-the-East, he (the Bishop of London) regretted it as much, or more, than any man, for he had more cause to regret it. The only point on which he was now particularly concerned to give any explanation was that which the noble Viscount (Viscount Dungannon) had raised, as to whether the churchwardens had done their duty. He had continually charged them, by word and by letter, to see that they did it; and he had taken steps to find them such assistance, by means of sidesmen, as the law enabled him to provide them with. He had even called upon the clergy belonging to the parish to meet the churchwardens and suggest some course by which the churchwardens might execute their duty. If any complaint against the churchwardens were made, he would be ready either to carry it into the proper Court, or to do what in him lay to induce them to do their duty; but although much abuse had been bandied about on every side, and everything that was done by anybody was wrong in the estimation of everybody else, yet no charge of which he could take cognizance had been brought before him. He believed that this was simply one of those miserable cases to be found in all parts of society, in which, if men would stand on their legal rights, there was no amount of disturbance they might not cause. In the domestic relations, for instance, suppose two persons determined to make themselves as disagreeable as they could, each to the other, without infringing the law, what a state of things would result from it in the family! He believed it was the same thing with those most sacred relations between the pastor and his flock; it was possible for a pastor to make himself very disagreeable to his flock without violating the law, and for the flock to make themselves very disagreeable to the pastor; and it was very difficult for those who wished to set them right to find by what means they could put an end to that disagreeable state of things. He trusted the expression of their Lordships' opinion, that both parties in this miserable contest were most shamefully to blame, and that there was no sympathy for either the one or the other, would have some effect on those persons who were, he believed, both the one and the other, in the wrong. He had said, and he believed, that if the matter was placed in his hands, it could be arranged; but it must be an unconditional surrender to the Ordinary. He must be called in to settle these disturbances; and he hoped he was not thinking too much of himself or his office, when he said he had full confidence that there was so much good feeling among Englishmen that, whenever they had no doubt as to where the authority lay, or as to how far those who exercised the authority were entitled to exercise it, they would be quite ready to give way to it. If the rector of that parish would do what he ought to have done months ago, and say, "I am unable to manage this parish; I beg the Bishop of the diocese to manage it for me," all the mischief might be put an end to.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the case of "Allen v. King" came before the Court of Queen's Bench when he had the honour of filling the office of Lord Chief Justice. It was contended on the part of the Rev. Bryan King that the Rev. Mr. Allen had no legal right to officiate as lecturer in the church of St. George's-in-the-East without Mr. King's consent. The Court decided that Mr. Bryan King was wrong and Mr. Allen right; but they earnestly recommended the parties to try and come to some amicable arrangement. With regard to his presenting Mr. Allen to the living of St. George's, Southwark, he (the Lord Chancellor) wished to state the circumstances under which he had made that appointment. He had been informed that it was of importance that some active and zealous clergyman should be appointed to preside over so populous a parish. He was wholly unacquainted with the rev. Mr. Allen, but that gentleman was recommended to him, along with a great many others, as being a most zealous pastor and a most upright and pious man. He received a great variety of testimonials of a most unexceptionable character stating his fitness for such a charge; but, not contented with these, he applied to the Bishop of London—because he was afraid that Mr.

Allen might have incurred some blame in connection with the controversies at St. George's-in-the-East, for the purpose of ascertaining whether he had done anything in those transactions which affected his character, and rendered him an unfit person to be appointed rector of the parish. The right rev. Prelate in answer testified to him that Mr. Allen's conduct, so far as it had come under his knowledge, had been unexceptionable, and that he was a proper person to receive the appointment. Upon that he (the Lord Chancellor) presented him to the living, and up to that hour he believed he had discharged his duties in a manner calculated to give great satisfaction. With regard to what had fallen from the noble Viscount (Viscount Dungannon), he would ask him on whom did he propose the censure implied in his Resolution should fall in regard to the continuance of the riots at St. George's-in-the-East? It certainly could not fall upon the Bishop of London, nor upon the Home Secretary; and the noble Viscount had not shown any other individual whose duty it was to suppress these outrages who was at all to blame. He hoped, however, that the expression of feeling in deploring these transactions, which the noble Viscount had called forth from all quarters of the House, would satisfy him, and induce him to withdraw his Motion.

THE BISHOP OF CASHEL rose to bear his strong testimony to the character of the Rev. Mr. Allen, and to his zeal and efficiency as a minister of the Gospel. He had never seen so large and attentive a congregation as that which he witnessed on one occasion at St. Jude's, Whitechapel, where that rev. gentleman officiated. The right rev. Prelate was proceeding to complain of the charges which were brought against Mr. Allen, when VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, that he had brought no charge whatever against Mr. Allen.

EARL GRANVILLE again interposed and expressed a hope that after the statements which had been made by two right rev. Prelates and by the Lord Chancellor, in answer to the charge made against Mr. Allen, their Lordships would not enter further into that collateral subject, but would confine their attention to the Motion which was immediately before them.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW rose and denied that he wished to throw any imputation upon the gentleman whose character had been so highly spoken to by two right rev.

Prelates. He knew nothing of him whatever; he only quoted the words of a pamphlet which had been circulated throughout the whole country, and in which much stronger words than he had used appeared. And he had asked the Bishop of London whether Mr. Bryan King did not inform him of those particular circumstances. He would also now ask the right rev. Prelate whether he did or did not try to ascertain what were the reasons why the rev. gentleman was obliged to relinquish the living of St. Luke's, Old Street?

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE rose to order. His noble Friend might offer an explanation of what he had himself stated, but he had no right to reply upon that occasion to the address of the right rev. Prelate.

EARL STANHOPE said, he regretted that the name of Mr. Allen should have been unnecessarily introduced into this discussion. It appeared to him that the character of that rev. gentleman had been completely vindicated by the testimony offered in its favour by the two right rev. Prelates and by the Lord Chancellor. His object, however, in rising, was to advert in a very few words to the unfortunate transactions which had taken place in the parish of St. George's-in-the-East. He entirely agreed in the opinion which had been expressed by several of their Lordships, that both the parties in that dispute were to blame. The outrages committed in the church were utterly indefensible, and such as all must join in condemning. But, on the other hand, he thought it was much to be regretted that Mr. Bryan King, acting, no doubt, from the most conscientious motives, had, by proceeding upon his extreme legal rights, excited an almost universal feeling of dissatisfaction among his parishioners. The outrages arose in a great measure from the employment of ritual observances not essential to Divine worship. Mr. King stated in his letter that the services in his church did not differ in any respect from those observed in the cathedrals. But his church was not a cathedral church, and why should he introduce into a parish church, upon his own authority, a cathedral service? He (Earl Stanhope) was persuaded that the only way of bringing those unhappy differences to a satisfactory settlement would be to leave them to the decision of the Bishop of the diocese. The noble Viscount who brought forward the Motion said he wished to see the Ordinary empowered, by a new Act of Parliament, to adopt such a course. But why should it not be taken in consequence of an agreement between the parties? He felt persuaded that was the only mode of removing discontent and restoring peace to the parish. Unwilling as the rev. gentleman had hitherto shown himself to yield to any representations, and resolute to maintain his own views at the cost of peace to the parish, he ought merely now at length to feel the necessity and the duty to submit himself to his Bishop's mediation. With regard to the Motion before the House, he would venture respectfully to suggest to the noble Viscount that he should not press it, but that he should rest satisfied with the expression of opinion which had been elicited from their Lordships in the course of that discussion.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he was sure their Lordships must have heard with satisfaction the address of the right rev. Prelate the Bishop of the diocese, and must have concurred in every word he said. But the question before their Lordships was not as to the origin of these unhappy and scandalous disputes, nor were their Lordships called upon to adjust the proportion of blame which ought to attach to the different parties concerned. His noble Friend called upon the House to affirm that sufficient power and energy had not been displayed in putting down these disturbances. Now, he (Lord Chelmsford) might have an impression that if a different course had been pursued the result would have been more effectual; but their Lordships had no evidence of any remissness on the part of the authorities. He could not, without more information than was at present before the House, join in the opinion that the magistrates had not properly discharged their duties, nor could he believe that the police had been remiss or negligent. There was great difficulty in obtaining evidence against the rioters, and it was the want of evidence and the absence of sufficient proof of identity which had occasioned the failure of the charges. Perhaps it would have been better if, instead of sending policemen, detectives in plain clothes had been employed to mix with the congregation. But, on the whole, he could not concur in the opinion that sufficient power and energy had not been displayed by the authorities; and even supposing that their Lordships were convinced of the truth of such a charge, was it desirable that they should adopt a Resolution embodying it? Was it desirable to adopt a Resolution which was perfectly futile and useless when his noble Friend's object had been entirely answered in the discussion which had been elicited? Under these circumstances, he must join in requesting the noble Viscount to withdraw his Motion.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON replied. He hoped that considerable benefit would arise from that discussion. He knew nothing of Mr. Allen, and had not the most distant idea of mixing up the rev. Gentleman's name in it—his sole object was to call attention to what was really a scandal to religion and a disgrace to a civilized country. He believed those riots were caused, not by the inhabitants of the parish, but by people who went to the church for the express purpose of creating disorder, and were glad to avail themselves of the opportunity afforded to their propensities in St. George's-in-the-East. But if his introduction of this question to their Lordships should produce any good effect in showing the rioters that their conduct would not be overlooked in Parliament or by the Government, his purpose would be answered. In the meantime he would withdraw his Motion.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

CEYLON RAILWAY.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON asked, what were the intentions of the Government with respect to the further prosecution of the Ceylon Railway? He believed that this question was first raised when the noble Lord opposite (Lord Taunton) was at the head of the Colonial Office, and that he sent out Captain Moorsom as the engineer to survey the line, and make an estimate of the cost. Captain Moorsom estimated the line at a minimum expense of £800,000, but as a margin to cover all contingencies, he put the maximum at £1,200,000. This was in the year 1856. Since then he believed no progress had been made in the line, though a company had been formed on a contract with the local Government of Ceylon, by which the colony guaranteed 6 per cent on the minimum cost of £800,000, and 5 per cent on its cost above that sum, on the understanding that the additional sum would not be more than £400,000. This was the position of affairs in 1856. But since then a serious difficulty had arisen. Doubts apparently had suggested themselves of the sufficiency of the estimate, and the company which undertook the line had sent out their own engineer, Mr. Doyne, who stated that the line could not be made under £2,200,000, and even that, he said, was only an approximate estimate. Now this was a very serious question of economy; because though the revenues of the colony might very well bear a charge of 6 per cent on £800,000, and 5 per cent on £400,000, it became a very different question if they were to pay the 6 per cent on £800,000, and 5 per cent on £1,400,000, or indeed on any indefinite amount which might be required—for it must be understood that, though the agreement between the colony and the company was based on Captain Moorsom's estimate, yet there was no fixed sum stated in the contract on which the 5 per cent was to be paid. He believed that the colony had offered to reimburse the company for all the expenses to which they had been put, and to cancel the contract. On the other hand, the company had referred the question to his noble Friend at the head of the Colonial Office, and were ready to abide by his decision. What he wished to know, therefore, was, what steps his noble Friend had taken in the matter?

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, the circumstances connected with this railway had been correctly described as in an unfortunate state of embarrassment. The proposition to construct the line had been agitated at the time of his former connection with the Colonial Office in 1854; but the preliminary arrangements were made during the term of office of his successor (Lord Taunton). The noble Lord opposite had correctly detailed the steps which were taken for the survey of the line, and the estimate which was made by Captain Moorsom, which amounted to £856,000. A contract was entered into between the colonial Government of Ceylon and the railway company formed to carry out this undertaking, which was based on Captain Moorsom's estimate, and on the principle of the guarantee which had been alluded to. The next step taken by the company was to send out Mr. Doyne, a civil engineer, for the purpose of superintending the works; and between the period of his departure in 1857 and the year 1859 the embarrassments arose to which their Lordships' attention had now been called. The ground was undoubtedly broken, but very little progress had been otherwise made with the works. But in June last a report was made by Mr. Doyne, estimating the cost of constructing the line, not at £856,000, but at £2,214,000. This estimate was received at the Colonial Office at a time when he (the Duke of Newcastle) was at the head of that Department, and one of the first matters he had to deal with was the complication arising on the subject of this railway. The colonists naturally remonstrated against the increased estimate sent home by Mr. Doyne, and under these circumstances he (the Duke of Newcastle) thought it quite impossible to allow the works to proceed without some further inquiry, and most thorough and complete investigation, and he accordingly felt it necessary to call to his aid the best practical advice which he was able to obtain. Although at that time retired from professional occupations, the late Mr. Robert Stephenson, at his request, undertook to inquire into the details, with a view of arbitrating, as far as was practicable, between the parties. It was agreed that two firms of contractors, Messrs. Brassey and Co., and Messrs. Waring and Co., should be allowed to send out agents, because the tenders which they were afterwards to submit would afford material assistance in determining on the course which ought to be adopted. Mr. Doyne likewise was recalled in order that he might lay the fullest information before Mr. Stephenson. But, to the disadvantage not merely of this undertaking, but he might say of society generally, Mr. Stephenson died in the meantime. In his place Mr. Hawkshaw consented to undertake the reference, and Captain Moorsom, after some correspondence, had promised to put himself in communication with that gentleman. The contractors to whom he had alluded, Messrs. Brassey and Waring, respectively sent in tenders to Mr. Hawkshaw on the 10th instant, and as soon as he had fully considered the question he would make his report. Within the last two or three days some difficulties had arisen which would create a slight delay, but he hoped that by the close of the present month they would be in receipt of Mr. Hawkshaw's views. No contract would be binding which had not received the consent of the Government; and on the part of the Colonial Office there was every disposition to promote a settlement of this question.

LORD TAUNTON stated that the proposition for constructing this railway originated in the period of office of his predecessor, Lord John Russell, to whom strong representations had been made by the colonists as to the advantages which the carrying out of this project would confer upon

The Duke of Newcastle

Ceylon. The noble Lord referred the matter for the opinion of the Colonial Government; but before its reply could be received a change had taken place in the home Administration; by which the further control of the undertaking devolved upon himself. He gave every assistance in his power to the project, with a due regard to the interests of those whose money he was administering; and had acted throughout on the principle of consulting the Government of Ceylon, who were to find the guarantee, and who being on the spot were necessarily better acquainted with the circumstances than he could be; and at the time he went out of office the matter was in a most prosperous way. Captain Moorsom was appointed by him to make the survey in consequence of the high character as an engineer which he possessed; and he greatly regretted, and certainly had never foreseen, that any circumstances could have occurred to bring about the present unsettled condition of affairs.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, May 22, 1860.

TAX BILLS—EXCISE DUTY ON PAPER. NOTICE OF MOTION.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I rise for the purpose of moving the Adjournment of the House at its rising until Thursday next; and I wish at the same time to give notice that, it is my intention on Thursday to move that a Committee be appointed to inspect and examine the Journals of the House of Lords in relation to any proceedings of that House on the Bill for repealing the Excise duty on paper made in the United Kingdom. I think it is desirable that that Committee should be followed up by a Committee to search for precedents. It is important that the facts with regard to what has passed should be ascertained, but Her Majesty's Government disclaim any intention of taking any step that would place the two Houses in a state of hostility. I now move that the House at its rising do adjourn till Thursday next.

COURT OF PROBATE.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he rose to ask the first Commissioner of Works when proper accommodation will be provided for Her Majesty's Court of Probate, and what steps have been taken to acquire the property for which powers were given under the Act of last Session, and for the purchase of which a sum of £60,000 was granted. The present offices were in every respect inconvenient. The accommodation was not sufficient for the gentlemen whose business it was to attend at the offices; and in one place a gentleman was put into a room where any Member would be ashamed to put one of his servants. The inconvenience and insufficiency of the offices had been the subject of long correspondence with the Treasury, but the only result as yet arrived at had been that portions of adjoining houses were hired, and openings bored through the wall to connect them with the Probate Office. The consequence of this state of things was that gentlemen holding important offices, such as registrars, and receiving high salaries, found themselves on the second floor of a house, the floor below being hired by somebody else, and the floor above by a third party. One of these registrars occupied an office in the room above which lived a gentleman with a zoological taste, who, by way of amusement, kept from fifty to sixty rabbits. He would leave the House to judge what the condition of the official gentleman was who had to discharge most important business in the room below. In 1857, such was the crowded state of the offices, that an effort was made to increase the accommodation, the chief object being to enable persons who wanted to examine or prove wills to do so without the assistance of lawyers. This was, to some extent, carried out; but it frequently happened that 80 or 100 people were waiting who could not get up to the table when the examinations had to be made. In addition to this, there was not room for the papers and wills deposited, and the result was that many of them were dispersed all over the country, while a loss of fees to the revenue, amounting to about £15,000 a year was sustained. By way of remedy for this evil, many very valuable documents had been sent to St. Paul's, where they were deposited in what was called the trophy room; but the Dean and Chapter would not allow a fire or candle in the room; so that they could only be examined during the summer months, and were, besides, being destroyed by damp and mildew. Last year a Bill was brought in giving powers to acquire property on which to build a Court of Probate, and a vote of £60,000 was taken towards the purchase of the ground. It was said that the College of Advocates asked a fancy price for their property, but Mr. Pennithorne stated that, if the property were bought merely as a temporary arrangement, such was the growing value of property in the City of London that he had no doubt it might be sold in five or six years without loss to the Government. It was said to be in contemplation to concentrate all the law courts on one site, but the House had already some experience of the delay that was likely to take place in carrying out such an object. The Keeper of Records had declared that after last Thursday there would not be a room in which a single will or any such paper could be placed in a state of safety. This was a subject which required the immediate attention of the House. Hon. Members would not sleep in their beds if they knew that in consequence of a dispute between the Board of Works and the Treasury the title deeds of their estates might at any moment be destroyed by fire. He paid a visit to the building the other day, and found, in a room four feet square, three gentlemen each with a companion, who were reading wills aloud. He could not understand a word that was said, yet it was evident a vast amount of property might depend on the correctness of a single word. Seeing that the Government had the power of purchasing this property at a valuation and that it adjoined the Probate Office, he begged to ask the First Commissioner of Works when proper accommodation would be provided for Her Majesty's Court of Probate, and what steps had been taken to acquire the property for which powers were given under the Act of last Session, and for the purchase of which a sum of £60,000 was granted?

MR. COWPER said, that his hon. Friend had prefaced his question by a good many remarks; but the actual question might be disposed of in a very few words. The real question was, whether the Board of Works were prepared to purchase the property that belonged to the College of Advocates. He would shortly give the reasons why he thought it better not to do so. The present Probate Registry was, no doubt, an inconvenient building, but it was only temporarily retained. It was expected that the Commission now sitting for the concentration of the law courts would recommend some plan for placing all the law courts on some convenient and contiguous site. It was, therefore, very desirable that the Board of Works should not go to an expense that would stand in the way of uniting the Probate Registry with the law courts. The Registry ought to be in contiguity to the Probate Court itself, the Divorce Court, and the Admiralty Court. He had, therefore, to consider how temporary accommodation could be supplied most conveniently, and at the least expense. That might be done in two ways—either by buying the property belonging to the College of Advocates to which his hon. Friend had referred, or extending the present accommodation by means of hiring the houses on the other side of the way. He had preferred the latter plan, because it involved a saving of £20,000. He should thereby provide seven times as much accommodation as was now found in the registry of wills and documents, whereas the officers of the court stated that it would be enough if they had five times the present space at their disposal. The plan he had adopted would be economical, and would provide the necessary accommodation until a larger and permanent building could be provided.

THE CONVICT ESTABLISHMENT AT BERMUDA.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD NAAS said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the state of the convict establishment of Bermuda. The case which he had to bring under its notice was so urgent and important that he should offer no apology for trespassing upon its time. Many able and philanthropic men in England had been for many years occupied in endeavouring to improve convict treatment, but there still existed a blot upon her public establishments which reflected the greatest disgrace upon the country. The convict establishment at Bermuda had been in existence a considerable number of years. It was not to be regarded in the light of a transportation colony, but was rather an offshoot of the establishments at home. Convicts had been sent out in very great numbers to Bermuda. There were now 1,200 persons there who were employed in public works, in the naval and engineer department. Parliament had devoted £58,000 a year to this establishment. At the expiration of their sentence the convicts were all returned to England to be discharged, and not less than 360 were sent home during the past year and liberated in this country. Many of them belonged to the worst description of criminals, being composed of prisoners who were sentenced to ten years' transportation or the longer periods of penal servitude. Here he might remark that the system was wrong, which sent to a place where there was the least supervision, offenders who required the strictest discipline and control. Their reformation under such circumstances was impossible and contamination was certain. Yet these men were let loose on society for the most part after four or five years' confinement. On looking over the Official Reports it was hard to say which was the worst managed—the department of public works, or that of the officers who had control over the prisoners. It appeared to him that bad management prevailed in every branch of the establishment. With respect to the department of public works, especially that of the dockyards and naval department, it was enough to refer to the Report of the Comptroller. He said:

“The principal divisions of works upon which the prisoners have been employed are three:—1st, the naval works under the superintendence of the Naval Department; 2nd, the Boaz Island Works; and 3rdly, the Ordnance Works, both under the superintendence of the Commanding Royal Engineer. A fixed number of 300 prisoners are supposed to be employed upon the Hospital at Boaz Island, a work second to one other only in importance, and the progress of which is not very sensible.”

Again he said at the end of his Report—

“I will invite serious attention to the present organization of the Works Department. That it is very defective is evidenced by the remarkably slow progress of the buildings, &c., in course of construction, and by the wasteful expenditure of stores and material which meets the eye in every direction.”

The works alluded to were of a very extensive and costly nature, and comprised those connected with the prison, with the dockyard and naval department, and with the engineers. In some instances they had not even been commenced, and in others they had been abandoned in a half finished state. Implements were scattered about in every direction, and valuable stores were sometimes landed in the island, and, being taken charge of by nobody, left exposed to the influence of the weather. No one seemed to be responsible for the management of the works, and hence the neglect and extravagance which prevailed. The next point to which he wished to call the attention of the House referred to the condition of the accommodation for the officers, and on this point the comptroller thus reports:—

“The want of accommodation for the officers is in itself fatal to the attainment of anything like a perfect state of discipline, for officers are thus compelled, in not a few instances, to go six or seven miles, and to cross the Sound to the opposite shore. One necessary consequence of this has been that one-third of the officers have been allowed to absent themselves from duty every night; thus those who remain find the duty rendered extremely arduous, while those who have leave (having a long distance to go) are obliged to leave the works two hours before the day's task is concluded, and for the same reason are unable to return in the morning until two or three hours after the convicts are at work, not to mention the unavoidable fatigue and lassitude consequent in this climate upon so long a walk. For five hours of each day there are not enough officers to take charge of the numerous parties. In short, the evils which result from the want in question are far too numerous to be detailed in my Report, and I would urgently recommend that quarters for the officers should be built at once, for I consider this of far more importance than any of the works in course of construction. The want of a prison wall has hitherto rendered it impossible to prevent communication between the convicts and the country people who are constantly passing and repassing on the public road through the Island, and who also supply fruit, vegetables, poultry, &c., to the private houses. The separation of the prison into places of detention so distant from each other not only makes supervision and reference to the comptroller more difficult, but introduces many delays into the smaller details of daily management."

Then with regard to the state of the prisoners on board of the hulks, what did the chaplain say?—

"The great majority of the convicts are confined on board the hulks, and so long as this is the case it must be prejudicial to any general improvement in the character and conduct of the men. Bermuda is the solitary exception, under the British crown, where these dens of infamy and pollution are permitted to exist. Both on the score of civilization and humanity they have been everywhere else condemned. Few are aware of the extent of suffering to which a prisoner is exposed on board the hulks, or the horrible nature of the associations by which he is surrounded. There is no safety for life, no supervision over the bad, no protection to the good. The hulks are unfit for a tropical climate."

Now he did not so much complain of the officers as of the defective nature of the arrangements and accommodation, under which anything like improvement or instruction was impossible. The state of the prison on shore was a source of great evil. The official Report states that—

"Boaz Island prison does not possess a wall or inclosure of any kind. There is a free communication both with the Ferry-road and with the private houses on the island. By these means the introduction of spirituous liquor prevails to a great extent, and drunkenness is a common offence among the prisoners. Before anything else is undertaken a wall of separation should be put up, without which the place does not deserve the name of a prison, so that when passing through the gates both prisoners and hired workmen might be searched, and all prohibited articles stopped. At present every prisoner on the island manages to have money in his possession, to gamble, to get rum, and to correspond with parties outside—practices which are strictly forbidden by the rules."

He believed that the erection of prison walls was recommended two years ago, but nothing had been done. More than half the convicts were punished during last year, and some were tried for serious offences. With the exception that the convicts were healthy, there was hardly a single evil connected with the worst system of prison management which did not exist at Bermuda. It was idle to say that the evils could not be remedied. If they contrasted the system which prevailed in Bermuda with the system which existed in Ireland they would find that, while one was the worst imaginable, the other was most successful. Since 1854 Ireland had absorbed all her convicts, amounting in number to no less than 5,063. During the four years 1,250 had been liberated conditionally, of whom only seventy-seven had had their licences recalled, and 854 had been liberated unconditionally, of whom four only had been re-consigned to prison. It might be said that he ought to have brought the subject before the attention of the House upon going into Committee of Supply, but in the present state of public business it was impossible to say when they would arrive at the consideration of the miscellaneous estimates, and he felt that something ought immediately to be done. He hoped he should receive some assurance from the Government that inquiry would be made, and that no convicts would be sent to Bermuda as long as the system of hulks existed there.

TAX BILLS—EXCISE DUTY ON PAPER. QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY said, he had anxiously waited in the hope that some other Gentleman would have put the question which he was about to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government. A petition had been presented by himself from Ruabon, most numerous signed, praying the House to take some immediate measures for the protection of their undoubted privilege of originating taxation. He had also a notice on the books in reference to the subject, and he hoped the facts would in some respect justify his rising. He wished to know whether the communication which they have just received about Precedents, is all they are to hear from the Ministerial Bench in reference to the event which occurred last night of the Paper Duty Repeal Bill being rejected in "another place," and if so, when the House will receive some further definite communication, such as the House and the country can understand and act upon in reference to this unprecedented, or, at all events, most important step taken in "another place." That was the question which he ventured to put to the First Minister of the Treasury, or to any other Member of Her Majesty's Government, who would be good enough to take cognizance of it.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: With reference to the question of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) I have nothing to add to what has been already said by my noble Friend, the First Lord of the Treasury; but, with regard to the question which the noble Lord (Lord Naas) has raised, my attention has been directed to the reports which he has cited; and I quite concur with him in thinking that the state of things, which these reports disclose, is one which requires the immediate and urgent attention of Her Majesty's Government. As far as the Home Department, which I represent, is concerned, there would be no difficulty in making arrangements for the disposal of the whole of the annual number of convicts, without sending any additional convicts to Bermuda, partly by means of other stations abroad, and partly by means of the convict prisons in England. The advantage which accrues from the annual supply which is sent to that island, arises from the public works in the nature of fortifications which are there proceeding under the direction of the Naval and Military Departments, and which would impose an additional charge on the public revenue for their continuance, if that supply were withdrawn, and the works continued. I believe that for some time no Irish convicts have been sent to Bermuda. The supply from Ireland has entirely ceased; and the convicts who have gone out have been convicts solely from Great Britain. Nevertheless, there is a certain number of Irish convicts there, and an affray of a sanguinary nature between the English and Irish took place in the course of last year. It was a sort of faction fight; and, much as it is to be deplored, it does not evince any general want of discipline. There is no doubt that the confinement of a large number of convicts in hulks at Bermuda, in consequence of the want of adequate prison accommodation on shore, is an objectionable system, and I am not about to defend it. But this question, like so many others which come under the consideration of this House, ultimately resolves itself into a matter of additional expense; and the proper time for considering this question will be when the convict Vote comes under consideration in Committee of Supply. The House will then have to decide whether they will incur increased expenditure for the improvement of the accommodation at Bermuda, with a view to maintaining an undiminished number of convicts there, or whether they will discontinue the public works on the present footing; in which case the excess of convicts not sent to Bermuda, can be received with facility elsewhere. In the meantime, I would say that I believe my noble Friend at the head of the Colonial Department is of opinion that it is desirable to send out a Commissioner, or some person charged with the function of inquiry into the present state of the convicts at Bermuda. I shall be prepared to concur in that course; and if the inquiry is made, the result will enable the House to come to a decision with fuller information than they at present possess.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON observed that the answer of the right hon. Gentleman was not altogether satisfactory. He said the question resolved itself mainly into one of expense; but it might much more properly be said to resolve itself into one of the departments which ought to have the control of these matters. He would put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be better that all the convicts, whether engaged on public works at Bermuda or in the dockyards at home, should not be placed under the central authority of the Home Office.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he had understood the objection to be directed to the system of hulks altogether, whether they were under the Home or the Colonial Department.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.—RESOLUTION.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I now proceed to make the Second Motion which stands in my name, by which the House is asked to resolve that, after Whitsuntide, Orders of the Day shall have precedence of Notices of Motion on Thursdays, Government orders having precedence of other Orders, and that on Friday Notices of Motion shall have precedence of the Orders of the Day.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved.

"That upon Thursdays, after Whitsuntide, Orders of the Day have precedence of Notices of Motions, Government Orders of the Day having priority, and that Notices of Motion have precedence of Orders of the Day upon Fridays."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Perhaps the House will allow me to add that it is proposed on Thursday that the Wine Licences Bill shall be disposed of. The third reading is not expected to take up much time; and after that my right hon. Friend will propose the Votes on account of the Civil Service Estimates. We shall then take up the Naval Estimates.

YORK ASSIZES—QUESTION.

MR. DEEDES said, in the absence of his hon. Friend (Mr. Cayley) he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department with respect to a Circular lately sent to the Magistrates of the County of York on the subject of a division of the Assizes of that county, Whether he is aware that the Common Law (Judicial Business) Commissioners (1857) reported against the expediency of removing the Assizes from York; whether he is aware that in 1858 a Memorial was forwarded to the then Secretary of State, prepared by a Committee appointed by the General Gaol Sessions of the County, and signed by 309 of the Magistracy (169 being magistrates of the West Riding), expressing a conviction that the removal of any portion of the Assizes from York would be accompanied by great public inconvenience and be at variance with the feelings of the county at large; and, whether he has any objection to lay upon the table any recommendation he may have received in favour of such change, together with the names or numbers of the parties recommending the same?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he had received representations from a very numerous and respectable deputation a short time ago in reference to the advantages which would arise from holding a separate assize for the West Riding; and he had addressed letters to the three Lords-lieutenant of the different Ridings of Yorkshire, requesting them to ascertain the opinions of the magistrates in their respective districts. There would be no objection to produce the answers when they were received. The correspondence which had already taken place would be published.

REGIUM DONUM.—GRANT TO NONCONFORMING MINISTERS IN IRELAND.

RESOLUTION.

MR. BAXTER said, he trusted it was not necessary for him to disclaim any hostile or unkindly feelings towards those persons who were the recipients of the grant to which the Motion he was about to make referred. He should be the last man in the House to say a word against a body of ministers whose religious opinions were largely identical with his own. The House would be aware that this grant was made to Presbyterian and Unitarian ministers in the north of Ireland, and amounted to nearly £40,000 per annum. It differed from all other grants to religious bodies, inasmuch as a fresh claim was created whenever twelve families were gathered together who were able to raise £35 yearly, which at once became chargeable on the Estimates for the ensuing year. Consequently, the grant went on increasing and extending just in proportion to the ability of any clergyman to collect a certain number of people, and to raise a small sum of money. It had often been to him a matter of astonishment that a large, wealthy, and respectable denomination should continue to receive these grants, to which much odium attached, and, in regard to which, even charges of imposition and fraud had been made. He objected to the grant on three grounds. First, he held it to be financially wrong and a waste of public money; and, next, he objected to it on principle, believing that as long as this grant went on, the House could not consistently stop short of carrying out a principle which the English nation had distinctly repudiated—that of subsidizing the ministers of all denominations. He had a third objection to the grant that it had been productive of disastrous consequences to the recipients themselves. It had been a drag on the Synod of Ulster, and was the main cause of the complaints of inadequate remuneration made by the ministers. He might, perhaps, be told that the grant had been given in lieu of tithes to the Presbyterian ministers of Ulster, and that they had, therefore, a right to it as a part of a compact between themselves and the Government of the day. But he had investigated the matter, and the result he had come to was that no facts existed to warrant the conclusion. In fact not a particle of evidence existed to support the allegation. Dr. Reid, the historian of the Church, said not a word about it. The truth was that it was not as Presbyterians but as clergymen of the Established Church, that the ministers enjoyed the tithes. The Marquess of Londonderry, in the memoirs of his brother, Lord Castlereagh, gave the true explanation of the matter.

"The Scottish colony," said he, "was accompanied by its ministers, who, by a comprehension and connivance, dictated by the necessity of the times, were put in possession of the tithes of the parishes of which they were ordained pastors. It does not appear that their title to the tithes was ever strictly legal; but they certainly enjoyed them with the consent of the bishops, and continued to be thus supported until after the death of Charles I., when they were deprived of them by the Commonwealth."

At the restoration of the monarchy the Presbyterian Ministers were deprived of all pay, and from that time to 1672 they were wholly dependent on the free-will offerings of their people. William and Mary, no doubt, renewed the gift, and placed it on the Irish establishment; but then it was only for £1,200 a year, and even should they admit a contract, it was only one for that amount and not for £39,000. But this was not all; in little more than a year after the new patent was granted the Irish Parliament passed a Resolution declaring "that the pension of £1,200 per annum granted to the Presbyterian ministers in Ulster, is an unnecessary branch of the establishment." The Queen, Dr. Reed informed them, continued the grant in spite of this parliamentary vote against it; but that she had no great zeal in the matter was proved by the fact that for some time before her death the Regium Donum was actually discontinued by the Irish Government. And further, even so recently as the year 1729, a deputation was sent to London, for the purpose of inducing the Government of George II. to restore the English, or additional bounty, as well as pay up the arrears for the years during which it had been suspended. Archbishop Boulter, who seems to have been very friendly towards the Presbyterians, gave the deputation a letter of introduction to the prime minister, Sir Robert Walpole, which was alike creditable to his candour and liberality. As the Archbishop would, no doubt, be well instructed by those whose cause he was advocating, as to the real state of the case, there was one sentence in his letter which was of great importance. Speaking of the arrears due to the Presbyterian ministers, he said,

Mr. Baxter

"They are sensible there is nothing due to them, nor do they make any such claim, but as the calamities of this kingdom are at present very great . . . it would be a great instance of his Majesty's goodness, if he would consider their present distress."

Well, then, it might be asked, what was the nature and reason of this payment? He replied that the history of all the transactions in regard to it, the deputations, and memorials, and increases from the reign of Queen Anne to the death of George III., most conclusively prove it to have been neither more nor less than a reward for political services. Or, as the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for the University of Dublin, last year more mildly stated, it was given "on the ground of public policy." Did any one doubt this? Then let him ask why, when Charles II. renewed the grant in 1672, it was placed in the annual Estimates, under the head "secret service money?" Why did Lord Castlereagh, in endeavouring to alter the mode of distribution in 1799, entitle his scheme "A Plan for Strengthening the Connection between the Government and the Presbyterian Synod of Ulster?" Why, even Dr. Killen himself, the eloquent defender of this Vote, used these remarkable words:—

"In proposing this new scheme of endowment for the Irish Presbyterian Church, it would seem that Government was chiefly actuated by those purely secular considerations which ordinarily have weight with prudent and calculating statesmen. Presbyterian ministers were now, to a great extent, dependent for subsistence on the voluntary contributions of their flocks; and, to maintain their popularity, they were sometimes strongly tempted to take the lead in political movements of very questionable expediency. An increase of the Royal grant would place them in more independent circumstances in relation to the people, so that they would be less likely to give any countenance to the spirit of faction or sedition. It was expected that the State, at the same time, would thus increase its own direct influence over the spiritual guides of an important section of the population of Ireland. In their arrangements for the augmentation of the grant, it is plain that the leading statesmen of the day aimed at the political subserviency of the Presbyterian ministers of Ulster, and, when impartially estimated, their motives were as destitute of piety as of patriotism."

He held in his hand a very curious little pamphlet, one extract from which would save his troubling the House with statistical memoranda of his own. He begged the particular attention of the House to it, and he made no apology for doing so; for he felt confident those who did him the favour to listen to the sentences he was about to read would admit that his case, as far as the failure of the present system was concerned, really required not another word of argument on his part. The pamphlet to which he alluded was entitled, "Pastoral Provision; or, the Income of the Irish Presbyterian Clergy Shown to be Insufficient; with the Proper Means to be Adopted for its Augmentation. By the Rev. William Oliver, of Dunluce." The following was the contents of one of the chapters, and it was not a little suggestive:—

"Evils of Insufficient Support: Large Proportion of our clergy unmarried—Dangers. Imperfect attendance on Church courts—Effects. The almost total extinction of original literature in our Church. Secularization of the clergy—Effects. Poverty originates suspicion of dishonesty—Efforts to maintain integrity. Danger of the cessation of the ministry among us. Removal of the gentry to other communions. Pulpit services want in variety of information, from inability to procure books. Temptation to relax in discipline."

The following extract was one of the most remarkable, and it was the only one he would read. Mr. Oliver, himself a Presbyterian minister, said:—

"In looking over the Government Return for the year ending 31st March, 1854, what an extraordinary picture does it exhibit of the depressed state of our ecclesiastical revenue! And this evil originates directly in the cause already assigned. This document, I would remark, is one of those yearly returns required of every minister, with a view to his being entered upon the Parliamentary estimates for endowment. It is a certified record given by him of the number of families that compose his congregation, and of the amount of stipend and other sources of emolument enjoyed or received by him during the previous year. It is, therefore, in the highest sense, authentic, and of the greatest value in ascertaining the exact sums contributed by our Church. In analyzing this document, a very painful exhibition of parsimonious dealing towards the clergy at once flashes upon the eye. The facts disclosed are so discreditable, that it may be thought highly imprudent to publish them. . . . I know that in dissecting this document, I will appear odious in the sight of many. Be it so. Are we to allow the gangrene to fester for ever; and is there no man to rise up, sufficiently fearless and honest, to probe it to the bottom, though it should touch the unfortunate victim to the quick? Presbyterianism is now, if ever, in a position to do its duty. It has remained in this land over two centuries; and, if in its infancy still, I ask, when is it likely to be released from its leading-strings? I will avoid making long comments. Let facts speak for themselves. And if parties get angry, let them disprove my statements, or turn their wrath into the right direction. If they have been guilty of causing this actual state of matters, that is no fault of mine, and why should they be ashamed of their own production? These tables tell us that, in connection with the General Assembly, apart from Unitarians, Covenanters, and other minor sects, there are about 450,000 adherents, paying, as nearly as I can reckon up, £18,748 11s. 7½d. Now, we have a perfect right to consider each individual as the object of ministerial attention. Infants have to be baptized, and attended to when sick; youths catechized and trained in the Sabbath school, and the aged prayed with and exhorted; and, what is the amount contributed by each individual? Exactly 10d. a year, or considerably less than one farthing per week, and this, be it observed, even including the large-hearted, and, in many instances, princely liberality of Belfast, Dublin, Londonderry, and other influential towns. That is, for every week's service, preaching on the Sabbath, and pastoral duties on other days, congregational visitation, catechizing, celebration of marriages, attending funerals, visiting the sick, addressing public meetings, and numerous other minor requirements, we are presented by each person with the munificent sum of one-fifth of a penny weekly. Here is the brand of disgrace engraven upon our foreheads, that has made us a gazing stock to the English Volunteers, the Irish Roman Catholics, the noble spirits of the Free Church of Scotland, and, in short, to every denomination of Christians on this and the other side of the Atlantic. But I grow sick of these calculations; and I merely introduce them to expose the palpable absurdity, that our people give as much as they are able toward the maintenance of their pastors. In looking over the same document, the following facts appear:—The average stipend of each minister is £40 per annum. In the whole assembly, consisting of 467 congregations, there are but 69 self-sustaining. Besides, there are no less than 146 congregations that pay their ministers from £40 to £80 a year; 127 that contribute between £20 and £80, or little over the keep of his horse, notwithstanding the Government screw of the £35 qualification, and 39 that actually give below £20 a year! We have thus arrived at the astounding conclusion, that, in a Church composed of 467 congregations, on the most liberal view of the case, there are 357 that only give a partial support, leaving their pastors to eke out the necessary means by farming, merchandise, or any other wordly employment they please."

The extract was quite sufficient, in his opinion, to show the result which had been brought about by the system of giving a State subsidy. He asked the House to compare that result with the case of Scotland. Seventeen years ago there was a disruption of the Presbyterian Church in that country, and since that time the Free Church had contributed a sum not very far short of five millions sterling for religious purposes. On the other hand, since 1799, the sum contributed in Ireland for the support of the clergy had positively decreased. By the terms of his Motion, he did not ask the House to take any extreme or unusual course. On the contrary, he submitted that he was asking the House to act in accordance with precedent. For generations there had appeared on the Estimates a Regium Donum Vote for dissenting congregations in England. That Vote had produced the same disastrous results as were now produced in Ireland. The noble Lord the Member for the City of London, when Prime Minister, at length removed it from the Estimates, and he believed the congregations affected by it had had occasion to thank the noble Lord ever since. Within the last few years the House had abolished the Regium Donum for the Independents of Scotland, and that body had benefited by the transaction. He was not, however, asking the House to do for Ireland what had been done for England and for Scotland. What he asked was that the Presbyterian clergy in the north of Ireland should be placed on the same footing as the clergy in British North America—namely, that the grant should be gradually abolished, and should cease with the lives of the present recipients. This was a very moderate and justifiable proposal; it had the recommendation of interfering with no vested interests, but would simply provide against any increase of the grant, and for its final extinction. An hon. Friend of his had objected to the Resolution as it then stood, adding that pensioners never died; but that only showed the moderation of his proposal. He submitted it with confidence to the consideration of the House. If they adopted it they would take a course which would strengthen Presbyterianism in the north of Ireland, and have, he believed, the immediate effect of raising the salaries of the clergymen connected with that body, besides putting an end to a system which, he believed, no statesman in the House imagined would be permanent.

“That this House is of opinion that the Grant now annuallly made to Non-conforming Ministers in Ireland (commonly called the Regium Donum), should cease and be extinguished as speedily as is consistent with the just expectations of the recipients thereof: and, with this view, that no further Grant be made on account of ‘New Congregations,’ nor to any existing Congregations after the present Ministers thereof shall have ceased, by death or otherwise, to be the Ministers of such Congregations.”

MR. FRANK CROSSLEY said, he had great pleasure in seconding the Motion. He believed it was the very best mode of settling the long-vexed question of the Regium Donum. It did not interfere with any vested interests; it simply provided that after the deaths of the present recipients no further grants should be made. His hon. Friend had clearly shown that it was not to the advantage of the Ministers themselves that the grant should be given, and that by doing so, the House said, in fact, to the congregations, that it was not their duty to provide for their pastors, although every one admitted that it was their duty to provide for their own household. He believed that by removing the grant the House would throw the duty where it ought to be. He would ask what right had the House, as representing the United Kingdom, to tax the whole people in order to provide salaries for a small portion of the inhabitants of Ireland? They could not set up the plea that they belonged to the Established Church of Ireland, or to that body which included the largest number of the inhabitants. Looking at Dod's Parliamentary Companion, he found that, although many hon. Members were against interfering with regard to what had been already done for the State support of religion, there was almost an unanimous opinion against new grants of money to any denomination whatever. Under these circumstances, he trusted that a large majority would assent to the Motion, and that the House would stand by the broad ground of not voting any further sums out of the public purse for the support of any religious denomination whatever.

MR. CONOLLY said, he rose to move an Amendment that all the words after the words “regium donum” should be omitted, and that the following words should be added to the Resolution:—

“Should no longer be exposed to the annual criticism of this House, but having been duly sanctioned by this House for a lengthened period of time, it ought now to be placed upon the Consolidated Fund.”

[Derisive cheers.]—He hailed with some pleasure those derisive cheers, showing as they did the scant knowledge of this subject of those from whom they emanated, and, as applicable to it, the small amount of their Parliamentary law. In proposing that Amendment he relied on the revered precedent of the late Sir Robert Peel, who, years ago, in answer to the late Sir Robert Inglis, said he intended to proceed by Bill in placing the establishment of Maynooth on a permanent footing; and he added—adverting to the Irish Regium Donum—that he thought it inadvisable that any of the Protestant institutions of the country should be subject to the annual criticism of that House. He therefore treated with contempt the derisive cheers that had proceeded from the Parliamentary ignorance of the hon. Gentlemen opposite. He begged to remind the House that the Resolution of the hon. Member for Montrose came with very small authority before the assembly to which it was addressed; for, first of all, the hon. Member himself represented a Scottish borough; and next, the Seconder of the Resolution represented an English constituency, although no doubt it was one of the most distinguished in the kingdom. Those hon. Gentlemen came forward, however, to interfere with the affairs of the Presbyterians of Ireland, a matter which they knew very little about. He (Mr. Conolly) claimed to have a better opinion as to what was good and fitting for the people of that religion in Ireland, and he must say that the hon. Members who had spoken took a singular way of augmenting the revenues of the Presbyterian ministers when they expected to do so by the withdrawal of this grant. The hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) had quoted a dictum of the late Lord Castlereagh against the grant; but he would remind him that the father of that noble Lord was a Presbyterian, and a zealous supporter of the Regium Donum, and his motives for being so were those of high policy as well as for the benefit of the Presbyterians themselves. No man could entertain greater respect for the Presbyterian body in Ireland, for their noble and consistent Protestant feeling, than he (Mr. Conolly) did, although he himself did not belong to it, and he felt confident that if hon. Members would look into the actual position of affairs they would not accede to this Resolution. He denied the authority of the hon. Mover and Seconder on this question, and he would confidently appeal to the judgment of the House to vindicate the claims of that most respectable and respected body. [Cries of "Divide, divide!"] He understood that cheer, and therefore he would not prolong the argument, but merely add that the Presbyterians claimed this grant as a right. From the time of William III. till now they had never failed to maintain the honour and dignity of the Crown and the interests of religion, and the justice and policy of the grant had, in consequence, been recognized by successive statesmen of the highest order in that House.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the words 'Regium Donum' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, 'should no longer be exposed to the annual criticism of this House, but, having been annually sanctioned by the opinion of this House for a lengthened period, it ought in future to be placed upon the Consolidated Fund."

—instead thereof.

MR. DAWSON said, that the hon. Member for Montrose had readily kept the promise that he made last year, that not only should there be a yearly discussion upon the merits of this endowment, but that besides the opportunity for debate to be expected in the Civil Estimates, that House should be treated, usque ad nauseam, with another anticipatory contention upon the same subject. He had no hesitation in meeting the Resolution of the hon. Gentleman with a direct negative, and he trusted that the House would establish, by a large majority, the full principle of justice which had maintained that grant for so many years. Its origin was almost coeval with the settlement of Ulster, and some years before 1655, Presbyterian ministers had participated in the tithes of Ireland, as in that year the tithes were transferred to the public treasury, and they, in common with the clergy of other Protestant Churches, received their share, and were recognized by the State. Though discontinued during the last years of the reigns of Charles II. and James II., almost the first Act of King William III., in 1690, was to order a payment of £1,200 annually for the maintenance of the Presbyterian clergy in the North of Ireland, and the very terms of this grant implied that it was not as a consideration for political services, but as a compensation for losses they had suffered in the withdrawal of their proportion of the tithes, that this charge was placed for payment upon the funds of the Irish Exchequer. Thus a deliberate compact was made with the Presbyterian Church for the partial support of its ministers, and though subsequently increased at different periods, the State has thus continually admitted its obligations, and the successive additions to this endowment have been made in reference to the growth of Presbyterianism and the requirements of religion. It is generally conceded that, as a matter of bargain, the State has been a great gainer by this grant to sustain the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, for whenever the annual attack is made upon it by those Gentlemen who represent the voluntary system in that House, the Irish Chief Secretary of the day, and those Gentlemen who have formerly held that high position, are found to advocate its retention by recognizing the superior morality, the orderly demeanour, and the loyal and patriotic sentiments which distinguished the Presbyterian population of Ireland. They tell us, and they tell us truly, that where the congregations of that Church are most thickly placed, the public expense of police is lessened; that the gaols and workhouses are comparatively empty; that not only is there a great diminution of crime, but that there is also a very considerable economy of cost in the administration of criminal justice. He had lately a personal proof of this honourable distinction in watching the proceedings of the Spring Assizes of the county which he had the honour of representing in Parliament, for though the calendar of the County of Londonderry was more than usually over-burdened, and the Presbyterian population of that county exceeded 100,000 souls, one Presbyterian alone was prosecuted to conviction, and that for an offence of a most trifling character. Credit must, therefore, in common fairness, be given to those Ministers of the Gospel who were answerable for the moral culture and superior religious training of their people; nor could he consider it would be advantageous that, by the suspension of State assistance, the Presbyterian clergy should become wholly dependent upon the precarious provision afforded by their congregations. They ought to be secured in an independent position, and the present arrangement for their sustentation, partly by a State endowment, and partly by congregational subscription, appeared equitable, and had been found to work beneficially for the public advantage. It should be remembered also that the present modest grant of £69 4s. 8d. to each minister is only given by the State after a minimum sum of £35 has been annually secured by the congregation; that the chapel must have been built, and that the minister must have received a salary for two years at least before the application in his individual case for the Regium Donum can be complied with. Objections have been made to this grant on account of its expansive character, and to the indefinite number of new congregations that it is alleged might be created under its operation, but he would remind that House that the Church Courts of the Presbyterian body were responsible for each new congregation, and that the honour and dignity of religion itself was concerned in the scrupulous administration and observance of this great trust. No abuse had ever yet been proved, and it would be more go-nerous and only just that no imputation should be made that could not be sustained. So entirely did he differ from the views enunciated by the hon. Member for Montrose that he considered that the foundation of this grant should be strengthened and the separate amount of royal bounty to each minister should be augmented and amended. He could not derive satisfaction from the present insecure establishment of a State provision which depended upon an annual Vote, and might be withdrawn by accident or the caprice of circumstances. Constant majorities in that House had affirmed its retention, and he would appeal to the Government whether the time had not come when, like other religious endowments, it ought to be placed beyond the danger of these periodical assaults by a transfer from the annual Estimates to the more confirmed position of a charge upon the Consolidated Fund. Such a proposition, proceeding from the Government (as he yet hoped to see) would, he felt certain, be acceptable in Ireland; for, in looking over the lists of the division in last year's Civil Estimates, he found that out of 105 representatives of Ireland, two only had recorded their votes against this endowment. The Roman Catholics of Ireland do not regard this grant with disfavour. All parties there are favourably inclined to its continuance, and he believed that its further consolidation would be received as a graceful act of conciliation. He thought that in consequence of the great change in the value of money, and the increased cost of all the necessities of life, the sum of £100 should be substituted for the present allowance of £69 4s. 8d. to each minister as a suitable provision, and he felt certain that circumstances would justify this extension of the national generosity. Were the Maynooth Grant and the Regium Donum placed upon the same secure foundation, it would be more difficult to endanger either; for he fairly owned that so long as he held a seat in that House, he should be prepared to support and defend those endowments, as well as all the other religious establishments of the nation. He therefore most heartily deprecated those religious discussions, whether proceeding from the hon. Member for North Warwickshire or the hon. Member for Montrose, for he believed that much injury to social good will and contentment was engendered, and that sectarian rancour and animosities were thereby fostered, and most especially in Ireland. He would, moreover, preserve these grants as tokens of justice to Ireland, for, subjected as Ireland now was to equal imperial taxation, and disproportioned as her public debt was to that of England at the time of the union of the two countries, she could fairly claim that her existing institutions should be maintained intact, and that the religious requirements of her population should be supplied.

MR. CARDWELL:—It seems to me that the House is desirous of coming to an early division on this subject. In the first place, I appeal to the hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. Conolly) not to persist in his Amendment, for which he could scarcely find a seconder, and which is not calculated, I think, to advance the cause he has at heart. I hope my hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) will not think me disrespectful if, in compliance with the wish of the House, I observe great brevity in answering the argument he has brought forward. I think that argument was of the fairest and most candid description, and raised the whole question in the plainest terms. But I must add that none but those who are prepared to carry out the voluntary principle to the utmost can give their support to the Motion of my hon. Friend. He states that the objection to the grant was based upon three grounds—the first being finance. That speaks for itself, and if the public consider that the benefit derived from the grant is not worth the moderate sum of £40,000, then I must admit that part of the argument. But it appears to me that weightier considerations ought to prevail. My hon. Friend urges, in the second place, that this is a matter of universal endowment. The shortest reference to the history of this grant shows that if there is a case in which a grant ought not to be withdrawn the present deserves the serious consideration of the House. It is admitted by my hon. Friend that when these parties originally went to Ireland, in the reigns of James I. and Charles I., they were in the actual enjoyment of the tithes of the benefices they served. But during the Commonwealth, when they refused to change the oath of allegiance, they were sentenced to what was then considered to be a severe punishment—they were going to be transported to Tipperary, and vessels were in readiness at Carrickfergus to take them off. According to the historian of the age, in the time of Henry Cromwell's lieutenancy—Henry Cromwell being himself of a mild temper—they had an easier time of it. But he remonstrated with them for not changing their religion, on the ground that they were receiving £100 a year from the Government. They said, "We have to give you no thanks for that, for it is a very poor compensation for the tithes you have deprived us of." Changes took place in the position of the Presbyterians in both countries. Suffice it to say that Charles II. originally gave them this Regium Donum, which on the first landing of William III., and before the Battle of the Boyne, was confirmed to them by that Sovereign. It was increased by George I., for loyal services performed, and so went on until 1803, when it came under the special consideration of this House, and when the arrangement now in substance acted upon was made. That was reviewed in 1831, and under strict rules it was administered, as I believe, with great advantage to the country. I think that a sufficient answer to the second part of my hon. Friend's argument—that this is a branch of a universal endowment. In not disturbing what has existed in substance from the time of the Commonwealth to the times of the Restoration and the Revolution, you can hardly be said to be consenting to a universal endowment. You cannot upset things that have been established by a precedent of that kind without involving serious consequences, which the House would do well to consider before it takes this step. The third argument of my hon. Friend was that the grant, in his opinion, was very injurious to the recipients. I have had the honour of communicating on that subject with the Moderator of the Synod of Ulster, who appears to me to be a better judge than my hon. Friend of what will be the result of the withdrawal of the grant to those whom it concerns. The Moderator entertains a very different opinion as to the consequences of such a course to that of my hon. Friend. My hon. Friend spoke forcibly of the extreme poverty of many of the ministers; but, surely, the worst remedy for poverty would be to take from them the only part of their annual income which is drawn from a permanent and reliable source, and leave them utterly dependent on that small part which is fluctuating and uncertain. My hon. Friend also pointed in the course of his argument to the Free Church of Scotland. Now, I do not believe that that institution, for which I have the highest respect, holds the voluntary principle. I had the honour of being well acquainted with Dr. Chalmers, who delivered eloquent lectures in this Metropolis in favour of endowments, and I believe he held that principle to the end of his days. Although that excellent body of men, the clergy of the Free Church, have been compelled to sacrifice endowments in their own case for the maintenance of a principle, they still hold the principle that they are legitimate for religious purposes. Then, as to the Maynooth Grant, at an earlier period of the Session the House showed its determination to maintain that grant by refusing to enter into a debate upon it, and we may reasonably hope that in the present case as well, the House is prepared, stare decisis, to adhere to the established practice, and not to open the question of general ecclesiastical establishments.

Mr. CONOLLY said, he had no objection to withdraw so much of his Amendment as referred to the allocation of the grant hereafter, but at the same time he should pledge himself in the most distinct manner to bring the matter to a decision by introducing a Bill for the purpose.

CORONERS' BILL (No. 3).

LEAVE.

Mr. COBBETT said, that the Select Committee which had been appointed to inquire into the office of Coroner, after examining several witnesses, came to the determination that it was very desirable to introduce a Bill forthwith, embodying their recommendations. Their recommendations were—1st, to make a declaration of the cases in which inquests should be held; 2nd, to empower the Attorney General to apply to a Judge at Chambers for a rule calling upon the Coroner to show cause why he did not hold an inquest in any case; 3rd, to give the Home Secretary power to make rules for the guidance of the county police in giving the Coroner information; 4th, to allow the Justices to fix the salary of the Coroner; 5th, to assimilate the election of Coroner to the election of a Member of Parliament; and, 6th, to provide that Coroners' jurors should be indifferently summoned from the jury lists of their respective counties. The Bill he proposed to introduce generally embodied

TREATY OF TURIN—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he wished to put a Question to the noble Lord the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. Their Lordships were aware that by the Treaty of Turin, Nice was to be ceded by Sardinia to France. In the French version of the Treaty as published in the Moniteur, it appeared that the word “arrondissement” was used, a term as to which there was some ambiguity. He wished to ask whether the noble Lord opposite could furnish the House with any satisfactory information on this subject. Their Lordships were also aware that a mixed commission of Sardinian and French officers had been appointed in order to settle the boundary between the two countries. Now those of their Lordships who knew the country were well aware that the road to Turin, after leaving Nice, instead of bending round the spur of the maritime Alps, mounted to their summit. The question of boundary was therefore of the utmost importance, both as regarded this road and also the limits of the neighbouring State of Monaco. He wished to know whether the noble Lord could give the House some information on this point also?

LORD WODEHOUSE replied, that he was not able to give much information. The Treaty of Zurich had not yet been ratified by the Sardinian Parliament, and, in fact, the treaty itself was silent as to the precise limits between Nice and Sardinia. He believed a Commission was about to be appointed to consider that question, but he was not in possession of sufficient information to warrant him in saying anything further upon so important a point.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that as to the existing boundaries on these frontiers, they were as well ascertained as those of any borough in England. If the word “arrondissement,” were intended as a translation of “circondario,” and the latter was the word actually used in the Treaty, there could be no doubt whatever as to what was its exact rendering.

UNION OF BENEFICES BILL.

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order.)

Clause 1. (Contiguous Benefices in a City, Town, or Borough, may be united.)

THE EARL OF DERBY said, the primary object of the measure was to meet the peculiar case of the City of London. The population having migrated to the suburbs, the City churches were now almost unoccupied, and it was consequently desirable that the churches should be sacrificed, and that accommodation should instead be provided for the inhabitants of outlying districts. He doubted, however, whether the principle should be extended any further, and whether legislation ought not to be confined to the exceptional case of the Metropolis.

THE BISHOP OF LINCOLN said, that in many of the old corporate and cathedral towns there were a number of small churches, ill-endowed, ill-built, and inadequate for the wants of the population, and which were a positive hindrance to church accommodation, because as long as they stood they would prevent more commodious churches from being erected. Such a Bill as the present would probably make it easier to remedy this evil, and by uniting certain benefices and allowing the demolition of some of these old churches would provide more adequately both for the support of the clergy and the spiritual wants of the district. He could see no reason why such a measure should be exceptional in its operation. If the principle were good for London, it was no less good for other places similarly circumstanced. He hoped therefore their Lordships would consent to make this measure a general one.

THE EARL OF POWIS said, that if it were thought desirable to extend a measure of this sort generally, there was no need of the elaborate machinery of this Bill. The object could be effected by means of the provisions of the Pluralities Act.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH thought that the application of the Pluralities Act would not be sufficient, because this Bill proposed in certain cases to authorize the pulling down of churches, which the Pluralities Act did not.

LORD PORTMAN pointed out that if the measure were confined to the Metropolis it would become if not a private, at least a hybrid Bill, and would require certain stages to be gone through before it could proceed further.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he must call their Lordships' attention to the fact that this Bill was in principle a continuance Act of an Act which expired this year; and that, therefore, this or some other Bill was necessary. The Bill did not apply to the whole country; it was confined to any "City, Town, or Borough," and did not extend to rural parishes.

THE EARL OF DERBY suggested the insertion, after the words "any City, Town, or Borough," of the words "inserted in the schedule to this Act annexed." The principle would thus be laid down that this legislation was exceptional and only applicable to the places mentioned in the schedule, the places whose names should be inserted in the schedule might be made subject of future consideration.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR recommended the right rev. Prelate to accept this proposal. He entirely agreed with the noble Earl, as he was always glad to do whenever he was able. The suggestion would meet the wishes of both sides of the House—it would extend the operation of the Bill to all those places to which it ought to be extended, and it would prevent its application to places to which it ought not to be applied.

EARL GREY observed that a grievance existed the extent of which was uncertain, and a remedy was proposed which was accompanied by careful restrictions. If those restrictions were insufficient, let them be increased; but let not their Lordships run the risk of omitting by inadvertence places from the schedule which ought to be included in it.

The Bishop of Lincoln

THE BISHOP OF LONDON assented to the suggestion.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 14 agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 15 (Site of Church pulled down not to be sold or let without certain Consents).

THE EARL OF POWIS moved to insert the words ("shall be taken or construed to legalize the Sale or Letting of the Site of any Church to be pulled down, if there shall have been any Interments or Deposits in any Grave or Vault under the Site of such Church"). The object of this Amendment was similar to that of the clause which was inserted by the House of Commons in the Act which was now expiring.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he should certainly be the last man to consent to any desecration either of churches or churchyards; but the object of the clause was simply to do that which had been already authorized by numerous other Acts both public and private. Some of these Acts had authorized the sale not of the sites of the churches only but of the churchyards. By the 19th Charles II., which was an Act for the re-building of the City of London after the Fire, and the 22nd Charles II., the same power was reserved; and by the 1st Will. IV. the Corporation of the City of London were empowered to dispose of the burial ground of St. Olave's, Southwark, and to remove the bodies. That was under the London Bridge Approaches Act. There were several other instances in which the Corporation of the City of London had been empowered to take down churches and to dispose of the site and of the burial grounds. It was by no means the intention of the framers of this Bill to put up these churches for sale by auction, or to look merely to raising money by the sale of them. The Bill, as it stood, would simply rest in very responsible persons the discretion of determining when the power given by Parliament should be exercised. Public opinion had much changed in this matter, it being seen that there was no real danger of the desecration of churches or churchyards under such guarded provisions as those under discussion. He was, therefore, disposed to adhere to the clause in its present shape. If the House of Commons should think fit to introduce an Amendment like that now proposed by the noble Lord, it would be competent for them to do so when the Bill went before them.

jected altogether to ecclesiastical precedents drawn from the days of Charles II., and with respect to the other precedents referred to by the right rev. Prelate there was probably none that did not involve advantages to the Corporation of the City of London. Now a distinguished statesman had once recommended to him never to have anything to do with the City Corporation, for that they were the greatest jobbers he ever knew in the whole course of his political life. Bearing in mind everything that fell from that excellent person, he objected to act on precedents derived from the Corporation of the City of London. The right rev. Prelate said that public opinion had changed in respect to interments of the dead — but respect for the dead was an instinct of human nature that could never be forgotten, and he thought it was far better for them to do what they knew and felt to be right than leave it to the House of Commons to tell them they had done wrong.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY supported the Amendment, alluding to an observation once made by Captain Cook, the great navigator, who had remarked that he found no more certain test of the comparative civilization and degree of mental culture attained by the wild tribes he had visited, than the degree of respect which they paid to the place where the remains of their dead were deposited.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, that the principle of the clause had been frequently acted upon from the time of Charles II. to the present reign for purposes of local improvement; and surely it was not to be objected to when the object was to provide means of religious instruction to thousands who would otherwise be left spiritually destitute. Care would, no doubt, in every case be taken that no violence was done to decency and that reverence for the dead which they all wished to cultivate. If the Amendment were adopted the mere fact of a single leaden coffin lurking in some corner of an old wall would prevent the sale of an ecclesiastical site, which it was most desirable to dispose of for the religious training of thousands of the living. He trusted their Lordships would not deprive the Bill of this beneficial clause.

↳ LORD CRANWORTH observed, that the effect of the Amendment moved by the noble Earl opposite would be that no title to any church could be made out without an objection being taken by the conveyancer, that it was necessary to establish that there never had been a corpse buried under any part of the church.

EARL STANHOPE thought the words proposed to be introduced would go much further than his noble Friend (the Earl of Powis) intended, and would extend to cases where, from the lapse of time there were no vestiges of mortal remains, but where, it appeared from ancient records interments had once taken place.

THE EARL OF POWIS said, that the plea for disposing of the sites of these churches in order to obtain the means of providing religious instruction elsewhere, would justify the sale of all churches and churchyards. There were two classes of churches in the City, some built merely for congregational purposes, and others for burials besides. The distinction to be recognized was, that where the churches were erected merely as places of worship, the consecration was confined to the fabric, but where interments took place the ground was consecrated as well as the fabric. His Amendment, in fact, only asked them to continue a principle in legislation they had adopted five years ago.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that, on the contrary, by passing the Bill, including this clause, in the form in which it was proposed by the right rev. Prelate, they would only be acting in conformity with what had been done by Parliament on former occasions, and conferring a great benefit on future generations.

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER hoped their Lordships would not adopt the Amendment, which would, in fact, make the Bill wholly inoperative. It was not likely that the Bishop of the diocese and the Archbishop of the province, with the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whose sanction was required before the remains of the dead could be removed or the graves and vaults disturbed, would sanction any "desecration." Surely this provision was a sufficient guarantee against improper proceedings.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON cited a Report made by the Inspectors of Graveyards upon this subject, in answer to a communication which had been addressed to them by the Home Secretary. They noticed the great differences which existed between some of the churches in London and others; but the general tenor of their Report was far more against the removal of the remains therein deposited than in favour of it. Their Lordships should be very careful about assenting to a scheme on which these gentlemen expressed so qualified an opinion.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON believed the noble Earl was referring only to the first part of the Inspector's Report, and not the second. At the end of their Report they recommended that nothing should be done without the sanction of the Secretary of State, and that provision was embodied in the Bill. It had been stated that some churches were built only for congregational purposes, and others for burials as well; but he believed that scarcely a single church could be found in the City of London under which interments had not taken place; so that if the noble Earl's Amendment were adopted not a single church could, under any circumstances, be disposed of.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH suggested that some provision should be made, by which the parishioners themselves might be consulted, and their opinion taken as to what should be done with the church.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON pointed out that, by the 7th and 8th clauses of his Bill, the vestry would have the power of objecting, and then the matter would have to go first before the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and then to the Privy Council.

Amendment negatived: Clause agreed to.

Clause 16 agreed to.

Clause 17 (Bishop may allow additional Church left standing to be used for certain services).

EARL NELSON observed that this clause gave power to the Bishop of London to give the use of these churches to any congregation of Foreign Protestants. He would not object to this for the performance of the Church Service in the Welsh or any foreign language; but it would be placing a Bishop of the Church of England in rather an invidious position to call on him to decide to what other foreign denomination he would grant the use of the Church.

LORD TAUNTON said, he hoped the proposal embodied in the clause would obtain the consent of the House: for it was quite in accordance with the spirit of the Church of England to hold out the hand of fellowship to the Protestants of Foreign nations. He remembered seeing in Canterbury Cathedral some French inscriptions, and the explanation of their being there was, the Archbishop of a former time had allowed a congregation of French Protestant refugees to assemble for worship in the Metropolitan Church of England, and to put up there some texts of Scripture in their own language, that they might not feel too much like strangers in the land to which persecution for their faith had driven them. He believed the present Bishop of London had acted in the same spirit, in admitting this recognition of that brotherhood which the Church of England claimed with Protestants throughout Europe; and he (Lord Taunton) feeling warmly on this subject, as from his connections he might be expected to do, did not love the Church of England the less, because he regarded her as a bulwark of Protestantism in the world. As a suggested consequence of assenting to this proposal, that members of the Mormon or similar persuasions would be admitted to hold their services in those churches, he (Lord Taunton) could not believe that the time was likely to come when the discretion of using his authority in such a case might not safely be left in the hands of the Prelate occupying for the time being the Bishopric of London.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that such an expression of feeling came very gracefully from the noble Lord, considering his family traditions; and he agreed with the noble Lord, so far as the question related to the maintenance of the great principles of Protestantism; but the wording of the clause was very loose and vague.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY hoped the right rev. Prelate would not abate one jot of this clause, which, in his opinion, was greatly in favour of true religious freedom. If the right rev. Prelate withdrew the clause he would cause disappointment to thousands and tens of thousands of Protestants in the kingdom. From the earliest days of the Reformation it had ever been the desire of the heads of the Anglican Church to cultivate friendly relations with the Protestants of the Continent, as was shown by the fact that in the days of Archbishop Cranmer, Martin Bucer and Peter Martyr were appointed Professors at Oxford. In the days of Elizabeth, Archbishop Usher wrote and spoke in the same spirit; and in our own days the late Archbishop Howley was in favour of a continuance of the same friendly intercourse. [The noble Lord read a passage from the late Prelate's writings to that effect].

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that if the late Archbishop Howley would have supported, as it appeared from the quotation he would have supported the clause, it was impossible for him to oppose it; for in his mind the late Archbishop Howley approached as near to the perfection of the Christian character as any man could be expected to arrive.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 18 to 27 agreed to.

Clause 28 (Property to be sold to vest in Ecclesiastical Commissioners).

EARL NELSON strongly urged that instead of pulling down the churches they should pull down the pews, and leave the whole of the sittings free and unappropriated.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, there was an old principle observed in parish churches for certain seats to be appropriated to persons resident in the parish; and he thought that it would give dissatisfaction to the parishioners if they were not to have seats set apart for them.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH asked whether under this Section there would be any possibility of pulling down St. George's-in-the-East?

THE LORD LIEUTENANCY OF THE COUNTY OF LONDONDERRY.

THE EARL OF BELMORE rose to draw the attention of the House to the appointment of Mr. Lyle, the Receiver Master in Chancery in Ireland, to the Office of Lieutenant of the County and City of Londonderry; and to ask Her Majesty's Government for some Explanations with regard to that Appointment. The noble Earl said that the office of Lord Lieutenant of a county in Ireland was created by an Act which was passed in 1831. In the discussions which took place on the passage of the Bill through Parliament, it was admitted that the persons chosen for the office should be persons of the highest rank and character resident in the counties to which they were respectively appointed. In the House of Lords, on the question of going into Committee on the Bill, Earl Grey (who followed the Duke of Wellington) said—

“With respect to the qualifications of those persons, no doubt they should be of high character and rank, and above all, as suggested by the noble Duke, residents in the county.”

In the House of Commons, Mr. O'Connell opposed the Bill, and said—

“He no more doubted than he doubted of his existence, that the measure would create discontent and heart-burnings throughout Ireland.”

Mr. Stanley (then Chief Secretary for Ireland) replied to the objections of Mr. O'Connell, and, in the course of his speech, said, “Generally there would be no difficulty in finding a person whose high standing and weight in the county, would point him out as a fit person to be entrusted with the responsibility of this office.”

And Lord Althorp said—

“One great advantage of the introduction of such a system as this into Ireland was, that they would have persons of rank, station, and respectability in the several counties there, whom they could make responsible for the recommendation of magistrates in their respective counties, and who would take care that none but proper persons would be selected to fill that office.”

The duties of a Lord Lieutenant of a county were to recommend persons for the Commission of the Peace to the Lord Chancellor, to appoint the colonels (and now all the officers) to the Militia of the county, and as Custos Rotulorum to appoint to the lucrative office of Clerk of the Peace. About two months ago a vacancy occurred in the Lord Lieutenancy of the County of Londonderry by the death of Sir Robert Ferguson. The appointment was given to Mr. Lyle, a Master in Chancery, a gentleman, he admitted, of the very highest character, but who certainly did not fulfil the conditions which he had stated: whereas there were resident within the county two Peers, and several gentlemen of wealth and the highest social position. He had no objection of a personal kind to make to Mr. Lyle, of whose private character and of whose efficiency as an officer of the Irish Court of Chancery he had heard many people speak in terms of the highest commendation. But there were many grounds for questioning the propriety of his nomination to the position of Lord Lieutenant. How was it possible that a gentleman who was bound to attend every day in the Irish Court of Chancery, could properly perform the duties of Lord Lieutenant of a county which was one of the most remote in all Ireland from the Irish capital? Again, a Lord Lieutenant recommended gentlemen to the Lord Chancellor for appointments to the Commission of the Peace; and in that capacity he was supposed to offer a check against the introduction by the Chancellor of unfit persons into the magistracy; but a Master in Chancery could hardly be expected to control in any way the action of a great public functionary in whose Court he filled a subaltern office. Was it, he asked, constitutional that the Crown should appoint one of its own officers to be the head of the unpaid magistracy of the county. Another fair objection to the appointment was the smallness of Mr. Lyle's property. All that he (the Earl of Belmore) could learn upon that point was that Mr. Lyle was the owner of a very nice model farm in the county of Londonderry, and that he had property there of the value of about £1,000 a year. He was informed that when that gentleman announced himself to the grand jury of Londonderry as their Lord Lieutenant, that statement was received by everybody present, with the exception of one person, in solemn silence. Of course, he admitted that where there were several persons equally well qualified to fill the office, the noble Earl (the Earl of Carlisle) had a perfect right to appoint one who agreed with him in political matters, rather than an opponent; but he hoped that if he (the noble Earl) had determined, when he could not find a person in any particular county, who entirely agreed with him, to seek for a Lieutenant from amongst the class of small proprietors, he would re-consider the matter, as he (the Earl of Belmore) knew that very often a Lieutenant so chosen would be overwhelmed with solicitations to make the most improper appointments, both to the magistracy, and to the Militia. There was another point to which he wished to refer. The other House of Parliament had a Standing Order which declared that any Lord Lieutenant of a county using the influence of his office to secure the return of a particular Member to that House would be guilty of a breach of their privileges. Now, it was stated that Mr. Lyle, within a day or two after his appointment, had taken an active part in a recent election for the city of Londonderry, and although it might be urged that he had only done so in his private capacity, it appeared to him (the Earl of Belmore) that he would have done better to abstain from any interference in such a political contest. These were circumstances which, in his opinion, called for explanation, and he hoped that explanation would be given on the part of the Government.

THE EARL OF CARLISLE: My Lords, I have to express my acknowledgments to the noble Earl on two accounts—first, for having treated this matter with good taste and temper, and secondly, for having brought it forward when I had an opportunity of being here present, and offering such an explanation as I may deem proper. It has been stated, though not by the noble Earl, that in the appointment of Mr. Lyle to the office of Lord Lieutenant of Londonderry, I acted very much under the inspiration of others. I mention this because, though I hope I am not indisposed on all due occasions to act in full concert with my colleagues, whether in England or in Ireland, I should be sorry to lose any of the direct responsibility of this appointment, inasmuch as I think it, for the reasons I am about to state, a remarkably good one. I shall begin by admitting that Mr. Lyle does not possess those attributes of large fortune, or of very high birth and lineage, which may, perhaps, be properly looked for, and which I will not dispute with the noble Earl are generally looked for, in these appointments. However, as many of your Lordships are aware, the county of Londonderry is very peculiarly circumstanced in this respect. A very large proportion of the county is in the hands of the great London Companies, comprised under the general designation of the "Irish Society." The area of the whole county consists of 518,000 acres. The properties held in fee by individual proprietors amount to 87,000 acres only, and the remainder—that is, about four-fifths of the county—is in the possession of the great London Companies. So that, really, if you were to look only to territorial possessions and influence, the Governors of the Irish Society or the Lord Mayor of London would be the most appropriate persons to appoint as Lord Lieutenants of the county. But the noble Earl has referred to certain individual proprietors connected by property with the county. He has stated that there are two Peers either of whom I might have selected for the office. One is the Marquess of Waterford. Now, I presume the noble Earl would hardly recommend me to place the office of Lord Lieutenant, who has the supervision of the magistracy and the Militia, in the hands of a Peer who is himself in Holy orders. I hold, moreover, the primary qualification for the office of Lord Lieutenant to be that of residing in the county; and it is well known that the noble Marquess referred to not only never resides in Londonderry, but resides in the county of Ireland the most remote from Londonderry. The other Peer is Lord Garvagh, who does not at present possess any property in the county; the estates belong to his mother. But I admit at once that if I had thought it fitting to have recourse to persons differing in political opinion from the Government with which it is my pride and pleasure to be connected, I might have found one or two persons, but scarcely more, whose stake in the county exceeds that of Mr. Lyle. I might have selected Lord Garvagh or Sir Harvey Bruce; but I think it due to those who concur in political opinion with Her Majesty's Government, whenever I have to assign stations of honour and distinction, unless there is some strong reason to the contrary, to give the preference to those who entertain the opinions and support the principles to which I myself owe the position I hold, and the power I possess of dealing with such matters at all. Such, I am sure, has been the general practice in this country, and it was the intention, as the noble Earl rightly stated, of those who brought forward the measure creating the office of Lord Lieutenant of a county in Ireland, to introduce the English system, and to follow the English precedent. In this country, under all Governments, the course has been followed of giving the preference in these cases to persons coinciding in political opinion with the Government of the day. I may cite two very remarkable instances which occurred in my own time, one under a Conservative, the other under a Liberal Government. There was a vacancy in the office of Lord Lieutenant for the county of Bedford. I need not tell your Lordships of the great extent of property possessed by the Duke of Bedford in that county. But the Government of Lord Liverpool, upon that vacancy occurring, did not give the Lord Lieutenancy to the Duke of Bedford, but gave it to Earl de Grey, who at that time did not possess one single acre within the county. The other case, which occurred under a Liberal Government, was a much stronger one. There was a vacancy in the county palatine of Lancaster. That office had been immemorially held by the family of the noble Earl who usually sits opposite, who was the last Prime Minister, who owns the largest estates in that county, and who, I have no scruple in saying, is by his position, by his public services, by his genius, and by his personal worth, one of the most eminent subjects, if not the most eminent subject, of the Queen. Still the Lord Lieutenancy of Lancashire became four times vacant, and four times it was given by different Governments not to the Earl of Derby, but to other persons, who however eminent, as to position, family connexions, and public eminence, could in no way compete with that noble Earl. I say that a much stronger argument might have been raised against the omission of the noble Earl in those instances than against the overlooking of any person in the county of Londonderry in the present case. The noble Earl has alluded to Mr. Lyle's property, which for the sake of his argument, he a little understated. I know from the best authority that Mr. Lyle has an estate in fee simple producing £1,300 a year, exclusive of his house and demesne containing 300 acres, and well worth £400 a year; he has also leasehold property worth £94 per annum, making a total of £1,800 a year. This is certainly not a magnificent estate; but I am within the truth in saying that it is of greater value than the estate which was possessed by the late lieutenant of the county, Sir Robert Ferguson, who performed the duties of his office with the utmost efficiency, and was held in universal respect and honour. It may be some consolation to Mr. Lyle under the unmerited, and, I think, ungenerous attacks which have been made upon him, to know that just the same taunts and imputations were levelled against the appointment of Sir Robert Ferguson. I might quote what was said at the time of that gentleman's appointment; but I am sure that those who made the attacks lived to see that Sir Robert Ferguson was a most excellent lieutenant, and I have little doubt that the same correction of hostile opinions will occur in the case of Mr. Lyle. Now, with respect to the personal qualities of Mr. Lyle—to those which, after all, constitute the real man, and which qualify him for the duties which he has to discharge, and the part which he has to play in life—I can only say that I would answer for him as I would for the most honoured of your Lordships. It was my lot—for my experience of Ireland has now been rather a long one—to recommend Mr. Lyle for the first legal office which he held. He has, since then, under different Governments with which I had no connection, risen gradually higher. He first became Deputy, and then Chief Remembrancer, an office held by the late right hon. Anthony Blake, whose reputation must be well known to many of your Lordships; and on that office being abolished he was made First Master in Chancery. I do not imagine that the duties which he has to discharge as a Master in Chancery in any way disqualify him for the performance of those which will pertain to him as Lieutenant of the county. If there should be any incompatibility between the two sets of duties, it will not be of long continuance, because it has long been notorious in Ireland that Mr. Lyle intends within a very short time to retire, as he is enabled to do by the Acts constituting the different Courts to which he had been an officer, from discharging the active duties of his profession. He has for fifteen years been a deputy lieutenant of the county of which he is now made Lieutenant; he has regularly attended the grand juries; he is intimately acquainted with the business, with the gentry, and with the interests of the county in which he resides. He has already been in the habit of living in the county of Londonderry. The noble Earl (the Earl of Belmore) asks how he can perform the duties of lieutenant of that county when he has to spend part of the year in his office in Dublin?—but I will at least make bold to say that he resides in his county much more than many of the noble Lords and Gentlemen, some of whom have seats in Parliament, and others hold offices under the Crown, who act as lieutenants for other counties in Ireland and England. He already resides there a great deal, and it is his intention to do so to a still greater extent. As to his still more personal qualities, I know him to be judicious, discreet, sensible, unblemished in character, and in the whole course of his life; in short, he is made of just the stuff to fit him to be a good lieutenant, and to enable him adequately to perform the duties of that office. Really, if I had not been specially called upon to do so, I should feel ashamed of detaining your Lordships so long by making excuses—that is not the word I ought to use, but by giving reasons—for the appointment of such a man, because he does not possess all the mere external attributes of fortune and position of which many far less really qualified than he is can boast. Having thought it right to say this much for Mr. Lyle, I am glad that at least in this place no insinuations have been hazarded that this appointment was made from sordid motives, to secure his retirement from his office in order that the Government might bestow it upon another. Had such insinuations been made, I should have been able to show your Lordships how exactly the reverse of the truth they were. I have thought it due to Mr. Lyle to say thus much, and I am sure that every succeeding year that passes over our heads will prove the propriety of his appointment. For myself, my Lords, I have only to add one or two very short sentences. I perceive that some censures have lately been passed upon my conduct—that, in short, charges of general mischief-making and personal corruption have been made against me. I do not forget how gracefully and how generously I was defended, and have only to say, with regard to them, that I have now been for a very long time, I believe for thirty-five years, before the public in one or the other House of Parliament. I have served large constituencies; I have been connected with the actual Government of Ireland for above ten years. No doubt shortcomings and errors in judgment might be plentifully alleged against me; but with respect to personal probity and integrity, if my conduct requires any defence, it is not worth defending.

THE BISHOP OF DERRY said, he would trespass on their Lordships but for a few moments, to express to them his sense of the great respectability and high character of his Friend Mr. Acheson Lyle. Since he had been translated from the diocese of Limerick to that of Derry every day's acquaintance with this gentleman had increased his appreciation of his merits. He might be allowed to say that he felt perfectly assured Mr. Lyle would discharge the high duties of his office with honour to himself and with advantage to the county, which he certainly would adorn.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM said, he had listened with some surprise at what the noble Earl (the Earl of Carlisle) had said in defence of the appointment. It appeared that he relied upon and brought forward the Earl of Derby's case as a parallel, and he mixed up his defence with expressions of pride and personal gratification at being connected with a "Liberal Government." Liberal! Why, what was this liberality? What was the liberal conduct of the Government? And what was the liberal conduct of the noble Earl? Was it to be said that no matter how great the services that had been rendered to the country by one of rank and position, no matter how meritorious those services, or how eminent the individual, he was to be set aside and overlooked in favour of a man who was called a "Liberal?" although inferior in point of position, inferior in every respect to the individual so set aside. Having performed no service for his country, but because he called himself a Liberal, he was to have a preference and be placed in a more prominent position than the person whose services were so exemplary. Were those the "liberal" sentiments of Her Majesty's Government? He should call this the reverse of "liberality;" indeed he should say this was "bigotry in politics." Was it to be understood that no situation, great or small, was to be given to any person who did not support the existing Government? That henceforth no favour or honour was to be bestowed on any person who would not go in every respect along with the noble and liberal Earl? It might be the noble Earl's pride, as he had said, to belong to the present Government—but what were the opinions of Her Majesty's Government? What were his principles? It appeared to him that they had no principles—nobody could fathom them:—at all events they held one set of principles in Ireland, and another in England. They had a Janus head. In England they upheld a Protestant form of Government; in Ireland a Popish form. The British Government was Protestant in form and expression. The noble Earl (the Earl of Carlisle) was just the reverse. He was not satisfied with appointing Roman Catholics to every office great and small, to the exclusion of all Protestants, but he appointed Ultramontanists, or, as they were called in Ireland, Papists. Under the mask of liberality the noble Earl sought to establish a despotism of the very worst kind. The noble Earl said that his character was not worth defending. But the country was worth defending, and the question came to this—were they to have the Government of Queen Victoria or that of the Pope? These were the grounds on which he would address their Lordships. ["Hear, hear!"] He rejoiced at those cheers. He trusted the House would lend him their patience, for he would require it. Mr. Lyle's selection for the office of Lord Lieutenant of a county was not an isolated case. The noble Earl had made equally objectionable appointments in the Queen's County, Wexford, Cork and Roscommon. Could the same excuse that had been advanced for the appointment of Mr. Lyle be urged for passing over Lord Clancarty, Lord Clanbrock, Lord Castlemaine, Lord De Freyne, Lord Ffrench, Sir Gilbert King, and other Resident Proprietors of much greater importance than Mr. Tenison. But Mr. Tenison wished to have a seat in the House of Commons. Perhaps the noble

Earl would favour their Lordships with his reasons for appointing Mr. Tenison for Roscommon?

THE EARL OF ST. GERMANS was under the impression that the last-named appointment occurred while he was at the head of the Irish Government.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM thought it would not be denied that the noble Earl (the Earl of Carlisle) appointed Mr. Tenison, Lieutenant of Roscommon. Being so appointed, that Gentleman stood as a candidate at the last election for his county. Will the noble Earl deny that, excepting for the purpose of advancing his electioneering prospects, there were not other gentlemen in the county better qualified than Mr. Tenison to fill that important office? but happily the noble Earl failed, in seducing the county of Roscommon to return Mr. Tenison, he lost his election, and having been defeated, he petitioned the House of Commons to unseat his adversary—pending that Petition, and the decision of the House of Commons, it became the duty of the noble Earl to select a gentleman to fill the office of High Sheriff for that county, and in so doing, he thought himself justified in setting aside Mr. Balffe—a gentleman fully qualified to fill that office, and whose name had been approved of by the Judges of Assize, and in consequence of the course taken by the noble Earl, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, the following correspondence ensued. The noble Earl was proceeding to read a correspondence with the Irish Government respecting a recent choice of sheriff for the county of Roscommon, when—

THE LORD CHANCELLOR rose to order. The noble Earl's remarks were quite irregular, there being no Motion before the House.

EARL BELMORE said, that he had asked a Question of Her Majesty's Government.

EARL GRANVILLE also interposed. It was usual for their Lordships, although no Motion was before them, to give a hearing, as a matter of courtesy, to any speaker who confined himself to the subject raised by any question that might be put to a Member of the Government. But in this case the noble Earl was assuming to himself a latitude wholly inconsistent with the order and usage of the House.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM said, he wished to be heard while the noble Earl the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was present to answer him. He had been taunted with bringing forward charges against the noble Earl in his absence; and now he had the noble Earl he thought it convenient to address their Lordships on the subject of his appointments.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON, as an Irish representative Peer, thought that if the noble Earl had any charge to make against the Irish Government he should put a notice upon the books of the House. It was very unfair to attack the acts of any Government without any Motion or previous intimation.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he hoped the noble Earl would take the advice just given him. Though he sat as Speaker he was sensible that he had no more authority over the debate than any other of their Lordships; but, speaking as a Peer, he could not but express his regret at the irregularity of the noble Earl's proceedings.

THE DUKE OF LEINSTER said, he did not think it necessary to add anything to the testimony of the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Derry) as to the character and qualifications of Mr. Lyle. He had no doubt that gentleman would fill the office to which he had been appointed with honour to himself and to the Government.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM, if such was the wish of their Lordships, would for the present postpone the subject; but if he brought it forward again—and bring it forward again he most assuredly would—he hoped the noble Earl, the Lord Lieutenant, would be present to defend his appointments generally.

EARL GRANVILLE: Will the noble Earl forgive me if I express a hope that he will bring forward some appointment in particular?

THE EARL OF LEITRIM: I will bring forward the noble Earl's appointments in general.

House adjourned at a quarter before Nine o'clock, till To-morrow, a Quarter before Four o'clock.

INDIAN TARIFF.—QUESTION.

MR. GREGSON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if the Report be correct that the Tariff value of Cotton Goods on importation into India has been raised from £100 to about £150; and whether the previous Duty of five per cent on £100 is to be raised to 10 per cent on £150, thereby fixing a Duty of 15 per cent in place of 5 per cent; and, secondly, if the Report be correct to ask if this excessive scale of Duties will be sanctioned by the Council of India?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he could not take upon himself to answer exactly the questions of his hon. Friend, as he had not himself received any account of the tariff arrangements which had been entered into. He was not, therefore, prepared to say what would be the effect of the changes made on the various descriptions of goods; but he might state generally what had been the course proposed by Mr. Wilson. It appeared that Mr. Wilson had found that there were different rates charged on the admission of manufactured goods into Calcutta, some being charged 5, some 10, and some as high as 20 per cent, and he had thought it right to fix the whole at a uniform rate of 10 per cent, the effect of which would be to lower the rate of duty on some goods and raise it on others. But he (Sir Charles Wood) understood the question of his hon. Friend to refer not so much to the rate of duty as to the valuation, which was in some cases found to be too low and had been raised. He had had the honour to receive a deputation of manufacturers on this subject, who complained a good deal of the effect of the rate of duty as not sufficiently approximating to an ad valorem rate. His hon. Friend was of course aware that there existed a long standing controversy as to the comparative merits of fixed rates and ad valorem duties. It had been represented to him that there was considerable hardship in the proposed arrangements, and the manufacturers whom he saw had sent him samples of goods, accompanied with a statement showing the inequality of the proposed duties. These samples, with the explanations, had been sent to Calcutta by the first mail which left after they had been received at the India House, with directions that the Indian Government should take such measures as would make the rates bear as fairly as possible on all descriptions of goods, and no doubt that injunction would be complied with. Indeed, they knew by a telegraphic message that the question was at that time under the consideration of the Government there.

TAX BILLS.—THE PAPER DUTY BILL.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I rise, Sir, to ask the permission of the House to propose the Motion of which I have given notice, as to the appointment of a Committee to search the Lords' Journals. I understand that the usual course is to move for such a Committee even without notice. If the House has no objection, I will move now that a Committee be appointed to search the Lords' Journals with the view of ascertaining what was done by the Lords with reference to the Bill sent up to them for the repeal of the Excise Duties on Paper made in the United Kingdom.

Motion agreed to.

Committee appointed,

"To inspect the Journals of the House of Lords with relation to any proceedings upon the Bill to repeal the Duty of Excise on Paper made in the United Kingdom, and to make a Report thereof to the House."—VISCOUNT PALMERSTON, MR. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, LORD JOHN RUSSELL, SIR GEORGE GREY, the MARQUESS of HARTINGTON, MR. BYNG, MR. CRAWFORD, MR. CLIVE, MR. LAING, and MR. BRAND.—To withdraw immediately.—Three to be the quorum.

SLAVE TRADE PAPERS.—QUESTION.

MR. BUXTON said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there would be any objection to the Slave Trade Papers of each year being published at an early period of the year following?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that the papers were not received by the Government in sufficient time to enable them to produce them at the commencement of the Session. But there would be no objection to have the information made up to the middle of each year, and laid before the House when Parliament met at the beginning of the following year.

SICILY.—NEAPOLITAN REFUGEES.

QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, on or about the 11th of April last, a fugitive from the Neapolitan troops at Palermo, the Cavaliere Luigi Villarosa, applied for refuge to one of the English Ships of War anchored in the harbour, that he was repulsed by the Captain, alleging that his instructions only allowed him to extend his protection to British subjects, and that he was received and protected on board a Russian vessel; and, if so, whether such transaction was previous to the date of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs' late Instruction to the Admiralty, and whether the officer in question is now informed of the directions of the Government on the subject?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, no such information as the hon. Member referred to had been received at the Foreign Office, and he had made inquiry at the Admiralty and found that no such information had been received there.

SAVINGS BANKS.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN O'CONNELL said, he wished to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill for the protection of depositors in Savings Banks this Session; and, if he is aware that there is a sum of money in the hands of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt to the credit of the Trustees of the late Tralee Savings Bank; and, if so, whether they would take steps to have this money paid to the depositors?

THE CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, it was no doubt desirable that some legislation should take place for the more effective protection of deposits in the Savings Banks and the interest of depositors, but the state of the public business forbade the Government from entertaining any hopes that it could be passed during the present Session, and therefore they should abstain from introducing it. With regard to the second part of the question, he was quite aware that a sum of money was in the hands of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, and credit was given to the Trustees. That sum was in the National Debt Office, and could only be withdrawn legally by the Trustees. The Government had no control over that money and no power of acting, while on the other hand the Trustees had shown no willingness to act. He suggested that an application should be made to them on the subject.

TAX BILLS.—THE PAPER DUTY BILL. REPORT.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON brought up the Report of the Committee appointed to inspect the Journals of the House of Lords with relation to the proceedings on the Paper Duty Repeal Bill. The Report was as follows:—The Committee appointed to inspect the Journals of the House of Lords with relation to any proceedings on the Paper Duty Repeal Bill, have inspected the said Journals accordingly, and found the following entry:—

“Die Lunæ, 21 Maii, 1807. Paper Duty Repeal Bill. Order of the Day for the Second Reading, and for the Lords to be summoned, read, moved that the Bill be now read a second time. Objected to, and an Amendment moved to leave out the word ‘now,’ and insert the words ‘this day six months.’ After a long debate on the question that the word ‘now’ stand part of the Motion, resolved in the negative, Bill to be read a second time that day six months.”

Report to lie upon the table.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I beg to give notice that to-morrow I shall move for the appointment of a Committee to search for precedents with regard to the practice of the House on such questions.

REFRESHMENT-HOUSES AND WINE LICENCES BILL.—CONSIDERATION.

On the Motion of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, it was—

Ordered,

“That the first fifteen Orders of the Day be postponed till after the Order of the Day for the Consideration of the Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Bill, as amended in the Committee.”

Bill as amended, considered.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would move the insertion of a clause, of which he had given notice, the object of which was to place parties applying for wine licences under the same obligation with regard to notice as was at present incumbent upon public-house and beerhouse-keepers.

Clause agreed to.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he rose to move,

“That, from and after the passing of this Act, section seven of the statute of the fifth and sixth years of William the Fourth, chapter thirty-nine, shall be and the same is hereby repealed.”

Great inconvenience had arisen from the operation of the Act in question. Many theatres were carried on more as ginshops than places of public amusement. The magistrates had no power over those places, and the announcement that drinks were to be obtained appeared in the playbills in characters as large as the names of any of the actors. A theatre, of course, was not established for the purpose of selling liquor, but of ministering to the entertainment and improvement of the people.

Clause brought up, and read 1^o; Motion made and Question proposed, “That the said clause be now read a second time.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he would admit that the law was at present in a very unsatisfactory state. Last year the provision of the Act of Parliament was suspended by a Treasury Minute, which was issued a short time after the passing of the Act. Afterwards the Minute was withdrawn, in his opinion on sufficient grounds, and the provision of the Act put in force. It was certainly desirable that legislation should take place on this subject. Some licence ought to be granted by the magistrates to theatres, or power should be given to the Lord Chamberlain to regulate the sale of liquors in such places. It was contrary to the practice in all countries but our own that spirits and wines should be consumed in theatres. He entertained a doubt, however, whether this question was at all germane to the Bill under consideration, and whether the introduction of such miscellaneous subjects might not be apt to create a difference of opinion between the two Houses of Parliament. He would, therefore, suggest that his hon. and learned Friend should bring in a separate Bill to dispose of this question, and he would undertake, if he did so, to give him the best support he could, provided he concurred in the general provisions of the measure.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT remarked, that the hon. and learned Gentleman who proposed the clause had this excuse, that it had as much connection with the present measure as the provision it was intended to amend had with the Act in which it was inserted. As the right hon. Baronet, however, had promised that a separate measure, on the principle laid down by the hon. and learned Gentleman, would receive the support of the Government, he would recommend the withdrawal of the clause.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he hoped the hon. and learned Member would not withdraw the clause. If the somewhat prophetic speech of the right hon. Gentleman should be realized, the clauses introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer were much more likely to induce a difference of opinion between the two Houses. This Bill, under the pretence of being a wine-licensing Bill, repealed the law, and laid down a totally different system of magisterial interference, and was, in fact, a species of compendium of the licensing system.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, what his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary laid down was, that the clause was worthy of favourable consideration; and, in order that it might have such consideration, he proposed to give the hon. and learned Member an opportunity of obtaining it. That was the position in which they stood, but if the clause were pressed they should deem it their duty to meet it with a negative.

MR. SPOONER said, under the law, as it now stood, there was no limit to the consumption of spirits in theatres, or to the days and hours on which they were sold. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman, instead of leaving the matter in the hands of a private Member, would bring in a Bill himself.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY suggested that as they were all agreed that something ought to be done, and as it would be very difficult for a private Member to pass such a Bill through in the present Session, it would be very desirable that the Home Secretary should himself introduce a Bill on the subject.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was, with the consent of the hon. and learned Member for Southwark, quite willing to introduce a Bill to effect the desired object.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, on that understanding, he would consent to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause withdrawn.

Another Clause (Fee to be paid on application for a Licence to sell Wine to be consumed in a Refreshment House), brought up, and read 1°; 2°, and committed; considered in Committee.

[No Report.]

Another Clause (As to costs of proceedings), brought up, and read 1°.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause withdrawn.

MR. AYRTON said, he rose to move the insertion of a clause prohibiting persons who took out licences under the Bill from selling wine to children under sixteen years of age. It was not the first time that the question had been brought before the House. The Commissioners of Police were so convinced of the evils which arose from inducements to intoxication being held out to children that a clause in its wording, similar to that which he now proposed, had been introduced into the Metropolitan Police Act. At that time, however, the sale of spirits was the only thing which was contemplated, whereas the wine containing 40 per cent of spirits which was now spoken of would be fully as intoxicating in its effects as the diluted gin sold in public-houses. The desire of filling the coffers of the Government should not be suffered to operate as a motive for inducing young persons to drink wine, and he believed that the cause of morality and sobriety would be promoted by the course which he had suggested. The hon. Member concluded by moving the insertion of the following clause:—

"Every person licensed to deal in Wines who shall knowingly supply wine to any boy or girl apparently under the age of sixteen years, to be drunk upon the premises, shall be liable to a penalty of not more than 20s.; and upon conviction of a second offence shall be liable to a penalty of not more than 40s.; and upon conviction of a third offence shall be liable to a penalty of not more than £5."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the only objection he felt with regard to the clause was as to the difficulty of carrying it into effective operation. But as a similar clause was contained in the Metropolitan Police Act he should not object to its introduction into the Bill.

Clause brought up and read 1° and 2°.
House in Committee.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he wished to point out that the clause of the Metropolitan Police Act was not co-extensive with that proposed by the hon. Member, inasmuch as its operation was confined to the Metropolis. In boroughs throughout the country the sale of spirits was regulated by municipal bye-laws, which could equally be applied to wine and sold under the new system.

MR. AYRTON said, he did not think it fair to the municipal towns that they should be called on to revise their bye-laws because a new Act had been passed by the Legislature. In manufacturing localities there was quite as great a necessity as in the Metropolis to impose restraints on young girls and boys. They began to earn wages at a very early age, and there was reason to fear that the money was dissipated in the worst practices. There was no necessity for increasing the facilities they at present enjoyed, and he therefore could not consent to the proposed limitation.

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to know with what operation the Act would be attended in the case of children going with their parents into a refreshment shop; or if the hon. Member for Greenwich, for instance, entered a confectioner's with a young lady of sixteen who wished to have a glass of wine. Was it intended that under no circumstances a person under age should obtain a glass of wine?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, there were reasons why spirits ought not to be sold in the Metropolis to a child to be consumed on the premises, but it was quite a different question whether the rule ought to be made general throughout the country and applied likewise in the case of wines. It would certainly seem hard to punish a shopkeeper for selling wine to a child, even though it might be accompanied by its father. The effect of the clause, if carried, would be that, where no bye-laws to the contrary existed it would not be penal to sell spirits to a child under sixteen, although it would be illegal to sell it a glass of wine.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was clear the operation of the clause must be confined to the Metropolis; otherwise, in the country a child going into a public-house to get a glass of wine would be refused by the owner on the ground that by supplying it he would become punishable, but he would add, "I can sell you something that will answer your purpose better," and would then sell a glass of gin.

MR. AYRTON said, his only concern lay with the Metropolis, and if the representatives of the country did not desire the benefits derivable from his clause he would not press that portion of it upon the House.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that adhering to the statements which he had previously made, he believed the clause was superfluous, as there was already a provision to the same effect in the Metropolitan Police Act, and that the Bill would be much better without it.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he hoped the hon. Member would not press his Motion, as in his opinion it would be entirely inoperative.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he was unable to distinguish the difference in principle between Liverpool and the Metropolis. Legislation, he thought, would be looked on as ridiculous which would prevent a father who might bring a fine boy of fifteen up to town from giving him a glass of wine with his sandwich.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that on the part of the Metropolis, he must disclaim the advantage which the hon. Member (Mr. Ayrton) was anxious to secure for it. The clause referred in no way to the presence of parents or guardians, but made it penal under all circumstances to sell wine to a child under sixteen years of age. If his hon. Friend therefore went to a division he should feel compelled to vote against him.

MR. AYRTON said, he must deny all intention of preventing parents who might think proper to do so from obtaining suitable refreshment for their children. The cases which had been supposed would not arise upon the construction of the clause.

SIR ROBERT BOOTH moved that the Chairman leave the Chair.

Motion agreed to. House resumed.

[No Report.]

MR. AYRTON said, he would then move the insertion of the following clause:—

"That it shall be lawful for the owners and ratepayers of any place which, by the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1858, is entitled to adopt that Act, and for the owners and ratepayers of each parish within the Metropolis, as defined by that Act, to determine, in the manner prescribed by the said Act, that the provisions of this Act shall not be adopted within the limits of such place or parish; and thereupon no Licence shall be granted under this Act for or in respect of any house, shop, or premises within the limits of such place or parish."

The object of the clause was to enable the owners of property and the inhabitants of any district to prevent the opening of wine-shops in certain cases. If the Bill were so good as was described the inhabitants of no district would take steps to repress it, but, on the other hand, he thought that they should not be compelled to take any action for its acceptance.

Clause brought up, and read 1^o.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the Local Government Act of 1858 was quite different in its object from that which the hon. and learned Gentleman supposed. The object of the Act was to introduce certain local regulations of a municipal character, and was not intended to interfere with the general laws of the country. It could not, therefore, be applied in such a case as the present.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, that however nicely it might be concealed, the Amendment was neither more nor less than an attempt to impose the Maine Liquor Law without the authority of Parliament. Such a course would be against all public policy, and he could not suppose that his hon. Friend was serious in proposing the clause.

MR. NEWDEGATE confessed that he sympathised with the views of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets as set forth in the clause. Without some such provision the inhabitants of a district who were opposed to the introduction of those houses would be left wholly without a remedy against what they considered to be a great evil. If the hon. Member pressed his clause he should certainly support him.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he hoped the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets would not press the clause. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was certainly not prepared to assent to the introduction of the Maine Liquor Law into this country, particularly in regard to wine-houses, when the houses of licensed victuallers were allowed to go free.

Motion made, and Question, "That the said Clause be now read a second time," put, and negatived.

MR. AYRTON said, he would then propose a further clause:—

"That no Licence to be granted under this Act shall be deemed or taken to confer any right or beneficial interest whatever in any person, so as to interfere with any restrictions being hereafter imposed by Parliament on the sale of Wine."

Clause brought up, and read 1^o.

Motion made, and Question, "That the said Clause be now read a second time," put, and negatived.

Clause 36.

MR. HOWES moved the addition of words empowering justices and magistrates to order the payment of fees, allowances, and expenses; to be recovered according to the provisions of 11 & 12 Vict., c. 43.

Amendment, after short discussion, agreed to.

Bill to be read 3^o To-morrow.

CIVIL SERVICES.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. LAING, in moving that the House resolve itself into a Committee of Supply, said it might be convenient that he should explain the difficulty which had led the Government to ask for a Vote on account for Civil Services, and the extent to which they intended to ask the House to vote money on account. The House was aware that the system of keeping the accounts for the Civil Services was essentially different from that of the army and navy. In the case of the army and navy, where there were only a few large Votes, the Votes were taken for the service of the current financial year and if at the end of the year; there was a balance in hand it must be handed over to the Exchequer, but if there was a deficiency it must be met by a further Vote within the year, power being vested in the Treasury to transfer a surplus from one account to meet a deficiency in another. In the case of the Civil Services, where the Votes were much more numerous and of a more miscellaneous character, that system had never been adopted. In fact, where the Votes extended, as they did last year, to so large a number as 197, it was impossible to adopt such a system, especially as the House never found it perfectly practicable to pass the Votes for Civil Services previous to the close of the financial year, on the 31st of March. Those services had been conducted by having a balance in the case of each particular Vote, for as respected them no power was vested in the Treasury, similar to that which obtained with regard to the naval and military services, of transferring a surplus from one account to make good a deficiency in another; therefore in the case of the Civil Services, when there was a deficiency in any Vote in consequence of circumstances that increased the expenditure after the Vote was taken, recourse must be had to the House for a supplemental Vote, although there might be a surplus in hand on some other Vote, which, however, could not be transferred to meet that particular deficiency. The present was not an exceptional or isolated case. It would have occurred about this time last year if the Votes had not been obtained at an earlier period. The course practically had been to have recourse, when occasion required, to the Vote for civil contingencies; but that Vote had been limited to £100,000, and was not sufficient to meet the deficiency that frequently occurred in carrying out the numerous objects involved in the miscellaneous service. The necessity had arisen during the last five or six years of obtaining either a large sum of money on account, or of taking up and considering the various Votes at an early period of the Session. Last year the difficulty which then arose from the dissolution was got over by a sum of £1,854,000 being taken in March. In the previous year a sum of £1,952,000 was taken in April; in May, 1857, when the dissolution occurred, there was taken a sum of £1,500,000 on account; in 1856 and 1855, the large sums of £5,194,000 and £4,867,000 were taken also on account. This year it was known to the House that, owing to the state of public business, no money had yet, though they were near the end of May, been obtained for the Civil Service. The consequence was, that the balances of many of these Votes had become exhausted, while in others they were nearly approaching to a state of exhaustion. It became necessary, therefore, either to obtain a Vote on account, or to do that which was objectionable—overdraw particular accounts, and thus intrench on the provisions of the Appropriation Act. He had asked the heads of departments to go carefully over the various Votes, and to ascertain the outside amount that would be required to prevent the overdrawing of accounts, supposing the Session to be protracted to an unusually late period, and the Estimates not voted by the House of Commons till a very late period, as was the case last year. The result of their calculations went to show that a sum of £1,468,000 was required to prevent that course being taken on the supposition that the regular Votes were not passed till the month of August. There were several precedents for taking a large Vote on account in the way now proposed. Some of them he had already mentioned. In 1848, when the Committee on the Estimates was sitting, a Vote was taken on account, as it was not thought desirable to go on with the Estimates till that Committee reported. A similar Committee was now sitting, and therefore what was done in 1848 might so far be taken as a precedent; but the strongest authority for the course now proposed was to be found in the Report of the Committee on public moneys, which recommended that in difficulties similar to the present, a sum should be taken on account for such services as had been sanctioned by Parliament in a previous Session. When a sum was taken under that limitation the control of Parliament was to a great extent preserved, because, on the one hand, no new service would be begun under such a Vote, and on the other hand the Vote for the old services would never be more than was necessary to carry them on for the current quarter. In the Estimate now submitted to the House this principle was strictly acted upon. No Vote for any new service was introduced, and no more was asked than was required to carry on the service for the current quarter. The Government felt that there were considerations in the State of the public business this year which might render the present an expedient time to moot the larger question whether this system should be introduced as a general rule in future. They therefore limited the Vote to such a sum as was absolutely necessary to carry on the public service till after the Whitsun holidays. The Estimate had accordingly been accurately revised with that view, and all that the Government asked from the House was a sum of £400,000, which would be distributed over ten votes. These Votes were, on account of printing and stationery, £30,000; County Courts, £35,000; Irish constabulary, £82,000; Education in Great Britain, £100,000; consuls abroad, £54,000; prisons, &c., £20,000; sundry temporary commissions, £12,000; slave trade, £12,000; civil contingencies, £54,000; Dublin police, £7,000. On a close investigation of the accounts this amount was found to be indispensable in order to prevent the confusion that would arise from overdrawing the accounts during the holidays. He trusted there would be no objection to the House going into Committee of Supply.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he very much regretted the Government proposed to take that Vote, as he greatly objected to the system of taking money on account. Complaints had been made in former Sessions that the Estimates were delayed; yet notwithstanding all that had been said as to the propriety of laying the Estimates on the table at an early period of the Session every Government that was in power adhered to the practice of bringing them in late in the Session, so late that it was impossible to give them the attention which they deserved. Her Majesty's Government should recollect that the Estimates were not to be considered as a reason for voting the money required as a matter of course. He should feel it to be his duty to oppose the Motion for going into Committee, and he should take the sense of the House on the subject.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he agreed that the Government were taking a most objectionable course, for when a sum was once taken on account any discussion upon the Vote afterwards was useless. That was quite a new practice, which had only obtained within the last three or four years. A few nights ago the Government obtained a large sum on account for the Army Estimates, and now they asked for another sum on account for the Civil Service Estimates. He thought that as the Government knew at the commencement of the Session what the requirements of the service were, they ought to be prepared to bring forward the Estimates at a period sufficiently early to prevent any such contingency arising as the present. He should support the hon. Gentleman in opposing so objectionable a course as that proposed, although it would, perhaps, be better to do so in Committee. The House ought certainly to express its opinion in respect to so objectionable a practice.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, I trust that the House will feel it to be its duty to give a strong expression of its opinion on this subject; but whether that expression shall be made on your leaving the chair, or when we get into Committee and know the particular reasons for proposing these Votes on account, I am not able to say. I think we had better go into Committee, but I am alarmed at the grounds put forward by the hon. Secretary to the Treasury for going into Committee of Supply with the view of voting this money on account. This is an entirely new proceeding on the part of the Government. The reasons given by the hon. Gentleman appear to me to be insufficient. The only precedents are two. One of them was made with the knowledge of the House when a great hiatus was likely to occur in the proceedings of the House in consequence of a dissolution. The other occurred when the House determined to take upon itself to examine the Miscellaneous Estimates, and when, therefore, the Government could not with propriety proceed with these Estimates until that examination was over. But what is it we are now asked to do? By the notice of Motion in the Supplementary Estimate recently circulated, the House was led to suppose that the Government was about to ask for not £400,000, but £1,400,000 on account; and I observed particularly that, when the Secretary to the Treasury was pressing this on the consideration of the House, he made out a case, not for voting money on account to meet a particular exigency, but to meet the possibility of the House sitting till August, and not being able to go on with them. This is what alarms me in the novel proceeding of the Government. I think it better not to oppose your leaving the chair, because the Government may have more reasons to give in Committee for voting this money on account; but when we get into Committee, we ought to scrutinize with the greatest minuteness the claims for these Votes on account. The Estimates ought to be proceeded with earlier in the Session, or this House will forfeit a much greater privilege than it is supposed to be about to hazard in another matter, for it is by these Estimates and by going into Committee of Supply alone that this House has an opportunity, before it grants a shilling of the public money, of demanding explanations with reference to all matters where they may be required. Postpone the Estimates and take money on account, and you deprive this House of the opportunity of bringing under the notice of Parliament any grievance that may require its interposition.

LORD HARRY VANE said, he was glad that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) did not intend to support the Motion, which he trusted his hon. Friend would withdraw, against the House going into Committee. It was most desirable that the Estimates should be proceeded with at an earlier period of the Session, and that it should not become the habit of the Government to ask for Votes on account. But the Secretary to the Treasury had limited the amount of the sums he proposed to take on account, and the House would run no risk in voting only what was essential for the public service. The present proposal was so reasonable that he hoped there would be no opposition to it, since the House did not pledge itself to vote the whole of the money of which it was now asked to vote a part.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he thought that the statement of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had somewhat changed the position of this question. Since the Notice Paper had been presented the Government had determined to ask only for money on account of ten items, and for £400,000 instead of £1,400,000. But it was a question of principle, and the House ought to know the precise meaning of the alteration that had been made. If the intention was to ask for money on account merely to enable the Government to get over the Whitsuntide holidays, and if it were understood that after the recess the House were to be asked to consider the Civil Service Estimates, the proposal would be of a moderate character. But if these Votes were proposed merely to enable the Estimates to be postponed until late in the Session, it was not a question of £1,400,000 or of £400,000, but of principle and precedent. Although he should be most reluctant to throw difficulties in the way of the Government, they ought to understand on what principle this money was asked for. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) had correctly stated that there were only three precedents for voting money on account—the dissolution in 1857, that of last year, and the appointment in 1848 of the Committee to revise the miscellaneous expenditure. Upon the last occasion the Votes were taken on account, in order to enable the House to deal with the Estimates after they got the Report of the Committee. There was, however, this difference, that it was not intended that the Committee which was appointed this year should express any opinion on the Estimates of the year. Their duty was to examine and report upon the Estimates only of the past year. The truth was that in all those three cases the ground on which the Votes were given on account was one, not of convenience, but of principle. When the House of Commons was about to be dissolved it would obviously be very improper for the House to proceed to vote all the details of the expenditure, and commit the country to their views. That was a duty which should be reserved for the new House of Commons which was to be elected. He understood, therefore, that the principle on which the Votes on account were taken in 1857 and 1859 was simply that, as the House was about to be dissolved, it was necessary that the settlement of the expenditure should be left to the following Parliament. Such was not the case at this moment. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Treasury cited the authority of the Committee on Public Moneys for the course proposed; but the report of that Committee was by no means applicable to such a case. That Report recommended that the same principle should be adopted in voting and auditing grants for the civil service as for the army and navy. The grants for the latter services were voted in large sums to be expended during the year, as had been explained by the Secretary to the Treasury. It was suggested that the civil service Votes were taken so late in the year that to adopt the same course with regard to them as with the other Votes would have the effect of involving the Government in difficulties. The Committee, therefore, with reluctance, suggested that Votes should be taken on account, as the only way of getting out of the difficulty. Considerable hesitation was exhibited by the Committee in coming to that decision. The then Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir G. C. Lewis) submitted a very able paper, which, to a great extent, formed the foundation of the Report, and in which he expressed some doubts as to the possibility of making any alteration in the mode of voting the Miscellaneous Estimates, because there was great difficulty in getting Parliament to pass all the Votes before the 1st of April. The Chairman of the Committee, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir F. Baring), stated his opinion that to vote money on account of the civil service, without specific appropriation, would be open to serious objection, and that to take part Votes for one quarter on each separate head would lead practically to a double discussion. But although, as he had said, that decision was come to with much hesitation, a certain object was to be gained by it. In the present case, however, they were asked to take the same course without attaining any object. In truth, on looking at the circumstances of the case, and considering the course which was proposed, it would be seen that by adopting it the House would be exposed to one of two difficulties—either they must discuss the principle of these Votes now—in which case nothing was gained except that they would have to discuss them over again—or the principle of other Votes, which it was desirable should be discussed, would be withdrawn from consideration. They were told that the proposal now made was very moderate, because they were asked to vote money on only one or two Votes. But some of these Votes were in class 7, which was not before them. That was a very important class, and one in which very large reductions had been promised—reductions to the extent of over £200,000. If it was really necessary for the Government to get money for these two or three services in that class, they ought to have the specific Votes before them, in order that they might discuss them properly. But if they were to give these Votes on account and leave the rest till the end of the Session, the consequence would be that they would be brought before the House at a time when they could not receive proper consideration. He objected, therefore, to giving these Votes on account in class 7. It was not to the amount, but to the principle involved, that his objection chiefly referred. He was opposed to passing such Votes on account, unless on the distinct understanding that they would have the Estimates before them immediately after Whitsuntide, to be proceeded with in the proper manner.

LORD FERMOY said, he objected on principle to Votes being taken on account, and he did not think that the Secretary to the Treasury had made out a special case for this occasion. A great deal of time had unquestionably been thrown away in the early part of the Session, not without due warning to the Government from himself and others that delay in the introduction of the Reform Bill would lead to a deadlock in the business of the country. It did not matter that the proposition now made was a moderate one. Unless the House of Commons made a stand, and protested against the practice of voting on account, they would find one Government after another announcing that they were pressed for money, and asking for a small sum on account, on the promise that the Estimates would be brought on afterwards. Every hon. Member who had spoken had objected to the principle, but it was of no use objecting to the principle unless something was done to prevent the practice. No one who listened to the speech of the Secretary of the Treasury could resist the conviction that it was not the intention of the Government to bring forward the Estimates before August; and if they were delayed till then, what opportunity would there be for properly discussing them? Another view of the question was, that the Vote of so much money on account was virtually a sort of Vote of Confidence in the Government. Now, the present was a very critical time. An important step would have to be taken by the Government in regard to a matter pending between this House and the other; and, for his own part, he could say that the confidence he would be disposed to place in the Government would depend very much on the nature of the step they took. The country surely could not be so completely short of funds that the Votes of Credit could not be postponed for a week or ten days, by which time the Committee which was to be appointed to-morrow would be enabled to report as to precedents. He would, therefore, press the Government to defer the taking of the Votes on account till at least after Whitsuntide.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I have no wish to mix the question now before us with any other. I will confine myself, therefore, to the proposition which the Government have submitted to us. On occasions like the present, notwithstanding the constitutional suspicion with which the House ought to view propositions of this kind, I am myself always inclined to facilitate the course of public business, and to give any Gentlemen who sit on the Treasury bench that fair assistance in conducting the affairs of the House which they have a right to expect from Parliament. It is impossible, however, to assent to this proposition without some consideration. The House should clearly understand the proposition that is made, because I cannot at all agree with the noble Lord the Member for Hastings (Lord H. Vane) in his view. The noble Lord seemed to entertain objections of a very serious character to any course of this kind, provided the demand had been a large one; but as it was, comparatively speaking, so small in relation to that originally asked, and positively speaking, so trifling in itself, he did not see how the House could properly refuse the application. To my mind the small amount of the proposition would rather add to its objectionable character, in case I felt it my duty on the whole to offer no opposition to the plan of the Government. Because, what is the view of the public business given to us by the Secretary of the Treasury? He certainly, as has been observed by the noble Lord who spoke last, and as was generally felt by both sides of the House, conveyed the impression that there was no immediate prospect of the House forming itself into a Committee of Supply to consider the Civil Service Estimates. Well, what will be the position of the House if, a fortnight hence, when this supply is exhausted, a similar proposition, equally small, is made? The House may be occupied at that time with business, supposed to be of great interest and importance, and an appeal may then be equally successful if it is urged as to-night, that surely the House has sufficient confidence in the Government to supply them with funds to carry on the urgent business of the country for another week or fortnight? Therefore, although the application may be small, the precedent may be large; and therefore it is only as a precedent, involving a principle, that the House has really to decide upon the question before it. I entirely assent to the arguments of my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole). I agree with him in all his arguments, and the only part in which I do not agree with him is the conclusion at which he arrives. It appeared to me that every reason urged by my right hon. Friend would have induced him to arrive at a conclusion the reverse to that which he reached; and, so far from thinking that this is not the opportunity upon which the House should come to a decision, whatever that decision may be, I am of opinion that it is upon the question that you, Sir, shall leave the chair that—a principle being involved, and we being called upon to establish a precedent—the House ought to treat the matter frankly and fully, and arrive at their decision upon it. Upon the subject of precedent I need hardly touch, because I think the admission of the Secretary to the Treasury is conclusive. All the precedents which he adduced proved that it was a course which the House adopted only under extraordinary circumstances, such as impending dissolutions of Parliament, changes of Ministry, references to the House itself of the Estimates; and in the present Session none of those extraordinary circumstances exist. I therefore think that we may fairly throw aside all precedents. We are called upon to-night to make a precedent. On the subject of amount it does not appear to me that it is of the slightest consequence whether the application of the Government be for £500,000 or £1,500,000. As far as the Government is concerned it is a question of confidence. I and every Gentleman sitting on these benches are perfectly prepared to give them that confidence, provided there is a clear understanding of the terms upon which that confidence is to be given. If the public service is in such a state that there really are not in the Exchequer funds to carry it on from day to day, I am disposed to come to the assistance of the Government. I will not go out of the way to inquire whether a great deal of time has been wasted. I will not read the list of the meetings of the House to show that, although Parliament was called together in January, a fortnight passed before any business was transacted, or that even on one or two nights the Government did not take advantage of opportunities to go into Committee of Supply. I will not stop to inquire why we have not yet been regularly in Committee of Supply. If the service of the country absolutely requires it, I will not enter into any discussion whether the sum shall be £500,000 or £1,500,000. The condition which I make with the Government, and which I think it right to make, and which I think the House of Commons ought to make, is this,—If we are ready to extend this fair confidence, will they engage that we shall have fair opportunities and legitimate occasions of entering into that criticism and examination of the Estimates of the Government which is our right and privilege? To ask us to enter into an investigation of the Estimates in August, as the Secretary to the Treasury tells us, or even in the month of July, is not a fair constitutional fulfilment of the conditions which, I think, the House in giving its confidence to the Government has a right to demand. That is the real point, and if the noble Lord or the right hon. Gentleman will rise and tell us that it is impossible, for want of Supplies, to carry on the business of the country until next Thursday, when we meet and can, if the Government please, go into Committee of Supply, every one will be perfectly willing to grant that which they require; but we ought to make a constitutional condition. When they ask this unusual assistance from the House, they ought to say: When the holidays are over we will go as early as possible into Committee of Supply, continue to take Supply, and give to the House the legitimate opportunities of investigating the expenditure of the country and of bringing before the consideration of Parliament those grievances which it is the privilege of the House of Commons to bring forward under those circumstances. If Her Majesty's Government frankly tell us that they are prepared to do that, which I conclude a Minister of the Crown cannot hesitate for a moment in doing—if they will enter into a clear engagement that when the holidays are over, next Thursday, we shall go into Committee of Supply, that these Estimates shall be submitted to us, that we shall not be deprived of our constitutional right to examine the Civil Service Estimates, and to see whether in our minds they are of the proper amount and character, and that we shall have the opportunity on those occasions of bringing subjects under consideration which it is usual to bring forward when Estimates are moved, I shall support the proposition of Her Majesty's Government. But if that offer be not accepted—if we are called on to establish a most dangerous precedent, and to go on through the remainder of the Session voting aids and credits without the advantage of going into Committee of Supply, thereby risking the loss of those privileges which are most valuable, and of which we are most proud, then I shall feel it my duty to support the hon. Gentleman. I only ask the House to remember the position in which it is placed. Certainly two-thirds, if not more, of the usual Session has already passed, and we have scarcely gone into Committee of Supply as far as the exercise of any real control over the expenditure of the country or of the privilege of obtaining redress of grievances is concerned. There is also, from the admission of the Secretary to the Treasury, a prospect that the remaining portion of the Session will also pass without the House having the enjoyment of those advantages. I trust that I have placed the question fairly before the House, and treated it in a constitutional point of view. As I have said, I shall support Her Majesty's Government if they enter into that engagement, but otherwise I shall support the hon. Gentleman who has moved the Amendment.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, it is quite true, as the hon. Gentleman says, that there is a financial necessity for a Vote for these services,—not that the Exchequer is empty, but that we have not yet Parliamentary authority to apply the money; and unless Parliamentary authority is given the services must suffer great inconvenience, and the public interest be seriously prejudiced. That is the simple ground upon which we apply to Parliament for these Votes on account. I cannot admit that an application to Parliament for a Vote on account of Estimates already presented is at all a matter without precedent. It is a matter of almost annual occurrence. Nor do I see any great distinction between these Miscellaneous Estimates and Estimates for the Army and Navy, except that perhaps the latter are more important and present a greater number of subjects upon which it is desirable opinions should be expressed. There is nothing unparliamentary or unconstitutional, when the necessity arises, to ask for Votes on account of the larger services of the army and navy; and I cannot see what Parliamentary or constitutional objection can be raised in principle to a Vote on account of consular establishments, education, or any of these different heads of the Miscellaneous Estimates, which are infinitely less important than those upon which Parliament by practice has acquiesced in the principle of Votes on account. It has been stated that the necessity for Votes of account on these Miscellaneous Estimates does not often occur, and why? Because these Estimates—and here I may appeal to the recollection of hon. Members to bear me out—come on late in the Session, and are frequently not finished till late in July, and the House has usually found nothing in that advanced period of the Session to prevent it giving the necessary attention to the details of these Votes. We are accused of negligence in not having brought these Estimates sooner before the attention of the House, but I beg to recall to the recollection of hon. Gentlemen that we called Parliament together ten days earlier than usual. We showed no disinclination at all events to meet Parliament at the earliest possible period consistent with the convenience of hon. Members—in fact we were somewhat blamed for having anticipated the usual period for its assembling. Have we, during the period which has elapsed from that time to this, abstained from submitting to Parliament measures of importance and general interest deserving their consideration? Parliament, in fact, has been uninterruptedly occupied by measures of the greatest national importance. I am not at all disposed to cavil at the length of time which the House has thought fit to devote to the consideration of the weighty measures submitted to them—the French Treaty, the Reform Bill, the Budget, and the financial measures springing out of it. They were perfectly justified in discussing them at length, but a great deal of time has, in fact, been occupied by these discussions, and they have so far interfered with the ordinary course of public business in regard to the Estimates, that at this moment we have not been able to give to the Army and Navy Estimates, which generally take precedence of the Miscellaneous Estimates, sufficient time to enable us to complete them. If the Miscellaneous Estimates, therefore, have been postponed to the present time, it is not our fault, but the result of that course which the House of Commons in the performance of its duty has thought fit to adopt with regard to the measures of first-rate importance which were submitted to it, and which deserved all the attention bestowed on them. Blame ought not to be thrown on us for a result which is no fault of ours, but which has arisen from the length of time the House has, in the discharge of its duty, thought fit to give to important business. The right hon. Gentleman opposite made very light of the observation of my noble Friend, that the objection to this course is diminished in proportion to the diminution of the sum asked for; but I think, even in his own view of the case, that observation had great force. The amount of money to be voted is equivalent in meaning to a certain portion of time, and those who object to these Votes on account to carry on a certain service, on the ground that they place the remainder of the Vote in a certain degree out of the control of Parliament, ought to feel that the diminution of the sum voted on account, as it involves the necessity of an earlier recurrence to Parliament for the remainder of the services, very much removes the objection to this course. The right hon. Gentleman says he is quite willing to agree to this Vote provided the Government will undertake that the details of these Estimates shall be submitted to the House at a time and in a manner which shall enable it to give to them the full and fair consideration which is necessary for the due discharge of its constitutional functions. Undoubtedly that is an undertaking which we are perfectly ready to enter into. Indeed, it seems to me to follow as a matter of course from that power which the House of Commons has over the Government. It is an engagement to which we can scarcely be said to be parties, because the House has the matter entirely in its own hands. The Votes now asked for will enable the Government to carry on the services till about the middle of June, and beyond that time nothing can be done without the sanction of the House. When the right hon. Gentleman, therefore, asks us to enter into such an arrangement, he is rather derogating from the constitutional power of the House, because we are in the hands of the House. No further money can be issued without the authority of the House, and that authority, of course, the House will not continue to give, unless it has an opportunity of entering fully and fairly into a discussion of all the details for which the money is required, and exercising their undoubted right of control.

MR. BENTINCK: It would be more satisfactory if the noble Lord would state in what manner he understands the engagement into which he professes his readiness to enter. When does he propose that we should go into Committee of Supply?

Viscount Palmerston

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: It is perfectly impossible to fix the exact day.

SIR FRANCIS BARING: The hon. Baronet opposite (Sir S. Northcote) referred to some suggestion of mine in reference to the Public Moneys Committee; but the Report of that Committee has, in reality, nothing whatever to do with the point before us. It related exclusively to certain arrangements which were proposed, but which would have necessitated a change in the mode of voting the Estimates, and the question with the Committee was how to get over that difficulty. But the real question before the House is this:—The Government state to the House that they require certain sums for the public service to carry them on till after the holidays, and I confess I am surprised to hear from hon. Gentlemen opposite that their principles are such that they refuse to go into Committee to ascertain whether those moneys are actually required by the Government or not. If the Government were prepared to ask sums which would throw off the consideration of the Estimates to an unreasonable extent, I can understand that sum being cut down in Committee to a proper amount; but, when the Government have stated that the public service requires certain sums to be granted, I would ask hon. Gentlemen opposite whether they will take on themselves the responsibility of refusing to go into Committee for the consideration of the votes asked for.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: The right hon. Baronet has misunderstood the feeling which prevails on this side of the House. My right hon. Friend made it perfectly clear that we have no desire to cause any public inconvenience. The speech of the noble Lord was directed entirely to an attempt to draw the House from the fact that the proposal of the Government is intended to establish a precedent, and that one of a very objectionable and dangerous character; and in guarding against that precedent, the language of my right hon. Friend and the general feeling on this side of the House showed that we had no desire to cause any public inconvenience. We have asked the Government to state distinctly whether there will be any injury to the public service by delaying this grant to Thursday evening next, and, if the Government will give us that assurance, we are ready to go into Committee at once; but they ought not to call on us to go into Committee without some assurance of that sort. If there is any necessity for the grant being made immediately, it is the Government who are to blame for bringing us into that condition. Parliament certainly did meet earlier than usual this year, but for the first fortnight nothing was done. We rose every night at eight or nine o'clock for the first fortnight, and, therefore, we have a right to blame the Government for making this Vote on account necessary, if necessary it be. Without some assurance of the sort, I should object to setting a precedent, for I deny that one already exists. The only way in which we can guard against that precedent being established, is by voting now against the Motion that you, Sir, do leave the chair, unless the Government will promise that they will bring these Estimates before us on Thursday next.

THE NEUTRALITY OF SAVOY.
QUESTION.

MR. KINGLAKE rose, to put the question to the Secretary for Foreign Affairs of which he had given notice—namely, Whether the Swiss Confederation persisted in asking for a Conference relative to the neutral provinces of Savoy, and whether Her Majesty's Government supported the Confederation in making the demand?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Up to the present time—and I had a despatch from our Minister in Switzerland this morning—the Swiss Confederation continues to ask for the meeting of a Conference on the subject of the neutralization of part of Savoy. Her Majesty's Government supported that proposal from the first, and unless the Swiss Government themselves abandon or withdraw that demand, we shall continue to support it.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET AND THE MESSRS. GREEN.—QUESTION.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: I am unwilling to interpose between the House and a division, but having received a letter from an hon. Gentleman opposite informing me that he intended to make a statement affecting me on going into Committee of Supply, I think I may claim from him that he should make the statement with which he has threatened me on the occasion on which he said he desired to make it. I received the following letter this morning:—

Mr. Lygon presents his compliments to Lord

Clarence Paget, and has the honour to inform him that it is his intention, on going into Committee of Supply this evening, to call the attention of the House to the reports which are current respecting his connection with the house of Messrs. Green & Co. of Blackwall."

I trust the hon. Gentleman will now fulfil his intention.

MR. LYGON: I am quite in the hands of the House. I can assure the noble Lord that it is not my intention to bring forward this question in a hostile spirit. The question is not one with regard to which it will be necessary for me to detain the House at any length; and, in common with every other Member of the House, I shall rejoice if the noble Lord, as no doubt will be the case, should be enabled to give a satisfactory explanation. I entirely disclaim all hostile feeling towards the noble Lord, and I can assure him he entirely mistakes my object if he supposes that my inquiry is made with any such purpose. But everybody, I am sure, will agree that under the circumstances which have taken place, when contractors have publicly acknowledged that they were the builders of certain gunboats which have suffered very severely from decay, and when it is reported in commercial circles that the Secretary to the Admiralty was a partner in the firm at the period when the gunboats were built—every hon. Member of this House will see that it is for the advantage of the service, of the House of Commons, of the Board of Admiralty, and of the noble Lord himself, that these circumstances should be explained. I, for one, have no doubt that they are capable of a satisfactory elucidation; and so far from the Motion being received by the noble Lord in a manner implying that he regards it as one which is brought forward in an unfriendly spirit, it ought, I think, to be matter of gratification to him to have the opportunity of meeting the reports which are current as to his being largely connected with Messrs. Green and Company. Such a report has gained notoriety, and must, it is evident, be most prejudicial to the public service. It is needless for me to enter into the question of the gunboats or the culpability of contractors. I have simply discharged a public duty of a very painful character. But the importance cannot be overrated of clearing up and setting at rest all misapprehensions which may exist on a matter so vitally affecting the credit of all public servants.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: I must ask the indulgence of the House, having already spoken on this question, and very few words, I think, will suffice for the purpose I have in view, which is to clear my character from any imputations which may have been made upon it. The hon. Gentleman opposite I understand to state that he has heard it confidently reported that I am a partner with Messrs. Green of Blackwall?

MR. LYGON: That you were connected with them at the period when the gunboats were built.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET; That I was a partner with them when the gunboats were building. I do not make any complaint of the hon. Gentleman for having called the attention of the House to this subject; on the contrary, I think that he—having been a Member of the department with which I have also the honour of being associated—if he heard any reports of a nature which he considered derogatory to my honour, either as an officer or a Member of this House, was quite right in bringing them forward. If I were disposed to make any complaint it would be that he had not placed the matter on the notice paper, in order that any hon. Member, if he had desired, might have come down to the House to deliver his opinion upon it. I might answer the accusation very much in the same vague way in which it has been made, because the hon. Gentleman brings no proofs, but merely states that he has heard certain reports, and I think I might satisfy the House by giving my word of honour that those Reports are utterly without foundation. But it is always best to be perfectly frank and fair in all matters where the personal honour of individuals is concerned. All thoroughly ingenious stories have some sort of foundation, by which a great deal more may be made of them than they are really worth, and, therefore, in order that there may be no misunderstanding—although I really scruple to take up the time of the House with a matter of this sort—I still think it my duty, holding as I do a very high and honourable position in Her Majesty's Government, to state exactly the circumstances of the case. It is perfectly true that for many years past I have been—alas! a very small, but still a shareholder to some extent in certain ships in the Australian trade. In 1857 my right hon. Friend, now the Secretary of State for India, did me the honour to invite me to take a seat at the Board of Admiralty. I will not quote his letter, because it was in terms rather complimentary to myself, and I wish to confine my observations exactly to the point in issue; and if I read my answer to that communication, at least that part of it which relates to these transactions, it will, I think, be quite sufficient to dispose of this charge. I should state that previously in that same year my right hon. Friend, through his private secretary, Captain Drummond, also an intimate Friend of my own, expressed his desire that in the event of a vacancy taking place I should hold myself in readiness to fill a seat at the Board of Admiralty. I told my Friend, Captain Drummond, that I had great scruples of conscience in the matter; for, although I had nothing whatever to do with shipbuilding, or with any vessels likely to be taken up by contract for the Government, yet, nevertheless, to hold a seat at the Board of Admiralty, and at the same time to retain a connection with shipping concerns, was what I thought would not be fair or proper. This, therefore, was the reply which I wrote to the very flattering letter of my right hon. Friend:—

“Plas Llanfair Oct. 22, 1857.

“Dear Sir Charles,—I hasten to express my obligations for the flattering and friendly communication I have this day received from you, dated the 21st. When during the last Session the subject of my going to the Admiralty was talked over between my friend Captain Drummond and myself, I, from a sense of honour, stated for your information that I could not conscientiously undertake the contract branch, which I believe falls to the Junior Lord, because I have for several years been, and still am, a shareholder in some ships belonging to Messrs. Green, and it would ill become me to open tenders in which they might be offered, for Government service. As to building, I have no connection with him or anybody else, but I should be very loath to discontinue my connection, small as it is, with that eminent firm.”

And I concluded by saying, “I have no alternative but to decline your offer.” Thus ended this transaction. I was altogether independent of the Board of Admiralty until the present Government was formed, when my noble Friend the First Lord of the Treasury did me the honour to invite me to join that Department. I stated to him exactly as I had stated to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for India, that I had been the owner of shares in a few ships, with which, however, I had nothing further to do, any more than one would have by holding shares in a railway, but that as long as I retained them I felt it incumbent on me to decline all connection with the Admiralty. “Well,” says the noble Lord,

"have you still those shares in the ships?" To which I replied, "No;" because on the occasion of my bringing forward during the last Session circumstances connected with the building of ships for the navy, to which, as an officer, I felt it my duty conscientiously to call attention, there were—I will not say open accusations—but there were inferences drawn, in certain speeches of hon. Gentlemen on that occasion, to the effect that as I was personally connected with a shipbuilding yard, I was therefore desirous of having ships built by contract there, instead of in the dockyards, and was consequently desirous of running down the dockyards. From that moment I determined that it was impossible for a public man, and particularly for a naval man, who wished to take a part in this House which would be beneficial to the service, to continue longer exposed to such suspicions, and that the sooner I got rid of these shares the better. There and then, —and I am bound to add at considerable loss to myself, for everybody knows that last year shipping was much depressed—I sold my shares. After personally accepting the appointment from the noble Lord, I wrote to him as follows:—

"2, Ennismore Place, S.W., June 16, 1859.

"My dear Lord Palmerston,—In accepting the post of Secretary to the Admiralty, I feel it due, no less to your Lordship than myself, that I should advert to the reasons which principally deterred me from joining your Lordship's Government in 1857. I was then, and have been till lately, a shipowner in the Indian and Australian trade, and while so employed I felt I could not conscientiously fill a post where, questions of personal interest to myself might possibly have to be decided; such as contracts for troopships, transports, &c. Various circumstances having induced me to dispose of my shipping property, I am now perfectly free to accept without scruples of conscience the office your Lordship has been good enough to offer me."

Let me acquit the hon. Gentleman who has introduced this subject of any intention to lower my character in this House; I trust that was not his wish, and I am glad to have had the opportunity of making the statement which I have now done, and to offer my sincere gratitude to the House for the kind reception it has met with.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: As my hon. Friend beside me (Mr. Lygon) has spoken already, he is not therefore at liberty again to rise. But I hope the House and the noble Lord will allow me to express what I am sure is the feeling at this side of the House, and which I am glad to believe is shared in by the House at large, that if it be the fact—of which I confess I was not before aware—that rumours of the nature alluded to have been current regarding the noble Lord, it is matter of satisfaction that in this place, where alone opportunity can be given to the noble Lord to meet those rumours, the subject should have been brought forward, and we must all rejoice to feel, after the full and frank explanation which he has given, that neither in nor out of this House can any such rumours continue to prevail.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

The House divided:—Ayes 135; Noes 109: Majority 26.

SUPPLY.—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

House in Committee of Supply. Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(1). £400,000 on account of certain Civil Services.

Printing and Stationery, £30,000.

County Courts (Treasurer's Salaries and Expenses), £35,000.

Constabulary of Ireland (Pay and Allowances), £82,000.

Public Education (Great Britain), £100,000.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH asked whether that sum of £100,000 would include the department of science and art?

MR. LAING explained that the Vote of £100,000 did not include the Vote for science and art, but was merely a payment on account of public education. It would be applied to meet the charges that were running on for public education—for the salaries of schoolmasters and so forth. The total Vote for public education would be £798,000, while last year it was £800,000. They were running into a fifth quarter, and the sum of £100,000 was wanting to keep up the current payments.

MR. BENTINCK said, he understood that the Government merely required a sum on account to take them over the holidays. He should like, then, to know why they asked so large a sum for that purpose as £100,000, when the whole Vote would only amount to £798,000.

MR. LAING said, the Vote for national education was already overdrawn out of the Civil Contingencies, to the extent of £40,000, and heavy payments were to be made in the department before the 10th of June.

Consuls Abroad, £54,000.

Prisons and Convict Establishments at Home, £20,000.

Sundry Commissions (Temporary), £12,000.

MR. WALPOLE said, that this latter was hardly an item to be put into a Vote of credit. At any rate a Vote should only be taken for what was absolutely required at present.

MR. LAING explained that the necessity for the Vote arose from the fact that the amount for the service was overdrawn out of the Civil Contingencies. Under the head of Temporary Commissions, there were extensive Commissions connected with military matters. It was necessary to make provision for the running Commission, and that was done out of the Civil Contingencies; and a sum of £10,700 was required to repay the debt to the Civil Contingencies. The Vote for the Slave Bounties was in a similar position.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he did not consider the explanation of the hon. Gentleman satisfactory, inasmuch as there was a sum of £50,000 to be asked for on credit for the Civil Contingencies. He thought the whole of the Votes in Class 7 of the Civil Service Estimates required peculiar consideration, and should be discussed in their order. As, however, the whole of the accounts were not before the House that was not then possible. There was a Vote, for instance, for the Serpentine? What was the state of that matter? Last year £17,000 had been voted for a certain plan with reference to the Serpentine; but, after that Vote had been passed, and the works commenced, a Committee of the House was appointed, which reported against the plan. Upon that the Government stopped the works; and, not content with that, they had begun to spend money for a different plan. It might now turn out that, when the House came to the discussion of the matter, they might disagree with the Select Committee, and disapprove of that expenditure of the public money without the sanction of the House. If certain items of that class were agreed to, then, of course, the House would lose the power of checking them afterwards.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he must enter his protest against the enormous sums spent on the Military Commissions, and he wished to call particular attention to the case of the Weedon Military Commission. There had been an enormous sum of no less than £9,000—£8,700 rather was the exact amount—charged for professional accountants employed in the investigation of the accounts of the establishment. The Treasury, he believed, had objected to that large amount, because the Commissioners had had the assistance of the clerks of the Commissariat, and of Mr. Commissary General Adams, an officer in the pay of the State. That £8,700 did not include the military clerks, so that altogether the expenses would come to over £10,000, an expenditure perfectly unjustifiable. He wished to know if the present Vote was to include that sum, and also when there would be an opportunity of discussing that Vote, and also the very singular proceedings that had followed the Report of the Commissioners.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he should wish to put the question whether one of the Commissioners of the Weedon Inquiry was not a police magistrate of London, and whether he did receive an allowance for his services on that occasion, though as he (Colonel Dickson) believed, his duties as a magistrate only occupied his time about six months in the year. He quite concurred in the remark of the hon. and gallant Colonel (Colonel Dunne) that the expenditure was quite unjustifiable, and the House was bound not to throw away the public money in that way without inquiry. Hon. Members opposite were constantly charging Gentlemen on his side of the House with being opposed to anything like Reform, and yet he was astonished to find that those hon. Members on the Liberal side, who were invariably preaching economy in the public finances, went out into the lobby and voted away large sums of money in the lump, and without a murmur. What was the use of talking about economy unless the question was brought to some issue?

MR. HUNT said, he wished to know whether the Berwick Bribery Commission had yet commenced its sittings?

MR. TURNER said, an attack had been made on the Weedon Commission which he thought was altogether unjustifiable. He should, when the proper occasion arrived, be able to justify the conduct of the Commissioners; at present he would leave it to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury to answer the question which had been put to him on this subject. He would only now say that, after the immense labour these Commissioners had undergone, he felt it his duty to protest most strongly against the insinuation that they had been guilty of any unjustifiable act.

COLONEL DUNNE explained that he had used the expression solely with regard to the expenditure of the Commissioners on Accountants, and he thought he should be able to prove it was so when the subject came fairly before the House.

MR. CHILDERS said, he thought the sums due to the Civil Contingencies ought to be voted separately, otherwise it might be spent along with the rest, and the public would never know anything about it. Votes taken in that manner might be made the means of cloaking over other matters not thought desirable to be brought to light, which was very objectionable. He wished to know when the details of the sums they were then asked to vote would appear under Civil Contingencies.

MR. LAING said, he would beg to say, in reply to the hon. Member for Pomfret (Mr. Childers), that the sums under the Civil Contingencies List would be explained when the full Estimates were submitted to Parliament. As to the unfortunate Weedon Commission, he was willing to admit that there had been a large expenditure with an inadequate result. The present Vote, however, did not touch any part of that sum. It might perhaps include some portion of the expenses, such as the salary of the secretary, and other minor sums, but not the large claim of nearly £9,000 sent in by the accountants, respecting which the Treasury had felt it to be their duty to take legal opinions on the fact whether they were liable to the whole amount. They had not yet got a decided opinion from their solicitor on that point, and while matters were thus pending he could hardly give a distinct answer as to whether those expenses would or would not be included in the Estimates. Of course if they were they would come under class 7, and there would be an opportunity of discussing them. Hon. Members would not be committed by the present Vote. In reply to the hon. Member for Stamford (Sir S. Northcote), he begged to say that, in order to reduce these two Votes to £400,000 he had gone to the lowest point at which it was possible to conduct the public service up to the 12th of June, without fear of overdrawing. That was the only fund that they had to meet claims that might be made during the next two or three weeks. He should think that the result of the Committee now sitting would be to alter the constitution of Class 7 very considerably. As regarded Class 7, he was ready to give a pledge to the Committee that it should be printed at the earliest opportunity.

MR. BENTINCK asked, if he was to understand the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Laing) as giving a pledge that it was not the intention of the Government to draw again on the amount voted for Civil Contingencies for the purpose of preventing the House from duly considering the Civil Service Estimates.

MR. LAING said that, after a very short period, the Government would be entirely in the hands of the House, because they would have no money in hand to enable them to delay taking the Votes in the usual course, but he could not pledge himself not to ask for a further Vote should there be occasion for it.

MR. W. HUNT asked, what were the Election Commissions the expenses of which they were called upon to vote?

MR. LAING said, that there were the Commissions for Gloucester and Wakefield.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he considered the system very objectionable of borrowing certain amounts for the Civil Service from Civil Contingencies. He had never been able to understand the application of the money. The details did not appear in the public accounts, and in point of fact the House knew nothing about them.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, that the Vote was a practical illustration of the objectionable course of asking for Votes of credit, or on account. He confessed he did not know what he was asked to vote £12,000 for. He did not know what any of the Commissions had cost, and when therefore he was asked blindly to vote such a sum of money, he, for one, should enter his protest against it.

COLONEL SYKES said, he, too, thought it extremely inconvenient to be called upon to vote away money without knowing what it was called for, where it was to go, or how it was to be paid away. There was much mystification in the accounts.

COLONEL DICKSON said, it was quite clear that the Government had sufficient money to carry them on beyond June, and if the present Vote were granted, they would not be furnished with details before the end of July.

MR. BENTINCK said, the first duty of the House was to take cognizance of every shilling they voted, and if they gave one shilling on account they virtually abandoned all control over the details. That point, however, it was useless then to dwell upon. He desired now to have it distinctly understood whether, on the arrival of the 10th or 12th of June, there was any chance of Government declaring that the time had not yet come when the House should have access to the Estimates, and should go into a consideration of the details.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he hoped that some explanation would be given as to the application of the £12,000.

MR. LAING said, the necessity for the Votes arose from the fact that there had been large drafts on the Civil Contingencies for several Commissions, which came on at too late a period to be included in Class 7 of the last year. Of course, those conversant with the accounts must know that Civil Contingencies were the only fund that Government had to meet any miscalculations or mistakes which might have been made in the 197 Votes which were asked for, or any new expenses which might arise during the recess, or during the last few weeks of the sitting of Parliament. A variety of Commissions had originated during the interval, and the amounts had to be drawn from Civil Contingencies. He could assure the Committee that the full details would be brought forward when the complete amount came to be voted. With regard to the remarks of the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), he begged to say that the Government had no mysterious funds hoarded up in order to meet emergencies. There were ample funds in the Exchequer, but there was no power of applying them without a specific Vote, and he thought no Secretary of the Treasury, or Member of the Government, was likely to take the responsibility of applying them without the authority of the House. Therefore, by the 10th or 12th of June, or at all events within two or three days more or less of that time, the Government would find themselves in the position of being obliged to come to the House and declare that their authority was exhausted, and that they must either have a further Vote, or else proceed in voting the Estimates in the usual way.

MR. MOWBRAY said, that the House had already voted £40,000 for Civil Contingencies, they were now asked for £12,000, and they would be asked by-and-by for £50,000 more. Thus the Civil Contingencies which they were asked to vote in this way had risen within a few years from £70,000 to about £100,000. The only conclusion he could draw from the Vote before them was, that it was for the payment of sums which had been withdrawn from the Estimates, and which it was now intended to pay out of this money.

MR. LAING said, if they had only the ordinary demands upon the Civil Contingencies, no doubt the sum of £100,000 would be more than what would be necessary for that department of the public service. But they were now arrived at a period far beyond that at which the Votes were usually obtained. A great many balances were now exhausted; but it was thought to be convenient to the House to reduce the sum required for the present to the lowest amount possible.

MR. WALPOLE said, he thought that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Treasury had dealt frankly and fairly with the Committee. Having listened attentively to all the hon. Gentleman had said, he (Mr. Walpole) was satisfied that the sums asked for were really wanted. The Civil Contingencies Fund was that from which all those small sums must be paid that were not otherwise provided for. The discussion had, however, strongly confirmed the statement of his hon. Friend (Sir S. Northcote) of the great disadvantage of taking Votes on account where the Estimates had not been laid before the House. What had taken place would, he hoped, be considered a warning, not only to the present, but also to all Governments, that the House had acceded to the proposal on the ground of exigency, and that it was not to be repeated without a stronger necessity than had been shown to exist in the present year.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he concurred with his right hon. Friend as to the frankness with which the hon. Secretary for the Treasury had dealt with those Votes. He could only say that if that explanation had been given at an earlier period of the evening he should not have gone out into the lobby against the hon. Secretary's proposition.

Vote agreed to.

Bounties on Slaves, £10,000.

Dublin Police, £7,000.

Civil Contingencies, £50,000.

(2) £2,500 Malta Harbour.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said that the present Vote had become necessary, in consequence of an agreement entered into with the Maltese Government for the construction of certain works in the Harbour of Malta, which would prove most advantageous to the Navy as well as to the Island itself. The reason why this Estimate had not been laid on the Table of the House at an earlier period was, because the Maltese Government had not come to a decision in regard to it until a short time ago. An outline of the plan of the proposed works had been placed in the hands of Members, in order to enable them to form an accurate opinion of their details. Ever since the Island had belonged to the Crown of England, the limits of Merchant Harbour, and that for the men-of-war, had never been clearly defined. The result was, that the merchant vessels had encroached upon the best part of the harbour; so that the men-of-war sometimes had great difficulty in finding a berth. The great addition in the number of ships frequenting the harbour, and the increase in the size of vessels of war, made it imperative to improve the Harbour of Malta, which was in a most unsatisfactory state; although Malta was our head-quarters for repairs, &c. in the Mediterranean. An engineer on the part of the Admiralty had surveyed the harbour in the company of the engineer selected by the Maltese Government, and they had come to the conclusion that the only plan was to deepen the head of the harbour, which was now a swamp, and to give it up to the merchant vessels, while French Creek, which was safe for vessels of war, would be given up for the navy. It was necessary to bring this vote before the Committee to-night, because the work was to be done at the joint expense of the two Governments; and the parties who owned the land around French Creek were only under contract to wait until the middle of June, when the agreement, unless previously confirmed, became null and void. The total estimated expense of the work was £111,000, but he only proposed to ask to-night for £2,500, in addition to the £2,500 which would be found in the Estimates already before the House.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he quite concurred with the noble Lord in the importance of the plan proposed. It was well known that Malta was the key of our position in the Mediterranean. He should have been pleased if the noble Lord had doubled his demand at present, in order that the works might be carried on as rapidly and efficiently as possible. He wished to know whether the quarantine harbour was to be made available.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: I fully concur in the value and importance of the proposed works; and regret that the subject did not receive due consideration many years ago, when, I am persuaded, the Government could have procured the land on more advantageous terms. I am rejoiced at the manner in which the noble Lord has so honourably vindicated his reputation and character from the charges which have been insinuated against him. Having enjoyed for several years the acquaintance of the noble Lord, I can testify that his character is above reproach; and he can well afford to treat such rumours and imputations with indignation and contempt.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wanted to know what proportion of the entire amount of £111,000 was to be defrayed by the Colonial Government?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he saw a sum of £60,000 put down for the purchase of property around the French Creek. That sum, however, was not to be taken immediately, but to be paid in future years. He wished to know how that amount was arrived at, and what security they would have for obtaining the property in question at the sum mentioned?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the contracts had been drawn up with great care. The arrangement was that, as soon as French Creek was deepened, then the property in question was to be paid for and to revert to the Government. As regarded the quarantine harbour, that was not to be made available; inasmuch as it was exposed, and could not be occupied with safety by large ships.

MR. BENTINCK said, he had heard with great pleasure the explanation given by his noble Friend opposite in reply to the charge that had been made against him. The honour of each Member was dear to the House, and they must have all heard the noble Lord's statement with the most unalloyed satisfaction. He (Mr. Bentinck) had certainly listened to it with a double interest, arising from personal friendship towards his noble Friend, whom he had known for many years. He could only say, and he was confident the whole House would confirm it, that no man could have listened to the explanation of his noble Friend without feeling that it removed all doubt—if, indeed, any such doubt existed—as to his noble and gallant Friend having been implicated in any transaction in a way inconsistent with his high character.

MR. PEASE asked if the merchants of Malta were satisfied with the arrangements which had been made.

COLONEL SYKES said, it appeared from the plan of the proposed alterations that it would be necessary to remove an enormous amount of mud. He wished to know what was to become of it—whether it was to be removed to some other part of the island to create a pestilence, or was it to be carried out to sea.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the merchants of Malta were perfectly satisfied with the arrangements made, which had, in fact, originated from their own Government. An estimate had been framed which was based on the probable cost of conveying the mud clear outside the harbour.

MR. HENLEY said, he regretted the short notice that had been given of so important a subject coming before the Committee. The sum, though small, pledged Parliament to an expenditure estimated at upwards of £100,000. Experience showed that the limit at first proposed did not always turn out correct. The noble Lord stated that the thing was narrowed down to this—that if the bargain was not concluded by a certain day in June, it would go off. Now, however desirable it was that the proposed works should be carried out, it was impossible for those who had not a personal knowledge of the harbour to give an opinion upon the subject, from the short period the papers in connection with it had been supplied to hon. Members.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to know whether the contract with the Maltese Government was, that they were to pay half the expense of this work, no matter what might be the amount, or whether the arrangement as to their contribution of a moiety only extended to the estimate before the House.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET replied, that unless the Admiralty had it under hand and seal of the Maltese Government that they would pay one half the whole expenditure—no matter what that might be—the contract would fall to the ground, and the work would not be undertaken. He concurred with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) that it would have been desirable to give the House an earlier intimation of this scheme. At the same time he must observe it was no new thing. The late Government had considered it, and the preparations had been making for several months, but it was only a short time previous that the scheme had arrived at a sufficiently matured state to justify its being placed on the Estimates.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked whether the noble Lord would lay on the table the agreement which had been made with the Maltese Government, and the contract for the purchase of the land that was to cost £60,000.

Colonel Sykes

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that as soon as the contract was concluded, he would lay it on the table.

LORD LOVAINE observed, that this plan had been before the late Government. The Admiralty under that Government were fully convinced of the necessity of some such work as that now proposed, but they had not arrived at any accurate calculation as to the expense, for they had not ascertained what would be the cost of the ground. There was, however, no doubt that, if they had remained in office, they would have brought forward some such scheme.

MR. JOSEPH LOCKE complained that Members should be called upon to vote sums of money upon Estimates which had not received sufficient consideration. The first thing which ought to have been done was to furnish the Committee with the various items of the Estimate, and then to have given hon. Members a chance of seeing whether the sum was proper or not. This was the case of a new work, and there was nothing before them to show whether it was a fit thing to do or not. They ought at least to have had the name of the officer who made the Estimate as a guarantee of its soundness.

MR. WHITBREAD said, he could assure the hon. Member that the Civil Engineer employed by the Admiralty to prepare the Estimate was a gentleman of much experience, and that the calculations had been made with the greatest care.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that as the Government had employed an engineer to measure and calculate the work, it would only have been reasonable to have given a little further time to the House to examine the details, before coming to a decided opinion on the matter. He was afraid the fact that the Admiralty were bargaining against an excess in the Estimate warranted the suspicion that they expected an excess.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, that no doubt the engineer had taken the exact measurement, and made a correct calculation, leaving a margin for contingencies or extras.

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON said, that very scanty information was given to the Committee. There was no account of the acreage of the work or the amount of accommodation to the navy. He wished to know whether there were to be any docks for the merchant service, and whether the expense was included?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, they expected to get accommodation for six line-of-battle ships and two frigates, but if they grew much larger there would be room for only five line-of-battle ships. As to any new merchant yards, in lieu of those which the Government purchased, the Government would have nothing to do with any buildings on shore. Their business was to deepen the harbour. The purchase of the French Creek, and all the buildings which surrounded it, was included in the Estimate of £60,000.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT inquired whether it was certain that the depth in the new harbour would be sufficient for the larger ships?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that this had been ascertained.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH observed, that there were no soundings given on the map.

MR. WHITBREAD said, that the small map presented to the House had been prepared since the previous evening. The large map from which it had been prepared had on it a great amount of detailed information that had not been copied on the smaller one. As to the objection of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley), he should observe that the Government would have given more ample notice, but there had been many references from the Admiralty to Malta, and they found by experience that when it became known the Government intended to purchase, the property trebled in value. If the estimate were postponed to a future day, the agreement to sell the property would become void.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had to propose a Resolution requiring the makers of British wines to take out licences for either making or selling the same wholesale, the amount of which was fixed at half the amount which the venders paid. The right hon. Gentleman moved—

"That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty there shall be charged and paid the following Duties of Excise, that is to say—For a Licence to be taken out by every maker of any kind of Sweets or Made Wines, or of Mead or Metheglin, for sale or by any dealer who shall sell the same in any quantity amounting to two gallons or upwards, or in one dozen or more reputed quart bottles at one time, £5 5s."

MR. AYRTON thought the right hon. Gentleman was taking effectual means to prevent the public getting good wine at all. As far as he could discover, before dealing in wines a trader would have to pay £19 19s. for licences, which was a large tax to impose on a person before he could embark in business. The greatest chance of the public having good wine was in the establishment of many traders who would deal in it wholesale and retail, and he had hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would have proposed one consolidated charge, after payment of which the dealer would be able to sell any quantity, large or small, as long as it was in bottle. With regard to British wine, it was much purer than a great deal of that which came from abroad. The process of manufacture here was, that dried grapes were placed in a vat with water, the juice being pressed out of them and allowed to ferment; and the wine thus produced was consumed in large quantities by people who were above the vulgar prejudice of thinking that that which came from abroad and had a high-sounding name was better than home productions. The whole tendency of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposals was to force the sale of wine upon the premises. It was his impression the other evening, on coming out of Committee, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended the Bill to extend to British wines. The night after the right hon. Gentleman stated that it was to be confined to the sale of foreign wine. Did the right hon. Gentleman, he would ask, intend, according to promise, to bring in another Bill regulating the sale of British wine to be drunk on the premises? As the case stood Parliament was called upon to alter our municipal law to promote the consumption of a foreign commodity, while it did nothing to extend the consumption of an article made in our own country.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he must really decline to follow the hon. Member into a discussion of the Wine Licences Bill. It might have been supposed that the hon. Gentleman had spoken long enough during the course of this discussion, but he seemed quite insatisfiable. As to the necessity of a new law respecting the consumption of British wine he was not aware that any such necessity existed, nor did he remember to have promised the introduction of any measure on the subject. What he said was that the sale of British wine might be regulated by the existing law. With regard to British wine, which the hon. Member seemed to think was made much more legitimately here from raisins than by expression from the grape in the country of its birth, it was to be remembered that these raisins were imported at a low duty, whereas the foreign wine paid a high rate of duty. The hon. Member, of course, could not be expected to sympathize with the exchequer in such a case; but the two articles contributed to the revenue in very unequal degrees, and this was an element which could not be entirely left out of consideration. A difference was recognised in the amount paid for licences—namely, ten guineas for a wholesale foreign wine, and five guineas for a British wine licence; but he should have no objection to allow persons who paid the higher amount to deal in both kinds of wine.

MR. BOVILL said, he thought it would be difficult to interpret the expressions "sweets" and "made wines" to be found in the Bill. Would "sweets" include "bitters?" Then a large proportion of port and sherry was manufactured in and about London, elder wine and logwood being prime ingredients in the former concoction. Within a short distance of that House there was a manufactory of champagne from rhubarb. Would those be "made wines" within the meaning of the Resolution?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the expressions objected to were certainly not to be justified upon abstract grounds, and fell short of the standard of purity which the hon. and learned Member wished to set up in the wording of the Act. But they were in accordance with usage, and would be, he believed, adequate for the purpose. "Sweets," he was informed, was the legal description of British wines, and "made wines" would comprise any of the other miscellaneous compounds sold under the name of wine.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolved,

SIR JOHN BARNARD'S ACT, &c. REPEAL BILL—SECOND READING.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [19th April], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

MR. BENTINCK said, he rose to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. He believed he might safely say that the distinguished statesman whose name had been so often brought before the House, never contemplated the celebrity which he was to acquire in after times. Strongly as he felt on this question—[A laugh.]—That laugh proceeded from some hon. Gentleman who was probably altogether indifferent about the morality of the country. He felt strongly on this question because he thought it was an important one. Hon. Gentlemen would remember that some complications had arisen in the earlier stages of the financial arrangements which suggested the measure, and it was accordingly transferred from the position it occupied in another Act, and made a separate Bill. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and other hon. Members who had advocated the measure had nearly all regarded it in different lights, and he believed all of them had seen it in a wrong light. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, with that power of language which always characterized his remarks, had contrived to a certain extent to mystify the House upon the subject. The right hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to show that the effects of Sir J. Barnard's Act were extremely inconvenient to trade; that they interfered with the business of the City; that the public morality had really no connection with this question, and that therefore the objections to this Bill were totally unfounded. Now, in the first place, if Sir J. Barnard's Act had been so extremely inconvenient to trade, it would hardly have been allowed to exist for 130 years. That Act could not have done much harm if it had done no good. The truth was that the first two or three lines of the preamble of the Act itself contained the whole gist of the matter—namely, “Whereas great inconvenience has arisen by the wicked, pernicious, and destructive practice of stockjobbing,” &c. The object of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was to place a penny stamp on time bargains, and to do that it was necessary to defend the principle of time bargains. Upon this question he (Mr. Bentinck) took issue with the right hon. Gentleman. A pamphlet had been sent to him (Mr. Bentinck), in which he found the following statement referring to a great authority in City matters:—

“The Times is aware that credit is lower on the Stock Exchange among themselves than among any other mercantile body; that, in addition to seventy failures in May, 1857, there were thirty-seven failures declared publicly, after which The Times declared that there was no such gambling to be found on the turf, or in any London gambling hells, or at any German watering-place.”

That was the opinion expressed by The Times newspaper, and yet how was the law carried out? Persons were frequently taken up for betting, and fined; and recently a publican, who had for many years carried on his business near Grosvenor-square, was refused his licence because he allowed persons to bet in a subscription-room in his house, upon the door of which was marked “private.” Betting upon horse races was an amusement indulged in by the highest persons in the land, and what were its immoralities compared with the vices of the system which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to legalize? The comparison could only be paralleled by the comparison of an angel to a fiend. Then how could the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer be so indifferent upon a question of public morals—and this was essentially so—as to propose the repeal of a Bill the real object of which was to discourage such proceedings? A melancholy case had lately been brought before our criminal courts of a man who had succeeded in defrauding a bank of more than a quarter of a million, and the explanation of its disposal was, he had speculated in time bargains. In no other place than the Stock Exchange could so much money have been wasted in the time. The gambling on the Stock Exchange, indeed, was perfectly unlimited, extending to hundreds, thousands, and millions. ANother important consideration was the manner in which the repeal of this Bill would affect the immense funds placed by the depositors in savings banks in the hands of the Government. It had been said, however, that Sir J. Barnard's Act might be construed into interfering with perfectly bona fide transactions on the Stock Exchange when the delivery was not immediate. He admitted such might have been the case. But his hon. Friend (Mr. Bovill) had lately sought leave to introduce a Bill the effect of which would have been to repeal all the objectionable features of this Act, retaining that portion which would apply to the malpractices to which he had alluded. Yet, strange to say, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had refused to agree to the introduction of that Bill, but was now endeavouring to repeal the only good that could be done by the Act. Without it was understood to be an admitted proposition that gambling was beneficial, he really could not see any ground for the repeal of Sir J. Barnard's Act, and he therefore hoped the House would not sanction it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the admirable speech he lately made at Edinburgh, had said that a hope of an enduring fame was, without doubt, a great incentive to virtuous actions. He (Mr. Bentinck) would like to know, supposing some pert young student of the north had risen just after that sentiment had been expressed, in the harmonious terms always adopted by the right hon. Gentleman, and had said, “That is all very well, but how about the repeal of Sir John Barnard's Act?” He thought the right hon. Gentleman would have found it rather a difficult question to answer. He could only say that this Bill was an unwarrantable attack on the morals of the people for the sake of putting a few pence into the public Exchequer, and he therefore moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.”

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he was glad that issue had been at length joined on the Bill, after so many postponements, and that there was some chance of laying the wandering ghost of Sir John Barnard at last. He trusted that the House would find no difficulty in acceding to the second reading of this Bill. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bentinck) had ad-

verted to the case which had recently occurred, in which the servant of a bank had disposed of large funds belonging to his employers in gambling transactions on the Stock Exchange. There was no doubt those defalcations had occurred, and had arisen out of gambling in the Funds, but the case had, in fact, no legitimate bearing on this question. If it had any, it argued rather in favour of the Bill than against it, for it showed the utter insufficiency of Sir J. Barnard's Act to prevent such transactions. It was but one of many instances, well known in the legal and commercial world, which showed that the Act, notwithstanding its stringency in terms, and probably owing to that stringency, and its cumbrous machinery, was a dead letter. The hon. Gentleman asserted, too, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, zealous for the finances of the country, had overlooked the dictates of honour and morality, and, for the sake of getting a small revenue out of contracts on the Stock Exchange, was prepared to do away with one of the existing barriers against gambling; but the answer to that was very simple. In fact, supposing the Act were repealed the next day, the law would still remain abundantly efficacious against gambling transactions. The law as to the invalidity of time bargains would remain just where it was, and the inducement to use stamps on the Stock Exchange or not to use them, would be just the same. There were two main enactments in Sir J. Barnard's Act. The first and the few following clauses were directed against time-bargains. They were declared void; and penalties were made recoverable at the suit of a common informer against all persons who might enter into them. Time bargains were defined thus in a judgment of Baron Alderson in the Court of Exchequer:—

“Sir J. Barnard's Act was intended to prevent gambling transactions where stock was not delivered, and where all that was recovered was compensation for a fictitious sale, which was merely imaginary between the parties—in truth, nothing more nor less than a gambling transaction or bet as to the price of stock.”

Had there been no subsequent enactment he should have been very much disposed to agree with the hon. Member for West Norfolk, in the expediency of retaining this portion of Sir J. Barnard's Act. The 8th and following sections of the Act rendered illegal, under penalties recoverable by a common informer, the mere fact of a person not possessed of particular stock entering into a contract to sell that stock. That clause prohibited a class of dealings perfectly wholesome and legitimate, which had been common on the Stock Exchange when the Act was passed, and which had continued to prevail there, notwithstanding it, ever since. Nobody, he believed, objected to the repeal of those sections. The question then arose whether the House would repeal the 8th clause and those bearing on it by themselves, or whether they would repeal the whole Act? By the 18th section of the 8th & 9th of Victoria, chap. 109, commonly called the Gaming and Wagering Act, it was provided in effect that every contract, however made, by way of gaming and wagering, should be null and void. The difference between this Act and Sir J. Barnard's Act was simply this,—that, while the Act of Victoria prohibited gaming and wagering with respect to every kind of vendible commodity, Sir J. Barnard's Act prohibited them with respect to only one species of property—namely, stock in the British Funds. The latter Act had no reference to foreign stocks, to railway stocks, or to any one of the innumerable kinds of property which might be made the subject of dealing, with the single exception of the British Funds. If it were disputed whether the Gaming and Wagering Act really applied to gambling contracts in the British Funds, every lawyer knew that it was now too late to raise that question; for it had been decided by the Court of Common Pleas that a colourable contract for the sale and purchase of railway shares, where the parties intended only to pay the difference, according to the rise and fall in the market, was gaming, within the Act of the 8th & 9th of Victoria. It followed, therefore, that the provisions of that Act would equally apply to wagering in the British Funds; and the apprehensions of the hon. Member for Norfolk that, if Sir J. Barnard's Act were repealed, fresh encouragement would be given to gambling in the Funds, were not well founded. The real truth was that Sir J. Barnard's Act had proved inefficient, and had practically been a dead letter, and, upon its repeal its place would be occupied by the Act of Victoria, which had been found beneficial and effective for its purpose.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he had stated when this question was originally mooted, that as regards the repeal of Sir J. Barnard's Act he should vote with the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but he entertained the suspicion that the present Bill was not introduced simply to repeal Sir J. Barnard's Act, but as a portion of the Budget for the purpose of getting a revenue from contracts void under that Act. He believed that the effect of 8th & 9th Vict. was not known to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that the present Bill formed an essential part of the Budget, its object being to allow those contracts which were void under Sir J. Barnard's Act to be valid. If a Bill had been brought forward to sweep away Sir J. Barnard's Act as being obsolete, no suspicion would have been created, but when the present Bill was proposed as an essential portion of the Budget, suspicion was naturally engendered. The hon. and learned Solicitor General had said that the opponents of this Bill need not have raised the ghost of Sir J. Barnard, and sent him wandering through the House. To carry on the metaphor, he (Mr. Edwin James) would apostrophise this Bill as Hamlet did the ghost of his father:—

"Thou com'st in such a questionable shape, That I will speak to thee."

Mr. HANKEY said, the members of the Stock Exchange had very naturally objected to the stamp duty which the Chancellor of the Exchequer sought to impose on contracts to which they were parties. They had waited upon the right hon. Gentleman, and put forward representations as to the onerous and unjust nature of the tax, and they had also asked to be relieved from liability to certain penalties imposed by an obsolete Act on transactions which in themselves he maintained to be perfectly legitimate, and in accordance with the usages of the present day. Time bargains were frequently the most convenient mode in which investments could be made; and as long as the seller of stock fulfilled his contract, he did not believe the legitimacy of the transaction ought to be affected by the period at which it came into his possession. For instance, if a gentleman, being left as trustee, or in any other capacity, had £50,000 to invest, he would go a stockbroker and desire him to purchase stock to that amount. The broker would, of course, buy it in at the most favourable times, and would make a contract with the gentleman to deliver the whole amount of stock on a particular day. In many kinds of marketable securities it was impossible that business could be carried on in any other way. Foreign stocks and railways, for instance, were not dealt in from day to day, but at stated intervals. Transactions in reference to them he regarded as by no means of an equally gambling character with fire insurances, where the agreement was clearly in the nature of a bet. The hon. and learned Member for Guildford (Mr. Bovill) had used a very strong expression when he applied the word "gambling" to the transactions of the members of the Stock Exchange, but he could mention places where practices much more open to objection were carried on without question. The bargains in stock were based upon sound commercial principles, and great practical inconvenience would be felt, if, owing to any reason, these were put a stop to. The gentlemen of the Stock Exchange were quite justified in their desire to have the character of illegality removed from their proceedings, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with their representations before him, had acted most properly in undertaking as far as in him lay to accomplish the repeal of Sir J. Barnard's Act.

Mr. BOVILL said, he had not intended to charge the Members of the Stock Exchange with gambling. He regretted that the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Hankey) or his friends had not availed themselves of the assistance of the Solicitor General, who would have told them that some of the transactions as to which they entertained such unpleasant apprehensions were perfectly legal, and were not declared to be otherwise by Sir John Barnard's Act, although, as the language of the Act was obscure, he (Mr. Bovill) was not surprised at the mistake having occurred. He had been delighted to hear from the hon. Gentleman the history of this measure, which, it now appeared, had been introduced, not from any pressing necessity for the amendment of the law, and consequently had not been intrusted to the law officers of the Crown, but in fulfilment of a contract between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Stock Exchange for the legalizing of gambling transactions. The House had been made acquainted that Session with a great many measures for the amendment of the law, but the proposal under consideration had originated from the Resolution by the Committee to grant a penny stamp duty on contracts, provided Sir John Barnard's Act was repealed. In drawing up the Bill for this purpose the able assistance of the hon. and learned Solicitor General had not been invoked, and the law officers had not even seen the Bill; but the Government had recourse to the assistance of some person so wholly inexperienced that it was first boldly proposed to repeal an Act, the operation of which only lasted for three years, and which expired nearly a century ago. It was now manifest by the speech to which the House had listened that no real amendment of the law was contemplated, the only object being to carry out the agreement by which in return for a penny stamp the Chancellor of the Exchequer was to bargain away the morality of the country. He remembered the feeling of utter astonishment with which in the first instance he had heard the Chancellor of the Exchequer introduce the subject by laying it down that, as it was impossible to prevent those transactions, it was better to render them legitimate, and to turn them into a source of revenue. What portion of the community, he would ask, had ever complained of the provisions of Sir John Barnard's Act; what classes had petitioned for its repeal, and what were the grounds suggested for sweeping away that enactment? The hon. and learned Solicitor General being uninformed as to the true reasons for the repeal of the measure, had ascribed the Bill now before the House to the fact that Sir John Barnard's Act was a dead letter. Had the House ever before heard of a case in which it was thought necessary to impede other useful legislation, and to keep a Bill on the paper night after night for a month, whose simple object was to repeal an obsolete and ineffective Act of Parliament? He ventured to think it was precisely because it was not a dead letter, and because its provisions were found a serious obstacle to the carrying out of those illegitimate gambling transactions that some parties were so eager for its repeal. He had lately prepared at considerable trouble a Bill, preserving all that was useful in Sir John Barnard's Act to prevent gambling, and sweeping away the obsolete provisions. Unless the Government wished to sanction these illegal practices, he asked why had they refused to accept his Bill? He would tell the House why. It was because it would not have fulfilled the compact between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Stock Exchange for a total repeal of that Act. The hon. and learned Solicitor General had said that Sir John Barnard's Act did not stop gambling; but, because Acts of Parliament were not sufficient to repress the evils they were intended to remedy, that was no reason why they should be repealed. Gaming-houses existed, but nobody would seriously propose to repeal the Acts against gaming. It was singular that with Sir John Barnard's Act before him the hon. and learned Solicitor General had omitted to state almost the only important part which affected the Stock Exchange. By that Act gambling transactions were prohibited, a penalty was imposed, and a bill of discovery was authorized to be filed, but there was also this further and most awkward provision, that if time bargains were made by way of wagering and gambling, the money so paid on such time bargains might be recovered back by the person who paid it. Would any person tell him that that was not a restriction on the facility for gambling? It was a restriction, and that was the reason which made the Stock Exchange so anxious for its repeal. The Government proposed to leave gambling under the Act of 1845, but that Act did not say that money paid upon time bargains might be recovered back. He repeated that the effect of the repeal would be to encourage gambling, and if they encouraged it in one case, they would have the small tradesman resorting to the Stock Exchange for the purpose of retrieving his fallen fortunes, and he should vote against the second reading of the Bill.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, that he had listened with great attention to the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down, because he was in hopes that his hon. Friend would have shown that Sir John Barnard's Act was of some use. His hon. and learned Friend had failed to do so. He had failed to show that it had ever punished anybody who had committed a bad act on the Stock Exchange. He had failed to show that it had prevented such acts. It had, indeed, been a terror to honest and respectable people, but was ineffectual either for the punishment or prevention of fraud. Such was his hon. Friend's admiration of this useless Act, that he had brought in a Bill to perpetuate some of its provisions, but with what result? His hon. Friend had not been able to find one Member of the House to support him and his Bill was negatived without a division. His hon. and learned Friend had addressed the House that as a common jury, and a very common jury indeed, but he had failed to convince them that it would be unwise to pursue the course to which they were invited by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in repealing the Act in question. It was said that the Act was to be repealed in consequence of a bargain which had been made between the gentlemen of the Stock Exchange and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In making that bargain he thought the right hon. Gentleman had done quite right. The gentlemen of the Stock Exchange disliked the imposition of a penny stamp on their contracts, and they said, here was an Act for which none but antiquaries could have any respect, but which did, in some way or other, interfere with stock transactions. The Chancellor of the Exchequer gave up to the Stock Exchange this worthless Act, and in return it gave the right hon. Gentleman a penny on each transfer. The hon. Member for Guildford had supported the hon. Member for West Norfolk, a gentleman for whom he (Mr. Locke) entertained the highest respect, but as he sat on the opposite side of the House, he did not place the same unlimited confidence in his judgment as the hon. Member for Guildford was pleased to do, and therefore he (Mr. Locke) was not disposed to support him on this occasion. These two hon. Members had hunted the ghost of the unfortunate gentleman up and down that House for the last three weeks; but he (Mr. Locke) trusted that this evening it would be finally laid.

MR. HUBBARD said, that when the subject was first mooted he had ventured to express his regret that the repeal of Sir John Barnard's Act should have been brought forward in the shape of a clause in the Stamp Act, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer appeared surprised at the objection he made; but his surprise must have long since vanished, considering the nature of the objections the circumstance had produced. That circumstance had given rise to an assertion that the object of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was to raise a revenue by a stamp duty upon contract transactions, which in themselves were illegal and immoral, and so legalize those transactions. No stamp of any amount would make moral and legal transactions that were illegal and immoral in their very nature. Many cases came before the Courts of law which depended on documents evidently given for an immoral consideration. Whether such documents were required to be stamped or not he did not know, but he was sure no stamp would render them legal. He denied, however, that there had been any mystery or concealment about the compact of the Government to repeal Sir J. Barnard's Act. The repeal was made a condition in a clause of the very Bill that imposed the penny stamp. Nothing could be more open than the way in which the Government had brought the matter before the House. The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) had quoted a passage from The Times, written several years ago, giving a very vivid description of the immorality of the Stock Exchange gambling. Evidently, then, Sir J. Barnard's Act had not prevented gambling transactions. But what were its negative effects? The chief objection to the measure was, not that it prevented transactions in the Funds of an objectionable kind; but that men, and those not mere gamblers only, sometimes took advantage of it to defraud those whom they had employed to operate on the Stock Exchange. But, as a London merchant, he must speak in behalf of a body of men who had been much maligned by Sir J. Barnard's Act itself and also by much that had been said during this debate. Did the charge of immorality apply only to time bargains in the Funds? Did it not equally apply to similar transactions in foreign Funds and many great articles of consumption, in which speculations were made of enormous extent and value, and which were quite as ruinous as any gambling in the Funds? Fortunes were lost and made by lucky time bargains in indigo and cotton, and nobody took exception to them. In fact, they could not be prevented, and it was an excessive detriment to liberty of action to fetter it merely because in its abuse it led to bargains which they might call immoral. The repeal of Sir J. Barnard's Act now stood on its own merits, and by voting for that repeal he should not consider himself bound to vote for the penny stamp. He found in the Parliamentary History a note of Tindal the historian, to which he begged the attention of the House:—

"The friends of this Bill were disappointed in its being passed. They had endeavoured to possess the public with the notion that the greater part of the Minister's (Sir Robert Walpole's) power and income and that of his friends arose from stock jobbing, and that as he was in the secret of affairs at home and abroad, he made use of his knowledge to influence the funds to the advantage of himself and his creatures. The notion was not more injurious to his character than it was false in itself, and he treated it with a becoming disdain by suffering the Bill to pass, though some parts were contrary to his private judgment."

He should vote unhesitatingly for the repeal of a statute which was in its spirit utterly opposed to the policy of the present day, and which, as he had shown, had originated in party strife and personal malevolence.

MR. MALINS said, that on that occasion he felt compelled to vote against those with whom he usually acted. They could not go into the motives which led to the passing of Sir John Barnard's Act, but must look at the present state of the law and consider whether they ought not to repeal the act. The Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to put a tax upon the gentlemen of the Stock Exchange, and they came to him and said there was a certain Act of Parliament which might act oppressively towards them—which was a public inconvenience, and it would much reconcile them to the new stamp duty if the right hon. Gentleman would remove that inconvenience. He agreed to do so and in his (Mr. Malin's) opinion the bargain was a perfectly fair and open one on both sides, and ought to be carried out. Sir John Barnard's Act would, if rigidly acted upon, debar any stockbroker from selling stock unless he had it in his possession. What would the House say if a railway company were to insist that, before he began his contract, the contractor was bound to produce all his iron and wood to satisfy his employers that the contract would be carried into effect? If morality was only to be preserved by Sir John Barnard's Act, it must have been destroyed long ago. [Divide!"] As the House seemed impatient, he would content himself with saying this, that if the principle of Sir John Barnard's Act was right, it fell far short of what it ought to do, because it ought to include bargains in the foreign funds, in timber, and other commodities. He agreed with the learned Solicitor General in thinking that there was sufficient protection against illegal transactions, by the 8th and 9th Victoria, and that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer acted wisely in seeking to repeal this Act.

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to state in one or two words the reasons which would guide him in the vote he was about to give. It had been openly stated and not contradicted, that a bargain had been made between the right hon. Gentleman and certain parties on the Stock Exchange, by which, in consideration of the repeal of this Act, they consented to pay the tax. Now, he did not pretend to be very conversant with what went on inside that place, but he believed they were a very shrewd set of fellows that frequented the Stock Exchange, and that they never would have consented to pay this penny tax upon every one of their transactions unless they found that this Act put them to some special inconvenience. He had almost arrived at that conclusion before, but he was confirmed in it by the observations of his hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard). His hon. Friend said that transactions of a certain kind went on there—that men sometimes fell among thieves, that they got robbed; that these time bargains, very honourable no doubt, could not be carried out; and that the Act prevented the carrying of them out being enforced. Now that convinced him that a great deal of gambling went on there which the Members were desirous of legalizing. His hon. Friend said it was of great benefit to the country, but he was not of that opinion; he thought it worked great mischief, and therefore he would vote for the Amendment.

Mr. Hubbard

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he also wished to state in a sentence the grounds on which he would vote against the second reading of this Bill. It totally repealed an Act in which he found several good provisions, particularly in bringing the light of publicity to bear on the transactions of the Stock Exchange. It was clear that the Stock Exchange was wiser than the House, for that body was endeavouring to make regulations to prevent the repetition of such disgraceful transactions as had lately allowed a quarter of a million sterling to be lost there. Now one of the provisions of Sir John Barnard's Act was, that a public register should be kept of all transactions that took place on the Stock Exchange, by which the light of day had been let in upon them. He therefore could not agree to the total repeal of the Act, though he should not have objected to its amendment.

MR. BUTT said, that if an informer were to bring a qui tam action against a respectable merchant on the faith of the provisions of this Bill, the House would act as it did in the case of the qui tam actions for horse-racing—it would not only repeal the Act, but pass an ex post facto law to prevent the enforcement of the penalties. He should support the second reading.

MR. VANSITTART said, he regretted to see the Chancellor of the Exchequer, having recklessly thrown away millions of the public revenue, now attempting to get it back by having recourse to the pettifoggish expedient—wholly unworthy of a Chancellor of the Exchequer—of the imposition of a penny stamp upon every document connected with commerce, and upon every movement in our warehouses. They had had evidence that evening of the fact that the right hon. Gentleman had actually been negotiating with the Stock Exchange in this matter, with a view to obtain from it a miserable contribution towards filling up the deficit which he had so wantonly made.

Question put, "That the word "now" stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 181, Noes 58: Majority 123.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for Tomorrow.

EXCISE AND ASSESSED TAXES ACT.

COMMITTEE. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

MR. MASSEY in the Chair.

Question again proposed,—

"That in lieu of the Duties now payable on Game Certificates in Great Britain and Ireland respectively, there shall be charged the following Duties of Excise:—

For a Licence to be taken out by every person who shall use any dog, gun, net, or other engine for the purpose of taking or killing any game whatever, or any woodcock, snipe, quail, or landrail, or any conies, or any deer, or shall take or kill by any means whatever, or shall assist in any manner in the taking or killing, by any means whatever, of any game, or any woodcock, snipe, quail, or landrail, or any coney, or any deer:—

If such Licence shall be taken out after the 5th day of April and before the 1st day of November,

To expire on the 5th day of April in the following year 3 0 0

To expire on the 31st day of October in the same year in which the Licence shall be taken out 2 0 0

If such Licence shall be taken out on or after the 1st day of November,

To expire on the 5th day of April following 2 0 0"

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he rose to move a Resolution on the subject of Game Certificates. He had made a good deal of inquiry with respect to it, both in conjunction with the Revenue Department and gentlemen interested in the matter; the result of which he believed to be a plan which was simple in itself and also workable, although it was not that which the Revenue Department preferred. It was that a game certificate taken out for the whole season should be

£3; and for a moiety of the season, including three months to or from October 31st, £2. That was the essence of the scheme. There was no alteration whatever in the law except with regard to deer; although the phraseology might be such as to give rise to some question. Deer would now be considered as game, and, of course, the shooting of deer would require a certificate to be taken out as in the case of other game. There was also a Resolution entitling a person having the right to kill game, to authorize any servant chargeable to the assessed taxes to kill game upon the same lands upon payment of the duty of £2.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY observed that the Resolution was not on the paper; he suggested that it ought to have been printed.

MR. BENTINCK said, he wished to take that opportunity of pointing out to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he had, in dealing with the subject, considered the question too much as a question of finance, and too little as a question of public convenience and advantage. The effect of the proposal would be to cause many people to take out game certificates who would not otherwise do so, and to encourage day poaching in districts where game was preserved. This would lead to scenes of violence between keepers and poachers by day as well as by night. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would carefully reconsider the subject.

MR. FELLOWES said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consent to adjournment, in order that the Resolution might be printed. It was really most important that hon. Members should know what they were going to do.

MR. KNIGHTLEY moved that the Chairman report progress.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had been under a misapprehension, thinking that the subject was before the Committee when he was absent. He did not advert to the fact that the Resolution had not been printed. He certainly quite agreed that progress should be reported under the circumstances. The Resolution would of course be printed.

LORD FERMOY said, he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not mean that a farmer would require to take out a licence at £2 or £3 to shoot rabbits, which were vermin.

MR. M'CANN said, rabbits were a great nuisance, and farmers were obliged to employ persons to destroy them. It would be very hard to require a farmer to take out a licence for that purpose.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, there was no alteration in the existing law in the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, except in the matter of the licences, and that farmers were allowed to kill rabbits without a certificate.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, he was glad the right hon. Gentleman had given up the idea of £1 certificates at the end of the season, and he was entitled to every credit for having done so. Every poacher would have availed himself of such a privilege.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, he wished to know whether the question was to be considered on financial or moral grounds? The fact was, that violent encounters and bloodshed occurred so often in various parts of the country, in relation to the game laws, that if hon. Gentlemen went into the question in a moral point of view, some inquiry ought to be made as to whether a stop could not be put to those outrages, which filled the gaols with prisoners, and caused an amount of evil which was almost incalculable in the counties where they occurred. He called the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the fact, to show that if the House really proceeded to consider the Game Laws at all, they should go into the whole case.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn. House resumed; Committee report progress; to sit again on Thursday next.

PIERS AND HARBOURS BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. PAULL said, he had to move that the Order for the Committee on the Bill be discharged for the purpose of having the Bill referred to a Select Committee.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he did not think that that was a Bill that ought to be sent to a Select Committee, as it proposed to levy rates on shipping, and to take out of the hands of Parliament the power which it now possessed as to levying rates, and to place it in the hands of the Board of Admiralty. He apprehended the House was not prepared to allow the Admiralty to take compulsorily land on the shores of the kingdom. The House alone ought to have jurisdiction in such matters. He would move that the Bill be committed that day six months if he were supported.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he would remind the House that on the second reading of the Bill, his hon. Friend (Mr. Paull), who had charge of it, consented, in deference to a wish then generally expressed, to submit it to a Select Committee, and that he was now endeavouring to give effect to that wish.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, the propriety of referring the Bill to a Select Committee had been under the consideration both of the Admiralty and the Board of Trade, and they had come to the conclusion that as the Bill had been read a second time after full discussion, it was desirable that it should go to a Select Committee, with the view to a consideration of what powers should be given to a department of the Executive Government for promoting harbour improvements. It was desirable that his right hon. Friend (Mr. Bouverie) should know that the subjects in question would not be altogether removed from the jurisdiction of the House, inasmuch as any provisional orders to be made under the Bill would have to receive the assent of Parliament.

MR. PAULL replied.

Order for Committee read, and discharged.

" Bill committed to Lord CLARENCE PAGET, Mr. MILNER GIBSON, Lord ROBERT CECIL, Colonel WILSON PATTEN, Mr. CORRY, the JUDGE ADVOCATE, Mr. EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, Mr. TALBOT, Mr. GORE LANGTON, Mr. BUCHANAN, Mr. M'MAHON, Mr. BLACKBURN, Mr. Serjeant KINGLE, Mr. RIDLEY, and Mr. PAULL:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records: Five to be the quorum."

METROPOLIS LOCAL MANAGEMENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [15th May], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

LORD FERMOY was understood to oppose the progress of the measure at so advanced a period of the night.

MR. CRAWFORD said, that he thought the Bill objectionable in many particulars, but in the belief that it would be properly scrutinized in Committee, he would give his assent to the second reading.

MR. JOHN LOCKE contended that there were grave objections to the Bill on the ground that the Metropolitan Board of Works were about to usurp the power of the vestries, and cause parishes to pay excessive taxation. The board also proposed to retain their present elective system, although by the constitution they were not elected by the ratepayers, but by the vestries, and the members elected did not fairly represent the Metropolitan districts. Some provision ought to be made in the Bill for an alteration in their constitution. If these points were attended to in Committee he had no objection, but the Bill must be almost entirely remodelled. He would move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, in order to enable the hon. Member for Bath to explain more fully its objects. The hon. Member concluded by moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. TITE explained the object of the Bill, which was to apportion more fairly the drainage and sewerage expenses among the districts of the Metropolis. There was a debt of £200,000 to be paid off, the payment of which was in the first instance divided among forty districts, upon some of which it pressed very severely in proportion to the amount of benefit they had derived. The Metropolitan Board of Works proposed to take £73,000 of the debt for the main drainage of the Metropolis, which would relieve some of the parishes, and allow of a fair distribution of the remaining sum. It was not proposed, however, to make any alteration in the mode of electing the members of the Metropolitan Board, as the system had hardly had a fair trial. The Bill was the result of careful deliberation, and the Committee which he would have the honour to propose would have the power to take further evidence and propose such modifications as would be thought most effectual in accomplishing the objects for which it had been framed. It was, however, a matter which pressed, as unless the Bill passed, the Board would have to enforce an unjust payment from several parishes.

MR. AYRTON said, he thought the House had great cause to complain that the Metropolitan Board of Works should ask them at the end of May to pass a Bill consisting of more than 100 clauses. They ought to pause before it gave any more power to the Metropolitan Board of Works so long as it was constituted on its present basis.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he could not understand why this Bill was not brought forward at an earlier period of the Session, if the Metropolitan Board were anxious to have the money that was due properly apportioned. However, he would not oppose the proposition for the second reading, with a view to the Bill being referred to a Select Committee; but he must reserve to himself the right of opposing the Bill after it came back from the Committee, if it was not materially improved.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he objected to a great many clauses in the Bill. Many of the powers given by the Bill were extremely arbitrary.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^o, and committed to a Select Committee.

SITTING OF CONVOCATION.

QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Her Majesty's Government have advised The Queen to sanction the sitting of Convocation in the provinces of Canterbury and York for any other than the ordinary purpose of adjournment?

SIR GEOEGE LEWIS said, that at the end of last February the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury passed a Resolution for an Address to the Crown praying that they might receive permission to revise the 29th Canon, the principal provision of which prevented a parent from being the godfather or godmother of his or her child. It was not by law competent for Convocation to consider the alteration of a canon without the previous permission of the Crown. That application had been taken into consideration by the Government, and they had advised Her Majesty that the prayer of the petition should be complied with, so that the Convocation of Canterbury had received permission to revise that Canon. In order to complete that revision it would then be necessary to submit the amended Canon to the Crown before it would have any valid effect. There had been no application from the Convocation of York for a like permission.

GOVERNMENT LAND AT PORTSMOUTH. QUESTION.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Land, or a portion of it, which has recently been bought at a high price by Government for the defences of Portsmouth, was not formerly in the possession of Government, and sold by them a few years back at a comparatively cheap rate; whether there was not, at the time of selling such Land, an official Plan for the defence of Portsmouth, embracing such Land, in the hands of Government, or of the Military Authorities; and, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return of the price at which the Land was sold, the price at which the land has been re-bought, and the name of the Official who sanctioned the sale?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he had sent to Portsmouth to inquire into the facts of the case, and was therefore prepared to state what had occurred. About twenty years ago, some land at Stokes Bay belonging to the Government was sold for £8,000, which was its full market value at that time. It had since been re-bought at intervals for small sums, and in sections; and the whole sum paid for it by the Government (£28,000) was no doubt greatly in excess of the sum for which it had been sold in 1839. There was no plan for the defence of Portsmouth at that time the adoption of which would have necessitated the retention of the land in question, except the old plan of the Duke of Richmond, made in Mr. Pitt's Administration. The sale was made by the Master General of the Ordnance of that Day.

INDIAN MUTINY.—QUESTION.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether Instructions have been sent to the Indian Government to take steps to reduce the amount promised by the Home Government for compensation for losses by the Indian Mutiny; and whether or not a Special Despatch to India was sent about January last upon the subject of these compensations; and, if so, whether there is any objection to lay that Despatch, or the last Despatch upon the subject, upon the Table of the House. And further, whether the Million Sterling awarded by the Home Government as compensation to sufferers by the Indian Mutiny is to be the minimum as well as the maximum of such compensation?

MR. T. G. BARING said, in reply to the first question of the hon. Member, no instructions had been sent out to the Indian Government to reduce the amount of compensation for losses by the Indian Mutiny. With respect to the second question there would be no objection to the production of the Despatch if the hon. Gentleman would move for it. With reference to the £1,000,000 awarded by the Home Government for compensation, the question as between the maximum or minimum was reserved until the Indian Government knew how much was to be paid on the principle upon which compensation was to be awarded.

INDIAN PROMISSORY NOTES.

QUESTION.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he would now beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if it is the intention of the Imperial Government to deduct the English Income Tax from the interest payable on Promissory Notes of the Indian Government, where such interest is payable in this country by Drafts on the Indian Treasuries; whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Ministers to allow the Indian Government to deduct Indian Income Tax from the interest payable on Promissory Notes of the Indian Government after English Income Tax has been already deducted from such interest in this country; or whether, in other words, interest on Indian Promissory Notes is subject to a double Income Tax?

MR. T. G. BARING said, in answer to the first question of the hon. Gentleman, that the Indian Office acted ministerially for the Board of Inland Revenue. Whether the English income tax would be deducted was a legal point upon which he must decline to give any opinion. It would be premature to give an answer to the second question until the Indian income tax Bill arrived in this country. The answer to the third question would be found in his answer to the other two.

TAX BILLS.—THE EXCISE DUTY ON PAPER.

COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, in pursuance of the notice which I gave yesterday afternoon, I rise to move that a Committee be appointed to search the Journals of the two Houses of Parliament in order to ascertain and report on the practice of each House with regard to the several descriptions of Bills imposing or repealing taxes. I shall abstain from going into any further detail at the present moment, and I trust the House also will see the advantage of not entering into any discussion upon matters upon which it is intended the Committee should furnish us with information. I apprehend that it will be better if hon. Gentlemen, whatever their opinions may be, would have the goodness to defer stating those opinions until the Committee shall have made their Report. This step, under any view, precludes nothing, and pledges nothing. It is one which I think the House would take under the circumstances, and it certainly leaves the matter entirely open for consideration, with this difference only, that we shall then be in possession of facts with regard to which different and contradictory assertions may otherwise be made.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—

“That a Select Committee be appointed to search the Journals of both Houses of Parliament in order to ascertain and report on the practice of each House with regard to the several descriptions of Bills imposing or repealing Taxes.”

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: It is, perhaps, hardly necessary to say that I have no intention, and I am not aware that any hon. Gentleman on this side of the House has the intention, to interpose any objection to the Motion of the noble Lord. On the contrary, after what has occurred I should have been surprised if the noble Lord had not taken that course. I agree that it would be premature on the present occasion to enter upon a discussion of the Motion or the circumstances that have induced him to make it. I heard with satisfaction from the noble Lord that no one in consenting to this Motion would be in the slightest degree fettered or compromised with regard to any course which it might be necessary to take upon the Report of the Committee. So far as my own vote is concerned I consent to the appointment of this Committee, and I do so with greater satisfaction on account of the assurance given by the noble Lord the other night, that it is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government that the appointment of the Committee should lead to any feeling of hostility between the two Houses of Parliament.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he regretted that he could not agree in the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman that it was not necessary to have some declaration from her Majesty's Government as to the course which they intended to pursue. He had waited, as a Member of that House, anxious with regard to a question which affected their dearest privileges, to learn from Her Majesty's Government the course they would adopt in consequence of that of which the House had now proper evidence—the rejection of the Bill for the repeal of the paper duty by the House of Lords. Any discussion the previous evening would have been premature, as the Report from the Journals of the other House had not then been received. But now that the House was formally in possession of the decision of the House of Lords respecting the Bill, all precedents justified them in taking some action on the subject. The Journals of the House of Commons told them, if they had writ their annals true, that they were in possession of abundant knowledge, and in a position to decide what course ought to be adopted. He had no desire to urge Her Majesty's Government to any premature step; but he thought that the country upon a question, in which it was deeply interested, and in which the dignity and honour of the House of Commons were equally interested, had a right to know whether the Government had made up their minds to adopt any course in the matter. The established precedents justified him in saying that the matter was ripe for action on the part of that House. He believed the last case of the kind occurred in 1742. Hon. Members who were versed in Parliamentary history would have that case familiarly in their memory. It was a case in which a Committee of Inquiry was appointed upon the alleged corruption of Lord Orford, formerly Sir Robert Walpole. A Bill was sent up to the House of Lords to indemnify the witnesses who gave evidence before that Inquiry. The House of Lords rejected the Bill on the 26th of May. A Committee was appointed like that moved for by the noble Viscount, to search the Lords' Journals, and they ascertained the rejection of the Bill on the 26th of May, the same evening that it was thrown out. The House of Commons thereupon passed a Resolution the following day to the effect—

"That the refusal of the House of Lords to concur in the indemnity necessary to carry on the Inquiry by the House of Commons is an obstruction to justice, and fatal to the liberties of the nation."

It was, therefore, in his opinion, perfectly clear that as the House was now formally in possession of information as to the decision of the House of Lords, there was no necessity whatever for the appointment of a Committee to search for precedents; and he could not help thinking that such a course would lead to temporizing and delay, though he did not in the least impute that the Government desired such a result. He held that by precedent the House was now at liberty to act in this matter, and that, as the noble Lord at the head of the Government must, by the rejection of the Bill, be to some extent embarrassed in regard to the financial arrangements of the Session, it was due both to the interest which the House took in its invaluable privileges, and to the self-respect and dignity of the Government, that the noble Lord should announce what course the Government were prepared to follow on this question.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR said, he had intended to address some observations to the House on this subject; but he felt that it would be disrespectful to the leader of the House if, after the appeal which he had made, he entered on the general question which was at issue. He would only say that he objected to the Committee now proposed, both on account of the terms of its appointment and of the manner in which it was composed. As to the terms of the Motion it proposed that the Committee should "ascertain and report upon the practice of each house with regard to the several descriptions of Bills imposing or repealing taxes." Now, he would submit that that language gave the Committee too much of the character of a roving commission. He believed that the practice of the other House as to Bills imposing or repealing taxes might be ascertained from such works as Mr. Hatsell's Precedents, and Mr. Erskine May's valuable work, without searching the Journals of Parliament. The simple question which had to be answered was, whether any precedent was to be found in the Journals of the House of Lords for the rejection of a Bill for the repeal of a tax under the same circumstances as the Paper Duty Repeal Bill. All that the Committee required to do was to ascertain whether any such precedent existed, leaving it to the House to say whether it applied to this particular question before them. According to the Motion of the noble Lord, the Committee might search all the Journals through and through, and yet conclude their labours without deciding whether there was any precedent whatever for what had just taken place. As to the composition of the Committee, he found upon it the names of four Cabinet Ministers, and the same number of Ex-Cabinet Ministers, but he regretted to see that it included the name of only one Gentleman sitting below the gangway—that of the hon. Member for Birmingham. There ought to be a larger infusion of the independent element in the Committee. He entertained no revolutionary views as to the other House, but he was anxious that this matter should be speedily and satisfactorily disposed of, and was satisfied that that end could only be attained by the appointment of a Committee in which the country had the fullest confidence. He thought that the legal profession ought to have been more largely represented in a Committee whose duty it would be to search for precedents, and balance minute points of difference or similarity. It was true that the hon. and learned Attorney General and Solicitor General were to be placed upon it, but he would suggest the addition of the names of the hon. Members for Plymouth (Mr. Collier), and Manchester (Mr. Bazley), as likely to give weight to the Committee.

MR. T. S. DUNCOMBE said, he differed from the two learned Gentlemen who had just spoken in the view he took of the question, and would beg leave to set them right in one respect. It was a mistake to say that the House of Lords had rejected the Paper Duty Repeal Bill. It had done no such thing. The House of Lords had only postponed the second reading of the Bill for six months. That was, no doubt, held to be tantamount to the rejection of the Bill, and the House of Lords intended that it should be so received. But there was no reason why, if the House of Commons could defeat the stratagem of the House of Lords and maintain the dignity of their own body, they should not do so. They ought to take the House of Lords at their word. Every one was of opinion that the paper duty was a bad duty—at least every one who spoke in the House of Lords took that view, and insisted only that this was not the moment to repeal it. Well, let the Government wait and see whether six months hence their Lordships might not discover that the proper moment had arrived. The Bill would be rejected when the Government, by prorogation of Parliament put an extinguisher on the Bill; but till then it stood merely postponed. He believed that before they were many days older they would find a very strong opinion expressed throughout the country against the rejection of the Bill; and if, when the business of the Session was over, the Government would advise Her Majesty not to prorogue Parliament, but to adjourn it from time to time, so that it might sit till November, the country might then be so circumstanced, the revenue might be in such a position, the people might express so emphatic an opinion, and put such a pressure on the Lords, that they might, after all, come to the conclusion that it was right and expedient to pass the Bill. A very large meeting of delegates from the Metropolis and different parts of the country had been held that day, and he was authorized to say that the Amendment he had to propose, and on which he was determined to take the sense of the House, met with their sanction, and would receive every support from them if the House had a mind to test the feeling of the country on this matter. The Amendment he proposed was as follows:—

“ That this House having learned with deep regret that the further progress of a Bill passed by this House for the repeal of the Duty of Excise on Paper manufactured in the United Kingdom, has been postponed by the House of Lords for six months, it is the opinion of this House that when the state of public business permits, Parliament ought not then to adjourn beyond November next, whereby another opportunity will be afforded to the House of Lords of considering whether the said Bill may not be then advantageously agreed to.”

Nothing, he maintained, could be milder or more consistent with common sense than that. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. James) said that the object of the Motion in the House of Lords was to embarrass and hamper the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and to obstruct the financial arrangements he proposed; and hon. Gentlemen opposite gave their assent to that view by a smile and almost by a cheer. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer was really the last man who ought to complain of what had happened. Generally speaking, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had reason to complain only when any great deficit had been created which he had to supply; but in the present case a surplus had been thrust upon him which he did not require. He believed, however, that the House and the Government had a right to complain that when a financial scheme was sent up to the House of Lords, they did not, as they ought to have done, take all or none of it. The noble Lord at the head of the Government proposed to go in search of precedents. He would not follow the noble Lord in that wild-goose chase. He maintained that no precedent whatever was applicable to the present day. They lived in rather extraordinary times. They had a scheme of finance, including a commercial treaty with a foreign Power, and the repeal of the paper duty was part and parcel of it. The House of Lords had no business to separate one part from another. Looking to the state of affairs abroad, could any man say that a Continental war did not hang as it were by a thread? Great principles were coming into collision—the principles of constitutional freedom and the despotism of autocrats. The Emperor of the French was the first to set the ball rolling in Italy, and he fervently hoped that Garibaldi would be enabled to complete in the south that which the Emperor had so nobly commenced in the north. [Cries of “ Question.”] It was of importance who should be at the head of a country like England at such a moment. They must not have men who would play into the hands of the great autocrats of Europe. They must have men who would give a chance to constitutional freedom. No one could say whether to-morrow it would be peace or war, and it was of importance that the financial schemes of the Government should not be lightly trifled with, as it had been by the House of Lords. It was quite right, according to constitutional law that the House of Lords should have the power to put a veto upon Bills which proceeded from this House, even Bills which applied to finance. From time immemorial money Bills had been sent up to the House of Lords, and if that House had not the power to put a veto on them, the House of Commons might insert in those Bills clauses affecting the rights, properties, and liberties of the subject. If the Lords had not the power of putting a veto, the Commons might put in a clause to abolish the bench of Bishops themselves. But from time immemorial, where the Bill was confined to a money Bill, the House of Lords had never deemed it right to reject or meddle with that Bill, as they had done upon this occasion. The noble Lord was going in search of precedents. He cared for none. He wanted no precedent. He knew what the House of Commons ought to do. He felt from the beginning—and the end of it in the House of Lords convinced him—that it was intended to insult this House. [Cries of "No."] Insult, he repeated, was intended from the manner in which it was done. [Repeated Cries of "No."] It was notorious to every man, woman, and child that when notice was given to postpone the Bill for six months by the Controller of the Exchequer, the late Prime Minister jumped up and said in effect, "Every foot which I can bring to bear shall assist to give that Bill a kick." It was a gratuitous avowal at the time, and he could consider it in no other light than an insult to this House. The people were beginning to look at it in that point of view. [Derisive Cheers from the Opposition.] He said they were beginning to look at it in that point of view. For the moment the public took a pounds-shillings-and-pence view of the question, and thought the Lords were right to postpone this Bill; but they were now separating the two questions, and were beginning to consider the measure as it affects the right of taxation of the separation of which from the right of representation they were extremely jealous. They were beginning to look at it in that point of view, because they naturally said, "How is ever a tax to be repealed if this is quietly submitted to?" The House of Commons ought not quietly to submit to it. They owed a duty not only to themselves, but to those who would come after them, not to establish a precedent of this sort. They ought to put on record their sentiments, and he believed that if the House would do him the honour to take his Motion they might even now come to an understanding with the Lords upon the subject, and avoid any collision. At all events, it would be satisfactory to the country, and would prove that this House was ready and willing to maintain those privileges and those rights which the Constitution had conferred on them. It was with that view that he begged leave to move the Amendment which he had read.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'this House having learned with deep regret, that the further progress of a Bill passed by this House for "the repeal of the Duty of Excise on Paper manufactured in the United Kingdom," has been postponed by the House of Lords for six months, it is the opinion of this House that, when the state of the public business permits, Parliament ought not then to adjourn beyond November next, whereby another opportunity will be afforded to the House of Lords of considering whether the said Bill may not be then advantageously agreed to.'"

—instead thereof :

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Mr. WHALLEY said, he rose to second the Amendment, with the more readiness because it appeared to be a proposition which, reserving entire respect and deference to the House of Lords, attributed to them the best possible motives for the course which they had been pleased to adopt. The main argument used in that House in favour of postponing the second reading for six months was that the state of the revenue would within a few weeks or months be such as to render the tax absolutely necessary for the exigencies of the country. The only objection which could be fairly offered to the Amendment was that they might find themselves in November in the same position in which they now were. He had prepared a notice, which he intended to put upon the Votes, by which that difficulty would be obviated. He looked upon this not as a question between this House and the House of Lords, but between this House and Her Majesty's Ministers. He had voted 10d. in the pound income tax upon the distinct understanding that the paper duty was to be repealed, and he asked the Government how they could allow the House to separate with 10*d.* in the pound income tax and the paper duty not repealed, when it was a distinct understanding brought to the test of a division upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Somersetshire (Sir W. Miles) that the consideration for that amount of income tax was the repeal of the paper duty. The notice which he intended to place on the paper was this :—

“ That this House considers that Her Majesty's Ministers stand pledged to this House and to the country to carry out the financial arrangements submitted by the Government and adopted by this House, and that it is the duty of the Government to advise Her Majesty to take such measures as may be necessary for passing a Bill for the Repeal of the Paper Duty through the House of Lords during the present Session.”

MR. BRIGHT: I have been sorry to observe, since this question has made its appearance before this House, that a few Members on the other side have been disposed to treat it as one of no importance. Now, if I were, unfortunately, a member of the party opposite, I hope I should be able to discover that there is something grave and important in this question, and in the position in which the House is placed with regard to it. I hope, also, that I should be able to dispossess my mind of any of those feelings which too often attend party triumphs, and which too often blind our eyes to the real consequences of the course we are taking. I presume that the noble Lord at the head of the Government and his Colleagues, who have a peculiar interest in the matter before us, do consider this a question of some moment; and I think the more it is brought before the House and discussed, the more the House will come to the same opinion. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe) in what he has said with respect to the growing opinion which is being manifested in the country with regard to it. Let hon. Gentlemen opposite bear in mind that never in the lifetime of the oldest Member of this House, or hardly in the lifetime of his father, has any great question arisen as to what may be termed the rights of the people through their representatives, or the rights of their representatives in this House. Generally men have assumed that certain things were irrevocably fixed; as, for example, that a man may travel in this country without a passport; or that a man's house cannot be broken into by the officers of the law without a warrant; or that if a man be apprehended he must be brought before some Judge or magistrate within a certain time, who may determine his case. These are questions which are fixed in the public mind, and men do not generally ask how they came to be fixed, but they take them as they take their daily bread, or their nightly sleep—as that which is natural and unchangeable in their condition. So with regard to this question of the administration of the finances of the country. Men have always understood, without being able to give chapter and verse for it any more than how it is they breathe, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was an officer of the Government chosen by the Crown, and having the confidence of Parliament, especially of this House, for the purpose of arranging the finances of the country for the year, and they have always seen that, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer has brought his scheme before Parliament, and that scheme has received the assent of the House of Commons, it has invariably become law. Having seen that, and never having seen anything else, it is not to be wondered at that the great bulk of the people of this country have not instantly discovered, the very first day the Report of the division in the House of Lords went out, that there had been some serious infraction of the Constitution, and some great damage to the powers of this House, and to the liberties of those who pay taxes—taxes which are to be levied solely by the representatives of the people. And when at the same time there has been this unfortunate feature connected with this question, that the press, particularly the press of London, and that portion of it which is most ancient, which is the highest in price, and which has not undergone the revolution which is inevitably approaching the press—that the press of London, actuated, I will not say—by base motives, but actuated by alarms which we all can understand—has been anxious to cover the disaster which was attempted to be inflicted upon this House and the country, and has endeavoured to misrepresent the whole question to the nation. When we take this into our consideration, I say we may easily understand how it is that, within three or four days after the enactment of this great event, there has been no widespread expression of opinion throughout the length and breadth of the United Kingdom. But, judging from what I see in the provincial press—from private letters which I have received—from what is taking place in London now—and in some of the largest towns in the kingdom—I am perfectly satisfied that there will be existing in a few days a wide and almost universal discontent at the course which has been taken. And let the House believe me, as I think they will, when I say that, in considering this question, I have not, at this moment, the slightest regard to the importance of the particular tax which it was proposed to repeal. If it had been proposed to levy an additional Excise upon paper, and if that Bill had gone up to the House of Lords, and it had been rejected there as this Bill has been, I confess that I believe I should have been one of those who would have resisted, so far as I was able to resist, with all those with whom I sit in this House, an interference of that kind on the part of the other House of Parliament. And though I acknowledge myself for many years to have had a warm and growing interest in the question of the abolition of the duty upon paper, yet since that division has taken place, the question of the tax itself has fallen, as it were, into utter insignificance in my sight, as compared with the far graver question which the course taken by the House of Lords has opened to the consideration of Parliament and the country. Now, passing from these observations, which may be considered general, to the point which is strictly before us, I am willing to admit, that there is something to be said—perhaps a great deal—as to the ordinary course of proceeding, and the mode by which the noble Lord at the head of the Government intends to proceed to-night. The noble Lord has proposed a Committee, and if the House will exclude my name from it, I should say it was impossible to select eighteen names more calculated, I think, to represent the solid judgment of this House in any matter that might be referred to them. At the same time, I think there is some force in what has been said by the hon. and learned Gentleman, the Member for Southampton (Mr. D. Seymour), that a name or two more might have been chosen from this quarter of the House; but I am willing to believe that, from whatsoever quarter of the House the names are chosen to act upon this Committee, so far as an accurate search for precedents, and an honest Report to this House goes—there are no nineteen Members of this House who might not be entirely trusted to do what is just and right in this great matter. But I complain—and in this I agree to some extent with the hon. and learned Member—I complain of the vagueness of the reference under which the Committee will act. I think the noble Lord has laid himself open—I will not say to suspicion, for I am not anxious to cultivate such a feeling—but he has laid himself open to some doubt as to the earnestness of his concern when he proposes simply that the Committee should ascertain and Report upon the practice of each House with regard to several descriptions of Bills for imposing or repealing taxes. When I read those words this morning it occurred to me that I was very unlucky in being named upon this Committee, for I concluded that we should have in all probability to offer to the House, at least, a volume upon this grave subject. Now, if I had had the drawing up of this Resolution, it should have been different—it should have been more effectual, and it should have tended to keep the Committee more exactly and minutely to the point which is before the House. In a wide order of reference like this, every Gentleman, who has been in the habit of sitting upon Committees, must feel that there is some danger that the real pith and point of this question may be lost sight of. It appears to me that what we have to inquire into is this.—We find that the House of Lords has increased the taxation of the country during the present financial year without the consent of the House of Commons. Now, that is a grievance, if there be a grievance of which the House of Commons has to complain; and, as this question is not a question of the paper duty, of this Government, or of this Session, or of that Opposition, but is a question for years, it may be for generations—or it may be for centuries in England, I hope I may appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite to discuss and consider it as if it were a question which did not affect any of their party objects during this Session, but one to which they ought to direct their minds with a calmness demanded only by the greatest question that can come before a national legislature. Let me for one moment observe that the noble Lord states in this Resolution that the Committee are to Report upon the practice of each House with regard to several descriptions of Bills imposing or repealing taxes. Now, there are two descriptions of money Bills, which some people fancy are only one, but which are still two and very distinct. There are Bills which in former times have been passed for the protection or for the regulation of particular trades, and those Bills have had in them provisions imposing taxes on imports of one kind or other, not intended for the purpose of revenue, but intended for the higher and the chief object of the Bill, namely, the protection or the regulation of some particular trade or industry. Now, that is one description of Bill which may be called in a subordinate sense, a Money Bill; and there are Bills of that kind which, I take for granted, have been interfered with, in some cases have been altered, and, at least I presume, in some cases rejected by the other House of Parliament. But then comes that description of Bills in which the Bill now before us must be included—namely, a Bill for revenue purposes only, connected with the Ways and Means for the service of the Crown. Now, if I could have advised with regard to this Motion for this Committee, the reference would have been of a more distinct character, because I would have asked the Committee to ascertain whether the House of Lords has in a recent period—confine it, if you like, to the Revolution, though I believe it goes further back than that—has the House of Lords refused to give effect to any Bill passed by the Commons for the repeal of a tax which they no longer deemed necessary for the service of the Crown, and for which a substitute has been provided. I am told that in a great speech on this question in “another place” it has been asserted that no substitute has been provided for the loss of the duty on paper; and I have read in the newspapers that at a certain house in St. James’s Square a Member of the other House of Parliament, of dominant influence there, apparently in discussing this matter with a large deputation, gave them to understand that he had never even so much as heard that a substitute had been talked of, or provided by the House of Commons for this paper duty. I cannot conceive of anything more unfortunate than that the finances of the country should be placed in the hands of a man so little observant of what is passing in this House, and who knows so little of what had been done by the great party in this House which acknowledges him as its leader. Certainly the hon. Member for Somersetshire (Sir W. Miles) must have felt very much astonished that the patriotic, though mistaken, efforts which he made received so little recognition at the hands of his leader. That hon. Gentleman moved this Resolution:—

VOL. CLVIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

“That as it appears that the repeal of the duty on paper will necessitate the addition of one penny in the pound to the income tax, it is the opinion of the House that such repeal is, under the circumstances, inexpedient.”

As far as I recollect the speeches delivered from that (the Opposition) side of the House, the whole discussion during one long night went upon this—not that the paper duty is a good duty in itself, because we all admit that it ought to be repealed. Nobody was more enthusiastic for its abolition hereafter than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, and now nobody is more enthusiastic than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Hertfordshire (Sir E. B. Lytton); you all admit the duty to be a bad one, but you say for the time, at all events, that you prefer the continuance of the bad duty, to the addition of 1*d.* in the pound to the income tax, which so grievously oppresses persons whose incomes are under £200 or £300 a year. That was the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), and also of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Hertfordshire, and it was the argument of every speaker on the Opposition side of the House; and it was the precise point on which the House went to a division. And in a House of more than 440 Members it was decided by a majority of fifty-three, that the paper duty should be abolished, and in lieu of it, and to supply the void occasioned by its removal, one penny in the pound should be added to the income tax. Now, that being so, let us not be told that a noble Lord elsewhere was in ignorance of this question having been discussed and decided, or that the House of Commons has provided a substitute for that paper duty it determined to repeal. I think, therefore, that the question that should be put to the Committee is this:—“Has the House of Lords refused to give effect within recent times—within such a period as fixed by law of Parliament—to a Bill passed by the Commons for the repeal of a tax no longer deemed necessary for the service of the Crown, and for which a substitute has been provided?” I object to the order of reference which has been proposed on these grounds. I think the noble Lord has not done justice to himself, to the Cabinet, of which he is the head, to this House, or to the strong claims of the country, which has so often maintained him in power, by not taking a line more decided on this great question. I am of opinion that the noble Lord has taken a course which is not only perilous to this House, but one that may prove fatal to the Administration of which he is the chief. When the present Parliament assembled at the beginning of this Session after the general election, the noble Lord had only a nominal majority in this House; and it was only by thirteen votes that he was placed in his present position. I am satisfied that he can retain that position no longer than he retains the confidence of all those on this side of the House, by whose votes he has been heretofore supported, and by that great party in the country that is represented on these benches. With regard to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Finsbury, I can assure the House I had not seen it till I came into the House, and I confess that it is one that had never suggested itself to me in the remotest degree. But to my mind that Amendment is dictated by a very clear and visible regard for the Constitution of this country; and for the honour and just functions of both Houses of Parliament. It was received with something like merriment; but the more the House considers it, the more they will feel, I am satisfied, that it is the best mode of maintaining the supremacy of this House as to matters of finance, while, at the same time, it maintains the dignity of the House of Lords, which I am one of the last who would seek to impair. [Laughter from the Opposition.] Do not let hon. Gentlemen for one moment fancy that I wish any governing power in this country to be degraded. If I were an avowed Republican—if I thought that in this country monarchy was no good, and the aristocracy no good, still so long as there is monarchy, and so long as there is an hereditary chamber, I say by all means maintain their dignity, and support them, as far as you can, in the true and honest estimation of the people; advise them, as I advise them—though they sometimes think in an unfriendly tone—so to rule and exercise their power, that their power may be perpetual. My hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury does not ask the House, as I understand him, to take any active steps in this matter—he does not ask you to express any resentment against the House of Lords for what has been done—he does not ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government to vary from the statement made the other night, when he said that he was anxious not to do anything to bring the Houses of Parliament into collision. The Amendment of my hon.

Mr. Bright

Motion for a Committee, or on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Finsbury, but would probably think it only just and advantageous that the debate should be adjourned to Thursday, with a view of giving to both sides of the House and to all parties concerned an opportunity of coming to some decided opinion. I feel persuaded that the result of the discussion to-night will be satisfactory to the country, but I believe our decision will be still more so if the Government consent to the adjournment of the debate. I beg, therefore, to make this suggestion to the noble Lord, and with the permission of the House I shall move that this debate be adjourned till Thursday next.

Motion made, and Questioned proposed, "That the debate be now adjourned."

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, it is not because I underrate the importance of the subject that is now before the House that I ask the House to consent to the Motion of my noble Friend, and not to agree to either of the Amendments that have been proposed. It certainly appears to me that there has not been within my memory a question of greater importance than the question before us. It is a question which undoubtedly affects a most essential function of the House of Commons; but for that reason, and especially bearing in mind that which I always must bear in mind—namely, the reflection which my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham made, that there is no reason to suppose that any portion or any section of the Members of this House are either indifferent or lukewarm to the maintenance of our most sacred privileges—I would endeavour to do that which should most enlighten the House without calling upon it to come to anything like a premature decision: and that is the character of the proposition of my noble Friend. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham says the Motion ought to have been of a different kind—that it should have been a proposal pointing out the difference of various kinds of taxes, and founding on that difference a reference to a Committee. Now, I will own to my hon. Friend that when I first considered this question I was disposed to take that view of it. There is undoubtedly a distinction—a very clear distinction—between different Bills. One set of these is for the purpose of imposing taxes or of relieving persons from taxation, and for providing those charges which are necessary for the supply of the year; and there is another kind of Bill in which the tax is merely incidental, as, for instance, where a very high duty in the nature of a prohibition is placed on foreign corn. There it would be obvious that the duty was imposed not for the purpose of revenue, but with a totally different object, and with a view to protection. In the same way, if a Bill placed a certain tax on barley used for distillation, the House of Lords might consider it a Bill, not for taxation, but for protection. Bills of this kind do undoubtedly exist; but it would not be advisable to make that distinction in our reference, because it might be supposed such a distinction did not leave the Committee totally free, and might lead to confusion. Besides, there are other descriptions of Bills besides those which my hon. Friend has mentioned, and to which I have alluded. Therefore it appears to me that the best and most prudent conclusion is that at which, after much deliberation, my noble Friend has arrived, that a Committee should be appointed to ascertain the difference between those various descriptions of Bills, and to point out the precedents that have been established in regard to them. Sir, those precedents, no doubt, will be found of various kinds; and it will be the business of the Committee to ascertain whether the House of Lords in this instance has gone beyond or varied from former precedents, and in what respects they have done so. There are certain questions connected with this subject of taxation upon which the House of Lords are jealous, and I think not unnaturally jealous, of their privileges. For instance, when this House has mixed with a Bill imposing taxation other questions not properly belonging to it—when they have endeavoured to fix upon points of legislation, and prescribed how these points should be settled, under the name of imposing or repealing a tax, the House of Lords have, I think, while making the admission as to the privileges of this House, rightly interfered to prevent any encroachment or any attempt on the part of the House of Commons to carry our privileges beyond the mark to which we ourselves press them. There is an instance in which that kind of objection did apply. I mention it only as an example; but it appears to have been on a question not totally dissimilar from the events of the present year—it was the case of a Bill passed by Mr. Pitt through the House after the negotiation of the Commercial Treaty with France in 1787. It was objected in the House of Lords by several noble Lords on that occasion that in the Bill three separate subjects were combined—the Commercial Treaty with France was sanctioned; new taxes were imposed beyond the scope of the commercial treaty; and besides this there was a great consolidation of duties, making a new species of legislation with regard to customs. It was objected that those three subjects ought not to have been contained in one Bill, but the objection was overruled. I mention it only as an instance of the great jealousy of the House of Lords with regard to Bills which go beyond the purpose of imposing or relieving taxes; but as it is clear that upon subjects of this kind there are many precedents, and precedents applying to various descriptions of Bills, it would be wise, I think, in the House to furnish itself with every kind of information, and enlighten itself in reference to those historical questions, before it comes to any conclusion at all. There can be no harm in doing so. Our powers are very great. I, at least, am not one of those who think that the powers and privileges of the House of Commons are about to succumb to the authority of the House of Lords. I believe that our privileges will be maintained, and I do not think that, taking time for the consideration of what we shall do—giving ourselves every chance of deliberation, and taking care that we walk in the path of the Constitution—I do not think that that course will at all prevent our coming to a right and deliberate decision upon this question, Sir, my hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury has moved an Amendment upon my noble Friend's Motion, and that Amendment seems to me certainly to go not only beyond the question, but far beyond the question—because, while the fault that many of us find is, that the House of Lords has trenched upon the privileges of the House of Commons, my hon. Friend's Amendment proposes that the House of Commons should trench upon the prerogative of the Crown. It may be the right course—I will not argue the question now, but it may be the right course that her Majesty should be advised not to prorogue Parliament, but that a long adjournment should take place. I do not discuss the question whether that would be a right or a good course; but, in the first instance, it certainly would not be right, it would not be respectful, it would not be constitutional for this House to declare by Resolution that Her Majesty's prerogative of prorogation should not be exercised. I will read the Amendment to show what is the fault I find with it:—

Lord John Russell

“That it is the opinion of this House that when the state of public business permits, Parliament ought not then to adjourn beyond November next, whereby another opportunity will be afforded to the House of Lords of considering whether the said Bill may not be then advantageously agreed to.”

I will not dispute whether that may be a right course or a wrong course; but it is quite evident that it would be to interfere with the prerogative that is usually exercised by the Crown in the prorogation of Parliament. I own it appears to me that, without altering any portion of the Motion—which comprehends everything, and yet commits no one to any particular course—this House might now fairly proceed to agree to my noble Friend's Motion, and, when the Report of the Committee is brought up, hon. Gentlemen, when considering the privileges of this House, may come to a conclusion more consonant with that which has been done in former times, and more bearing the symptoms and fruits of deliberation than any conclusion we can arrive at at the present moment.

MR. CLAY said, he could not support the Amendment. The best means of obtaining a repeal of the paper duty might not be the best means, or any means, of vindicating the privileges of the House of Commons. Suppose the House of Lords, at the end of six months, altered its mind and passed the Bill it had postponed, how much nearer would the House of Commons be to knowing whether the House of Lords had, or had not, trenched on their privileges? He should, therefore, support the Motion for a Committee that would inform them of their rights, and whether they depended on written law or ancient usage. When the House knew its rights, let it maintain them. He hoped the noble Lord would not alter the terms of the reference, though he should not therefore withdraw his support from the Motion. He was quite content to trust the defence of the rights of the House to the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, than whom no man was better fitted by character, position, and name for the task.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he should support the Motion for Committee. If the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Duncombe) was of opinion that the Lords had not virtually rejected the Bill, but had merely postponed it, and if that opinion was correct, then the House of Commons had no right to interfere in the matter at all.

MR. WHALLEY said, he did not think that they were adopting the proper means for defending the privileges of the House.

For his part, he had not the least doubt that the result of inquiry would be to reduce the question between the two Houses to a mere matter of the letter of the Constitution, by which the constitutional compact between the House of Commons and the Government would be entirely evaded. They were not now dealing with merely the amount of the paper duty, they were dealing with some £40,000,000 or £50,000,000 a year, over which, if they assented to the power claimed by the House of Lords, they would practically lose all control. He believed that the course about to be taken would be perfectly futile, and that it would still further endanger the constitutional rights of the House.

MR. BRIGHT: I need hardly say that my object in moving the adjournment of the debate was not to impede in any way the progress of the business of the House. I did so because I thought it might be convenient to hon. Members opposite, as well as to some hon. Members sitting upon this side of the House, that the consideration of the question raised by the Motion of the noble Lord at the head of the Government should be postponed until after the recess. After the observations which have been made by the noble Lord the Member for London, however, which seemed to meet with general assent, and looking also to the state of my own feelings, which have been somewhat altered by what has been said, I shall, with the permission of the House, withdraw my Amendment. I should also like to put it to my hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury whether, seeing that it has been stated by the noble Lord that his Amendment would, if adopted, tend to interfere with the prerogative of the Crown, he would not consent to adopt a similar course.

Motion by leave withdrawn.

MR. T. S. DUNCOMBE: I think that, under all the circumstances, I shall ask the House to permit me to withdraw the Amendment. I do so on the distinct understanding that when the Committee shall have made its Report with regard to precedents, I shall then have an opportunity of again moving it if it appears desirable to do so. With regard to some remarks made by an hon. Member opposite—

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member for Finsbury was not entitled to reply upon the question.

MR. KNIGHTLEY said, he should oppose the withdrawal of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Finsbury. He thought it ought to be negatived in a becoming manner. Besides it had not appeared on the Notice Paper.

MR. T. S. DUNCOMBE said, he was not aware until the evening before what course the noble Viscount proposed to take, and he had prepared his Amendment since he had read the notice of Motion on the Orders of the Day.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he would beg leave to ask whether, if the Committee were nominated, its numbers would not be enlarged. It would, he contended, be unfair to the two great sections on both sides of the House who sat below the gangway that they should not be represented upon it.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I hope the hon. Member opposite will not persist in adopting the somewhat unusual course of stepping in to prevent an hon. Gentleman who has made a Motion of this nature from withdrawing it, and thus saving the House the trouble of dividing. With respect to the question of the enlargement of the Committee, I may say that in my opinion the best time to discuss it would be when the Motion for the appointment of the Committee has been agreed to, and when I propose, as I intend to do, that it should consist of a certain number.

MR. KNIGHTLEY said, he had not the smallest wish to force the House to a division, but he simply desired to see the Amendment negatived.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the course taken by the hon. Member would not effect that object. According to the forms of the House the Question that would be put was "that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question." No decision on that Question would give a direct negative to the Amendment.

LORD JOHN MANNERS suggested to his hon. Friend the expediency of not pressing his objection to the withdrawal of the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON thereupon moved that the Committee consist of nineteen Members.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Committee do consist of nineteen Members."

MR. BRIGHT expressed a wish to know whether the noble Lord intended that the Committee should meet the next day, or whether its sitting would be deferred until the reassembling of the House after the recess. It might be that some of the Members could not remain in town.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I think it would be convenient to hon. Members who are to serve on the Committee generally, that the usual course should be followed, and that the Committee should not meet until after the recess. As to the question whether it should consist of more than nineteen Members, I can only say that I have no particular objection to enlarge it beyond that number. It is, however, perhaps better to defer the consideration of that point until the House reassembles.

LORD FERMOY said, he happened to be one of those who, out of consideration to the request of the noble Lord that no remarks should be made upon the main question, had hitherto abstained from making any remarks, merely for the purpose of allowing the noble Lord, as leader of the House of Commons, to declare his policy on the subject. However, he thought—and many hon. Members were of the same opinion—that some deference ought to be paid to the two important sections of hon. Members below the gangway, in the selection of the names to be placed on the Committee. He himself was opposed to the view of the noble Lord with respect to the appointment of a Committee, but as the House had decided upon following that course, it was unfair that any of the large sections of that House should be unrepresented. There were a large number of hon. Members who sat below the gangway who entertained strong opinions on the subject, and he put it to the noble Lord whether he would not, for their satisfaction, then give notice that he meant to add the names of some hon. Members below the gangway on both sides of the House to the Committee.

MR. WYLD said, he would move as an Amendment that the number of the Committee be increased by four Members, and that the number be twenty-three instead of nineteen.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, that the Amendment was not regular. It was not competent for the hon. Member to move the enlargement of the Committee without giving notice of his intention. If, however, the nineteen Members proposed by the Government were appointed, the hon. Member could give notice of the names which he intended to move as an addition to the Committee. He did not think it would be wise to enlarge the Committee to the number proposed by the hon. Gentleman; but perhaps the noble Lord would have no objection to make an addition of two Members—one to be taken from each side of the House.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman. According to the rules of the House, when a question was put from the Chair any Amendment might be proposed, and consequently the hon. Member for Bodmin was in order.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he thought the question for consideration by the Committee was of sufficient importance to warrant him in testing the principle that hon. Members below the gangway on either side of the House should be represented upon it; and with the view of giving an opportunity for further consideration of that point he begged to move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

MR. SPEAKER: Does any hon. Member second that Motion?

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR: — Yes, I second it.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped to meet the views of the hon. Gentlemen who had moved and seconded the adjournment by giving notice that on Thursday next he should move the addition of two members.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had heard with great regret the decision of the noble Lord. Nothing was more inconvenient in practice than large Committees, and he was sorry to find there was a tendency to swell the numbers forming them. There was great difficulty in conducting the business when the number of members was large. He would rather the number in this instance had been fifteen instead of nineteen, but if the noble Lord was of opinion that it was desirable to increase that number to twenty-one, or even more, he (Sir John Pakington) would not oppose it. He highly approved of the fairness that had been displayed in the constitution of the Committee as regarded the balance of the two parties in the House. It was such as no one could take an exception to. As was usual when a Committee was moved for by a Government, ten members had been selected from the Government side of the House and nine from the other side, which was as near an approach to equality as was possible under the circumstances.

He hoped the noble Lord, in making an addition to the numbers, would not take them all from the Government side of the House.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, his noble Friend did not say that he intended to take them from the Government side of the House. It was suggested that one should be taken from each side below the gangway, and his noble Friend in what he had consented to do believed he was acting in accordance with the general usage of the House, and he (Sir George Grey) was surprised to hear any objection to it, especially as it was a proposition that met with the approval and support of the right hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. S. Estcourt). It was competent for the House then to decide the number should be twenty-one instead of nineteen, but it was not usual to name the members until after notice had been given. His noble Friend proposed to place the names on the paper that evening, and submit them to the House on their re-assembling after the recess.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he did not think the constitution of Committees was placed on a right basis. There were too many official Gentlemen, not fewer than twelve, who are or had been Cabinet Ministers, on this Committee. The various sections of opinion in that House could not be fairly represented with such a predominance of official members.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, that on the understanding that the two additional members to be moved on Thursday should be taken from below the gangway, he would withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. WYLD said, he would also withdraw his Motion. His object in moving it had been to assert what he considered to be a right. Hon. Members below the gangway were always ready to support the Government when they felt they could do so consistently with principle. The Committee about to be appointed was one upon a subject which greatly affected their privileges, and they were entitled to be represented upon it. He had no intention to find fault with the constitution of the Committee.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Ordered, That the Committee do consist of twenty-one Members.

Committee nominated: — Viscount PALMERSTON, Mr. DISRAELI, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the Ex-

CHEQUER, Mr. WALPOLE, Lord JOHN RUSSELL, Mr. ESTCOURT, Sir GEORGE GREY, Sir JOHN PARKINGTON, Sir JAMES GRAHAM, Mr. HENLEY, Mr. EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, Colonel WILSON PATTEN, Mr. MASSEY, Mr. BENTINCK, Mr. BRIGHT, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Sir HUGH CAIRNS, Mr. MORE O'FERRALL, and Sir WILLIAM HEATHCOTE: —Power to send for persons, papers, and records. Five to be the quorum.

On Motion that the House at its rising do adjourn to Thursday next,

GLOUCESTER AND WAKEFIELD.

QUESTION.

MR. T. S. DUNCOMBE said, he begged to call the attention of the Home Secretary to the question which stood upon the paper in his name. He maintained that the House had no right to suspend the issuing of the writ for the boroughs of Gloucester and Wakefield, upon the ground that there was nothing before the House to warrant that procedure. He himself had moved at an early period of the Session a Resolution in that House which would have had the effect of giving the House a ground upon which to suspend the issuing of the writs. He had proposed to bring in a Bill to enable the constituency of those two places to exercise their franchise under the protection of the ballot. While that Bill was pending it would, no doubt, have been perfectly constitutional to suspend the issue of the writs; but the House had not thought proper to adopt that Motion. Upon what ground, then, could the House suspend the issuing of the writ. There was no ground except the pleasure of Her Majesty's Government. Whenever writs had been suspended, a Motion had always been before the House in reference to some case of alleged bribery. No proceeding of the sort was then before the House. On that account he asked the right hon. Gentleman under what authority and for what purpose he was withholding these writs. It was quite true that the executive of the Crown was invested with the power of issuing writs; but why was it invested with that power? For the purpose, he maintained, of expediting the matter, and not for delay. The House had enfranchised by an Act of Parliament the boroughs of Gloucester and Wakefield, and that being so, nothing but an Act of Parliament could deprive them of their right to be represented. Unless, therefore, the House were prepared to disfranchise them, or to enlarge the limits of those boroughs, it had no right to suspend the issuing of the writs. As to Gloucester, a Report had been made by the Commission which completely exculpated both the candidates from bribery, and these gentlemen had received certificates. As to Wakefield, both the late Member and the opposing candidate were at that moment under an order for prosecution for a misdemeanour. He would ask, could two-thirds of that House with clean hands order the late Member to be prosecuted? He hoped no prosecution would take place. It would do no possible good. If such prosecutions were right, why had they not taken place in the instances of Canterbury, Cambridge, Maldon, Barnstaple, and Hull? In the case of those boroughs, Commissioners were appointed, and reported that both bribery and intimidation had taken place; but the Members had not been prosecuted. Why should they now turn round and prosecute, when the individual, as far as they could judge, had given his evidence candidly before the Commissioners? The Corrupt Practices Act and the Act that enabled Parliament to issue those Commissions, were not passed for the purpose of prosecuting individuals, but for the purpose of ascertaining the extent of the bribery, corruption, and intimidation that prevailed in certain boroughs, with the view of seeing if some remedy could not be discovered by which that bribery, corruption, and intimidation might hereafter be prevented. The Acts were not directed against individuals, but they now proposed to satisfy themselves with prosecuting individuals instead of going into the whole question. To prosecute Mr. Leatham and Mr. Charlesworth was an act really unworthy of the House, and he hoped that the hon. and learned Attorney General would move that the order be discharged. He begged leave to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in consequence of the bribery and corruption reported to prevail at Elections for the City of Gloucester and the Borough of Wakefield, Her Majesty's Government has anything to propose upon the subject; if not, by what right, and for what purpose, he delays the issue of New Writs to those places?

MR. MONCKTON MILNES: Sir, before any Member of the Government rises to answer this question, I wish to say, locally interested as I am, and having had a long personal connection with one of the boroughs to which my hon. Friend has alluded, I cannot agree with him that the suspension of these writs, for the present

at least, is not demanded both by public opinion and public justice. I believe that suspension is in itself a very severe punishment, and is felt to be so by the constituencies which have thus offended, and that it is also a punishment of the right kind. The offence is solely one of a political nature, and the punishment ought likewise to be solely political. I cannot, therefore, help thinking that the selection of one or two gentlemen of no especial culpability or viciousness of character, in order to hold them up as objects of public obloquy, is not a dignified proceeding on the part of this House, nor one likely to lead to any remedy for this great public evil. But in this case the painful position of these two gentlemen, with both of whom I have the honour to be personally acquainted, is most seriously aggravated by the peculiar constitution of the Commissions appointed by the House for inquiring into the corruption of delinquent boroughs, because by the very fact of issuing such a Commission, with its form of process, you hold out every inducement to the persons examined before it to make a clean breast and give every evidence in their power, even, it may be, against themselves. What is the meaning of that? Why, that much as you regret individual error, much as you abhor that low tone of political morality which allows men to traffic in votes themselves, or to incite others to do so, nevertheless your end is a public, not a personal one, and therefore you, as it were, encourage these avowals of past political delinquency to secure a future public good. But in refusing these two gentlemen those certificates of legal impunity which in these cases are generally so freely given, you not only render them liable to the unhappy consequences of a penal prosecution, but—which is far more serious—you imply that they have not acted honourably in the face of the Commission, and have not told it all that they knew about the matter. Now, from my personal knowledge of these gentlemen, I am convinced that the fact is quite different; that, whatever may have been their political errors, yet, appearing as they did before these Commissioners, and being asked as gentlemen to disclose on their honour what they had done, the evidence they gave was the truth and the entire truth. Therefore I would appeal to the Government not to press so cruelly and so partially on these two persons; because I am certain the public effects of such a harsh course will not be good; but that, on the contrary, it will be said there is some hypocrisy in the conduct of this House, that we are not acting sincerely or simply from a wish to eradicate this evil, but are ready to sacrifice two unfortunate gentlemen who may, from some accidental circumstance, have rendered themselves specially obnoxious to the law, and that we are doing this instead of endeavouring to discover, through the highest political sagacity we possess, by what means we can extirpate this disorder from the State. I implore the Government, then, not to continue a prosecution so unworthy both of themselves and of this House, but rather to set about the search for a remedy by totally different measures.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, the noble Lord the Member for the City had acknowledged, in 1852, that the most appropriate way of dealing with such cases was to transfer the franchise from a borough proved to be corrupt, to another locality, and he considered that there was more justice in that proposition than in what had been urged by the noble Lord at a later period. Anything less than a suspension of the writs for ten years in the case of the peccant boroughs would be an inadequate punishment for their delinquencies. Indeed, it would be better to transfer their franchises altogether to other and purer constituencies. If such grave constitutional offences were to be treated with leniency, the country would put no faith in the sincerity of the House's professed abhorrence of electoral corruption. To suspend the writs, as had been proposed, merely till another Session, when it was intended that the franchise should be brought down to a lower and, if possible, even more venal class of voters than at present, would be to condone and encourage that very corruption which they all professed so much anxiety to repress.

MAJOR EDWARDS said, he entirely concurred with everything that had fallen from the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. M. Milnes). He happened to be well acquainted with both of the individuals who were the subject of that discussion, and he was satisfied that what they had already suffered through the prosecution hanging over them was quite sufficient punishment for whatever offences they might be supposed to have committed. He was therefore persuaded that the hon. and learned Attorney General would gratify every Member on both sides of the House if he were to rise and announce that the legal period for it having now expired this prosecution would not be carried any further.

MR. COLLINS said, he hoped the Government would not consent to the issue of the writs for either of these boroughs during the present Parliament. There were grave objections, however, to their disfranchisement. The hon. Members for Gloucestershire and the West Riding of Yorkshire doubtless would not like to have these corrupt towns merged in their respective constituencies. It would be better to suspend the writ for five years.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: I wish to call the attention of the House to one view of this case, which appears to me of great importance, and with regard to which we may find ourselves in a difficulty if we proceed without considering well the course about to be taken. I shall not now say a word as to the general question of the best and most philosophical mode of treating boroughs which have been found guilty of great corruption. I wish to speak of an entirely different subject. My hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General a few nights ago informed the House, in answer, I think, to a question, that even although the time had expired for what we may call the statutory prosecution of the candidates at the late election for one of these boroughs, he believed, I dare say most correctly, there was room for an indictment against them for misdemeanour at common law, and that it would be his duty, as he conceived, to direct such an indictment to be brought forward. Now, it is very important that we should not, from a desire existing, no doubt, upon both sides of the House to repress corrupt practices of this kind, take a step which may have, or which may be represented out of doors as having the appearance of very great injustice towards these two gentlemen. I have not the honour of the acquaintance of either of those gentlemen, and I am only anxious to prevent the House committing an injustice by proceeding rashly in this matter. The House has often had its attention called to the Act of 1852, which authorized the making of these inquiries into corrupt practices at elections, and it knows that very precise and somewhat unusual clauses were introduced, and certainly not the least conspicuous of them is the clause which holds out to every person who may be called upon to give evidence before these Commissions the promise that if he gives full and fair evidence he shall be protected from all penal consequences whatever. That clause is so strong that I hope the House will allow me to read it. It runs as follows:—

“IX. For the more effectually prosecuting any inquiry under this Act, every person who has been engaged in any corrupt practice at or connected with any election of Members or a Member to serve in Parliament for any county, division of a county, city, borough, University, or place to which any inquiry under this Act relates, and who is examined as a witness, and gives evidence touching such corrupt practice before the Commissioners appointed under this Act to make such inquiry, and who upon such examination makes a true discovery to the best of his knowledge touching all things to which he is so examined, shall be freed from all penal actions, forfeitures, punishments, disabilities, and incapacities, and all criminal prosecutions, to which he may have been or may become liable or subject at the suit of Her Majesty, her heirs, or successors, or any other person, for anything done by such person or persons in respect of such corrupt practice; and no person shall be excused from answering any question put to him by such Commissioners on the ground of any privilege, or on the ground that the answer to such question will tend to criminate such person.”

Observe what is the consequence of that. You tell all persons who are summoned to give evidence before the Commission that, provided they make a full and fair discovery of everything, to the best of their knowledge, they shall be indemnified against every possible consequence that may happen; and more, that they are not to have that which is the ordinary protection of every subject of the realm, they are not to be allowed to refuse to answer a question on the ground that the answer may criminate them. They cannot do what the meanest witness in any of the courts of criminal jurisdiction can do; they cannot say, “I decline to answer that question because my reply may subject me to criminal prosecution.” The answer would be, “No, it won’t; if you tell the truth as to what you know you are indemnified by the clause in the Act of Parliament.” The question may arise. “Is not that sufficient? How can there be any room for a prosecution against these gentlemen?” The only room for a prosecution arises from the next section, which provides that, in order to make their indemnity perfect, in order to enable them to plead it before the courts, they are to have a certificate under the hands of the Commissioners. Now, I apprehend that the meaning of that clause was clearly this, that the Commissioners who took the evidence should judge whether the witness who gave the evidence had made a full and fair discovery of everything within his knowledge before they gave the certificate in question. Now, what has happened in the case of the Wakefield election? Two gentlemen who were candidates at that election were examined at great length and in great detail before the Commissioners. I have looked only cursorily at the report of their examinations; but it does seem to me that nothing appears upon the face of the proceedings which would enable any one reading the evidence to say that the persons giving it had not made a full and fair disclosure to the best of their knowledge. The Commissioners may have thought differently; the certificates have not been given to those two gentlemen. Now, my proposition is this:—I do not wish the House to limit the power of the Commissioners as to giving or refusing these certificates; but I do ask that when upon the face of the proceedings, as reported by the Commissioners, and laid before us, a witness appears to have made a full disclosure, but no certificate has been given to him, the House shall not make itself a party to his prosecution, without requiring the Commissioners to state why they refused to give him the certificate. In this case the Commissioners have made their Report, and have assigned no reason whatever for refusing these certificates. They have not said, “No matter what may appear upon the evidence, the air and manner of the witnesses were such as to lead to the belief that they had not made a true discovery, to the best of their knowledge, touching the things upon which they were examined.” Had the Commissioners made such a Report to Her Majesty, I have no doubt that the House would have been satisfied with it, and would have given them credit for having formed a true judgment. But what I say is, that it behoves the House of Commons, before it directs, or invites, or urges a prosecution of these gentlemen, to have made known to it, in some way, why it was that they were deprived of that large promise and inducement, which is held out, before examination, to witnesses, on condition that they answer truly and to the best of their knowledge. Just observe the position in which these gentlemen are placed. They cannot go to any Court of Appeal from the Commissioners, and say, “We ought to have had certificates, but have not got them;” nor could they, before giving their evidence, demand their certificates, because the Act of Parliament says, “You cannot have a certificate until you have given your evidence." Therefore, this is the state of things. The Commissioners refuse the certificates without assigning any reason; and these gentlemen have no appeal, have no means of insisting upon those certificates being given to them. They have done all they could. They have given all the evidence which they might have refused to give, had it not been for this Act of Parliament, and they are now left to a prosecution, which this House urges the Attorney General to undertake. I know there is no man in the House whose feelings of justice and propriety might better be trusted, than might those of my hon. and learned Friend, and I put it not only to the House, but also to him—although I know that in this matter he is acting more upon what appears to be the wish of the House, than upon any opinion or judgment of his own—whether the House of Commons, if it encourages or urges on this prosecution, may not be doing an act of the grossest injustice. It may be that there was a good reason for refusing these certificates; but the Commissioners have assigned none, and I say that, from all that appears upon their Report, we must presume that the witnesses gave their evidence upon the faith of this Parliamentary contract, and that they gave it fairly and truthfully; because I do not find that the Commissioners anywhere censure them for giving testimony of a different kind. If that is so, do not, for goodness' sake, let us, affecting a desire to punish and repress bribery and corruption—which I have no doubt we all feel—do not let us, simply because we can lay our fingers upon two individuals, urge a prosecution against them; at all events, without knowing why it is that they have not got the protection which the Act of Parliament promised them.

MR. MALINS said, he took very much the same view as his hon. and learned Friend who had just sat down; but he wished to add to his statement a fact which he considered to be of great importance. His hon. and learned Friend was right in stating that the Commissioners had not assigned their reasons for refusing their certificate; but he (Mr. Malins) had been informed by Mr. Serjeant Pigott, the senior Commissioner upon the Wakefield inquiry, that he thought that Mr. Leatham ought to have had his certificate, but that it was refused in consequence of the other two Commissioners, Messrs. Willes and Slade, being of a different opinion. The section quoted by his hon. and learned Friend amounted in reality to a Parliamentary contract with any person whom it might induce to give evidence, for if it were not so, let them consider what would be the position of persons who gave their evidence before the Commissioners. Having come there on the faith of a Parliamentary contract, and made a full disclosure of everything he knew, the witness would find himself at the mercy of the Commissioners, who might rightly or wrongly refuse the certificate. Now, in the case before the House, the chief Commissioner might have been wrong, and the junior Commissioner might have been right; but a higher question was raised, and that was whether, there being clearly a doubt, the House would not, acting on the well-known principle of the law, take a merciful view of the case, and giving the accused the benefit of the doubt, withdraw from the prosecution? He wished something could be done to show the determination of the House to prevent the continuance of bribery and corruption; still they were bound to act mercifully, not harshly, and above all they were bound to bear in mind the Parliamentary contract which the Act of Parliament made with the witnesses. There was another point he wished to press on the attention of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General. When, in the course of the debate, upon the issuing of the Berwick Commission, he referred to what had taken place at Wakefield, he by no means intended to urge upon the Government that they should undertake a prosecution which, if instituted at all, ought to have been instituted directly the facts became known. The 14th section of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act provided that all proceedings under it should be commenced within a year after the Commission of the offence; but all these transactions occurred in April, 1859, and therefore the year had already expired. He submitted that the Government would not be justified in instituting a prosecution where there was a serious doubt whether the result would be favourable, and upon the whole he was decidedly of opinion that no further proceedings should be taken against individuals in the present case.

MR. MELLOR said, he took a somewhat different view of the reasons which ought to influence the House in its consideration of this matter, from his hon. and learned Friends opposite, though he arrived at pretty much the same conclusion. It appeared to him that an election Commission was intended to be, not a mere instrument for the prosecution of individuals for bribery, but a body to ascertain the extent to which corruption might prevail in a particular borough, with a view to legislative action. He therefore believed that it would be attended with the greatest danger to the success of such Commissions, if the strictest faith was not kept with the parties who came before the Commissioners to give evidence. In that particular case he had looked into the evidence, and he was at a loss to discover the grounds upon which a certificate was refused to Mr. Leatham. The differences of opinion between the Commissioners, stated by his hon. and learned Friend, were an additional reason why the prosecution should not be carried on; and he was certain that great mischief and inconvenience would occur if it were undertaken. As to the issue of the writ, it was known to every body that the Corrupt Practices Committee had recommended that for the future, when extensive bribery had been found to prevail in a borough, the writ should be suspended for a period of five years, without prejudice to the right of the House to take stronger measures by way of whole or partial disfranchisement. His chief regret was that hitherto the House had not disfranchised the borough where extensive bribery had prevailed, transferring the privilege to some other place; and, at all events, he hoped that in the present instance the Attorney General would seriously consider whether it could with propriety institute prosecutions against individuals.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he fully concurred in the statement of the law given by the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir H. Cairns), and he had the authority of Mr. Serjeant Pigott for stating that, in his opinion, certificates ought to have been granted upon the ground that when the Commission was opened the parties were informed that if they came forward and made a full disclosure the Commissioners had power, under the Act of Parliament, to grant them certificates of indemnity. There would be great difficulty before a special jury in Westminster Hall in convicting any gentleman to whom it had been held out that if he made a full disclosure a certificate of indemnity would be granted. If a magistrate went into the cell of a prisoner and assured him that if he made a disclosure of the crime alleged against him he would receive a certificate of indemnity, no Judge on the bench would allow a statement so obtained to be recorded against the prisoner on a criminal trial.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: The Addresses to which the House has listened have certainly placed me in a very painful position, because I must speak to you in a manner which must appear rather ungracious after the speeches you have heard from my hon. and learned Friends. They have told you things which are highly creditable to their humanity, their feelings as Gentlemen, and their kind consideration of the circumstances of the case; but undoubtedly not creditable to their reputation as lawyers. I have not heard a single argument broached that would for one moment be listened to in a court of law; but at the same time there have been many observations made, which, on the ground of humanity, may well be deemed worthy of attention in an assembly of Gentlemen. But you must remember that you have placed me in a false position, because you have delivered Addresses concluding with no Resolution. If the House has heard sufficient to influence their decision, declare an opinion at once that, under the circumstances, it is the duty of the Attorney General not to proceed with these prosecutions against individuals. No man in the House would more joyfully acquiesce in that conclusion than I; but it is impossible for you to leave me exposed to the whole weight of a public duty, and imagine that I can feel myself adequately discharged from that onerous obligation in consequence of certain Gentlemen, however much they may be entitled to respect and attention, having addressed a few speeches to the House characterized by feelings of humanity, kindness and forbearance. I cannot act upon addresses, however generous and humane; but if any hon. Gentleman will come forward with a Resolution, I shall certainly not oppose a single word to its adoption by the House. One or two points have been mooted, upon which I may be permitted to make a few remarks. Nothing is more to be deprecated than that you should constitute yourselves a Court of Appeal from any description of judicial authority, and I am extremely sorry that the kindly feelings of the hon. and learned Member for Belfast should have induced him to forget the lawyer in the man, because, undoubtedly, election Commissioners are armed with a great judicial authority. I am sorry to find that one of them has made that communication to which the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. James) has referred, because he was bound by every consideration not to impeach the judgment which the majority of his colleagues gave, and my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. James) will permit me to say that so unadvised and indiscreet a communication ought not to have been stated to this House. [Mr. E. JAMES: I had his authority for stating it.] Then I regret it the more, because he was in a minority of three Judges, and he was bound to uphold the judicial decision which the majority had pronounced, and not to impugn it. But, I repeat, you should not constitute yourselves a Court of Appeal from those to whom you have intrusted a judicial duty. If you do so, who in future will be found willing to undertake that duty? Nor, I submit, can you properly call upon the Commissioners to state the grounds of their decision! You might as well call upon the Court of Queen's Bench to explain the reasons of their judgment in a particular case. You cannot sit in judgment on the Commissioners. They can determine what is committed to them by law, can judge of the credibility of a witness not only by the terms in which he couches his answers, but by his demeanour and appearance before them, and you have not the means of deciding as to the manner in which they discharge their duty. What the Act of Parliament has done is this:—the certificate of the Commissioners is the only evidence which the law permits to be offered that a witness has given satisfactory answers to the questions put to him. If a witness does not obtain that certificate, the law is bound to conclude that in the judgment of the Commissioners the witness was not entitled to the indemnity, though the Act of Parliament prevents his evidence being used against him. Therefore you do him no injury. You do not give him the indemnity, but at the same time what he has said is not to be used against him. The Act of Parliament itself protects him against any prosecution based upon evidence given by him the tendency of which would be to criminate himself.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: Is that so?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Yes, that is so.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: I do not find it in the Act.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Yes, it is so, undoubtedly. And when my hon. and learned Friend speaks of the senior Commissioner reading the Act of Parliament to the witnesses, as if that would make any difference, I am astonished at his observations. The Act of Parliament is known to every one, and it cannot affect the case one way or other whether it was read or not read to the witnesses by the Commissioners. Another element for our consideration, however, has been introduced in the course of the discussion—namely, that it is doubtful whether the time has not expired within which a prosecution ought properly to be instituted. If there were any doubt upon that point in my own mind, or in the mind of those to whom I have resorted for assistance, I should be most glad to give the accused persons all the advantage of it; but I have not the slightest doubt with respect to it. The limitation of time has no application to a criminal prosecution for misdemeanour; and the hon. and learned Member for Belfast misunderstood what I stated the other night. What I then said was, that I should prosecute for misdemeanour under the statute. If I had a doubt of the propriety of that mode of proceeding, I should not hesitate to resort to the common law; but I have no doubt, and, therefore, the prosecution will be under the statute. If I am wrong, though I think I am not, the accused will have the benefit of the error and will be protected by the Act of Parliament. The hon. and learned Member also spoke of the prosecution as if it had been directed by the House. [Sir H. CAIRNS was understood to explain that he said that it was urged, not ordered, by the House.] It was, indeed, urged by the House on a variety of occasions, unless this House has been guilty of the most solemn mockery and hypocrisy. You have urged it by passing the statute. Is that Act to be a real thing, or a mere piece of hypocrisy and imposition on the public? It has been urged again and again, and by no one more earnestly than by the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins), who blamed the Government for issuing Commissions which were productive of no good at all. And why were they productive of no good? Because, when the time comes for action, the House of Commons shrinks from enforcing the statute, and there is no one here who will throw the first stone. If that is to be the principle on which you act, confess it, be consistent, and repeal the Acts. But while those Acts of Parliament remain, and you have returned to you a mass of evidence which proves that there has been corruption in the grossest, most extravagant, and exaggerated manner, while this is brought publicly to the notice of the Attorney General, and the Attorney General is willing to perform his duty, I say you must allow him to perform it. Undoubtedly, you will be glad that those things which you affect to treasure so highly — namely, your enactments — are about to be tried, and that it will be shown whether this statute was passed for a real purpose or not. Such is the question, I say, that is about to be tried, and will be tried unless you come in to the rescue of those who are accused, and by a Resolution of the House, take off from the Attorney General that responsibility from which, as an individual, he would be most thankful and most happy to be relieved. Sir, I have undertaken this duty, as I hope everybody will give me the credit for, most unwillingly; but the conviction has been forced on me that unless the whole thing is to be given up as a farce and a piece of hypocrisy, it is my bounden duty, in the position I occupy, having first ascertained that I have, as I believe I have, all the materials for a conviction, to enforce the law. But, now, remember, you introduce an exceptional case with regard to Mr. Leatham. It may be, and I think it was, a very hard case. But remember this—if you pass a Resolution with respect to Mr. Leatham—

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: I did not allude to him particularly. I spoke of both.

MR. MALINS: It was I who particularly mentioned Mr. Leatham.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Well, what I wish you to understand is this—that if you choose to take exception to the judgment of the Commissioners in the case of Mr. Leatham, I decline to prosecute any of them. For how can I tell that they may not have erred as greatly with regard to the rest as with respect to him? I will tell you what I have done. I have selected eight of the greatest culprits (using that word as denoting the greatest delinquents according to the evidence before me), and I have taken them without any difference or distinction, other than that four have been selected from the one side of politics and four from the other. Within two days, proceedings, I trust, will be commenced against them. I shall commit the prosecution of the four belonging to the one side to gentlemen of the bar, who are generally supposed to be of the opposite persuasion in politics, observing a similar impartiality with reference to the other four. That is the step which, as Attorney General, I shall take, though I repeat I shall be most happy to relinquish the prosecution under the authority of an express declaration by this House.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, I shall not address the House with respect to any particular case, but, understanding this matter was coming forward, I have looked into the evidence and considered the Act of Parliament, and the result of my reflection is, not that my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General is departing from his duty in what he proposes to do, still less in the reasons he has assigned, but that if these prosecutions be pressed, two consequences must follow:—one, the perpetration of a great act of injustice; and the other, the risk of defeating the objects of the Act of Parliament. I will state my reasons for these two conclusions. I think that the Attorney General has not accurately represented the operation of the Act of Parliament in one particular. If I understand the Act rightly, there can be no defence to any prosecution for bribery instituted against persons who have given evidence before the Commissioners, except pleading the certificate given by the Commissioners, for the Act distinctly says, that where any person is examined before the Commissioners, such witness shall not be indemnified under the Act, unless he receives from the Commissioners a certificate in writing under their hands that he has made a true disclosure touching all things on which he was examined. Therefore, any admission which a witness has made against himself will be used against him, unless he has the indemnity secured by the certificate. The Attorney General seemed to think that under the 9th section of the Act the witness is protected from all the consequences of an admission against himself, that section declaring that the witness shall be free from all penalties, actions, forfeitures, disabilities, and criminal prosecutions. But he is only to be free from them, according to the same section, if on examination he makes a true disclosure of facts, and the only mode of testing that point is by the certificate of the Commissioners. If, therefore, the certificate is withheld, a prosecution may be instituted and a man may be convicted on admissions made by himself, although he is bound as a witness before the Commissioners to answer every question, notwithstanding that the answers may tend to criminate himself. If that be the true construction of the statute, only conceive what you are about to do. You not only induce witnesses to come forward to disclose bribery and corruption, but you also say that those witnesses shall not be entitled to the ordinary protection which every accused person in this country has of not answering a single question tending to criminate himself. Can that be a proper course either for the House or the Attorney General to pursue, if you mean to make use of the Act for the fair purpose of stopping corruption, but not for prosecuting individuals with undue severity on account of admissions which they would not have made if they had not thought themselves entitled to protection? I quite agree if a witness before the Commissioners had apparently not made a true disclosure, had prevaricated, and kept back the truth, then protection should not be extended to him; but in the Report of the Commissioners with respect to this particular case there is not one tittle of evidence to show that these persons from whom certificates were withheld had prevaricated or abstained from disclosing the truth so far as it was within their own knowledge. If so, they have performed their part of the Parliamentary contract, and we are bound to perform ours. Now, I have read the evidence of Mr. Leatham. I cannot say that, according to the evidence, Mr. Leatham has behaved with discretion or with prudence; and anybody may well suppose that he was led into the commission of acts for which he must now himself be sorry. But I cannot find one word in the evidence which tends to show that Mr. Leatham kept back any facts which it was important for the Commissioners to learn. If he has given a truthful relation of facts, you may make use of them and derive benefit from them in dealing with the case of Wakefield; but, assuming their truth, I think Mr. Leatham is entitled to a certificate of indemnity. See what the consequences of such a prosecution will be as regards the statute, and the offence to which the statute applies. If you proceed against the persons from whom a certificate is withheld, they not being open to the charge of having given unsatisfactory evidence, what witnesses will you ever get to come before such Commissions for the future? Your hands will henceforth be tied, the whole object of the Act of Parliament will be frustrated; you will have no means of ascertaining whether corruption exists or not, if you institute such prosecutions. The Attorney General says, and very properly, that he ought not to be put in a position where he may be reproached for not prosecuting, when, in point of fact, he is willing to discharge that duty. In this I quite agree with him, and think he would be quite justified in going on with the prosecution, until, at all events, good reasons were adduced in this House to satisfy him that an injustice would be perpetrated if it were allowed to continue. I believe that an injustice would be committed by a conviction obtained through evidence given in the belief that the parties concerned would receive a certificate of indemnity; and believing that, I will not be a party to such a prosecution, but will join with those who have urged the Attorney General not to proceed any further in this matter. If blame is to attach to anybody, let it attach, not to the Attorney General or the Government, but to us who suggest the course. The hon. and learned Gentleman has done his duty so far, and I think he will not less discharge his duty now that the facts have been brought before him, if, upon considerations, not of humanity, but of justice and sound policy, he withdraws from these prosecutions.

MR. BRIGHT: I have some difficulty in saying anything on this matter, because, as the House knows, one of the gentlemen concerned is a near relative of mine. At the same time, there may be some points which have not been laid before the House, but which are familiar to me from my connection with him. The Attorney General has made a speech, Sir, with which I can find no fault. Its law, I have no doubt, was in all points correct, and I do not complain that in his observations he went one hair's breadth beyond the line of his duty. But it is quite possible that everything he said may be true, and that at the same time everything else which has been said in the House to induce him not to proceed with these prosecutions is also true. It may be perfectly true that those gentlemen—and I may mention in particular the name of Mr. Leatham, in whom, it may be supposed, I take a somewhat warm interest—it may be true that they have been examined by the Commissioners, that they have not received a certificate, that the funds which they supplied have been expended in bribery, and that they are open to prosecution by the Attorney General; but I will put before the Attorney General, in two or three sentences, the case as it is presented to my mind, and I will not colour it too warmly because I have an immediate interest in one of the gentlemen. One of these gentlemen—Mr. Leatham, if you like—comes before the Commission. He is especially told of the Act of Parliament. On the opening of the Commission the Act is read in public Court, and witnesses are told, “If you make a full disclosure on all the matters about which you are examined, a certificate of indemnity will be given you.” Mr. Leatham lived in the neighbourhood; he attended the Court several days; but he was only once examined. Not a single syllable was said by any one of the Commissioners during the examination, or after it, to show they regarded his evidence as unsatisfactory and incomplete. He might have been examined any day. He was there ready to answer any question which might have been suggested by the evidence of other witnesses. But neither when he was under examination, nor at the conclusion of it, nor at the termination of the inquiry, nor at any time, was there an intimation to him by the slightest word or look that the Commissioners were dissatisfied with his evidence. If they had said to him “There appear to be discrepancies in certain points. Can you clear them up?” he would have been most ready to do so if he could. But nothing of the sort was done, and therefore he left the Court with the perfect assurance that he had done all which the Commissioners expected from him, that the contract would be fulfilled, and that in due course of time a certificate would be sent to him. He had made a full disclosure. I speak, knowing the facts as completely, I believe, as Mr. Leatham knows them himself. Well, then, the Report comes out, and he finds that, without any statement made, without any reason given, without any fault found, the certificate is withheld from a certain number of persons, including himself. He immediately applies by letter to the Home Office, and takes steps to ascertain whether it was possible for him by the re-opening of the Commission, by application to any Court of Appeal, or by any other mode, to make a further statement if anybody chose to ask him anything further, in order that he might obtain the certificate, and remove the imputation that his evidence given on oath had not been as satisfactory as the Commissioners had a right to expect. I will not say that the Attorney General is not right in his law, but I think the House will feel at once that this is a case of grievous hardship, and I think the hon. and learned Gentleman admitted it. He says this House is not a Court of appeal. But if the Act of Parliament does not establish any Court of appeal, there still is one—namely, the consciences and the love of justice which prevail, I believe, universally among hon. Members of this House in matters of this nature.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: I did not mean for a moment to dispute the authority of this House. On the contrary, if it expresses its opinion definitely, I shall at once bow to it.

MR. BRIGHT: I may have expressed myself too warmly, but I say again that I do not find fault with anything which the hon. and learned Gentleman said. He made an observation respecting the Chief Commissioner. Mr. Serjeant Pigott is known to many Members of this House. I have known him for some years, and he is a very good lawyer and an excellent and honourable man. The Attorney General says that he went a little beyond the ordinary etiquette of office in making the communication which has been referred to. Now, as the Act of Parliament does not allow one of two persons to sign the certificate, and as Mr. Serjeant Pigott found that a grievous hardship was about to be committed, he intimated that, so far as he was concerned, he thought Mr. Leatham had made a full disclosure, and was, therefore, according to the Act, entitled to his certificate. And, moreover, he authorized the hon. and learned Members (Mr. James and Mr. Malins) to make that statement here. There is one point which I should like to put to the Attorney General. He repudiates the notion that the time for instituting these prosecutions is past. I will admit it to be so. But he cannot dispute that so lately as 1854 an Act was passed “to consolidate and amend the laws relating to bribery, treating, and undue influence at elections of members of Parliament,” by the 14th clause of which it is declared that

“No person shall be liable to any penalty or forfeiture hereby enacted or imposed, unless some prosecution, action, or suit for the offence committed shall be commenced against such person within the space of one year next after such offence against this Act shall be committed.”

I am quite willing to agree with the Attorney General that this clause does not apply to the present case in the mode in which he proposes to proceed; but, seeing that this is the very last Act of Parliament on the subject of bribery, and that it is a consolidation Act, I think it fair to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman to infer with me that the House at that time intended, when twelve months had elapsed after an offence of this nature, that no prosecution should take place. That may be so or not, but so it strikes my mind. I rely, however, on the other point. I say when a gentleman has made a full disclosure, and receives no intimation of his having given incomplete or unsatisfactory evidence—when a Chief Commissioner declares his belief that to withhold the certificate is contrary to an Act of Parliament—I very much mistake the character of the House of Commons, and I think I have mistaken, too, the character of the Attorney General if, under these circumstances, they do not admit it would be impossible to continue these prosecutions. I admit all the Attorney General has said, I see his difficulty. But I think, after the observations which have been made to-night, the facts being now more fully before the House, he will feel that though duty compelled him to commence a prosecution, it will not be inconsistent with his duty to proceed no further with it. I shall say no more, nearly related as I am to a Gentleman concerned in this matter, except to declare that if I was of opinion that that gentleman had acted in a manner which justified a prosecution being instituted against him, although he were my own brother—so much do I abhor this corrupt system which obtains at elections—I should be the last person in the world to stand up in the House of Commons and shield him from the arm of the law.

MR. WHITESIDE: The first discussion on this matter arose from a question incidentally put to the hon. and learned Attorney General. The House however, has never addressed Her Majesty to direct the Attorney General to prosecute. I certainly do not like to have it put to me as an alternative that the House of Commons shall interfere and coerce the hon. and learned Gentleman, against his sense of justice, not to prosecute, but I would say—having been a law officer of the Crown—if it was stated to me that of three Commissioners carrying out the provisions of this Act one was of opinion that a particular witness was entitled to a certificate, and that the others differed from him in that respect, I should hesitate to commence a prosecution under such circumstance. You may prosecute any of these persons for having given false evidence, and the fact that you do not prosecute them for giving false evidence is some proof that they have given true evidence. This Act of Parliament says any person giving false evidence shall be liable to the pains and penalties of perjury. Well, there is no prosecution for perjury in this case, but there is a prosecution for bribery. I think my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole) has raised a very nice point under the 8th section of this Act, and I give this warning to my hon. and learned Friend, the Attorney General, that a prosecution in a criminal court is wholly unlike a Chancery suit; that juries, somehow, will always take into consideration many other things besides the evidence in the case. [THE ATTORNEY GENERAL—speeches in this House, for instance.] That shows great good sense on their part; and what juryman could be insensible to a speech of my hon. and learned Friend? I thought from what my hon. and learned Friend said on a former occasion, that the evidence he had was evidence which he had obtained from other sources than the Commission itself. I understand my hon. and learned Friend to mean that although he won't use evidence that A. B. gave against himself, yet that he will use against him evidence which C. D. or E. F. gave. But that is just doing the very same thing indirectly that you ought not to do directly. I agree it is difficult for this House to exercise jurisdiction over the three Commissioners, and to say that they ought to have given a certificate where they have not given one; but we have this fact before us, that these gentlemen differed in opinion as to whether a certificate ought to have been granted—the senior Commissioner holding one view upon that point, and the two others entertaining another—and I think that is a case in which the Attorney General should consider well before he prosecutes.

MR. MALINS was understood to say that Mr. Serjeant Pigott had written a letter to his colleagues, stating the grounds on which he had arrived at the opinion he expressed.

THE CENSUS.—QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to press the Census Bill in its present form as regards the mode of ascertaining the Religious Profession of the Population, or whether they propose to alter the said Bill in that respect; and, if so, in what manner?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Before I advert to the question just put to me, I may be permitted to say that I have remarked on previous occasions the great discordance of opinion in these cases with respect to the policy of acting on the Reports of Commissions issued to inquire into corrupt practices at elections; and certainly the debate this evening has not served to remove that impression; for there have been very conflicting opinions expressed with regard to the policy of acting, and those opinions have been in direct conflict with those expressed on former occasions. According to my recollection of the last debate in the case of Berwick, the charge against the Government was that they were supine in instituting proceedings founded on the Reports of these Commissions; that through their supineness these Commissions became nugatory, and that it was incumbent on the House and the Executive Government to take active steps in consequence of the information disclosed by the Commissioners' Reports. On that occasion I remember severe reproaches were directed against the Government for not having previously founded prosecutions upon the Reports of the Gloucester and Wakefield Commissions, but particularly upon that of Wakefield, in which it was pointed out, and with considerable commendation, that certificates had not been granted to all the witnesses. In consequence of what passed on that occasion my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, having had the matter previously under consideration, decided on instituting prosecutions. The House has heard the explanations which my hon. and learned Friend has afforded, and nothing can be more embarrassing than debates such as that which has taken place with regard to the conduct of the Executive Government and of my hon. and learned Friend who is charged with the management of criminal prosecutions. We are first urged to conduct such prosecutions, and when the first steps are taken for that purpose a debate is raised in this House, founded on no distinct Resolution, prejudices are created, and insinuations are made. [Mr. BRIGHT: No, no!] Well, I will not say insinuations. Prejudices, however, are raised, and admonitions are indirectly conveyed to my hon. and learned Friend; but no positive fact is laid before the House by which the conduct of the Government can be guided. I wish to state my own opinion, that it is utterly impossible for the Executive Government to regard any of these Commissions otherwise than in a judicial point of view. These Commissioners are appointed under a special Act of Parliament; and if the Government were to interfere by calling on them to explain their proceedings or to be the organ of conveying charges against them, undoubtedly such conduct would meet with the reprehension of this House. It would be said that these being Parliamentary Commissions, issued under an Address to the Crown, and the Commissioners being named in the Address, any interference on the part of the Executive Government, whether the Commissioners were actually sitting, or, having presented their Report, were functi officio, would be a violation of their duty to this House. A memorial was presented to me by Mr. Leatham, containing the allegation, which has been repeated by more than one Member this evening, that the Chief Commissioner was of opinion that he was entitled to his certificate. I have no reason to doubt that Mr. Leatham had sufficient grounds for making that statement; but the only official use I could make of his memorial was to refer it to my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, in order that he might have official knowledge of it. It was not competent for me to call on the Commissioners to give any explanation of their conduct. I must say, however, what cannot but be obvious to all, that speeches made in this House while legal proceedings are pending are calculated to embarrass the course of justice. The fairest course towards the Executive Government would be for some hon. Member to bring forward a distinct Motion in this House either to stop the prosecution or to recommend that it should go forward, as in either case there would be a distinct ground on which the Executive Government could act. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University, did not, I think, sufficiently distinguish between two different clauses of the Act. It is true, that when a certificate is given, the person receiving it is held harmless against criminal proceedings, but it is likewise true that where no such certificate is given his evidence will not be used against him in any criminal proceeding. If the House will refer to the provisions of the 8th section they will see that no question can arise on that point; for it says that no answer to any question, except in the case of perjury, shall be admissible against the person giving evidence in any proceedings, civil or criminal. [Sir H. CAIRNS: That is part of the indemnity.] It seems to me to be distinct from the indemnity, and to bear the construction which I have put upon it; nor was I aware that any persons competent to give an opinion had a different view of it till now. Now a few words as to the question of the hon. Member for Finsbury. The charges to which the Government are exposed with respect to the execution of the Act come from different quarters. Some hon. Members impute to the Government an unnecessary degree of lenity in their treatment of these two boroughs of Gloucester and Wakefield. The hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Duncombe) thinks the suspension of the writs during the present Parliament an unnecessarily severe measure, and he asks why the writs should not be issued immediately. Other hon. Members, on the other hand, say that the suspension of the writs during this Parliament is a weak and insufficient course, and that the boroughs ought to be disfranchised for a longer time. The hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Griffiths) said that the course taken by the Government in recommending a suspension of the writs for this Parliament only was a proof of their insincerity, because the course taken falls far short of the justice of the case. Now, nobody can dispute that the suspension of the writs during the present Parliament is a considerable deprivation, and a penal measure of some magnitude. The issue of these writs is in the power of the House; but if any hon. Member thinks that a longer time of deprivation is required, it is competent for him, to bring in a Bill for that purpose. If the period of suspension is to exceed the length of the present Parliament, that can only be done by means of a Bill, because as soon as a dissolution takes place the issue of the writs is out of the hand of the House. The Government have not thought it desirable to take that course, because with a Bill under the consideration of the House for a reform of the representation of the people, which will add considerably to the constituencies of Gloucester and Wakefield, it was not thought expedient to suspend the writs for a longer period than during the present Parliament. Now, with regard to the question put on the subject of the census by the hon. Member (Mr. Dillwyn), I do not think it a convenient course in general to anticipate the debate on a Bill which is in progress through the House. I hope, therefore, I shall not be considered as acting disrespectfully towards the House if I decline to enter into a discussion of that question. I will only say that the proposal with reference to the religious returns to be obtained at the census was deliberately made, and that I do not see any practical difficulty in the way of its being carried out; but if the House should be of opinion that it would be an infraction of religious liberty to impose a penalty on the refusal to answer the questions with regard to the religious denomination of individuals, and if it should be wished to make a distinction between that particular and the other particulars to be collected at the census, I should not be unwilling to make that distinction.

Mr. Dillwyn

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he wished to disclaim having made an unqualified charge of insincerity against the Government.

MR. BASS said, that with reference to the subject of the bribery prosecutions, he thought the question before the House was whether they would or would not treat bribery as an offence. If the matter were to be passed over in the way recommended by some legal gentlemen, the country would never afterwards believe for a single moment in the attempts of the House of Commons to put down bribery, nor would anybody think it worth while to take notice of any amount of bribery that might be committed. The Act of Parliament expressly provided that every witness who gave satisfaction to the Commissioners should receive a certificate, and it was a proof that those who did not obtain a certificate were not entitled to the privilege.

ITALY.—FOREIGN ENLISTMENT.—THE PAPAL ARMY.—CIRCULAR OF THE IRISH GOVERNMENT.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he rose with reluctance to call the attention of that House, of the country, and of Europe, to the course which within the last few days the Irish Government had thought fit to take. At any time that course would have been extraordinary, but when it was contrasted with what the Government had done in England, it must be described as not only extraordinary but also as unjustifiable. Within the last few days the Government in Ireland had issued a procla-

ation signed by the Chief Commissioner of Police, and purporting to be a caution against foreign enlistment. It seemed to have been put forward to prevent a few Irishmen from taking service in the army of the Pope. Let the House remember that England was not at war with the Pope, or was she likely to be at war with him. He was not at war or likely to be at war with any one with whom England was in alliance. Why then should the Government arbitrarily interpose to prevent those Irishmen who sympathised with the Pope from taking service in his army? Let the House observe that, at the very same time when the Government were issuing that proclamation in Ireland, the Government in England were countenancing, and he believed, actually encouraging the collection of subscriptions in aid of Garibaldi and others. These acts had been pronounced by law-yeas on both sides of the House to be illegal, and they were known to be contrary to the laws of nations. It was aiding men to make war upon sovereigns with whom ostensibly we were on terms of amity; and such conduct between individuals, in private life, would be considered treacherous and hypocritical. The case stood thus. The overwhelming majority of the people of Ireland were Catholics. They sympathized with the Pope, and, as the natural result, they were anxious to aid him in his distress. But the Government had no sympathy whatever with the Pope. That document was therefore circulated through the country, and the effect of it must be to produce in the public mind the impression that those Irishmen who took service in the Pope's army would be visited with severe penalties. In England, on the other hand, there was a feeling hostile to the Pope, and favourable to any persons who would assail his power, no matter what their antecedents or views might be. The consequence had been subscriptions in aid of Garibaldi and others. These subscriptions had been declared to be illegal, but the Government sympathized with the subscribers and with Garibaldi, and the result was that these subscriptions had been countenanced and encouraged. The very next day after the discussion in that House as to the subscriptions in aid of the Sicilians, when every legal Member of the House declared them to be contrary to law, there appeared in the columns of the Daily News a letter addressed to the editor of that paper, saying, "I send £50 in aid of the fund now raising consequently were determined to crush the expression of Irish zeal. This repression was an instance of tyranny in its most odious form. On a former occasion the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) sneered at the possibility of a Catholic thinking that any outrage to the Pope or any assault upon his temporal power could be sacrilegious; but he would put the noble Lord in possession of the opinion of a statesman who, in the estimation of posterity, would be considered not to rank after the noble Lord. Mr. Pitt, when alluding, in a debate in that House, during the war with Napoleon, to the outrages and insults inflicted on Pius VII., that venerable Pontiff, declared, "that such conduct seems even to me, a Protestant, hardly short of the guilt of sacrilege." What would be the effect of this Proclamation on Ireland? It would, like all things of the kind, bring forth a crop of informers, transform every policeman in the country into a spy, and subject every man who wished to leave Ireland, no matter what might be his destination, to the intolerable nuisance of having his movements watched. Wherever there happened to be a bigoted magistrate or an officious constable in a hurry to be promoted, a story would be trumped up and forwarded to Dublin Castle. Then there would be the old story of State prosecutions over again; and as that venerable institution, a "packed jury," would, no doubt, be appealed to, the result would be the conviction of the accused persons. Supposing it was contrary to the law for British subjects to join the service of the Pope, why was it that the law was put in force in that case, and not also in the case of the illegal subscriptions in aid of the Sicilian insurgents, where the law was not less distinct? The Government ought either to carry out the law in this country, or withdraw the Proclamation they had issued in Ireland. That Proclamation would be deemed an insult by every Irishman not blinded by prejudice or interest, and would tend more than anything which had occurred for many years back to convince the people of Ireland that in matters of this nature they could not expect impartial justice at the hands of the British Government.

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, I am very sorry that the hon. Member for Tipperary should think the conduct of the Irish Government extraordinary. The conduct of that Government, whether right or wrong, has been simply this—obedience to the law. The

hon. Member supposes we have issued a proclamation which he pronounces tyrannical and oppressive. But, in the first place, the fact is that we have issued no proclamation at all; and, in the second place, when I state what we have done, I think it will appear that our motives and conduct were anything but tyrannical and oppressive. There is a law of the United Kingdom which renders it penal for any subject of Her Majesty, without Her Majesty's permission, to take service under a foreign Sovereign. That statute is clear and unmistakeable, and the provisions of that statute it is the duty of the Government, both in England and Ireland, to carry into effect. Knowing such was our duty, we did not desire to bring into the meshes of the law persons who might have offended against the statute in ignorance of its provisions, and who, had they known them, might have been ready and willing to obey. We, therefore, directed a notice containing the terms of that statute, in clear and unmistakeable language, to be printed and circulated, in order that it might be brought to the knowledge of those persons what the law was to which they were bound to conform. It was our plain duty, as long as Parliament kept the statute on the statute book, to enforce its provisions, and it was a course not of tyranny and oppression, but of common prudence and propriety, to circulate that notice, in order that the people of Ireland might receive due warning of the state of the law. The hon. Gentleman said also that the Government had pursued one course in England, and an entirely different course in Ireland, and that there was no equality of justice between the two parts of the United Kingdom. The hon. Gentleman cannot say that there has been any tendency to infringe that statute in England. If there had been, I have not the smallest doubt that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, with whom I have been in communication on this subject, would have issued in London the same notice we have issued in Ireland. It was said also by the hon. Gentleman that we have been parties to the encouragement of an illegal subscription for the purpose of getting up and supporting revolutionary interference in Italy. On the part of the Government I entirely deny that we have been parties to anything of the sort. If the hon. Gentleman possesses any evidence that we have done so let him produce it, and substantiate the accusation he brings against us. But I am not now going to sition to that judicious course which was to have been expected. The conduct of the Government in those matters, encouraging the demarcations between different countries to be broken through, and one State to unite itself with another without the sanction of a European Congress, had led to the union to France of Savoy and Nice. It had also led to the agitation now going on in the East respecting the Christian provinces of Turkey, and he only hoped it might not lead to a similar agitation in respect of Belgium and the Rhenish provinces. When a Government professed neutrality it was bound to carry it out fully and fairly, and not to allow one portion of the inhabitants of the country to gain a triumph over the other. He trusted that the Government would not persevere in such a course; but, under any circumstances, he felt grateful to the hon. Member who introduced this subject for affording the House an opportunity of expressing its opinions upon it.

ITALY.—THE NE POLITAN STATES. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BOWYER said, he rose to call the attention of the House to a most extraordinary despatch from Her Majesty's representative at Naples dated March 23, 1860. That despatch had been written with the full knowledge that it would probably be made public, and yet in the despatch he found a passage which was almost unparalleled in diplomatic correspondence—he could not say quite unparalleled, for the House had seen certain despatches from the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs which resembled rather speeches to a Jacobin Club than documents addressed to a Minister resident in a friendly State. Mr. Elliot said,—

“ In the present excited state of Italy the announcement that political refugees could find a safe asylum on board Her Majesty's ships would probably nearly suffice to produce an outbreak; but, on the other hand, it must be recollected that while a Government and its agents are persecuting individuals in defiance both of law and justice, a person flying from the police may fairly be considered as somewhat in the position of those who are escaping from the Lynch law of a mob.”

He (Mr. Bowyer) was not about to give any opinion on the merits or demerits of the Neapolitan Government, and he should abstain from doing so because he was addressing the British House of Commons, and not a Neapolitan Parliament, and because he conceived we had no business to meddle with the internal affairs of other countries. He must say, however, that if a Minister accredited to a foreign Government was allowed to express himself in such gross terms of insult towards that Government it was an outrage against all the usages of diplomacy and the law of nations, and a violation of the decencies of civilized life. If such opinions had been expressed in private letters, nothing would have been said about them; but they had been set forth in a despatch which had been made public, and which the writer must have known would probably be made public. For a Minister publicly to insult the Sovereign of a foreign country was not only improper, but it led to the most serious inconvenience. It was indeed a part of that system which had made our diplomacy a nuisance to foreign countries. Would such a thing have been done towards France? Lord Cowley would never have dreamt of such a thing. Such insults were only offered to minor States. To large States there was nothing but eulogium, sometimes amounting to almost fulsome adulation, but the minor States were bullied to satisfy the prejudices of this country. He did not believe that the noble Lord in his heart entertained those sentiments of bitterness which he declared in his despatches, but was pandering to an unwholesome feeling existing in this country, grounded partially upon a hatred to Catholic Sovereigns by bigoted Protestants. He wished to know what the Government intended to do after publishing a despatch so insulting in which the Government of the King of Naples, for taking measures for the maintenance of the throne of their Sovereign, when attacked by conspirators and rebels, had been compared to those who administered the Lynch law of a mob, was it possible for a Minister, who had made use of such gross and insulting language towards the Sovereign and Government of that country, to continue in any relation with the Court, or to serve this country usefully in the capacity of a diplomatic minister. He had always understood that the mission of an ambassador was one of peace, and that it was his duty to maintain the rights of his own country, to give protection to subjects of his own country, and to convey to the Government any information which they desired to know. But, at the same time, it was his duty to show the greatest respect and deference to the law of the country vernment for some explanation of the despatch he had mentioned, and he hoped, for the credit of this country and of the Government, that the noble Lord would disclaim the insulting language which had been used by Mr. Elliot, and would be able to state that means had been adopted to prevent the employment of similar language by a British envoy to a sovereign at peace and in alliance with Her Majesty.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I am afraid I cannot satisfy the wish of the hon. and learned Gentleman by informing him that Her Majesty's Government have expressed any disapproval of the despatch which has met with his censure. The chief characteristic of that despatch is that it states the truth, and I apprehend that it is the duty of Her Majesty's diplomatic agents abroad to state the truth, however disagreeable to the Government whom they address, with regard to the facts upon which they have to communicate. This was not a volunteered communication from Mr. Elliot. It arose from a discussion which took place here as to the supposed conduct of a British naval officer in giving refuge to a Sicilian fleeing from persecution on shore. The standing orders which have been given on those matters are recorded on the other page of the paper, from which the hon. and learned Gentleman read an extract. They are in the shape of a communication to the Admiralty, given by my direction when at the head of the Foreign Office, and the orders under which all naval officers are acting, in places where these circumstances are likely to occur, are simply these,—that when any one flees from justice, to escape from a trial or from the condemnation of a tribunal, to any British ship of war which may be stationed in a foreign port, he is not to be received; but that if an individual flees from persecution on account of political opinions, or political conduct, and gains access to the ship, then the commanding officer is not to refuse him asylum. It is upon the principle that every British ship of war is British territory; and that principle has been acted upon in other places and with regard to other countries besides Sicily. During the civil wars of Spain, Gibraltar was the place of refuge alternately of all the different parties. Carlists at one time, Progresistas at another, fleeing from the power of their adversaries, triumphant for a moment, have equally found refuge under the sanction of the British flag at that place. On the same principle it would be an act of barbarous cruelty on the part of the commander of a ship to turn adrift and force back into the hands of his pursuers a man who had committed no distinct offence, who had been tried by no tribunal, who had been charged and found guilty of no civil or criminal offence, but who was persecuted simply on account of his political opinions, and sought a temporary refuge on board a British ship. Mr. Elliot states when he last wrote that the condition of Sicily at the time was such that persons flying for refuge from the police in this way, were like persons flying from the Lynch law of a mob. [MR. HENNESSY: They were flying from the Government.] Yes, but the Government of Sicily is the police. That is the gravamen of the charge. The hon. and learned Gentleman says Mr. Elliot showed disrespect to the laws and institutions of the country, but I say, on the contrary, he showed respect to them. The laws and institutions of the Neapolitan kingdom are now entirely set aside, and consigned to oblivion—the whole Government of the country is in the hands of the police. In the kingdom of Naples there is an excellent code—[MR. BOWYER: Hear, hear.]—the Code Napoleon—[MR. BOWYER: No, it is not so.]—adapted to local circumstances and suited to the habits and to the usages of the people. There is a Constitution and a Parliament, granted by the late King, sworn to by him in the most solemn manner, with adjurations of the vengeance of Heaven on himself and his successors if ever it were set aside—but yet that Constitution is a dead letter. The police do everything—they arrest people without any charge against them, they keep them in prison without any trial, and if by any accident any prisoner is brought to trial and acquitted he is equally kept in prison, because it is said he is suspected. Innocence is no protection there, and the utmost barbarities have been perpetrated by the police of Sicily on the unfortunate population of the country. The hon. and learned Gentleman does not know what is passing there; if he did, I am sure his generous feelings would revolt against the barbarities which we hear and which we know are practised in that country. I believe that no such case as that of M. Rosa, which has been brought forward, has occurred; the report is entirely unfounded. We do not know that there is such a person; but, putting a hypothetical case—if any man flying from the fangs of the police were to seek refuge on board a British ship, there is no man, I believe, in this country, who would not deem that that officer had misconducted himself, who, under those circumstances, should drive such an individual back to be the victim of the barbarities I have described. These are matters of feeling on which we must all think alike. It is no departure from our position of neutrality in regard to the contest now going on. No encouragement has been given to those who are subscribing to the fund in aid of Garibaldi. The hon. and learned Gentleman says the speech of my noble Friend the other night was an encouragement; because at the moment he compared Garibaldi to a great historical personage; but if the hon. and learned Gentleman has no other ground than that for asserting that the Government has given any such encouragement, he is rather straining facts and assertions, in order to prop up the opinions which he wishes us to receive as sound. Therefore, as far as this question goes, there is no censure to be applied to Mr. Elliot. With regard to the feelings of the Neapolitan Government upon that despatch, I should think when they read it, all they could have to say to it would be

"Pudet hoc opprobria nobis, Et dici potuisse, et non potuisse refelli."

In respect to the other point, there is a great distinction between the two cases. In the one case there is a positive statute, plain, intelligible, and simple, to the violation of which certain penalties are attached—that is the Foreign Enlistment Act. The other is an infraction of the law of nations, which may be punished; but every man must see that a prosecution in this case would be much more uncertain, than in the case of offences against the Foreign Enlistment Act. In the one case a warning was thought necessary to certain people in Ireland, who did not seem to be aware of the state of the law; in the other case it was stated by a hon. and learned Member opposite, that the discussion in this House would be sufficient warning to those who were supposed to be engaged in these subscriptions, which were deemed to be contrary to the law of nations.

MR. HENNESSY said, the noble Lord's description of the state of Sicily reminded him of a statement which had been made some years ago by a colleague of his on a similar matter. In 1857 the Foreign Secretary of the noble Lord's then Government (the Earl of Clarendon) stated in "another place" that Baron Poerio war with a Sovereign in the East, and we might have another now with a Sovereign in the West; for the noble Lord's speech might promote a rupture between Her Majesty's Government and the King of Naples. The noble Lord once talked of sending a fleet to the Bay of Naples, but he got a letter from the Emperor of Russia, which was circulated throughout Europe, informing him that the Russian Government would maintain the principle of non-intervention, and that they would not permit him to dictate to a small State because it was small; and then the noble Lord very wisely, though not with much dignity, retreated from his menacing position, for he felt that though he could bully Naples he could not bully Russia. Hon. Gentlemen would find that if they allowed the noble Lord to have his own way, he would get the country into all kinds of expensive and disastrous complications. He would only add the expression of his regret that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had not been as explicit and candid as usual in his answer. The right hon. Gentleman stated that he had not issued any proclamation. Surely one which had been issued at the direction and by the advice of the Attorney General must be taken as the act of the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a member.

MR. CARDWELL: I said, that no proclamation was issued, and that what was issued was the ordinary police notice; and that is exactly the truth of the case.

MR. O'BRIEN said, that as a Roman Catholic he wished to preserve, if it were possible, the Romagna, and the rest of his dominions in all their integrity to the Pope, because he considered, apart from any religious question, that it was absolutely necessary, in a political point of view, that the Pope should be independent. For the same reason he regretted the issuing of the proclamation by the Irish Government which had been referred to. At the same time he could not concur with his hon. Colleague in defending the Sicilian Government, which he believed was an abomination, and which he trusted one day or another would be compelled to succumb, not to Garibaldi, with whose projects he had no sympathy, but to popular opinion, aided and influenced as it was by the Roman Catholic clergy rising and overturning Neapolitan tyranny. He could not hear the statement made by his hon. Colleague without standing up and vindicating those principles of liberalism which that hon.

Member had so openly repudiated. He admitted that it was contrary to law to interfere by subscriptions or otherwise in the affairs of other nations which were on terms of amity with Her Majesty's Government, but no law could prevent our feeling sympathy with those who were oppressed, and sympathy wherever expressed would always be found useful.

FORTIFICATIONS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL DUNNE, in asking the Secretary of State for War how soon he will be prepared to lay on the Table the Report of the Commission on Fortifications, said, he hoped that if the Government were not prepared to do so immediately they would do so on the re-assembling of the House after the Whitsuntide holidays.

CASE OF WILLIAM AND MARTHA BRIGHTMAN.

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, that he rose to move for an Address for copies of correspondence between the Secretary of State for the Home Department and the clerk to the Spalding board of guardians, relative to prosecutions at the last assizes for the county of Lincoln against William and Martha Brightman for bigamy. He was unwilling in that House to animadvert upon the language of a Judge of the realm, as no one could feel a greater regard for judicial integrity than he did; but in this instance he felt it his duty to call the attention of the House to the circumstances of the case. It appeared that the two persons in question had been married about twenty years ago, but had, owing to some quarrel which had arisen between them, separated on the day of their wedding, and had never cohabited. Not very long after their separation the man had again gone through the ceremony of marriage with another woman with whom he lived, and at the lapse of a considerable number of years found himself obliged to apply to the Board of Guardians for Spalding for relief for himself, his nominal wife, and four children, who were of course illegitimate. The board, having had the circumstances of his case thus brought under their notice, had no other alternative but to institute proceedings against him, inasmuch as they could not charge the nominal wife and her children upon the funds of the union, her settlement not being within its limit. A prosecution for bigamy had accordingly been instituted against him. The case had been tried at Lincoln, and the accused had pleaded guilty to the charge. The learned Judge who tried the case—Mr. Justice Willes, however, and it was to his conduct in the matter his Motion more particularly related—before he heard the case, and having simply read the depositions, had thought proper to make use of observations to the following effect in his charge to the grand jury. He said that the prisoner was alleged to have committed the offence about eighteen years before, and that he could not conceive, apart from pecuniary considerations, why his name should appear in the calendar, adding that, prima facie, the case looked more like a persecution than a prosecution, and that it was productive of more harm to bring such cases before the court than if they were not proceeded with at all. It was quite clear from these remarks that the learned Judge seemed to have made up his mind about the matter; but when the case had come on, the prisoner had, as he before stated, pleaded guilty, and the learned Judge, in passing sentence upon him, had used language such as he was about to mention, which was taken from the report of the proceedings contained in a journal of large circulation, and which, having taken pains to ascertain the accuracy of the report, he believed to be the unexaggerated record of what actually took place on the occasion. The purport of the learned Judge's observations were, that no man possessed of the commonest feeling would venture to prosecute in such a case; that the prosecution was a cruel one; that it would seem to have been instituted for the purpose of torture; and, taking into account that the prisoner had applied for relief in consequence of indisposition, it was little short of murder; and that for his own part he would be rather in the place of any one in the calendar than in that of the prosecutors. The learned Judge concluded by sentencing the prisoner to one day's imprisonment. But that was not all. It appeared that the real wife of the prisoner had also been arraigned on a similar charge, and that Mr. Justice Willes said the case was one more fit for a romance than for a court of criminal justice, and that such a prosecution could be instituted only by some person with a heart of stone, adding that he would not make himself a party to it by sentencing the pri-county of Lincoln, against William and Martha Brightman, for Bigamy."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that he had not a word to say against the manner in which his hon. Friend had brought forward the matter, which he would admit was one which quite justified him in calling for explanations. His hon. Friend said he did not wish to make any imputation on the integrity of the Bench, and always regretted when any circumstances arose to throw doubt on the decision of a Judge. But he must beg to point out to the House that whatever question might arise with regard to the conduct of the Judge in this case, no person could suppose that there was the smallest reflection on his judicial integrity. The only question was as to his discretion in the use of certain language when passing sentence. The merits of the case lay within a very narrow circle. Two persons of the labouring class were married according to the rites of the Church of England in 1838, but it so happened that before evening came on a quarrel arose and they separated, cohabitation not having taken place. They never met again, he believed, and they considered themselves as not having contracted a valid marriage. Among persons of that class of life it was not an unusual error to suppose that under such circumstances no valid matrimonial connection was formed. He did not mean to justify that popular error, but the error, he believed, existed. About four years afterwards—i. e., in 1842—each of these parties married again other persons, believing that their second marriage was a valid one. They lived together for a number of years, and only by accident, when the man applied for relief to the Spalding Board of Guardians, it was discovered that his second marriage was invalid, his former wife being, in fact alive, and that the children of the second marriage were illegitimate. That, of course, had an effect on the administration of relief by the Board of Guardians, who directed that a prosecution for bigamy should be instituted against the husband at the next assizes. On investigation it also appeared that the wife had contracted a second marriage, and the Board of Guardians thought if they prosecuted the husband they were bound also to prosecute the wife. They gave directions accordingly to their clerk, who was also clerk to the Magistrates. The two cases came before Mr. Justice Willes. The first marriage had taken place in 1838, and 22 years had elapsed before the prosecutions were instituted. The Judge who tried them took a strong view as to the impropriety of the prosecutions. From circumstances that came under his observation, the Judge was of opinion that the prosecutions had been instituted for the sake of costs. His hon. Friend seemed to think that the Judge was imperfectly acquainted with the facts of the case. Now, the prisoners pleaded guilty, and the depositions were in his hand before he charged the grand jury; therefore, the Judge was acquainted with all the facts of the case before he passed sentence. The Judge certainly took a strong view as to the impropriety of the prosecutions, and, if correctly reported, the language was such as no doubt it was desirable a Judge should abstain from using in passing sentence. There might have been something that came before the Court which appeared to the Judge to be a perversion of justice; it was impossible to suppose that he could be actuated by any impure motive. He certainly had no communication with the learned Judge, as had been stated in the letter read. He was responsible for that letter. If a similar case came before him he should be prepared to write a similar letter. He believed it was not the duty of the Secretary of State to pass any censure on the language used by a Judge, even if he were of opinion that the language was not altogether discreet. He thought the assumption of such a power by the Executive authority would be an undue interference with the course of justice. He, therefore, at the time declined to communicate with the Judge, in order to ascertain from him whether he admitted the accuracy of the Report brought under his notice by the Spalding Board of Guardians. But assuming that the Judge's words on the whole were correctly reported—that they approximated to the truth—some indiscretion of language had, no doubt, been committed; but the error, if there was error, did not go beyond some fault of temper in passing sentence. The Judge thought it a case in which there had been an improper use of the power of prosecution, and that the indictments ought not to have been brought before the grand jury. In passing sentence he might have used language which was indiscreet and went beyond the necessity of the case, but that was all he admitted.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, that after the explanations which had been given, he

MR. RIDLEY said, he was in favour of the Bill, but thought it might be improved by introducing Amendments.

MR. VANCE remarked that the Bill was badly drawn, and that it would be far better to withdraw it for the purpose of allowing the Government to introduce one of a practicable nature.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT observed that it was rather hard upon his hon. and gallant Friend who had introduced the Bill that, after it had passed the second reading with, as he understood, the support of the Government, the principle of it should now be opposed, and it should be thrown out in Committee. It would be best to let the Bill go through Committee pro forma, to allow him to make the requisite alterations, and then go on with it.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he doubted whether it was desirable to go in Committee merely on the speculation that something good might come of it. As he had said, he had referred to the law advisers of the Crown for their opinion, and the opinion of the Solicitor General, from his legal experience, was that there existed no sufficient cases of hardship from the present law affecting innkeepers to justify so general an alteration as was contemplated by the Bill. He, therefore, founded his opposition to the Bill mainly upon that opinion, and upon the result of some inquiries which he had made. There might, perhaps, have been a few hard cases, but generally the law did not work in an unsatisfactory manner. The preamble of the Bill stated what was diametrically opposed to the fact, as the practice of taking much luggage for sleeping at inns had diminished since the introduction of railways.

COLONEL SMYTH said, he believed he had made out a good case for legislation, and could not consent to withdraw his Bill, the principle being generally admitted, unless the right hon. Gentleman would undertake to propose some other remedy for the hardship inflicted by the present law.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Mr. MASSEY brought up the Report of the Committee of Supply.

Resolutions reported :—

1. "That a sum not exceeding £400,000 be granted to Her Majestys on account, for, or towards defraying the Charges of certain Civil Services to the 31st day of March 1861."

Printing and Stationery, £30,000.

County Courts (Treasurer's Salaries and expenses, £30,000.

Constabulary of Ireland (Pay and Allowances), £82,000.

Public Education (Great Britain), £100,000.

Consuls Abroad, £54,000.

Prisons and Convict Establishments at Home, £20,000.

Sundry Commissions (Temporary), £12,000.

Bounties on Slaves, £10,000.

Dublin Police, £7,000.

Civil Contingencies, £50,000."

2. "That a sum not exceeding £2,500 be granted to Her Majesty for the Extension of the Malta Harbour."

On the Resolution of £2,500 for Malta Harbour,

MR. KINNAIRD said, in his opinion this small sum was merely the prelude to a large draught on the Imperial Exchequer—a draught which he believed would ultimately amount to £250,000. The Council of Malta had formally resolved to pay only a fixed sum, so that any excess of expenditure would have to be borne by the Imperial Government. He would like to know whether the rights of the navy in those waters would be secured after all that outlay?

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY asked whether there was any likelihood of the Estimate being exceeded?

MR. WHITBREAD said, the greatest pains had been taken to secure accuracy in the Estimate; and unless any unforeseen accident arose the work would be completed without exceeding it. The local Government of Malta had certainly passed a Resolution restricting their liability to half the amount of the Estimate, but unless they would consent to bear their share of the whole expense, whatever it might come to, the Admiralty would limit the extent of the work executed to the amount voted by Parliament. He assured the hon. Member that the rights of the navy were fully secured.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

equal facility, replace any regiments of Yeomanry they may think proper to disband. A cavalry soldier is not made in a day; and there are only a certain number of men in each county who, from having been accustomed to the management of horses all their lives, are available for the Yeomanry service. Were the Rifle Corps formed to supersede either the Militia or the Yeomanry Cavalry as auxiliaries to the regular troops in the not impossible event of a struggle for our existence as a nation on our own shores? The Yeomanry of England never presumed to place themselves on a par with the regular troops of the country; but as a contingent in times of internal commotion, or a threatened invasion of the country, they have always been prepared to do their duty. The compliment paid by the Secretary for War at this particular juncture, when, snubbing an old constitutional force, he was toadying one only in its infancy, was, under the circumstances, most insulting. The efficiency of the Yeomanry Cavalry depends, of course, on their regular training and annual meetings, hitherto allowed by Government. It is all very well to say you will dispense with this every other year, and allow eight days' training once in two years. What will be the consequence? Why, that you will, by this kind of discouraging treatment, induce men to leave the Yeomanry to join the Rifles, and by degrees you will sacrifice the 14,000 men, with as many horses, which have hitherto been the pride of the country, and prepared at all times to obey the command of their beloved Sovereign. Although of necessity we look to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War for providing the annual Military Estimates, I cannot believe that this treatment of the Yeomanry could have originated with himself; on the contrary, I feel more inclined to attribute it to the arbitrary will of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, in one of his economical fits, and setting aside the remonstrances of the Secretary at War, must have dashed his pen through a Vote probably approved of by every other Member of the Cabinet. The Yeoman, who feels a pride in the regiment to which he belongs, keeps a peculiar class of horse as his charger all the year round. If you assure him that his services are no longer appreciated, he will substitute another kind of animal, more adapted for farming purposes, but utterly useless as a charger. During the last two centuries, the Yeomanry have been looked upon as our chief domestic force, and the use they might be made of, should our shores be unhappily invaded, has often been acknowledged by military men in this House, for outpost duties, carrying despatches, cutting off supplies from the enemy, or in escorting prisoners of war. Are we, then, to grudge this paltry sum of £35,000 for the purpose of retaining its services, at a time, too, when we are reducing millions of our revenue to propitiate the French Emperor? Whatever may be the feelings and intentions of the Emperor towards this country is of secondary moment, when we consider that he owes his position in Europe and the safety of his throne to an army of 600,000 men. To the arbitrary dictation of this army, clamorous for employment, he must at all times inevitably submit, be it for good or for evil, for peace or for war. In justifying the measures adopted with reference to this arm of national defence, Mr. Pitt said, in 1804:—

“Although he entertained as high an opinion as any man of the superiority of our regular troops, yet he was convinced it was necessary to resort to some other subsidiary forces to defend the country. The regular army would always be the rallying point of national defence, but with the benefit of their example and of their instruction, he was convinced that other descriptions of force could be brought forward with great advantage. He wished to see the Volunteer forces of the country brought to the utmost pitch of perfection, in order that the regular army might be used to its full extent in assailing the enemy. He approved the Volunteer system, and would have wished to have it carried to a much greater extent in the counties bordering on the sea coast. He thought the Volunteer system capable of being made a permanent, solid system of defence, and a great source of national energy. The improvements of the system which appeared to him more immediately necessary were the assembling the small companies into battalions, and giving to each battalion a field officer and an adjutant. He also considered the number of days appointed in the year for drills as too small, and that instead of receiving pay for twenty, the Volunteers should receive pay for forty or fifty days. These alterations would certainly cause an increase of expense, but it appeared to him that it would be money well spent.”

There was much in these remarks that applied equally to the Yeomanry Cavalry and the Volunteer Corps. The volunteer system had become permanent, and if it was to be properly carried out, facilities for drill and exercise must be afforded. The hon. and gallant Member concluded by asking the Secretary of State for War whether any Correspondence has passed between the War Office and the Treasury, or any other department of the Government, respecting the omission from the Army Estimates of the usual Vote for the annual training of the Yeomanry Cavalry; and, if so, whether he has any objection to produce such Correspondence?

MR. DEEDES believed that an impression prevailed that the Yeomanry Corps were being looked upon with disfavour by the Government since the commencement of the Rifle Corps movement. He had nothing to say against the Rifle Corps, but thought the Yeomanry were entitled to a more definite answer than had been given to the question asked of the Government on their behalf. All he asked at present of the Government was, that if they had come to the conclusion that no Yeomanry Corps ought any longer to receive pay, fairly to state the fact.

THE GUARDS AND THE LINE.— OBSERVATIONS.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he rose to call attention to the effect of selection of Lieutenant-colonels of Regiments upon the relative positions of the Guards and Line in cases of Exchange; and to ask, Whether the grade of salaried full Colonels might not be abolished (as regards the future) without disadvantage, and so as to effect a considerable saving; whether Aide-de-Camps are subjected to adequate examination (as in a certain foreign service), and whether they have regimental pay when not on regimental duties; whether there is any ground for a difference between Guards and Line as to the necessity of certain officers going on half-pay before they can go on the Staff; and whether it is true that any Guards' Officers have as much as eight months' leave for the year? It appeared to him that such a system of selection, as the first part of his question referred to, would inevitably lead to difficulties and complications. It was in the power of an officer in the Guards, by exchange, to acquire the position of the selected officer in the Line, without any guarantee being afforded that he was fit to discharge the duties of so responsible a post. There were a great many Lieutenant-colonels in the Guards; and this was, therefore, a very important question. The next point related to the abolition of the salaried Colonelcies. The manner in which one of these places had recently been filled up was universally held to be so indefensible, that it had excited suspicion as to the propriety of maintaining these sine-

cures. It was understood that they were intended as rewards to be conferred on Officers for distinguished military services, and as such were justifiable, although he thought the reward might be bestowed in a more direct and satisfactory manner; but no excuse could be offered for the appointment which had just been made, and which could be characterized only as a most iniquitous job. His next question was as to the examination of Aides-de-Camp. This class of Officers enjoyed very high pay, and were often intrusted with very delicate and important duties, and he thought they should be required to pass through the Staff College. His next Question was, Whether it was true that Officers of the Guards had eight months' leave of absence in the year? The expense of maintaining the Guards was very considerable. There was a Colonel-in-Chief of the Grenadier Guards with £2,200 a year; another for the Coldstreams with £2,000; and another for the Fusileers with the same pay. He was satisfied that on the three regiments of Guards alone as much money could be saved, without any difficulty, as would provide Her Majesty with more than one complete regiment of the Line. The extra allowances of the Guards were very large, in comparison with those of the Line, and might well be reduced. He was told that, by some sort of underhand arrangement, it was possible for an Officer in the Guards to obtain leave for eight months in the year; and as the rule was that after five years' service he became a Colonel, he might attain that position by actual service for only twenty months. He wished to know whether that report was true?

GENERAL PEEL: My object in rising is to call on those hon. Members who have expressed the opinion that these Estimates are extravagant to come forward and state upon what grounds they consider them to be extravagant; and I especially address myself to the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer and to the hon. Member for Birmingham, if they happen to be in their places, because the right hon. Gentleman, in introducing his Budget, spoke of them as enormous, though he trusted only temporary, and the hon. Member for Birmingham has been going through the country denouncing them as extravagant and useless. I invite all hon. Members who agree with the hon. Member for Birmingham who may be here to come forward and state the grounds on which they consider them extravagant, and how they propose to reduce them. For my own part, I have no hopes whatever that a reduction of expenditure can be accomplished by a reduction in these Estimates. There is one point on which we should all be perfectly agreed, and that is that it would be a great advantage if it were possible to fix some permanent peace establishment, which would not be subject to these sudden augmentations and reductions, and squaring of the Estimates, which are not only detrimental to the service, but must always lead to great uncertainty as to the amount of money to be voted and variation in the Estimates. By the peace establishment I mean the number of men necessary to perform the ordinary duties of the army in time of peace, including the garrisons and colonies abroad, and sufficient to protect this country from any attack that would be made upon it. I am aware that the House of Commons labours under a great difficulty in forming a correct opinion upon the subject, because they are not yet in possession of the same information which the Government and the highest military authorities possess. I might have had some hesitation in alluding to the confidential Report of the Secret Committee appointed by the late Government, to which I belonged, if two of the Members of that Committee had not been examined before the Organization of the Army Committee—namely, his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief and Sir John Burgoyne. I know that I am not in order in referring to evidence which is not before the House ; but, as it is shortly to be presented, it would be affectation in me to pretend ignorance of the fact that it is the opinion of the highest military authorities that there is not a sufficient amount of regular forces in the country, and that every means should be taken to increase it ; and I take it for granted that the present Government coincide in that opinion, because they immediately proceeded, without waiting for the authority of Parliament, to augment the army by the addition of 6,456 men, raising the total amount of Her Majesty's forces from 229,356 to 235,852. In addition they proposed an army of reserve of 20,000, of which we have heard very little. This augmentation had no reference whatever to the requirements of India, because at that time a large number of men were returning from the East. The number of men on the Indian establishment last year was 92,490, and I have on a former occasion pointed out that it is a far larger number than any one could anticipate the Indian Government would require or could be prepared to pay for during the whole of the financial year. Neither could the augmentation have any reference to the war with China, because with the exception of one battery of Artillery and one regiment of the Line, all the troops in China have proceeded from India, and have been transferred from the Indian establishment. There are also 4,600 Native troops in China, who are not included in the troops voted by Parliament, and will be an additional augmentation of our army. There is no provision for them in these Estimates, but they will be paid, I presume, out of the China Vote of credit of £500,000, which is supposed to be sufficient to cover the whole expenses of the Chinese war. I think I am justified, therefore, in saying that the Government must be of opinion that an addition to the regular army is required for the proper defence of the country ; and, indeed, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, in his able speech in introducing the Estimates, fully succeeded in proving by comparison with the armies of other countries, and the proportion of troops to population, and considering the duties that they had to perform, that the number he asked was extremely moderate. He also proved, and I think very clearly, that the addition he proposed to the Engineers would be actually an act of economy. Then comes the squaring of the Estimates to which I have alluded, which was rendered necessary by the introduction of the Budget before the Estimates were voted, a proceeding which has rendered the revised Estimates, not the Estimates of the Secretary for War, but of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The proposed augmentation of 6,456 men vanishes, and the total number is reduced below what was voted for the previous year ; that is to say, that instead of a larger number, the total number is less than it was last year. [Mr. SIDNEY HERBERT: Not less than last year.] Yes, upon the whole army. We have got an additional provision for pay and allowances of £257,000, equal to the pay of 8,500 men ; although I shall show there is only a nominal increase of 1,900 ; and of those 1,900, not one more will be available for the defence of this country than last year. They were all present in this country before in depôts of the regiments in India. The only difference is, that they are transferred from the Indian to the British establishment; and we have to pay for them, instead of the Indian Government. I am perfectly satisfied that this re-adjustment of the account for pay and allowances was necessary; otherwise there would have been, as I pointed out when the first Estimates were laid upon the table, a large excess upon these Votes. Then there is the embodied Militia—and I quite agree that it is necessary to take all the Votes together. There is £320,000 for the embodied Militia, or pay and allowances for 10,000 men. The return of the British regimental establishment for 1860-1, of all ranks, exclusive of the Staff, shows 140,000; so that together there are pay and allowances for 150,000 men. On the 1st of April last the return of the number of effectives on the British regimental establishments, and of embodied Militia, was 153,195; or 3,195 in excess of the number voted by Parliament. I know that that excess may be met by the disembodiment of Militia, but you of course reduce in proportion the number of men you have hitherto thought necessary to keep in this country, and unless the Indian revenue bears the expenses of a larger number of men than is fixed for their establishment, which I do not think they are likely to do if they can help it, you will have an excess upon the Vote for the regular army. You have got, as I have said, upon that Vote money for 140,000 men exclusive of the Staff—you have deducted the pay and allowances of 4,000—from the 145,269 as pay of men wanting to complete the establishment, but they are only wanting because they have not yet been transferred from the Indian establishment. They are all raised, and on the 1st of April, instead of men being wanted to complete, there was an excess upon the numbers voted by Parliament in the whole army—namely, effectives in British Establishment 133,962; Indian Establishment 94,829; Staff 1,121; total 229,912, against the number voted 228,854, or an excess of 1,098. Now, I am not finding fault with the number of men you have provided for. I think 150,000, exclusive of the Staff, would be sufficient for the British Establishment, although it would not supply the number of men considered by the military authorities, to whom I have alluded, as necessary for the defence of the country. The amount of regular troops necessary for the defence of the country must always depend upon the amount and efficiency of the Militia and Volunteers, who must be looked upon as the Reserve. Now, it was my opinion from my first entering office, that the Militia, as at present constituted, is a very expensive and, comparatively speaking, very inefficient force. The quota of the regiments are no indication whatever of the real strength that might be relied upon; and I think further, that twenty or twenty-eight days' training in a year is not sufficient to make them soldiers; it would be quite sufficient in the case of those regiments who have been embodied, and who have only to practise what they already have acquired, but I believe the larger portion of the Militia have only lately been supplied with the Enfield Rifle, and that many of the regiments have never had an opportunity of learning the use of them. Now I quite agree with the Secretary of State that the Militia should be what it is intended to be, an army of reserve, and not to be embodied in time of peace, unless under very particular circumstances; but I think that if one-third of the Militia were sent every year to the camps of instruction, and kept out for a much longer period than the usual time of training, then the ordinary period of training for the next two years would be all that is necessary. Now do not let it be for a moment supposed that I am underrating the services of the Militia, or underrating the services they have performed to the country. Without the Militia we should have been unable, in my opinion, to put an end to the Indian mutiny, as a sufficient number of regular troops could not have been spared if the Militia had not supplied their places, and also supplied their ranks by the number of volunteers they furnished to them. I must also bear testimony to the efficiency which these regiments attained, rendering them equal to regiments of the Line, and it is because I wish to see the numbers of the Militia kept up, and more opportunities given them of becoming efficient when not embodied, that I make these remarks. I appointed a Royal Commission to inquire into the organization of the Militia, which had not reported when I quitted office; but I trust that upon their recommendations the Secretary at War will be able to make great improvements. I have to congratulate the Secretary of State on the success of the Volunteer movement, and I am sure that every Englishman must look with pride and satisfaction to the magnificent army that is growing up for the defence of the country, composed of men whose zeal, assiduity, and intelligence, will speedily secure their efficiency. Still I trust that the Volunteers will ever be looked upon as auxiliaries to and not substitutes for a regular army, and that constitutional army of reserve—the Militia. There is another force also to which I think the country is greatly indebted, and which I sincerely regret it is not proposed to call out for training during the present year, I mean the Yeomanry, to which my hon. Friend (Major Edwards) has called attention. I fear that our not doing so will interfere with the power of officers to keep up their numbers, and must also interfere with their efficiency. If the period of drill given to the Militia is not sufficient to form an infantry soldier, still less is that accorded to the Yeomanry sufficient to make a cavalry one; and unless you keep up these corps, to at all events a certain standard of efficiency, you had better abandon them altogether. You are only going to useless expense in maintaining them. Now in stating that I consider the number of men to be voted for the regular army sufficient to perform the duties required from it in time of peace, I am making ample allowance for the assistance that is to be expected from all these forces in defending the country. The number of the regular army in this country will still fall far short of those considered necessary by the military authorities I alluded to, and are only sufficient to perform those duties which none of these other troops can be called upon to do. The system of relief laid down as necessary for our regiments on foreign service has never been able to be carried into effect, and one of the greatest boons and benefits that ever was promised to the British army has been hitherto unavoidably denied to them. It was laid down that for every ten years' of foreign service, each regiment should have five years at home—but what has been the practical result? I take regiments without any selection whatever, and by mere accident I met an officer belonging to a dépôt battalion, and asked him to give me the period of services, at home and abroad, of the regiments composing it; and this is the result. The 1st Battalion of the 1st Foot had served 24 abroad and 6 years and 8 months at home. The 1st Battalion of the 6th Foot had served 33 years and 8 months abroad and 5 years at home. The 54th Foot, 34 years and 3 months abroad and 6 years and 5 months at home. The

56th, 40 years and 10 months abroad and 11 years and 11 months at home. The 66th, 26 years and 7 months abroad and 13 years and 2 months at home. The 83th, 26 years and 9 months abroad and 8 years and 9 months at home. It appears by this that only one regiment out of the six I have referred to has been at home one-third of its time. I think I have stated sufficient to show that there is no hope of any reduction being made in these Estimates dependent upon a corresponding reduction in the number of men. On the contrary, there is an element which will create a great increase in the expenditure which does not appear in the Estimates. With regard to the Votes themselves, that for the Volunteer Corps it is quite evident must be increased. The sum set down this year towards the payment of their expenses is only £15,000. Clearly, you will have to take a much larger sum next year. I think that you must also provide for calling out the Yeomanry next year on permanent duty. You have saved some £40,000 by not calling them out this year. Although you propose by the Estimates to increase the number of men, you have reduced the Vote for clothing by £18,000. This is owing to a God-send of £233,000 due from the Indian treasury for clothing furnished and paid for out of last year's Estimates. With regard to the barrack accommodation there is no probability of any diminution being made in the Vote under that head. We are building new barracks in Chelsea, in Nottingham, and in Glasgow. In future years, instead of a diminution of expenditure under this head, I think there will be rather an increase of it for the purchase of adequate sites for those buildings. With regard to the fortification Votes, it is perfectly impossible to say what the expense in that particular will be until all the plans are before you. Any addition to this Vote for fortifications must naturally lead to a large increase in other Votes. You cannot have fortifications without men to occupy them, guns to mount on them, ammunition, stores, &c. All these considerations have nothing to do with party questions, and my only motive for calling the attention of the House to them is, that we should fully understand what is the exact amount of defence for the country which is proposed by the Government. With regard to the Motion of which notice has been given by my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire (Mr. Adderley), I am of opinion that it is much too important a question to be discussed incidentally in a debate on the Army Estimates. I hope, therefore, that it will be brought on separately in the shape of a substantive Motion for a Committee to inquire into the subject.

LAND TRANSPORT CORPS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR JOHN LOCKE said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the claims of the Artificers of the Land Transport Corps, enlisted during the Crimean War, and to the non-fulfilment of the conditions under which they were so enlisted; and to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it was the intention of the Government to satisfy those claims, or to cause an inquiry to be made respecting them? He wished to state to the House the facts of the case, which were these:—In the year 1856, it was necessary that a corps should be formed which should unite within it a body of artificers who should be of service in their various trades out in the Crimea. The class of men who enlisted were persons who were earning in this country as much as 5s. and 6s. a day. The enlistment paper for those men was the ordinary enlistment paper used before the magistrate; but, in addition to that, a placard was circulated, in which it was stated what was to be the pay of those men. That pay was to be altogether different from the ordinary pay of the soldier. The placards stated that the pay was to be 5s. or 6s. a day, according to the nature of the employment, and likewise that the men were to serve for two years, if required, and for a further term of one year, if so directed by an Order in Council. He wished now to call the attention of the House to a most important circumstance connected with the enlistment of these men, attested by no less than thirty of those men who had made declarations upon their oaths before a magistrate. He believed also that he should be borne out in this statement by the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Alderman Salomons), then Lord Mayor of London, before whom a number of those declarations had been made. The men stated that they were enlisted upon a clear understanding between them and Captain Vokes, that after their services should be no longer required, they were to get three months' notice or three months' pay. Now, what had been the course pursued by Her

General Peel

Majesty's Government? In August, 1856, a portion of these men, about 130 in number, were brought back to England from the Crimea, and their services being no longer required, they were discharged at Gosport, after having served about six or seven months. Upon their discharge they received £1 which was the ordinary course pursued in regard to a common soldier. They also received a paper discharge instead of a parchment one, which afforded to them no protection against being again called upon to serve by the Government. These men made a claim for three months' pay, not having received three months' notice, according to the contract made with them by Captain Vokes on behalf of the Government. This was refused. Another body of those men, amounting to 170, were, on the 9th of June, 1856, sent to Malta, from thence to England, and were afterwards discharged at Horsfield Barracks, Bristol. These men also complained of the mode in which they were discharged, and made their claim for three months' pay. They were compelled to take the paper discharge, although a parchment discharge was necessary in order to relieve them from the service, and to leave the barracks under coercion, and one man was placed under arrest for protesting against being discharged under such circumstances. Their clothing was taken from them, which was estimated at the value of £4 a man. There had been an attempt made in that House to have an inquiry into the case of these men, but from some cause or other they were not included in the inquiry which took place with respect to the drivers. The case of the artificers and that of the drivers was, however, totally different, and whatever decision that Committee might have come to, it was to be taken as no authority in deciding the case of the artificers. Failing to obtain any satisfaction, the men were driven to make application at the Horse Guards. They had an interview with the Duke of Cambridge, and, as he (Mr. Locke) was informed, his Royal Highness stated that the case did not come within his Department; but he said that the paper discharges which they had received were incorrect, and they ought to have received parchment discharges. He (Mr. Locke) should mention that subsequently parchment discharges were offered to some of the men, but they were antedated, the effect of which would have been that a person taking one of those discharges would have relinquished his claim to the three months' pay or three months' notice. What he had to complain of more especially was, that at an investigation which afterwards took place at the Horse Guards before a board of officers appointed to inquire into the subject, the men had no opportunity of being heard. That tribunal took Captain Vokes's word, without giving the men any opportunity of being confronted with him and making their statement, although they repeatedly demanded to be heard face to face with Captain Vokes. The men complained most strongly of that ex-parte inquiry, so unfair to them and so un-English in its character. After this a letter was addressed to the artificers, telling them that they had consulted Captain Vokes, who informed the Board that they had no claim to three months' pay. The Board therefore took the statements of the officer who enlisted them and decided behind their backs. This was a most unjustifiable course. Both sides ought to have been heard, and an opportunity should have been given to the artificers to prove before the board of officers the statement they had made before the Lord Mayor. The position of the men was certainly, to say the least, quite as respectable as that of the person who was examined, and upon whose ex-parte statement implicit reliance was placed. A contract had been broken, and the case was one demanding an impartial investigation at the hands of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, that when he was Lord Mayor of London some twenty-five or thirty of these men solicited his assistance, and he had taken an interest in their case, because they stated that they were unfairly treated, and they appeared to be respectable men. He had had a correspondence with the authorities, and had seen Colonel M'Murdo on their behalf; but nothing had been done for them, except awarding them £1 each, on their discharge, as had been stated by his hon. and learned Friend. He still thought these men had not been treated fairly, considering the terms of the advertisement by which they were invited into the service. He held in his hand a placard issued by the authorities, which advertised for a number of artificers belonging to certain trades, and which stated that the services of sober and intelligent men were required, and would be paid for at certain rates, from 5s. 6d. to 7s. a day, clothing and rations free. The term of service was stated to be two years, with an option on the part of the Government to prolong it another year, or the men were to be discharged at the end of the war if their services were no longer required. The Government had availed themselves of the last condition, and had discharged these men at the end of the war, which happened when they had been only engaged from three to six months. These men had left good places for the purpose of making an engagement for two years, and with a chance of being required another year in the service of their country, and they were shortly afterwards discharged with only £1 each as a compensation. That was all the reward they had obtained, and he thought there were no men more deserving of the consideration of Parliament, for these men had not had their fair hire awarded to them by the Government, and he was one of those who believed that every man was worthy of his hire.

COLONEL NORTH said, that having served on the Committee which had investigated the claims of the officers of the corps, he must express a hope that the case of the men would meet with the consideration which he was sure it deserved. The officers were about to be shamefully treated when their case was taken up and a Committee appointed. Owing to the proceedings of that Committee, justice had been done to them; and he trusted that the men would not be dealt with in a different manner.

ARMY PROMOTION—WARRANT, OCTOBER, 1858. — OBSERVATIONS.

COLONEL LINDSAY said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the Army Promotion Warrant of October, 1858, in respect to the position of certain General Officers who accepted promotion on half-pay, in accordance with the terms of the General Order of the 25th day of April, 1826, and are now receiving only the half-pay of their former Regimental Commissions. It was necessary to explain how unattached pay arose. Formerly there was no unattached pay to General Officers at all. The system, so far as it regarded officers of that rank was commenced in 1814, and in 1822 was placed upon the basis on which it had remained down to the year 1854. It was then established that there should be, besides colonels, 120 General Officers receiving at the rate of 25s. a-day; the remaining General Officers beyond that number were to receive the full pay of their last regimental commissions. It was provided, however, that they should have served six years in the regimental position of a field-officer. If not, they were not to be entitled either to 25s. a day or to the full pay of their last regimental commission. The next move with regard to unattached pay was made in 1823, when half-pay commissions were introduced into the Ordnance Corps, with the view of promoting young officers. That system worked well in the Ordnance Corps, and in 1825, it was introduced into the Line. It worked well in the Line up to a certain point, but there it stopped. The large class of brevet field-officers serving in inferior regimental ranks became inconvenient to the service, and an order was brought out making an arrangement to relieve the regimental ranks of those officers, many of whom were very old. This was the account Sir Herbert Taylor, then Military Secretary, gave of the matter in his evidence in 1828. He described the inconvenience which the regimental ranks suffered by brevet field-officers serving in the rank of captain, and brevet lieutenant colonels serving as majors, and the necessity of getting rid of these officers by placing them on half-pay. He would now call attention to the General Order of the 25th of April, 1826. It had received the sanction of Lord Liverpool, then First Lord of the Treasury, and Lord Palmerston, then Secretary at War. It declared, with reference to brevet field-officers, that it was most desirable to relieve regiments of them, and spoke of conferring some boon upon them for their service. The boon they received was being placed on half-pay, for nearly 34 years, of 9s. 6d. a day, while they were in the actual receipt of 13s. 7d. a day. These officers, therefore, had received 4s. 1d. a day during 34 years less than they were formerly in receipt of, making a sum of £2,400 which they had lost. It might be asked why they did not avail themselves of the provisions of the Order of the 25th of April, 1825. The answer was simple. Being brevet field-officers they would, if they had gone out under that Order have been obliged to purchase a field officer's rank; but having got that already there was no object in paying for it. It would not have been worth their while to do so merely for the purpose of availing themselves of the Order of the 25th of April, 1825. The Government, finding that these officers would not go on half-pay by purchase, under the Order of 1825, were at last driven, to bring youth into the ranks, to issue the Order of 1826, and pledged themselves if these officers accepted half pay under the terms of that Order for the good of the service that they would neither forfeit for themselves or families their future claims on the service. With respect to the six years' rule, it lasted only while these officers were in the regimental ranks; it expired when they accepted the terms offered. No less than three of the number who accepted this unattached pay were senior captains of their regiments, and a death vacancy or a movement of the staff would have given them the substantive rank they got on half-pay; others were second and third captains; with one exception they were all high up. When this Motion was formerly introduced by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North), it was attempted to be shown that the only claims these officers did not forfeit were those for their wives and families, but the General Order distinctly stated that they did not forfeit "for themselves" "or families" their future claims on the service. What claims had these general officers ever been able to make for themselves? One of those claims, if it could be called a claim, was, that they had immediately endeavoured to return to full pay by exchange. But the exchange to full pay depended on whether the authorities gave them an opening for that purpose, and also on the state of the list at that time. He held in his hand letters from four of these General Officers, all declaring their extreme disgust at the treatment they had received, and stating that they never would, under any circumstances, have accepted this substantive rank on half-pay if they had had the slightest idea that such would be their treatment. They expected to have been employed, and to return again to full pay, whereby they would have served the six years as field officers; or, if they did not return to full pay, they distinctly understood, from the terms of the Memorandum and General Order of 1826, that their claims would have been recognized. If it was really to be held that the claim for their widows was the leading feature in that General Order, it was a curious fact that no fewer than four of these officers had never been married, and they had informed him that in 1826, when they accepted this half-pay, they had not even the slightest intention of marrying. The benefit of their widows could hardly, therefore, have been any inducement with them in accepting the position that was offered to them for the convenience of the service. He had the authority of the right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) for his reading of the General Order—namely, that under its terms these officers were fully entitled to receive the pay of General Officers, and that a distinct pledge was given them that their claims should not be forfeited by going on half-pay. The only claim they had had an opportunity of putting forward was the one which he now asserted on their behalf—namely, that they should be placed in the position of General Officers, receiving General's pay, instead of receiving, as at present, only the half-pay of captains. The manner in which these officers were gazetted, totally differing as it did from the usual form, also showed that the offer of substantive rank made to them by the Government was made for the convenience of the service, and for that only. A binding contract had been entered into with them on the part of the State which had never yet been fulfilled. The correspondence between the Treasury and the War Department on this subject proved that the matter had not been sufficiently explained to the Treasury, whose answer was given without a full knowledge of the circumstances. He trusted, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Sidney Herbert) would now be able to state that these claims would receive a fair consideration at the hands of the Government. Another point to which he wished to call attention related to a warrant issued on the 1st October, 1858, placing surgeons in the army, on completing the age of fifty-five, upon half-pay. This rule, having a retrospective action, had operated with extreme hardship and injustice upon a body of most valuable men. If these officers were really too old for their work, or had been ruined in health by a foreign climate, it would doubtless be the duty of the Secretary of State to supersede them. But he knew that many of them were in the full possession of all their faculties and every way efficient for the service. Yet, having attained the age of fifty-five, they were arbitrarily removed from their positions, and deprived of the rank and pay to which they looked forward at the close of their career. The Order was the more severe upon them, because, if they had obtained the rank next above that which they occupied they would have been entitled to remain ten years more in the service. A warrant had lately been issued for the navy, under which medical officers, of equal rank to the army surgeons, whose case he advocated, were not obliged to retire till they reached sixty. One of the officers to whom he alluded had been thirty years in the service, twenty-one of which had been passed in the Colonies; he was a man of great vigour and activity, and he had been told that if he had not been serving in a more distant part of the empire he would have been employed in the Crimea, where he would have had a chance of rising to high rank. The only compensation these surgeons had received was simply 1s. 6d. a day—an amount that was no equivalent for the great sacrifice they had been called upon to make. They had, indeed, also obtained honorary promotion to the rank above them; but of what avail was the mere rank of Deputy Inspector of Hospitals without the substantive advantages attached to it? A medical officer, who sat upon the Sanitary Commission over which the right hon. Gentleman opposite presided, had fully acknowledged the hardship inflicted on these officers, and stated that he scarcely suspected they would have suffered so much as it now turned out they had done. The warrant had pressed with great severity on men who had faithfully served their country in distant parts of the globe, and it would have been only a graceful act to grant them some compensation for the loss entailed upon them by the retrospective effect of an Order which they could never have contemplated when they entered the service.

COLONIAL MILITARY EXPENDITURE.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. CHILDERS hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Staffordshire (Mr. Adderley) would accede to the suggestion which had been made by the right hon. and gallant General (General Peel), and abstain from calling attention, on that occasion, to the military defence of the Colonies—a subject which he should like to see referred to a Committee. At the same time, he thought it desirable to bring under the notice of the House a preliminary matter which bore upon that question, and to point out that the mode in which the military Estimates were, and had for some years been framed, did not accurately exhibit the amount which was contributed by the Colonies for the pay and expenses of the troops which were employed in their defence. These Estimates ought to be based on one of two principles—either no reference at all should be made to money coming in from other sources than the Imperial Votes; or they should show, first, the entire amount of charge, and next the money coming from other sources, and then the House of Commons should be asked to vote the balance. The latter, he thought, would be the preferable mode. He had carefully gone through the Estimates of the last five or six years in reference to the colony of Victoria, in which he had for some years resided, and had compared them with the estimates of the local Legislature; but he found such extraordinary inconsistencies and disclosures, that he felt it necessary to call the attention of the House to them before going into the general subject. In the year 1855 the Legislature of that colony voted £200,000 for their military expenditure, of which £32,000 was for the Imperial and £33,000 for the colonial pay of the troops stationed in the colony, and £53,000 for the expenses included in Vote 8. The only sum, however, for which credit was given to the colony was one of £5,146, which was included in the Estimates submitted to that House for the year 1856–57, under the head of “Payments into the Exchequer.” In the year 1856–57 the Colonial Legislature voted £12,000 for the staff, £33,000 for the regiment stationed in the colony, £12,000 for the extra cost of provisions, among other sums, exceeding in all £150,000 for military purposes; and yet no notice was taken of this in the Imperial accounts. All this time there appeared in the Home Estimates that an express deduction was taken for the pay of troops stationed in the Australian Colonies amounting to £1,427. In the following year the Legislature of Victoria voted for military purposes £147,000, of which £3,500 was for the staff at Melbourne, £30,000 for Imperial, and £31,000 for the colonial pay of the troops, and £45,000 for the ordinary contingencies under vote No. 8. In that year credit was given to the colony for only the insignificant sum of £3,600. In the year 1858–59 credit was given to the Colonies for a sum of £26,175, as paid into the Exchequer. How the sum came to be £26,000 that year, £3,000 in another, and £5,000 in another, when really £50,000 or £60,000 was contributed annually, he was at a loss to say. After that year the colony altered its arrangements, and in the following year the Legislature voted a sum of £38,075 “to be granted to Her Majesty for the head-quarters staff and Her Majesty’s troops in Victoria, to be paid over to the officer commanding the troops, and to be distributed by him in such manner as to Her Majesty may seem fit.” That, as he understood it, was a distinct contribution from the colonial revenues towards the ordinary and extraordinary Imperial expenditure for the troops stationed in the colony; and yet for that year only £5,136 appeared as having been paid into the Exchequer as a contribution from the colony. In the year 1859–60 the sum voted by the colonial Legislature was still more, I think above £40,000, for not a farthing of which credit was given in the Estimates presented to that House. His object in calling attention to this subject was that past irregularities might be cleared up, and that so far as Victoria was concerned, he might assist in establishing a basis for deciding the important question which had been referred to by the right hon. and gallant General.

Mr. Childers

THE ORDNANCE CORPS.

OBSERVATIONS.

CAPTAIN JERVIS, in calling attention to the condition of the Generals and Commanding Officers of the Ordnance Corps, said, that it would be in the recollection of the House that in April, 1858, an Address was voted to Her Majesty praying that the entrance in the Ordnance Corps should be by competition, according to the principle adopted in 1855. He believed the object of the House in agreeing to that Address was, that the best men the country could supply should come forward and compete for these appointments; and he believed that was also the intention of Her Majesty when she signed the Warrant. But unfortunately for the young men who had successfully competed, they found that it led to nothing. The Ordnance officers complained that they did not obtain those commands to which they considered themselves entitled. There were some ill-natured people who said it was because the officers of the Ordnance corps consisted wholly of younger sons and other nobodies, of whom nobody cared what became of them. But the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon, when he was at the War Office, said the real cause was the old age to which the officers of those corps attained before they became General officers. He would not go into the question how that was to be remedied now; but he thought it right to call the attention of the House to the way in which that difficulty was overcome when it was encountered among the officers of the Line. He found that when the War Office could not find a General officer in the Line of sufficient active habits to undertake a command it was their practice to take a colonel, and give him local rank as brigadier general for the purpose. He found in the Army List of last month acting in this way Colonel Cunningham, Colonel John Lawrenson, Trollope, and several others whom he might name. The officers of the Ordnance corps, therefore, were apt to think that the ill-natured people were right after all, and that it was owing to their want of interest that they did not obtain those commands to which they were entitled. See how differently matters were managed in the Ordnance from the Line. For instance, he might refer to Aldershot, which he believed was instituted for the instruction of officers as well as of men; yet there he found an Artillery force of 2,190 men, with 1,200 horses and 60 guns—an Artillery force sufficient for an army of 30,000 men—under the command of a colonel of Artillery who was not even a brigadier. In the South-eastern district a colonel commanded 2,300 men; in the South Western a colonel commanded 3,000 men; in the Western a colonel commanded 1,500 men; and in Ireland a colonel commanded 2,500 men. Now, he appealed to any one whether the rank of brigadier ought not to be given with such commands as these. The matter was last brought before the House by his gallant and lamented Friend the late Captain Leicester Vernon in 1856, and he was replied to by the noble Lord who was then, as now, at the head of the Government, who assured the gallant Officer that the question he had brought forward was one of great importance and that it should receive due attention at the hands of the Government. What attention the Government had given it he did not know; but the matter remained exactly as it was. Now, a command was to an officer of the army what a judgeship was to the Bar or a bishopric to the Church—a means of stimulating them to an active discharge of their duty; and if these inducements were not held out to the officers of the Ordnance corps in common with others, they could not expect their duties should be done with the same spirit that it was always desirable Her Majesty's officers should show. He believed this was an entirely financial question; the difficulty lay in the small expense between the pay of a colonel and a brigadier; but that difference was really so small, while the encouragement it would afford to the Ordnance officers was so great, that if the right hon. Secretary could hold out any hope to the service that it would be conceded to them, it would be of the greatest public advantage.

RIGHTS OF FISHERY—(IRELAND).

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. CONOLLY said, that he had a Motion on the paper which involved a serious charge against the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. He was precluded making that Motion on the present occasion, inasmuch as the right hon. Gentleman had not yet presented the Return to the House for which he had moved. When the proper time came he should move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty would be graciously pleased to give the necessary orders to Her Majesty's Government (War Department) to enable them to restrain the Officers of Engineers in Ireland from putting forward Claims to Rights of Fishery on the Coast and in the Inland Waters in Ireland, in respect of Lands or positions held for purely military purposes, whether they be Batteries or other Coast Defences, or Barracks, Parade Grounds, Forts, and Store-yards in the interior. What he complained of was that the War Office had used positions occupied for merely military purposes to set up rights that really had no existence whatever. The answer given by the right hon. Gentleman on a former occasion was very far from satisfactory. It put forward two issues. The first was, what he would call a reference to "the Circumlocution Office," inasmuch as the right hon. Gentleman referred him from the Office which he conducted with such ability to the Court of Chancery. But as the right hon. Gentleman had himself established the grievance of which he (Mr. Conolly) complained, he had no ground for referring him to the Court of Chancery to defend his rights. The Government were no setting up certain rights, like a private individual, but they were using the funds of the State to do that which they were not entitled to do by law. His remedy was not in the Court of Chancery, but in that House, and he should ask for redress at their hands. The right hon. Gentleman was certainly so far wrong in his claims to these fisheries that when the hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) had put them forward before him, such was the excitement they gave rise to in Ireland that the Secretary of State for that country remonstrated with the War Minister, and the claims were allowed to lie in abeyance. New brooms, however, swept clean; and when the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Herbert) came into office he put the full vigour of his Department to work, in order to assert the claims which he (Mr. Conolly) was prepared to dispute. He now came to the second issue, which he should designate the officially evasive answer. The officially evasive answer was this—the Department over which the right hon. Gentleman presided with so much plausibility, had certain rights as connected with the estates held by the military powers in Ireland, and they were only exercising the same rights as other landlords when they put these fisheries up to public competition. He joined issue here as to a matter of fact. The military stations in different parts of Ireland were in some cases so small as to be literally positions for defence, and not in any case worthy the name of estates. Some of them were merely barren rocks, which, however, from their projecting position on the coast, were very valuable as fishing stations. He must say that he looked upon the right hon. Gentleman as the monster poacher of the Government, for he was using the funds of the War Department to attack the fisheries of the Irish people, and he had offered the rights of private individuals for public competition. He believed it was even contemplated by the War Department to claim a right of fishing for every Martello tower round the coast. If the right hon. Gentleman did so he might despair of obtaining volunteers for Her Majesty's service, since he would bind together all the maritime population against the Department with which he was connected, under a feeling of injustice grounded on common sense. He maintained the War Department had nothing to do with fisheries. They had quite enough to do with Volunteers and all the new fangled machines to destroy life, without destroying fish.

Mr. Conolly

GENERAL SIR CHARLES GREY'S APPOINTMENT.—OBSERVATIONS.

SIR DE LACY EVANS, in rising to draw the attention of the House to the recent appointment of General the Hon. Sir Charles Grey to the Colonelcy of a Regiment, observed:—A Notice stands in my name respecting the recent appointment of General the Hon. Sir Charles Grey to the sinecure Colonelcy of a Regiment. That Notice has been caused somewhat accidentally. In the Committee on Military Organization I took the liberty, a few days since, of asking the Secretary for War, in the course of his evidence, a question, which is reported in the following words:—

“In the highest appointments (for which you are responsible) you include, do you not, nominations to colonelcies of regiments?—Yes.

“There has been an appointment (to a colonelcy) which attracted a good deal of public attention; did that appointment come under your notice?—Certainly; I am responsible for it.

“I do not wish to press the question, but it might, perhaps, be agreeable to you to state the reason for that appointment?—I would sooner you put that question to me in the House of Commons.”

Now, I consider this invitation as leaving me no option but that of submitting the question, which I now do, on the present Motion. And, considering the very serious principle involved in this recent appointment, I am very glad that it has thus devolved to me to bring it to issue; for, if it be to be regarded as a precedent, it is but right that the fact should be made known to the army and to the public. In 1833, a Select Committee was appointed to inquire into the grounds of similar sinecure nominations. In the evidence of the late Lord Raglan (then Lord FitzRoy Somerset) before that Committee, the following questions and answers are recorded:—

“Do you not consider it essential to the good of the service that the Commander-in-Chief should have the power to select the most meritorious officers for those which are appointments of reward, and not exactly appointments to which duties are attached?—Yes; I consider that the just reward of individuals in all ranks, but particularly in the higher ranks, is a very important duty for the Commander-in-Chief to discharge, not only as it affects the officers of the King's service, but the credit of the country and the honour of His Majesty himself.”

“Supposing (his Lordship was asked) that there was a general officer who had had short service, but who had had an opportunity of distinguishing himself in the field, and that there was another officer of a longer service, but who had performed that service in the Colonies and had not had the same good fortune in distinguishing himself,— which of those two classes would, as the general principle, the Commander-in-Chief prefer in recommending for Governments?—I should say that the general officer whose service has been shorter, but who had the greater opportunity of distinguishing himself in the field, has been repeatedly exposed to danger, and has been wounded,—one, in fact, who has been in a situation of higher responsibility,—would be the first class of officers to be considered."

His Lordship went on to say, that—

"The next officer to be considered would be one who had accompanied his regiment to the Colonies and had acquitted himself well in command of it."

Then the general officers, he added, who had performed very respectable service, chiefly at home, would certainly come in the last of the three classes. Again, in the Report of the Royal Commission of 1854, of which the present Secretary of State for War was Chairman, there is the following recommendation to Her Majesty, namely:—

"That the command of battalions in the Ordnance corps be given without reference to seniority, in the same manner as the colonelcies of regiments, to the officers whose services appear the best to entitle them to such a distinction."

In mentioning the name of General Sir Charles Grey I have not the remotest intention or wish to undervalue the services of that officer. On the contrary, I have no doubt that the gallant officer has rendered very important services as Private Secretary to his Royal Highness the Prince Consort; but the impression on my mind is that they are not important military services. I have heard that General Sir Charles Grey has commanded with great propriety a regiment on home service, and far be it from me to diminish the gallant officer's claim on that account; but to that description of claim Lord FitzRoy Somerset has given the last place. Upon looking over the Army List it appears that there are fourteen general officers senior to Sir Charles Grey who have seen a great deal of service in the field and in the Colonies, some having been wounded; and again, there are several Generals who have commanded brigades, or even divisions, during the Indian mutiny or in the Crimea, who are without regiments. Then there are a great number of other officers less fortunate in arriving at the rank of General, but who have served longer than Sir Charles Grey, and have performed distinguished services; yet the General officer selected for the recent appointment has never, if I am rightly informed, served out of the United Kingdom. I do not complain of the appointment of such a young general as Sir John Inglis to a regiment, for he rendered distinguished service at Lucknow. but when generals of long standing in the service, who have served in all parts of the world, find their claims totally overlooked and their services set aside in favour of an officer who has never been out of the United Kingdom, I must say I think it very extraordinary. I have no doubt that General Grey commanded a regiment perfectly well on home service. Perhaps he may also have gone to the Colonies. If so, the Secretary for War will not fail to state it. But according to Hart's Army List, General Grey virtually quitted the army eighteen years ago to take a high and confidential appointment in the Palace. I am far from wishing to undervalue or depreciate the important services which he may have rendered, and no doubt has rendered, in that capacity; but again I say they were not military services. I believe only two or three officers have been promoted above him; but on this question of seniority I wish to draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the Report of a Commission which sat in 1854, and of which he himself was the Chairman. This Commission recommended "that the command of battalions in the Ordnance corps be given without reference to seniority, in the same manner as the colonelcies of regiments, to the officers whose services appear the best to entitle them to such a distinction." It will be seen from this that the right hon. Gentleman totally disclaims the principle of seniority, unless in addition to seniority there is distinguished service. In the public prints, eight or ten names of really distinguished officers have been mentioned who have been set aside on this occasion, some of them having held high commands. In short, I can hardly help believing that the whole of the matters connected with this case have not been brought under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman as they ought to have been, because I am satisfied, with his high sense of justice and his strong desire for the good of the service, that he would have hesitated before giving his assent to or accepting the responsibility of this appointment. The right hon. Gentleman on the occasion to which I have referred volunteered the statement that he was expressly responsible for this appointment. Probably there is some little omission here, for the Commander-in-Chief must surely have recommended the appointment to him, and he would not make it without such a recommendation. On speaking of this matter to some persons they said that the readiness of the right hon. Gentleman to meet the question in the House of Commons probably arose from his being aware of the fact that General Grey had offered to serve in the Crimea. Well, I believe that all the general officers in the army offered to serve there. But with regard to offers of service in the Crimean or other wars let me draw attention to a passage in the letters of the Duke of Wellington, just now published, which is very decisive on this point. He was Secretary for Ireland in 1809. It was reported that an expedition would sail to the Peninsula. His appointment produced large emoluments—I believe some £6,000 or £7,000 a year; but he wrote directly to Lord Castlereagh, somewhat to this effect:—"I hear it reported that an expedition to the Peninsula is being prepared. I am determined not to abandon my profession. I hold a very lucrative post. Whether you have the opportunity of appointing me to this expedition I cannot say, but this I have to say—you must be so good as to provide a substitute for me in the office of Secretary for Ireland, for I will not stay in that office, whether I go to the Peninsula or not. I should risk my character with the army if they could say that I had preferred a lucrative position at home to serving in the field." And on another occasion he said:—"There shall be no mistake about it. I won't continue to hold this office, whether you give me a military command or not. Provide another Irish Secretary, for I won't stay here." The result was that he was appointed to command the expedition; but his language showed how strong was the feeling which he entertained in reference to the position of an officer who continued to hold an emolumenary office during time of war. I think, therefore, that the mere offer of service in the Crimea, unless it was followed up with the vigour which Sir Arthur Wellesley evinced on that occasion, hardly furnishes an adequate ground for the present appointment. These preferments are 135 in number, and really, unless it is found that they are distributed on some satisfactory principle as rewards for military services, I doubt whether the country will acquiesce in the continuance of this definite number of them. I have never seen this House unwilling to reward active and approved services, and

Sir De Lacy Evans

I cannot help sharing in the opinion which many entertain that several of the officers who have recently distinguished themselves in India are entitled not only to this kind of preferment, but to a great deal more; while I believe, on the other hand, that some officers have succeeded to such appointments without having seen any service which could give a right to them. I said before there were not less than fourteen general officers senior to General Grey, whose claims were not considered upon this occasion. Several of them went through almost the whole of the Peninsular War. Then, again, there is a list of other officers, not, indeed, senior to General Grey, but far superior to him as soldiers, who performed signal services in the Crimea and India, but who were also passed over. A few days since an old general officer called upon me while this notice was on the paper. He is one of the officers named in a recently-established military publication, The Army and Navy Gazette—General George Bell. I knew that he was a very old officer, and had served most honestly and gallantly, and I asked him how his services had been rewarded, and whether he had received the command of a regiment. He replied, that his services had not received the slightest word of encouragement, and that he despaired of any requital for them. "Have you any objection to my referring to them in the House?" I asked. "Not the slightest," he said. He is a gallant old officer, and does not care one straw for anything which may be said, seeing that he speaks nothing but the truth. He has served for about fifty years, which is much longer than General Grey's military career. Of these fifty years, forty were passed upon active service in the Peninsula (where he was present at a great number of battles), in the East and West Indies, the Mediterranean, Gibraltar, Nova Scotia, the Canadian rebellion, the Burmese war, and in the Crimea. General Bell says, that, undoubtedly, there were others who, perhaps, served longer than he did in the Peninsula, but who afterwards retired; but he has served up to the present time, and asks to serve again. During eleven years he commanded his regiment (the Royals), and he was wounded more than once at the head of it. He was wounded also while commanding the troops (3,000 men) in the trenches before Sebastopol, and he also commanded a brigade in the Crimea. Surely such an officer as this, who has seen forty years of active service, is unfairly neglected when a general officer, twelve years younger in the army than he is, receives the command of a regiment, while he gets no encouragement even to expect such an appointment. I presume that the right hon. Gentleman will be able to make out a good case. He appeared to have not the slightest doubt of doing so. I remember that when the question of the purchase system was brought under the consideration of the House some time ago, the great obstacle set forth in the way of removing that dishonour and disgrace to the British army was said to be the difficulty of making a selection. It was then given out by some very high authorities—by Lord Panmure and the Commander-in-Chief amongst them—that to make selections would be most invidious. But the present is one of the most complete cases of selection that can be imagined, and I believe that it has caused more dissatisfaction among the officers of the army than can well be conceived. Many other subjects have been adverted to this evening, and a very important statement has been made by the late Secretary for War (General Peel). In some of his opinions I concur, but from others I certainly must dissent. He seemed to think that there could be no further economy in the present military establishment. If he means that no economy can be effected as regards the numerical strength of our forces, I agree with him. But if he means that there is no possibility of effecting any saving in the administration of the army, I can assent to no such proposition. I believe that the military Estimates which are presented to us from year to year are in a state of great confusion. They do not satisfactorily explain the state of the administration. The object of them must be to make clear what is the expense of each officer in the service and in every department; but I will venture to say that few men, whether civilians or military men, are able to discover that distinctly. Almost every staff officer has three or four different items of pay, and unless they are traced out with great care in different parts of the Estimates it is impossible to find out what is the amount each officer is really receiving. I must do my hon. Friend (Mr. Laing) and also the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote), the justice to say that the Treasury has several times remonstrated with the War Department upon the confusion of the accounts, and the expediency of simplifying them. I will just state one instance of the delusive character of these accounts. Take the first item in these accounts. The salary of the Commander-in-Chief is stated broadly at £3,300 a year; but if we look through the Estimates we shall find that there are three or four other items, which increase his emoluments to upwards of £6,000 a year. I do not mention this in any invidious spirit, but simply because it is the first item which presents itself. Then, again, in my opinion, the Staff ought to be paid in accordance with the importance of the duties which the officers have to perform, and the payment should appear clearly in the Estimates. I believe if this matter were looked into, we should find that a very considerable per-centage of saving could be effected. I know that there are parties who would be prepared to offer opposition to such a change. The right hon. Gentleman has a large body of clerks who, having been brought up on the old system, would be very disinclined to adopt a new one. I will not dwell further upon that point, but I must say that some improvement must be made in the present practice if the army is ever to be administered in an economical and efficient manner. I think there is some extravagance in the cost of our Staff. I do not wish to select individuals, but in order to do any good one must refer to particular cases. Until lately there was no such thing as a General officer on the Staff in the Guards, that duty being generally undertaken by some officer at the Horse Guards. Then, again, there are some corps which have more officers than they require. There are also certain items in the payment of Staff officers which I think it would be for the comfort of those officers themselves should be inquired into. There are also other appointments of considerable emolument which it would be well to inquire into. I find there are some General officers who receive from £5,000 to £10,000 or £11,000 a year. Now, I think that as £5,000 or £6,000 a year is a very handsome allowance for a Bishop, it is enough for a General officer. I know it may be considered invidious to make these remarks, but unless some one does it we shall do no good. An hon. and gallant Gentleman (General Peel) has stated that we have 150,000 effective men upon the establishment, exclusive of India. I wish we had 150,000 available men in the United Kingdom—but unfortunately that figure includes the troops in the Colonies, which amount to 30,000 or 40,000 men. We must of course keep garrisons in certain fortresses, but the question of keeping troops in the Colonies has been treated of in an able Report recently laid before Parliament, drawn up by three civilians, Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Elliott, and Mr. Godley. Among the contents of that Report—which contains some very just observations—a maxim is laid down, that the real defence of the Colonies is in the people themselves, and not in paltry detachments of troops disseminated through the colonies. That is no new thought, however, for I recollect when I was much younger I lamented the erroneous system which prevailed of having garrisons in almost all the places in our possession. That was at a time when the French had no large fleet; but whether she has a fleet or not, I hope the Government will always bear in mind that the real defence of the country is best cared for by having a great mass of troops concentrated near the heart of the empire and taking the chance of some little island being attacked; our best plan is not to garrison all posts, but to mass our troops upon a central point. Even at the commencement of the tremendous mutiny in India, we had nearly 12,000 men, nearly 10,000 of the Line, at the Cape of Good Hope. The Governor of the Colony had such great regard for good troops, that although he received orders from the Colonial Office to detach troops, he did not do so. He was first instructed to send troops to the Crimea, but he declined to comply; and subsequently he received more than one order, as has been proved before a Committee of the House of Commons, from the Colonial Department, to send troops to India, but he held back. The fact was we were spending nearly a million a year for the advantage of the small population of the Cape of Good Hope. That is one instance of the effects of the old system. Except in the fortresses which must be held by garrisons, and with the great exception of India, I do not see that there need be any considerable number of troops in any other posts. A very important communication was made to the different Colonies by the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Minister in Lord Derby's Administration (Sir John Pakington), pointing out to them that they were all greatly increasing in population and wealth, and ought to develop their own means of local defence, without expecting any assistance from the mother country except in case of war. That point has also been ably dealt with in the Report to which I have before referred, and I hope the present Government will follow up those suggestions and say to the Colonies that they must place themselves in a position for self-defence. Some have, indeed, done so; Australia has commenced, and Canada has made considerable progress. The two Provinces of Canada, I believe, have a militia amounting to about 200,000 men, a force far greater than our own militia. The hon. and gallant General opposite has referred to a most important point, the Reserves of the army. When Parliament was prorogued at the end of last Session there was one paragraph in the Royal Speech which attracted my attention and gave me much pleasure. Her Majesty congratulated Parliament that measures had been taken to form Reserves both for the army and the navy, and that the national defences were a paramount object in the policy of the Government. I think still that ought to be a paramount consideration; but I am sorry to say the Reserve for the navy has proved most insignificant in numbers, and the Reserve of the army hardly exists at all, or at most only to the extent of a few hundred men. We have, no doubt, a considerable force in the shape of Volunteer Corps, which we owe entirely to the public spirit and patriotism of the country. The Government are entitled to very little credit in respect of that force, for the truth is, that for a time they seemed to doubt whether they should encourage or discourage the movement. I am sorry to see that an hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) has thought it necessary to give notice of a Motion that the Vote on the Estimates for the Volunteer Force should be reduced. I can only say that I believe the movement has been, on the whole, very satisfactory, and I was happy to see the amount of the force lately stated authoritatively to amount to 120,000 or 130,000. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War will give to that important force all the encouragement it so well deserves. I rather regret, however, that steps have not been taken to enlarge the basis of the force. I am afraid that in some quarters there is a little jealousy felt as to allowing the people at large to join in this movement. I will only remind such persons that one of the great Powers of Europe—Poland—fell and disappeared from the rank of nations through the jealousy of the aristocracy towards the great mass of the people.

very much regret that nothing has been done to establish a volunteer force in Ireland. I know very well that an idea exists that the people of Ireland are disaffected, and that those who profess the Roman Catholic religion are not so loyal to the British Crown as they ought to be. It appears to me, however, that the sympathy which many of the Irish people have evinced for the Papal cause ought not to excite the least apprehension. There is no reason to suppose, because sympathy has been manifested towards the Pope, that they are, therefore, disloyal to the British Government. It is a complete mistake to think so, and one that ought to be rectified. We are told that the law does not admit at present of the embodiment of volunteers in Ireland. If such be the law, I say, as I have said before, that it ought to be altered without delay. In the Letters of the Duke of Wellington, just published, and to which I have already alluded, I find that in 1808, when there was infinitely greater cause than now of disaffection towards the British Throne, the Duke writes with much satisfaction to say that he has organized a volunteer force of between 40,000 and 50,000 men; and the population was considerably less at that time than it is now. We have had Irish militia regiments in this country, and I should like to know if any one ever thought of distrusting those troops? There are, too, the Irish constabulary, almost all of whom are Roman Catholics; but I never heard that disloyalty was imputed to that fine body of men. These, in my opinion, are all arguments to prove that we ought to have a strong volunteer force in Ireland as well as in this country. With regard to the feelings of the people of Ireland on this subject, I would refer with much pleasure to an excellent speech lately delivered by the Catholic Bishop of Kerry, in which he answered some statements said to have been made rather too favourable to the French Government. He said such statements arose from a want of consideration; that he did not believe his fellow-countrymen or the priesthood would be so wanting in common sense as to desire to have a species of despotism in Ireland such as existed in France; and he reminded them that they would not have been allowed in France to make such speeches as had been made in reference to this subject. The late Secretary for War (General Peel) has spoken of the exact force now in this country, and has declared it as his opinion that that force is quite inadequate. In that opinion I entirely concur. The nominal force in this country at the present moment is quite inadequate, and I am not satisfied with its composition. Let us economize as far as we can. No one will be readier to do so than myself; but the possession of a numerical force that will enable us to fight in the field is the great object that we ought to aim at. We are told we have 150,000 men, but we have no such number in the United Kingdom. [Mr. WILLIAMS: Hear, hear!] The hon. Member for Lambeth no doubt knows all about it. We may have 150,000 to pay, but this includes men for the Colonies, and some of them are highly garrisoned. I do not believe we have more than 30,000 troops of the Line at home; there are 20,000 in the depôts, and these depôts are in a most unsatisfactory state, because they are made up of recruits assembled together without amalgamation. A speech was lately made by a noble and gallant Lord (the Earl of Lucan) in "another place" on this subject, and he recommended that second battalions should be substituted for depôts. This is a matter worthy of serious consideration, and I hope it will receive the attention of the Government. At any rate the present system should be altered, for it was far from producing satisfactory results. I have to apologize to the House for the length of the observations I have ventured to make; but my excuse is the vast importance of the subject.

MILITARY DEFENCES OF THE COLONIES.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. ADDERLEY, in calling the attention of the House to the Report of the Committee on the Military Defences of the Colonies, said, he thought it was essential to a proper discussion of the Army Estimates that the expenditure of the country upon colonial defences should be brought before the House. He was induced to introduce the subject now because he might not have another opportunity of doing so, and because if it were to be discussed at all it ought to be before supply was granted for the army. They were about to vote £15,000,000 for the Army Estimates, and of that sum upwards of £4,000,000 was disposed of in colonial defences. He could show that a great deal of this money was unnecessarily voted—that it was uselessly thrown away; while at the same time the resources and rightful obligations of large portions of the Empire in men and money were refused, although both could be readily enlisted in Her Majesty's service. A Committee had sat upon the subject of the Colonial Defences, and he wished now to know whether the Government intended to act upon their Report, and if not, what was going to be done. It was in March, 1859, that the gallant General (General Peel) then at the head of the War Office, communicated with the Colonial Office and the Treasury his sense of the immense inconvenience and mischief produced by the existing system, and urged upon them the necessity of coming to some definite principle as to the distribution of the expenditure on colonial defences between his own and the Colonial Department. General Peel then laid down, as the basis of an equitable arrangement, the double principle that the Home Government ought to contribute to the defence of the Colonies from invasion, but that the colonists should provide wholly for their own internal defence, and that any expenditure by the mother country for that purpose ought to be reimbursed from the colonial funds. The gallant General then proposed the formation of a Committee formed of representatives of three offices—the War Office, the Colonial Office, and the Treasury—to consider the best means of devising better arrangements. That Committee was formed and consisted of Mr. Hamilton (the Secretary of the Treasury and formerly a highly respected Member of that House) as representative of the Treasury; Mr. Godley (a man of the highest ability and worth, and one whose opinion upon a question like this was of the greatest value because of his vast acquaintance with colonial matters) from the War Office; and Mr. Elliott (also a man of eminent ability) from the Colonial Office. Mr. Godley was one of the founders of the Colony of Canterbury, in New Zealand, one of the most successful colonies this country had ever established. He (Mr. Adderley) could himself bear testimony to its success, having been one of the original adventurers in the scheme with Mr. Godley, and being in the receipt of large and ample dividends arising from the unexampled and unchecked prosperity of the colony. That Committee made its Report. To that Report he desired the particular attention of the House on various grounds. Questions of considerable import were involved in its consideration. It was important on the ground of economy; it had an important bearing upon the efficiency of the army, which, as the hon. and gallant General (Sir De Lacy Evans) had just stated was now scattered over the globe; but thirdly, it was important because it showed that the safety and vigour of our colonies were materially impaired by the present system. He intended, first, to state the principles laid down by the Report; secondly, the objections advanced by Mr. Elliott, in an appendix, to some of those principles; and thirdly, to show the fallacy of those objections. The Report showed, first, that the colonies of England contributed to the expense of their own defences about one-tenth part only, and it stated that such a state of things was quite novel in the whole world's history and an entire innovation on the former treatment of her Colonies by England. It was absolutely unparalleled in the history of the world that any portion of an empire—colonial, provincial, or otherwise—should be so exempted, both in purse and person, from the cost of its own defences. He did not believe that there was one Englishman in a thousand who was well acquainted with the history of our earliest colonies; but those who knew it would remember that for a century and a half the original American colonists had maintained their own defences without any assistance from the mother country, and had not only maintained peace within their own borders, but had even defeated the regular armies of Spain, France, Holland, and other countries repeatedly with their own Militia troops. Graham, the historian of the early American colonists, showed how England used to go to war in those days, and the zeal with which the colonists readily supplied not only money but troops. In 1710, when England was engaged in a contest with France, the American militia, being disappointed in the arrival of the English regular army, obtained permission to take the field alone, and added Port Royal and Acadia to the dominions of the Crown. A far more memorable instance was that of the taking of Louisburg in 1745, when the young English colonies, exposed to danger on all sides, absolutely themselves, unaided by a single man from England, raised a force, both military and naval, and took Cape Breton, the Gibraltar of America, and added it to the dominions of the Crown. The Mutiny Act of England was never extended to America until 1740, and it was then that the introduction of English troops began there, never ceasing until the emancipation of those colonies, produced mainly by the interference of the mother country.

The present system was not only an innovation, but one of the most inconsistent and anomalous description. No definite rule existed; for some colonies which as Imperial stations had a right to have Imperial garrisons, contributed most, and those which had no claim for assistance contributed least. Another aggravation was the treatment of the troops in regard to colonial allowances. In some rich colonies Her Majesty's troops received allowances in addition to their pay. The consequence was, that the pay of the troops stationed in less liberal colonies where no such allowances were made was necessarily increased out of our Treasury beyond the regular pay of our army; and where this was not done continual grumblings and discontent prevailed. When Earl Grey was at the head of the Colonial Office, he suggested that all that England should undertake to maintain in each colony was that amount of force which might be considered necessary for Imperial purposes. Very ample reasons were given in the Report for not adopting that proposition. He thought the Report sufficiently disposed of the proposition and principles laid down by Lord Grey. What was sufficient for Imperial purposes? He suspected hardly two Gentlemen in the House would give the same opinion on that point; some would say that no force at all, others that a very large one, was required. This proposition, in fact, left it to the discretion of the Government to determine what force was required, which was the very practice at present found so mischievous, that a Committee had been formed to get rid of it. The force which might be deemed sufficient during peace would, of course, prove insufficient in time of war; but that was just the time when the mother country could least spare any troops. The Report laid down the only principle which appeared to him capable of application to the case, and that was the classification of all English dependencies into Imperial stations and self-governed Colonies. It recommended that the cost of those posts which were established by the Imperial Government for their own purposes, whether warlike, as at Gibraltar and Malta, or philanthropic, as in West Africa, should be defrayed out of the Imperial Treasury. The Report included in the second class the territories of Colonies which had each a Government of its own, and declared that there was no reason whatever why this country should contribute a farthing towards the defence of those Colonies, or that they should be exempted from bearing their full share of the cost, except that the Imperial Government had the power to determine the questions of peace and war, or, in other words, that the Colonies were not represented in the Imperial Parliament. He would next come to the objections raised by Mr. Elliott to portions of the Report. Mr. Elliott acknowledged that there were gross anomalies in the existing system, and that it was impossible that England should undertake to defend all her Colonies throughout the world, and he illustrated that position very tersely in his Appendix. He said, when the Emperors of France and Austria went to war in Italy it was immediately proposed to construct new batteries at the Cape of Good Hope. That was a proposal to strengthen this country in the event of her being involved in a European war, by locking up 100 artillerymen on the most southerly coast of South Africa. It was an illustration of the system of England with regard to all her Colonies. Mr. Elliott, however, denied the soundness of the principle laid down by the Committee, that the non-representation of the Colonies in the British Parliament constituted the only reason for their exemption from paying the cost of their own defences, and insisted that mere self-interest ought to induce us to defray some part of that outlay, because the Colonies consumed more of our produce than other countries. He also objected to the recommendation of the Report that a fixed rule and rate of aid should be laid down on which England should assist the Colonies. He (Mr. Ad-derley) thought he should have little difficulty in showing the utter fallacy on which Mr. Elliott based his objections. He would not accept the position that the Colonies should bear their full share of their own expenses, even if they were represented in Parliament. He would still have some reason why they should be exempted, even though they were represented as much as Scotland; on what ground such partiality should be exercised towards portions of the Empire, he utterly fails to show. As to Mr. Elliott's reason that the Colonies had other claims on this country and that self-interest induced us to contribute to the expense of the Colonies, because they imported more of our produce than foreign countries, that was simply the old fallacy which existed before the principles of political economy were so well known as now. Sir George Grey, the Governor of the Cape of Good Hope, had recently expressed the same opinion in a speech in London, in which he said that upon every article the colonists imported from this country they paid something towards the Imperial taxation. Why, if that was contributing to their own defences then every country in the world that took our produce did the same thing, and we ought to pay for the local expenses of every foreign country dealing with us on the same ground of self-interest. But absurd as his inference is, he is still less sound in his premises. Mr. Elliott pointed to Australia as consuming per head a larger amount of the produce of Great Britain than the United States, and drew the conclusion that therefore a dependent country consumed more than an independent one. That argument was completely exposed by Mr. Godley, who showed that the opposite conclusion might be supported by the same logic, because Canada imported less per head than the United States, and the United States themselves imported more largely after they became independent than before, even in rate of importation per head. There are, therefore, more data for expecting importation from independent, than from dependent, countries. Of course all these arguments were fallacious, because countries did not import produce from this country from political motives but from commercial requirements. With regard to Mr. Elliott's second objection to a fixed rate of aid towards the defences of our Colonies, the Report recommended that the rate should be laid down, from which there should be no deviation, save by way of exception. Mr. Elliott would have no such rate laid down as a rule, but would keep the matter still in the discretion of the Colonial Office, to say what amount of contribution this country should be charged with—the amount of money and the number of troops Her Majesty should contribute towards each of the Colonies. What Mr. Elliott proposed was simply to retain matters as they are. It was trusting to the discretion of the Colonial Office that had led to the present state of things. His proposition was to amend the present system by retaining the present system. The proposition of the Report was to lay down a fixed rule, and rate of aid. There could be very little question which of those two propositions was the wiser. Alteration was at least more in the way of amending a vicious system than simple retention. Mr. Elliott endeavoured, by way of some change, to classify the Colonies under four heads, instead of under two; but it would be found that the four resolved themselves into two, and he did not think that any mode could be devised of varying or increasing the classification under the two heads proposed in the Report. Mr. Elliott classified colonies according to the amount of European element in their populations. Mr. Elliott said that from the number of coloured population the West Indies required a large contribution in men and money from this country; yet, singularly enough, the troops which protected those colonists from the coloured population were coloured troops. The case of the West Indies best illustrated the advantage of a fixed rule, because if any deviation from a fixed rule could be justified, it would be in their case where the Imperial policy had interfered with the local government, interrupted their command of labour, and embarrassed the relations of the colonists to their population, and where their policy being exceptional, the treatment might also be justly exceptional. How much better to treat exceptional cases exceptionally, than to have no rule, because there must be exceptions! He concluded that Mr. Elliott, having been so long connected with the Colonial Office, gave a fair example of how the discretion which he advocated would be used. Mr. Elliott said of Ceylon that they contributed more than other colonists to their own defence, and there was some question whether they should not contribute still more, but at this moment they were engaged in making a large outlay on railways and other works, and it was clear that whatever was taken extra for defence would be deducted from those very useful public works. People in England were engaged in railway undertakings and other remunerating enterprises, and yet every poor man was taxed for national defence; but according to Mr. Elliott, colonists who were undertaking public works ought to be exempted from the usual liability of citizens, and all the cost of their defence be added to the taxation of this country. The Government have stated that the present state of things could not be allowed to continue; they had asked for a Committee; they had formed a Committee representing three Departments of the Government. This most important Report was before the House, and he wished to know how the Government intended to deal with it. The Report proposed material changes in the system, and changes which he thought would be of very great benefit to this country, by improving the efficiency of the army and diminishing taxation, and to the colonies by insuring their vigour and safety. If the Government were not prepared to act upon it—he did not mean hastily, but by declaring that they would gradually carry the principle recommended in the Report into effect,—would they suggest some plan of their own, or would they refer the subject to a Committee of the House? Before going into Committee of Supply upon £15,000,000 of Estimates, £4,000,000 of which he disputed as involving many useless items and still more mischievous principles, the Government ought to let them know what they were about to do upon this important subject.

LORD ROBERT CECIL thought it a matter of regret that this departmental paper should have got into their hands. He did not think that the practice of substituting for a speech of a Minister the printed opinions of his permanent subordinate was likely to be attended with advantage, and in this instance the only result was to show that three officers of the Government had a serious difference of opinion upon the subject. There seemed to him no other way to settle the controversy than to refer the matter to a Committee of the House; and a further reason for doing so was, that he thought these three Gentlemen—especially Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Godley had exceeded the limits of the reference in their Report. The direction of General Peel was that they should examine into the best mode of saving to the country the expense of defending the Colonies and maintaining order within them; instead of which, Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Godley had gone into a metaphysical inquiry as to how best to promote patriotism and self-reliance, which was clearly beyond the purview of their duties. The right hon. Gentleman said that the fact that Mr. Godley had been a colonist and was in the War-Office gave a combined value to his report; he had a very high opinion of Mr. Godley, but having been in the same colony with that Gentleman he knew that these opinions were there openly professed by Mr. Godley, and had, therefore, nothing to do with his tenure in the War-Office. He felt bound to dispute the statement that Canterbury was the most successful of all our colonies. It was a scheme which failed entirely in those points in which it differed from other schemes, and although it was perfectly true that 4,000 Englishmen, placed upon most fertile land, succeeded in supporting themselves, and rising to a flourishing condition, he could not allow the claim of Mr. Godley to be the leader of the most successful band of colonists which had ever left these shores. His right hon. Friend disputed £4,000,000 of those Estimates as useless; but the total amount for the Colonies was only £3,000,000, and half of that must be deducted for military garrisons, which it was necessary to maintain for Imperial purposes in different parts of the world—such as Malta and Gibraltar. That could not be charged as part of the expenses of the Colonies. His right hon. Friend had passed over very lightly the objection to the views of which he was the advocate, which was to be found in the fact that the Imperial Government was wont to make wars, for the cost of the prosecution of which the Colonies were compelled ultimately to provide the funds. It was indeed doubtful whether they would in many cases be put to any but the most trifling military expense were it not for the consequences which their connection with Great Britain entailed. When there was an impression that there might be a war between England and France there was a great panic in Australia; but it was solely upon this ground, that if the Imperial Government went to war the trade of Australia might be harassed by the enemy. So in the instance of Canada. If she dreaded the breaking out of hostilities with the United States she was apprehensive of that result chiefly because some dispute might arise between this country and the latter with respect to the Isthmus of Panama, the subject of recruiting, or for some similar reason. If we had to maintain a large force in Ceylon, it was simply because our Government of India might possibly create a ferment in the Native mind which might run on to Ceylon and render the services of troops necessary. So it was also with the other colonies; while in the case of the Cape of Good Hope and New Zealand a considerable force was required to keep the large native population at bay. It was true, indeed, that the Dutch needed hardly any assistance to keep the Caffres at bay; but then that was because they shot them as they would wild beasts, which our feeling would not permit us to do. Again, it had been our policy to plant two Republics which were rapidly growing in power to the north of the Cape Colony, presenting a constant source of danger, which, inasmuch as the establishment of those colonies was the direct act of the Imperial Legislature, it was bound to furnish the funds to meet. So it was in all cases, that wherever there was a necessity for troops that necessity arose simply from the connection of the Colonies with England, and from the danger of the Colonies being involved in England's quarrels. Now, Mr. Godley, in his paper which had been circulated the morning before, expressed it to be his opinion that it was desirable to reduce to a minimum the dependence of the Colonies; but it was perfectly obvious from the observations of his right hon. Friend that the object of those who supported that view was to destroy the dependence of the Colonies altogether. But if those opinions were carried into effect, and that the Colonies in the event of a breaking out of a French or Russian war were plundered by our enemies, the result would be that they would seek, as soon as possible, to put an end to a connection which they found to cost them extremely dear. His right hon. Friend had referred in support of his views to America, while Mr. Godley drew attention both to America and the Greek colonies of old, contending that in neither of those cases was it the custom to pay for colonial defence. But it should be remembered that in America the militia, which a spirit of patriotism and self-reliance had called into action, had been hardly so formed when it had been turned against England herself; while the Greek colonies could not be held to be colonies in our sense of the term. Coreyra, for instance, was no more a colony of Corinth than England was of Saxony, from which source a large amount of its population was derived, but upon which it was in no way dependent. The population, it was true, went from the old country to the new, but the dependence was merely nominal; and this was the state to which it was wished to reduce our colonial empire, at least it was a state of things which would be brought about by the policy recommended, whether it was wished or not. He did not think that there was any necessity for him to argue in favour of the continuance of our colonial system, for he believed that any proposition to abandon our Colonies would be hooted out of the House. He believed, however, that though our colonial empire could not be overthrown in that way, yet that it might be undermined; and he therefore most earnestly trusted that the Government would not take any action upon the recommendations in the documents in question—recommendations which had

Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he was very glad the noble Lord had risen to address the House, inasmuch as he concurred in nearly the whole of the observations which he had made. He must, however, express his regret that the subject of those observations had been brought forward that evening by his right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Adderley), inasmuch as, in the present state of the House, it was impossible that any satisfactory discussion with respect to it could take place, and as some hon. Members had left under the impression that the question would not be introduced. He regretted particularly the absence of the right hon. Gentleman who lately filled the office of Secretary for the Colonies (Sir E. Bulwer Lytton), who, he had reason to believe, would not lend his powerful aid in support of the views of which the right hon. Gentleman was the advocate. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) asked what course the Government intended to take in reference to the Report? It must not be forgotten that there were virtually two Reports, which were incompatible with each other. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to object very much to the classification of the Colonies made by Mr. Elliott, and to prefer that made by Mr. Godley. The latter gentleman, however, had really made no classification of the Colonies, as one of his classes contained them all, while the other comprised those military posts which are not Colonies. It appeared to him (Mr. Fortescue), on the other hand, that Mr. Elliott's classification was adapted to the state of things as it stood, and to the various and varying circumstances of the several communities which owned our sway. He found a number of communities differing in almost every respect; some, like Australia and America, of English origin, and others not, some young and growing, and others firmly established; he found islands which comprised the most extraordinary collection of races that had ever been brought together under any Government; and a number of dependencies with savage tribes on their frontiers or within their borders;—finding these circumstances existing, he adapted his advice to the facts with which he had to deal; and this circumstance very much recommended Mr. Elliott's Report to consideration. Now, the first of the Reports, to which the right

hon. Gentleman had called the attention of the House, (Mr. Godley's); which had been sent in at the suggestion of the gallant General, who was then at the head of the War Department, was a very able document. But what did this Report do? Instead of preparing a scheme adapted to each Colony, according to its respective needs and capabilities, it attempted to lay down one rigid, uniform rule, as applicable alike to every one of our various and widely differing dependencies. It took away the whole of that discretion now exercised by the department of State concerned with these Colonies, and sought to supply the place of the judgment and discretion of the Secretary of State, by a kind of agency which was certainly simple enough—and, if possible, might be very convenient—but which he thought was an utter impossibility. It proposed to hand over to the Colonies the entire responsibility, management, and initiative in all matters relating to their military defences—a greater revolution could not well be conceived;—and, having handed over that power to the Colonies, this country was to contribute towards the expense of that military defence, not according to the wealth, danger, or necessities of the Colonies, but in one fixed and uniform proportion. Such a proposal, however ably defended, he could hardly believe any responsible Colonial Minister would undertake to carry into effect. It entirely disregarded the numerous differences that existed between our several Colonies, whether they were wealthy or poor, young or old, secure in their position, or exposed to internal or external foes. In short, it would be in practice entirely unworkable. The right hon. Gentleman had dwelt a good deal on what he considered the main motive and reason why this country should contribute in any degree to the protection of her dependencies—namely, that these were not represented in the Legislature, and that the power of peace and war was not in their hands. It was impossible to overrate the importance of that consideration; but it was not the only reason. Many of these dependencies could never have come into existence; and could not continue in existence now as separate and independent communities. It was only under the protection of this country, which sent them forth, that they could be maintained at all. Many of them were so small, that it was perfectly futile to speak of them as independent communities—if we chose to abandon them, they must attach themselves to some other State.

A great part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman referred, not to the proper mode or amount of our military contributions to our Colonies, but to the question whether we should maintain our Colonies at all. Now, hon. Gentlemen had undoubtedly a right to their opinions on that subject; but representing, as he did, the Colonial Office, he did not think it his duty to discuss such a question; he thought the business of that office was to keep the Colonies; and therefore he did not enter into any question of the value to us of the commerce of Australia and Canada, as compared with that of the United States. With respect to the motive for keeping up a force in our Colonies, it did not arise mainly from the problematic risk of a great European war; it was of a more pressing and immediate nature. In some of them, where any considerable amount of force was kept up, the danger arose not from any chance of a European war, but from the risk of hostilities with formidable Native tribes. Great as our expense had lately been at the Cape, it had saved us the still greater expense of another Kaffir war; and that expense was already greatly lessened; for at present the force of all arms at the Cape was not much more than 4,000 men; whereas, when the Report was made, it was double that number. In New Zealand, again, these charges were daily diminishing. While that was so, he entirely admitted that it was the duty of the Government to examine into the condition of every Colony, and endeavour, by every means in their power, to reduce the amount and cost of the force in each; and obtain from each the largest and fairest contribution towards its support. But the head of the Colonial Office was not prepared to adopt the very simple but impossible scheme to which the name of Mr. Godley was attached. Mr. Godley rather taunted Mr. Elliott with not having proposed a rival scheme; but he entirely denied the justice of that accusation. It was impossible by one stroke of the pen to unite all colonial and Imperial interests, and to produce one uniform self-acting scheme which would supply the place of the judgment, sagacity, and firmness of the Secretary of State in settling all those difficult and complicated questions, involving both colonial and Imperial interests. It was the duty of a Colonial Minister to take the case of each colony or group of colonies into separate consideration, dealing with it according to its special circumstances and requirements, and, while reducing its demands upon the Imperial Exchequer to the lowest practicable limits consistent with safety, also to foster and stimulate the feeling of self-reliance in the minds of the colonists. The right hon. Gentleman had passed very lightly over the military spirit which undoubtedly existed in the great colony of Canada. In our Australian colonies, likewise, there was a rapidly growing spirit of self-defence—a sentiment which it was most desirable to cultivate to the utmost. Those colonies were most favourably situated. Separated from the great Powers of Europe by thousands of miles of ocean, and with no formidable tribes on their frontiers, their need of the protection of Imperial troops was reduced to very narrow limits. He would not, however, say that they should be wholly divested of that protection, because he should be sorry to see any great dependency of the British Crown entirely denuded of a certain number of English redcoats. Feeling and reason went to a great extent together in this matter, and it would be undesirable that these colonial communities should be left unprovided with a moderate body of the mother-country's military force. The colonies of Australia already contributed a large portion of the expenditure upon their own defence—one of them considerably more than half the entire amount. And let him remind the House that if, following out the recommendation of the Report, one fixed and uniform rule were applied indiscriminately to all our Colonies, we should be driven to this absurd result—that we should have to reject a portion of the sum now contributed by these rich and growing communities. Such an uniform rule must be adapted to the circumstances of the weakest and poorest of our Colonies, which could not be expected to pay more, perhaps, than one-third of the cost of its defence—a proportion much below that which was derived, and properly derived, from a wealthy colony like Victoria. The subject was, however, a very large and complicated one, and it was impossible on an occasion like the present to treat it as it deserved. With respect to the question put by the right hon. Gentleman to the Government, he could now only answer, speaking for his noble Friend at the head of the Colonial Department, that he would use his best endeavours to restrict the Imperial expenditure upon colonial defence within the smallest possible compass—to induce, and if necessary compel, certain colonies, New Zealand for example, to contribute more than they now did towards their own protection. But at the same time his noble Friend could not undertake to carry out one rigid uniform scheme, which it was impossible to adapt to all the varying exigencies and capacities of our different dependencies.

Mr. A. MILLS said, it was not the proper time on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply to discuss so important a question as the military expenditure of our Colonial Empire, and he expressed a hope that the Government would consent to its being referred to a Select Committee. The Report on our colonial defences, to which allusion had been made, was a very valuable document, and he placed great reliance on Mr. Elliot's opinion. The recommendation made by the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) with regard to colonial military expenditure was deserving of consideration, because, as the Estimates were now framed, there was great difficulty in ascertaining what was paid by the Colonies, and what by the Imperial Government. He was inclined to think that the amount of our colonial expenditure was exaggerated; and though it was not to be denied that England should frame her colonial policy on the model of that of France, yet it was worthy of remark, that the single colony of Algeria cost France more in one year than the whole Imperial expenditure of England in the fifty Colonies of her Empire. He looked upon the charge for fortifications for the Colonies as an extravagant one, and he doubted if we got value for it in the event of any contingency arising. Large works for fortifications had been carried on at Quebec. We had spent there two millions, and a quarter of a million at Halifax. The only value those works were to us was in the event of the United States making a descent on Canada; but for it to be successful they must suppose sympathy on the part of the colonists and determined aggression on the part of the United States. If such a contingency were to arise it would not be by fortifications or by any conceivable military preparations, that our North American Colonies would be preserved to us, and therefore it was that he desired the expenditure with reference to our colonies should be so judiciously expended that we should get a corresponding benefit from it. The absence of any great military road through Canada was an illustration of the illogical character of our policy in this matter. The only access for troops into the interior of Canada during seven months of the year was through the State of Maine, by way of Portland, and yet we spent vast sums in fortifying colonial cities, to which, in the hour of danger, we should be unable to send succour. He (Mr. Mills) repeated the expressions of his hope that the Government would allow the whole subject of colonial defences, the revisions of which was a necessary corollary to the adoption of the principle of colonial self-government, to be referred to an impartial Select Committee of the House of Commons.

PENSIONS.—QUESTION.

GENERAL UPTON said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it be the intention of Government to recommend to Her Majesty a revision of the Warrant dated the 1st July, 1848, with a view to its improvement, and especially to increase the rates of Pension of Non-commissioned Officers and Soldiers discharged the service in a helpless condition. The hon. and gallant General said that his object in desiring the increase of these pensions was not only to improve the condition of the soldier, but also to facilitate recruiting for the army. His principal objection was to the temporary pensions granted to men who had been disabled in the service. Those pensions were now 6*d.* a day for from twelve to eighteen months if a man had served seven years, for from one to two years if he had served ten, and for from three to five years if he had served fourteen years. Would any one say that it was creditable to the country to discharge men with pensions so small as these? He also complained of the insufficient pensions varying from 9*d.* to 1*s.* per day, granted in cases of total blindness. That was most unjust, and he hoped the Secretary for War would be of his opinion.

OUR MILITARY EXPENDITURE.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that many of the questions which had been submitted to the Secretary for War, on the House going into Committee of Supply, were of so important a character that they were far better suited to be submitted as substantial Motions. The enormous amount of the Estimates for the Army, exceeding that of any former year of peace, was creating uneasiness in the country. The people were inquiring why these prodigious sums were asked for. Every means had been taken to frighten the people into the belief that France intended to invade us, in order to increase the Army Estimates; and, notwithstanding all that had been done, it was still affirmed that we were not in a position to repel an invasion if it should be attempted. A Return lately presented to the House gave the number of our army at 145,000 men, besides 80,000 for India; 40,000 of them were for the defence of the Colonies, and 105,000 for the protection of this country. The number of men at the depôts of the regiments in India, amounted to 15,000. Then there were of Marines on shore 6,000, enrolled pensioners 16,000, embodied Militia 23,700, and disembodied Militia 44,300; which gave us an efficient force of 210,000 men. Some gallant Officers had thrown out doubts as to the efficiency of the disembodied Militia; but in every instance after each inspection the most encouraging reports had been made. Moreover, there were of Yeomanry Cavalry 15,000, and 12,000 Irish Constabulary. Then, take the rifles at 130,000, and the total force would be 367,000 fighting men. Now, he would ask any rational man whether, supposing that any enemy were mad enough to attempt an invasion, and that it was possible to effect any landing at all, with our superior navy, whether it was possible that he could land a force that would be equal to one-third of what we could send against him? Then with regard to the Colonies. A Report was lately presented to the House in which it was stated that the military cost of the Colonies was £3,590,000; and we had to provide them with bishops and other church dignitaries, and all manner of things beside, so that he had found, by putting the Parliamentary Returns together, a total amount of £4,877,000 in one year, 1856-7. This was not the system practised by other countries. Look at the Dutch. They had only a few colonies; but, instead of costing the mother country anything, they remitted for Imperial purposes £2,600,000 a year. The colonies of Spain remitted £1,150,000 to that country after paying all their own expenses. It had been suggested that a Committee should be appointed to inquire upon this subject, and the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) had stated that great misrepresentations and discrepancies had taken place in the statements of the amounts contributed by the Colonies towards the maintenance of the military force; but the House had very little to do with that—what the House had to deal with was the amount which annually went out of the pockets of the people of this country. The sum of £511,000 had been spent by this country on the military force in the Australian colonies, and the Staff of that force cost £17,482. The sum expended by this country for the same purpose in North America was £514,000, and for the Staff £17,745; in the Cape, £830,687, and £28,121 for the Staff, whilst the Staff alone in the Ionian Islands cost £8,465. The Secretary for the Colonies asked whether the House would prefer maintaining this expenditure or abandoning the Colonies? He (Mr. Williams) was not for abandoning the Colonies at all—and depend upon it the Colonies were not for abandoning their connection with this country; but they were of no intrinsic value to us in point of trade. [“Oh, oh!”] The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) seemed to doubt that. Before the establishment of free trade the Colonies were doubtless of great value to this country. We received their produce, and they took our manufactures. But since the establishment of free trade they sent their produce and also bought their articles in the best market. It was very honourable to this country that it proved the best market for the Colonies still, but the whole trade did not produce a profit equal to an expenditure of £4,800,000. He (Mr. Williams) was much surprised at the defence made by the hon. and gallant General opposite (General Peel) of the present Army Estimates. Hon. Gentlemen opposite and the hon. Gentlemen who sat on the Treasury bench often differed widely upon important public and party questions, but whenever the public money was to be voted there never was any difference between them. When the right hon. Secretary for War got up to defend an extravagance in expenditure never before equalled, the hon. and gallant General, late Secretary for War, stood up and defended him. No doubt it was a source of great satisfaction to the right hon. Gentleman to be so ably defended; but, at the present time, when the question of spending the public money was taken up by the other House of Parliament as well as by the Commons, it was very important to know upon what principle such an expenditure was warranted. The hon. and gallant Officer (General Peel) challenged the House to point out how any reductions could be made in the present military expenditure. He (Mr. Williams) would point to former years. He would refer to the year when England was governed by two of the greatest men produced in our times—Sir Robert Peel and the Duke of Wellington—when the Army Estimates were £11,200,000 less than the Estimates of the present year; and even in 1852, the year before preparations for the Russian war, the amount voted for military purposes was £8,500,000 less than the present Votes. The same, or a similar result was shown by a comparison with other years about that time, and he would ask what there was in the condition of the country to justify the House in voting those enormous sums of money? He had often thought and said that the country ought to be more thankful to the Government than to the House of Commons that a much larger Vote of expenditure was not required. The hon. Member for Tavistock (Sir J. Trelawny) had called attention to the Foot Guards. It appeared that in the three regiments the officers were sometimes eight months in the year absent from duty; and he was not surprised at it. The regiments numbered 6,300 men and 261 officers, the cost being £206,362. In five regiments of the Line, consisting of 100 men more, there were only 228 officers, or thirty-three less than in the regiments of Foot Guards. The difference in the cost of those 228 officers, and of the officers of the Foot Guards, was £42,800. The entire regiments of Foot Guards cost £11,470 more for clothing than the five regiments of the Line; making a total difference of £54,310 in favour of the five regiments. Why should this distinction be made? The Foot Guards did not perform duties nearly so arduous as the other regiments, and they were not sent to the Colonies. He believed they occasionally marched from St. James's to the Tower—and sometimes they went by a more modern mode of conveyance to Windsor. The cost of clothing the Life Guards was £3 7s. 2d. more than that of the ordinary cavalry soldier. He did not object to that, because the Guards were in attendance upon Her Majesty: the only fault he found was that they were much too numerous, and in that opinion he was sustained by the present First Lord of the Admiralty (the Duke of Somerset) who when a Member of that House had stated that one-third of the number would be sufficient for attendance upon her Majesty. But why the cost of clothing the Foot Guards should be £1 16s. 5d. more than that in any other regiment, he was at a loss to say. The army was well clothed, and the highest encomiums had been passed upon the various descriptions of clothing with which the soldiers were furnished; but that would not justify so great a difference between one regiment and another. On the whole, he must say that the military and naval expenditure of the country was much in excess of what it ought to be, and he should have more to say on the subject in Committee.

COLONEL KNOX wished to obtain from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Herbert) a specific answer to one particular question of great importance to the army—namely, what course he intended to pursue with regard to the purchase system? In the debate on the purchase system the right hon. Gentleman was understood to state that purchase was to cease at the rank of major, and from that point the system of selection would be adopted. What was that system of selection? He said broadly and distinctly in that House that selection meant nothing more or less than jobbery. Nothing was more invidious than that any officer who rose by purchase to the rank of major in the army should suddenly find himself without any security whatever that his interests would be protected. Supposing an officer not connected with people of influence in England to be in the West Indies when his superior died—everybody here would know that there was a vacancy in the regiment long before the major in the West Indies, and the Minister would be subjected to every kind of pressure. Court influence, political influence, and all the rest of it, would be applied; and there was very little chance indeed for the major in the colonies, who had no influence here. They had seen enough of this at the Admiralty. The consequence very frequently was that many valuable officers would retire from the army in disgust; for they would very naturally ask, what was the use of purchasing successive steps up to the rank of major if, when they arrived at that point from whence they could look forward to promotion without purchase, they found that they were sacrificed to those who had more influence than they? He thought a specific and distinct explanation ought to be given by the right hon. Gentleman on this point. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to make a distinct avowal of the principle on which he meant to proceed, for the army was very anxious on the subject. With regard to the observations of the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Williams), he (Colonel Knox) would not enter at length into a controversy upon the points raised by the hon. Member, but would content himself with saying that he had fallen into many inaccuracies in the course of his observations.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER, in answer to the hon. Member for Lambeth who asked what made it necessary to spend so much more money now for the army than during the Government of the Duke of Wellington and Sir R. Peel, would beg to inform him that at that time there was not a Napoleon Bonaparte on the throne of France, nor had France then an army of 600,000 men. For the same reason the money now spent on the navy must be much greater than during the period alluded to, for they had it on the authority of eminent officials—of the present Secretary of State for India (Sir C. Wood) and of the present Secretary of the Admiralty (Lord C. Paget)—that France could man her fleet when England could not man hers. These things he thought, proved the necessity for a more efficient army and a larger navy. A friend of his who had just come from France had asked a gentleman high in the naval department of that country whether the statements made in that House relative to the condition of the French navy were correct, and the answer he received was that as regards the ships they were very nearly correct, but that as regards the personnel they were very far understated. He had also been told by two gentlemen who had been at Toulon that there were seven years' store of every description in that place, and that the French could send out from it twenty sail-of-the-line and 30,000 men in less than a fortnight. Therefore he said that, instead of the forces of this country being too large, they were a great deal too small; and he called attention to the fact that at the present moment the number of sailors for the British fleet was 7,000 below the Vote of the House of Commons.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH expressed his regret that the present Military Estimates had not been deferred until the Secretary for India had made his statement for India, because the number of men for India must, to a certain extent, regulate the expense of the establishments at home. With regard to the depôts, he should be glad to know whether the expense was paid partly out of the Indian and partly out of the Imperial revenue?—as there was nothing in the Estimates to show how the matter stood. With regard to fortifications, the money was asked for in a lump, without explanation; but the country had a right to know how the money was to be applied. The sum for this purpose in the Estimates had no connection with the large amount of about £11,000,000 which it was said would be proposed in consequence of the recommendations of the Defence Commissioners. He hoped, however, that such an estimate as that would not be brought forward. There were several items in the Estimates above the amount proposed last year. He thought some of them should be reduced, as there was no justification in many instances for the increase.

MR. PALK remarked that, on a former occasion, in answer to a question from him, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sidney Herbert) undertook to lay upon the table the Report of the Committee on the Defences of the Country before Whitsuntide; but that promise had not been kept. He did not wish to interfere between the right hon. Gentleman and the House; but he desired to know why the promise which he understood to have been given had not been observed. Of all questions the most important was that relating to the defence of the country, and he did not think it was right to allow the subject to dwindle into a matter of secondary importance, to be brought on at the fag-end of the Session. The subject, in his opinion, was of far more importance than the Reform Bill or the Wine Duties, which they had been discussing for such a lengthened period. He might misunderstand the feeling of the country, but he thought it was a question in which all ranks of the people were interested, and he warned the right hon. Gentleman and the Government that this question was not to be trifled with. Many questions might be postponed and undoubtedly must be; but the question of the National Defences could not be postponed. The course the Government might take with reference to the Defences of the Country must, in a great measure, depend upon the number of men voted for the service of the country. He thought the Government were open to censure for having delayed bringing this subject before Parliament. In finance, the small margin taken by the Chancellor of the Exchequer had already dwindled to nothing, and but for the happy circumstance of another branch of the Legislature having interfered he believed the country would have been exposed to imminent bankruptcy. They were now at war not with Commissioner Yeh, but with the whole Chinese Empire. The great question was how the defence of the country was to be provided for, and how the expenses were to be met. If they proceeded by way of loan, that might be a reasonable proceeding; but if so they would have to make provision for that loan. If large defensive works were intended, gallant Officers on all sides of the House had told them that fortifications were absolutely dangerous, unless they could be efficiently manned. He knew that the Government were now under heavy contracts for the purchase of land for defensive works at Plymouth and Devonport, and therefore it was absolutely necessary that the matter should at once be brought under the consideration of Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman had promised to state the details of the steps intended to be taken, and also to lay upon the table the Report of the Commissioners; but if that was not done at once, there would be no time for the House to consider the subject fully as it deserved.

MR. BENTINCK said, he wished to refer to what had fallen from his hon. Friend the Member for Chatham (Sir F. Smith) in reference to the 12th Vote in the Estimates, namely, the Vote for the Fortifications, £645,355. Now there were no details whatever given in the Votes as to how the money was to be expended. He wished to ask whether it was the intention of the right hon. Gentleman, when the Committee arrived at that stage of the Votes, to give them the particular items composing the gross sum. Now, he was one of those who were of opinion that all the money expended upon the fortifications at Alderney would be a complete waste of money. For this reason, if ever the contingency, which all had in their minds, although no one liked to name it—a war with France—should arise, we should have to find men to man these works. He thought we should find we had been constructing harbours which would be more useful to our enemy than to ourselves. They would prove useless either as harbours for the purposes of war or mercantile operations, and every shilling expended on them would be thrown away. Unless the Vote was placed in such a shape before the Committee as would enable them to deal with the items separately, it would be perfectly impossible to sanction the whole sum. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would inform them how they could deal separately with the items.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT : In answer to the last two speakers, I venture to say, in spite of the hard words of the hon. Gentleman opposite, that I have not in any way shirked or evaded my duty. I have given every attention to the subject, which is one of immense importance ; and I think no Gentleman will consider the Government ought to have laid the Report of the Commissioners on the table without at the same time being prepared to state the course they proposed to adopt. The Report is, I believe, so far advanced in printing that I shall be able to lay it on the table next week, but it would not be right to do so until I could state the course we propose to take with regard to the recommendations contained in it.

In answer to the Question of the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), I may say that I never intended to ask the House to vote a lump sum without knowing the items of which it is composed. I inserted a lump sum because when we were about to deal with the Report of Commissioners which contemplated works on a large scale, it was necessary for me to put a Vote in the Estimates which might be necessary if any action were taken upon the Report, but which must be altered in its proportion and distribution according to subsequent decision. I proposed a Vote, but I do not think the House ever anticipated that I should ask them to grant it until all the details were explained. The details shall be given before the House is asked to pass any Vote upon the subject. The questions raised have been so numerous that I hardly know where to begin. It will perhaps be more satisfactory if I take them in the order they were put to me and answer them seriatim.

I think the hon. and gallant Member for Beverley (Major Edwards) began by asking whether I could produce the Correspondence that had taken place as to the Yeomanry not being called out for training this year ; and another hon. Gentleman (Mr. Deedes) said there was great alarm in the regiment he commanded lest the Government should intend to do away with that constitutional force altogether, and that the men were falling away in consequence. The omission to call out the Yeomanry is not without precedent. It has occurred several times within my recollection, and no further back than 1857. The Yeomanry, however, have gone on and flourished since that time, and I should be sorry that any step taken by the Government, as this has been, under pressure, should lead to the impression that they undervalue the services of the force, or that it is not intended to call them out again. It is my opinion that the Yeomanry is a most valuable force. It may be a matter of consideration whether improvements in its organization might not be introduced, but the Government has a high opinion of the value of the Yeomanry corps, and would not desire at all to discourage them. This year has been one of great pressure, and considering the great increase of expense that has been put upon it, I have thought it right to avail myself of every resource which would enable me to meet the necessary expenditure for the permanent defence of the country.

The hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock (Sir J. Trelawny), has referred to exchanges of officers from the Guards to regiments of the Line. I know that of late years the Guards have been very severely dealt with by the different warrants regulating promotion, and no one is more responsible for that than myself ; for I felt it my duty on former occasions to deal, for the general good of the service, with great severity towards the Guards. But just look at the difference which the warrant of 1854 has made. Before that time the Guards, having always a step, or even two steps, in army rank in advance of the Line, and in attaining by brevets the rank of major-general, did occupy a position in the list of major-generals quite disproportioned to their number. But the warrant of 1854 did away with that. It is true they can exchange into the Line ; but how seldom do you find that done unless under very exceptional reasons ? A lieutenant-colonel of the Line is qualifying to become a full colonel ; but if he exchanges with a lieutenant-colonel of the Guards he is qualifying for nothing until he become a mounted officer. That has made a very great difference with regard to these exchanges, and the hon. and gallant Officer opposite has written an able pamphlet in which he complains of the effect of the change which has taken place. I feel, therefore, that when speaking of this ancient corps, many of whose special privileges have been taken from them during the last few years, and when I recollect that I have been the instrument of doing things that have pressed hardly upon them, I am bound to say something in their behalf, when I hear statements like those of the hon. Member for Lambeth with respect to them. The hon. Member spoke of the great advantages possessed by the Guards, and seemed to deride their services, as if they consisted of little else than marching from the Tower to Windsor and from Windsor to the Tower. The hon. Member, in so speaking, was utterly forgetful of the duties which they have to discharge. Whenever there is an important service to be performed, an expedition to be undertaken, requiring courage, experience, and ability, we uniformly go to the Guards, as a corps which we are sure to find in the finest state of discipline and efficiency, and always ready for any service they may be called upon to undertake.

I hope the different Members who have spoken to-night will excuse me if I make a short statement in answer to the numerous questions that have been put to me. I was asked by the hon. Baronet (Sir John Trelawny) whether or not aides-de-camp were subjected to examination. I have to reply that, not only are they subjected to examination, but to one of some importance, and which exceeds in extent that of almost any other country in the world. They are examined, not on military matters only, but in languages and other accomplishments. I find that in Prussia, for example, which is the most examining country in Europe, and where there is an almost pedantic adherence to theoretical tests, there is no examination for aides-de-camp. It is, however, strictly carried out with us, and I believe it is attended with very great advantages; and I believe Prussia is about to follow our example. A gallant Officer opposite spoke of the expense of the disembodied Militia; but he also said that, after all, if it was found to be of service for recruiting the army, he did not see how it could be abolished without detriment to the public service. There used to be a vast amount of men in this department on paper, who were maintained in this position because it was said that if that number of men no longer existed the difference would be filled up by men who would only enlist to abscond. But this paper force no longer exists. All these paper men had now been struck off. I do not know it officially, as the Returns have not yet been sent in; but I have reason to believe that all the men have been struck off who do not really exist, and who have either deserted or gone over to the Line, and those only are included in the Returns who form part of the effective force of the various regiments. I have also just sent out a circular to the colonels of disembodied Militia, announcing that the Commander-in-Chief had issued the most stringent regulations against recruiting parties attempting to induce disembodied militiamen to leave the Militia to join the Line—because I think there is no more use in asking a militiaman to go to the Line than there would be to ask a man to leave one regiment for another. The officers of the Militia, when they know that they are protected from that invasion, will have recourse to a class of men not very valuable for the Line but valuable for the Militia—men of fixed habits and whose characters are known. In this matter I think that not only the House but the public out of doors are run away with by the comparison which they make between an embodied and disembodied regiment. It is said that twenty-eight days' drill will not make an efficient soldier. No one says it will. If you want to make an efficient soldier, pay him all the year round. But if you want a reserve that will not cost much, and which by further training can be made efficient men, then I say the system of twenty-eight days' drill will, as near as possible, combine the two objects of cheapness on the one side and a certain advance towards efficiency on the other. The hon. Member for Lambeth complains that the two sides of the House uniformly support each other when the Estimates come to be considered, and that the economy of the service cannot in consequence be secured; for, whatever difference of opinion there may be on other questions, they are always, he says, sure to combine to maintain the Estimates. Now, I think I can explain this by saying that on other questions we are more or less regulated by party feelings; but that no one can shut his eyes to the necessity that exists of having this country at all times in such a state of defence as to make it secure against the aggressions of an enemy. The right hon. Gentleman (General Peel) has referred to the system of reliefs, of which he complained. All I can say is, that, though the rules which have been laid down for reliefs are adhered to as closely as possible, there are often disturbing causes at work that prevent them being regularly carried out. Thus, the Indian war, the Russian war, and the Indian mutiny very materially disturbed the arrangements that had been made, and at one time during the Russian war we had not more than 24,000 troops in England. This arose because, with a small establishment, we were attempting to carry on a great war. We are told of those times when, during the administration of Wellington and Peel, the military and naval expenditure of the country was so much less than at present, the Army Estimates being £11,000,000 less than now; but we must recollect that this great reduction took place when the whole face of Europe was exceedingly pacific; and we must also recollect that for that state of things we are now paying, for it was the lowering of our stores, and the reduction of our armaments in those times that have imposed on us now the heavy burdens we are called to bear. We have been for years at the War Office striving to retrieve this error, for we were deficient in stores in every part of the world, and it is an error that I trust we shall not fall into again. I think we are bound to look most closely to every item of our vast expenditure; but I confess that I find great difficulty in carrying out this object, in consequence of the claims that are constantly put in now by one class of officers and now by another, all of which would go to increase greatly our military expenditure. The Secretary for War, however, is bound to recollect that we have got the most expensive and most highly paid army in Europe, and that every time the cost of that army is increased the effect is to diminish its numbers.

A question has been put to me about the Land Transport Corps. I had thought that the question of the Land Transport Corps was long since settled, and I confess I was somewhat alarmed when I was charged with not having kept good faith with the persons making the claims now urged. An hon. Gentleman (Mr. John Locke) spoke of their being promised 6s. a day, and that the agreement was that they were to be taken for two years; but that agreement, it turned out, was only to be carried into effect provided their services were required. Then the hon. Member for Greenwich (Alderman Salomons) got up with a gigantic placard in his hand, and I confess I was somewhat alarmed again, thinking it almost impossible but that some recruiting zealot, regardless of truth, had made some promise of a three months' gratuity on service for two years. Not a bit. The placard agreed with the attestation. The Government had adhered to their bargain, and there was not a shadow of a case of grievance on the part of these men. Lord Pannure appointed a board of officers to consider their complaints. They refused to acknowledge the authority of a deputation or a Committee that had taken up the matter, for these men had got into the lawyers' hands—but they heard every individual, and they settled their claims satisfactorily.

I now come to the question which my hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Lindsay) brought under the notice of the House relative to the officers who in 1826 accepted unattached rank on half-pay, the Government having thought it necessary to relieve the list. My predecessor in office thought that the case on the part of these officers was a good one, and he referred it to the Treasury, who refused the claim. I am therefore impartial in the matter. There was a doubt thrown upon the interpretation of the General Order, but I think, upon the whole, that the Treasury was right. No one would have made so improvident a proposal as that these officers should be promoted by steps of unattached rank remaining on half-pay, and should have at the same time, not only the advantages of half-pay, not only the advantages of full-pay, but advantages which a full pay officer would not have. Two years before the issue of the Order of 1826, a rule was established requiring six years' service as field officer before a man could become a major-general. These officers thought it a hardship that they should go upon half-pay and lose 4s. 6d. a day for so many years. But they got their steps in promotion, they were freed from foreign service, and they rose in rank to be brevet officers. The hon. and gallant Gentleman says they had not married and did not intend to marry; but that was their misfortune—if they had, their widows would have been entitled to the advantages afforded by the Order. What was the object of the rule? A man was to serve six years as a field officer, because the experience of a field officer's rank is necessary to make a General officer. Even if a man had been serving under the burning sun of India, he would nevertheless be ineligible to the pay of major-general unless he had served six years' as a field officer. If, therefore, the officers who availed themselves of the Order of 1826 enjoyed a dispensation from the six years' service as field officers, they would not only have all the advantages of half-pay and full-pay, but another advantage which officers on full-pay did not possess—exemption from service in unwholesome climates. This would be a solution of the problem that has puzzled so many people—how to eat your cake and have it. They would gain a step in rank, they would be receiving their half-pay at home, and at the end of the period they would be in as good a position as an officer who had been under a grilling sun in the East or West Indies, or had served in the most unhealthy climate. Although a doubt has been expressed on the words of the General Order, I think the Treasury upon the whole came to a wise and just decision in the case of these officers. With regard to the question of the compulsory retirement of medical men at 55, the warrant gives them great advantages in a higher half-pay. There is, too, this to be said, that, although the rule may be said to be an arbitrary one, it is not only advantageous to the soldier, but to the medical profession, as it entails more rapid promotion in the regiment, and gives the soldier the benefit of the services of men in the vigour of their age. I now come to the question raised by my hon. Friend (Mr. Childers), who says we have been doing a great injustice unwittingly to some of the Colonies. There are in the Estimates all the sums that the different Colonies pay in aid of the military expenses of the colony, and which are paid under arrangement into the Exchequer. The particular colony of Victoria, which is, I admit, one of the most liberal, does not appear on that page, because the sum is paid into the Exchequer either as colonial allowances, or to cover the whole pay and allowances. When the regiments are serving in India the payment is left blank, because the Indian Government undertakes the payment. When a regiment in Australia is paid entirely by the Australian Government, it ought to stand with that explanation against it; but there is this difficulty in the way:—We make our Estimates for the year to come three or four months before the Estimates are agreed to. We ought to know beforehand what the colony intends to do. The colony at different times, either from local financial difficulties or other causes has taken different views, and we, of course, are not aware whether by a vote they may not decline to advance this money. If, however, we could come to a clear and definite arrangement for a payment extending over a certain period the difficulty would be got rid of. I, for one, should be glad to see a colony so public spirited receive full credit for its liberality on the Estimates.

I will not now enter upon the subject of colonial defences introduced by the right hon. Member for Staffordshire (Mr. Ad-derley)—a subject of all others requiring the most careful, deliberate, and delicate handling. It would be taken very ill in the Colonies if the Government, without consulting them and giving them an opportunity of pointing out any exceptional circumstances, were to announce that they were going to apply a Procrustean rule to them as to the payment by them of the expenses of colonial defences. We have the advantage of the labours of the Committee on the subject, and the very clear and able rule they have laid down, and, on the other hand, we have the exceptions taken by one of the Committee to some of the opinions in the Report. If the world were ruled by logic the arguments might be very good, but men have feelings and passions which must be taken into consideration, and upon no subject is it more necessary to act with care and caution than upon one so largely appealing to the interests, feelings, and hopes of the different Colonies that compose our colonial empire.

I come now to the question of the Ordnance Corps. I must say that a great deal of the argument of my hon. and gallant Friend I thought extremely sound; but I cannot help suspecting that he, as an Artillery officer, did not examine both sides of the question. The Artillery and Engineer officers are a peculiar body, and have almost a monopoly of a vast number of places and appointments to which they are fully entitled by their attainments, but from which field officers of the Line are excluded. They are a seniority corps, without purchase and without selection; and the result is that unless you have men of very advanced age in the upper ranks, and unless there is a great augmentation to the Corps, promotion is slow. The average age of the full Generals of Artillery was, I believe, lately 84 years. The average age of sixteen officers commanding brigades, answering to the colonels of regiments, was 78; and of sixteen unattached officers, 71 years. The three supernumeraries are, I believe, all employed. The same observation, of course, applies to the Engineers. The pay of Artillery officers is very high. A brigade of Artillery, which answers to a battalion of the Line, has a colonel, who is generally on leave, another colonel in command, and four lieutenant colonels. The officers of Artillery enjoy an entire monopoly of the Staff of their own corps. It would not do to make an officer of the Line Adjutant General of Artillery; but the Staff appointments of the Line are open to officers of Artillery. Now, these are all decided advantages. The number of Artillery officers employed in other departments not strictly military is very large; and I own that, in my opinion, it is only what they are fairly entitled to from their superior attainments. There are twenty-nine officers of Artillery on the Staff, including Colonel Bingham, Colonel Wodehouse, Colonel Dickson, &c. Colonel Wilford is Governor of the Cadet Company; Colonel Tulloch, Royal gun-carriage department; Colonel Askwith, gunpowder manufactory; Colonels St. George and Rowan, and Lieutenant-Colonels Campbell, Younghusband, and Smythe, War Department; and so on, to the number of forty altogether, in civil employment. All these things must be taken into consideration as a makeweight against the lesser employment of the Staff of Artillery officers in other capacities. I think that officers of that corps placed in command in districts where the artillery amount to 4,000 or 5,000 men have a fair claim to consideration, and I believe this matter is now under the consideration of the Commander in Chief.

As the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Conolly) who complained of the scandalous outrage committed on his proprietary rights as the owner of a large fishery, has postponed his Motion, I need not go into the question now. His argument is that when the War Department purchase a property, they do so for military purposes alone, and therefore acquire only the right of firing guns or whatever it may be, without any manorial rights. I cannot admit that such is the case. I hold that when the War Department buys land, it buys everything belonging to it, the same as any other purchaser; and I do not see why the public should be robbed of those particular rights, when they pay for them.

GENERAL PEEL: And pay a great deal more than anybody else.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: A great deal more, no doubt; and therefore I do not see why we should give up any of our rights.

I come now to the speech of the gallant officer the Member for Westminster (Sir De Lacy Evans). He said, with great truth, that in a Committee upstairs after we had discussed the subject of the responsibility of the Secretary of State for the appointment of officers of high rank, when he asked whether or not I was responsible for the appointment of General Grey to be colonel of a regiment, I replied that I should prefer to have that question addressed to me in the House of Commons. I thought that if a transaction of that sort was to be publicly questioned, it ought to be done where it could be publicly defended. The gallant Officer began by reading extracts from the evidence given by Lord Fitzroy Somerset, to the effect that the colonelcies of regiments were given to three classes of officers—first to those who had distinguished themselves in war; second, to those who had performed colonial services; and, third, to those who had not been so fortunate as to have been engaged in war or colonial service, but who had commanded efficiently and respectably at home. The gallant Officer supposed that General Grey's appointment came under the last head. That is a mistake; it did not come under the last head. I have seen it stated in the public prints that General Grey was an officer who had never been out of Hyde Park; and, by way of cumulating all his offences, that he was a Guardsman. General Grey never was a Guardsman. He has been in the Line all his life. He was attached to the 43rd regiment, and was twice on colonial service with it; he was colonel of the 71st Regiment, and was in Canada with it. He commanded it for nine years. During the whole time General Grey was in the army there were only two occasions when there was a foreign expedition of any kind—one was to Portugal and the other to Canada, when the rebellion had broken out; and he happened to take part in both. I wish to destroy entirely the notion that General Grey has been a stranger to service out of Hyde Park. He comes under the category of having served in the Colonies. Lord FitzRoy Somerset laid down correctly the rules which had hitherto prevailed in disposing of these colonelcies. They are not given according to strict seniority. Officers are occasionally passed over by those who are their juniors. That was General Grey's case. He was passed over three or four times, and once by a very excellent officer, who had seen no foreign war service—General Breton, who is now in Mauritius. It is said there are officers, senior to General Grey, who can point to long and distinguished service. General

Bell's name has been mentioned ; but on referring to the Army List I find he is considerably the junior of General Grey. There are officers who have served in the Peninsula, but they have done nothing since. What has any one to say against General Grey ? Officer after officer has been appointed with less service than he can show. In answer to the question addressed to me on this point, I may say that the Secretary of State is responsible for these appointments, but that he acts on the recommendation of the Commander-in-Chief. The Duke of Cambridge said to me, " I think General Grey's services are such that he ought not to be passed over any longer ; I think nothing could be more wrong than to make him colonel of a regiment on the ground that he has a place at Court." No one can deny that. " But," he added, " it would be most unjust to refuse him the place if he has otherwise a title to it, because he has an office at Court." I asked his Royal Highness whether, if General Grey were General Smith, with no place at Court, and unconnected with any known family, but with some colonial service to point to, he would be entitled to the place, and the answer was that he would have got the appointment before this. Therefore, merely because a man happens to possess a place at Court, and there may be an outcry in the public prints about his getting any other place, it would be a shabby, cowardly thing not to give him a post of this sort when it falls vacant, and he has otherwise a fair claim to it. Once lay down the rule that a man who has a place at Court is not to receive the reward to which he is otherwise entitled for service in the army, and what will be the result ? Her Majesty has surrounded her children with officers of distinction. The Prince of Wales is attended by General Bruce and Major Teesdale, Prince Alfred by Colonel Cowell, Prince Arthur by Major Elphinstone. Well, once make it the rule that the moment a man accepts a Court place, a black mark shall be set against his name, that his past service shall not count, that he shall be debarred from receiving the legitimate honours of his profession, and you exclude from the places which it is the interest of the country to have filled by the best men, the very officers whom you would yourselves select, as the best persons to discharge the duties. Nothing could be more unjust than to lay down such a rule. The gallant Officer who brought this matter forward said I spoke to him so confidently he supposed I had a good case. I believe I have a good case, and I repeat it would have been a mean, shabby, and cowardly thing to have refused an officer, on account of name, position, or connection, that reward to which, in the ordinary course of service, he was fairly entitled. It has been said that Sir John Inglis has been recommended to the colonelcy of a regiment out of his turn. I own that such a step may be taken exception to ; but as the gallant officer had returned from India with broken health, and as this was the regiment with which he defended Lucknow, both the Duke of Cambridge and myself were of opinion that it would be a just and graceful act to offer him, although out of his turn, the command of the regiment with which he had been so honourably associated. I will not now make any further observations, but after this long discussion I trust the House will allow me to take, at any rate, the first Vote. The difference in the number of men is very small, about 2,000. The discussion may be taken on the next Vote for the pay, and we shall then have taken one step in considering these Estimates.

MR. DISRAELI: The question raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster involves a principle of much greater importance than the mere merit of an individual or the propriety of a single appointment; and I think the House would do well to express, though not in a formal manner, their opinion on this point. I will not at all enter into the merits of the individual whose name has been introduced into this discussion. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War has given a sufficient answer to the charge that the promotion of General Grey has been made in the case of an individual not entitled by his services to that mark of recognition by the Crown. This question ought to be argued with reference to the mere case of the individual. I certainly should have no prejudice in favour of General Grey. My earliest recollection of the gallant Officer is associated with my having stood three contested elections against General Grey, in all of which that gallant Officer vanquished me, and that at a time of life when defeat does not lead to those amiable results which at a more advanced period are possibly experienced. But the point to which I wish to allude is this—is it to be laid down as a rule that because an officer has an appointment at Court, he therefore is to be looked upon as a soldier not entitled to promotion, or to the fair prizes of the profession to which he belongs? It is not merely the practice of our own Court, or our own Princes, that those immediately in attendance on them should be military men. In Europe, during some centuries, such has been the custom. It is a fact that the Households of Sovereigns and of Princes near the Throne are invariably formed of members of the military profession. Then are we to lay it down as a principle that, because a soldier accepts office in the Household of our Sovereign or of a Prince near the Throne, he is no longer to be entitled to promotion or preferment in his profession? If so, the consequence must be that you must have in the Royal Households a very inferior class of military men. It is not for the interest of the country that our Sovereigns and the Princes of their families should be surrounded by military parasites; but rather that they should be surrounded by men of station, of independent feeling, of high qualities, and with a sense of responsibility. So long as the system prevails—and I confess I see no good reason why it should cease to prevail—it is a matter of importance to the public interest that the Officers in the Royal Household should be men of the highest class, and that it should not be considered because they accept appointments in the Royal Household they are therefore to be deprived of all future promotion in their profession. The public interest in this matter undoubtedly is, that the individuals who occupy this position should be men of station—men who by their cultivation and general feelings would exercise a beneficial influence on the sentiments of those with whom they are brought in contact. The gallant General whose name has been introduced into this question is one who fulfils those conditions. He is the son of an eminent statesman, is himself distinguished, and I believe it will be acknowledged by all that he has performed the duties of his office at Court in a manner that has entitled him to respect.

COLONEL DICKSON rose to say one word on behalf of his old Friend and brother officer, General Sir John Inglis. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Herbert) that it was a graceful compliment to the gallant Officer to make him colonel of the regiment which he commanded at Lucknow; but the House should understand that it was little more than a compliment, for in accepting the regiment he resigned his good service pension of £200 a year, which would now be conferred on some other officer.

SUPPLY.—ARMY ESTIMATES.

House in Committee.

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(1.) 1,907 Men, a further number of Land Forces.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, at that hour (half-past eleven) he would state the differences between the first and the present revised Estimate as shortly as possible. There was a difference in the first Vote of 1,907 additional men, which arose from the fact that six battalions of infantry and a regiment of cavalry were coming home from India. In Vote No. 2 there was a corresponding addition in consequence of those regiments coming home. In Vote No. 3 there was a diminution of £54,000, in consequence of a reduction in the number of men to be raised, as well as a reduction of £15,000 in the purchase of horses for the Artillery. There was also some diminution in consequence of the postponement of the erection of a military prison in Canada. In the Works Department there was a reduction of nearly £76,000, chiefly in the carriage department, owing to the carriages having got ahead of the guns. As to the reduction in clothing to which an hon. Member referred, that arose on the free kits, which of course were not required by the men coming home from India, but would have had to be given if the men had been newly raised.

COLONEL HERBERT said, it was unsatisfactory to see a reduction of the regiments at home. The nominal increase was 8,000 men, and that hardly compensated the force sent to China. There was a Vote of £322,000 for Embodied Militia, but the amount would supply the pay of 16,000 additional regular soldiers. It was most unsatisfactory to see the regular regiments so weak and ineffective.

COLONEL KNOX reminded the right hon. Gentleman that he had not answered his question respecting the new purchase system.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT begged pardon for having overlooked the gallant Member's question. He adhered to what he had stated on a former occasion that the new system would require considerable deliberation. He had in nowise departed half-pay of his regimental rank, a Staff pay was altogether distinct from that of rank; in the case of General Grey it would amount altogether to a year. But when his five years' service on the Staff were up, he was to fall back at once to the half-pay of his regimental rank—about £200 a year. He thought a great hardship. They tried to encourage their best officers in the Staff, and they also compelled them to go through a very severe course before they were appointed, and when it was a hardship to remove them and make them fall back upon what was perhaps a paltry pension. He was desirous to encourage their best officers to go on the Staff; they should not be put on the ordinary half-pay, but on some increased half-pay—somewhere between regimental half-pay and the Staff officers, in order to make that all palatable or agreeable to them. It was also another hardship in which they were liable. When a sudden war broke out, like the Indian war, it was rare, a number of officers whom the Staff College were placed in, were suddenly called upon to go over; and these officers, being removed from the Staff before their time was up, were liable to see paid to themselves passed over as JOHN TRELAWNY said that the Estimates included the case of General Grey, who was disposed to say "No"; he intended to enter a protest against it, but that the defence set up by the Government for War was at all satisfactory. He said that the right hon. Gentleman said that the Staff officers' being connected with the Government was no reason for his not being appointed; but he was not satisfied with the House of Commons, only that he was a fit man, and there was nobody available to fit.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD HOTHAM said, that on the right hon. Gentleman's statement, the right hon. Gentleman for War had said that the Staff officers would shortly be called upon to pass the Staff College, in order to ascertain from the right hon. Gentleman how persons were to be placed on the Staff, and what was the duty of the army in the Staff College. The right hon. Gentleman said it had been proposed to form a separate Staff corps, but the objection to that course was that it might create jealousy amongst the other officers of the army. That jealousy might be created if the officers were selected without reference to their qualifications; but if the best officers were selected then no jealousy could arise. Did they wish to have able officers on the Staff or not? Did they intend to adhere to the rule of five years' service, and then send the officers back to their regiments? If so, the effect would be merely to make a set of bad regimental officers. Who were to do their duty in the regiments while they were at the Staff? If they could spare officers from their regiments, it was a proof that they had too many. Adverting to the subject of the recent appointment conferred upon General Grey, great confusion had arisen from describing appointments to colonelcies of regiments as the reward of distinguished service. That was a mistake. They were given for distinguished services when the officer, upon whom the appointment was conferred, had not attained the seniority, which would, otherwise, entitle him to it. General Grey having served for the time required by the existing regulations, he (Lord Hotham) had nothing to say in opposition to his appointment. It was a perfectly just rule that in those cases in which officers had long and efficient foreign service to adduce in their favour, a preference should be given to them over those who did not happen to be so fortunate; but then the claims of the latter, though they might be somewhat postponed, should not, he contended, be altogether ignored. It was not granted to every officer to be afforded an opportunity of performing distinguished military service, and those, therefore, ought not to be shut out from reward who, although they might not have had the advantage of such opportunity, yet discharged with credit the duties which devolved upon them in the position in which they had been placed. While that, however, was the view which he took on the subject, he should wish to call the attention of his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War to the statement which he had made, to the effect that nothing less than six years' service as a field-officer could entitle an officer to receive the full pay of a General officer. Now, his right hon. Friend had not alluded to an important exception to that rule, and he would, therefore, take the liberty of asking him whether he thought it was fitting that an officer who had passed, say five years and nine months amid the arid plains of India, or in some still more unhealthy climate, should not be held entitled to receive a General officer's pay, and that a person holding office about the Royal household—for instance, the office of Principal Equerry—altogether a political officer, and changed on every change of Government, who, perhaps, had not passed a single day on foreign service, should have open to him the same reward as Sir John Inglis, or any other officer who had done active duty, and had gained the highest distinction abroad, while the regulation requiring six years' service as a field officer was administered with such strictness against those who had nothing but their own services to recommend them. He had always felt that the exception made in favour of those holding offices about the Court was a great scandal, and he alluded to it now because he feared, from what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman, that an extension was about to be given to the principle that in future the honour of being an Equerry for a certain number of years would be sufficient to put such an officer on the same footing for promotion as long and faithful service in defence of his country.

GENERAL PEELE inquired if the Vote now before the Committee included, besides the ordinary pay, the colonial allowances to the troops in Australia, for instance?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT was understood to reply in the affirmative.

MR. O'BRIEN asked if it were true that the pay of the officers of the Royals at Hong Kong had been reduced after being voted by the House? He wished also to know whether any Roman Catholic chaplains had been sent out for the benefit of the soldiers in the 1st Regiment and others forming the China expedition?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that the reduction referred to had been made in mistake. He would ascertain the number of chaplains that had been sent out, both Protestants and Roman Catholics.

MR. CHILDERS thought it much more convenient that the whole provision, including extra allowances, should appear in the Estimates, and that a deduction should be made of the contribution by the several Colonies, which, in the case of Victoria, was very considerable. In fact, that colony had for three years borne the entire expense.

MAJOR STUART KNOX would be very sorry to follow the example of the hon. Baronet (Sir J. Trelawny). He was an got 14s. 7d. less pay than before, and no advance of rank. They had not enjoyed a single advantage that had been promised them. It was one of the hardest cases he had ever heard of.

Mr. BUTT asked, why medical officers serving in India had not received the benefit of the Royal warrant improving their rank.

Mr. SIDNEY HERBERT replied, that these gentlemen were paid according to the Indian rate, which was much higher than that allowed for home or colonial service.

(3.) £287,285 Miscellaneous Charges for Land Forces.

COLONEL KNOX moved that the Chairman report progress.

Mr. SIDNEY HERBERT assented, and, in reply to an hon. Member, stated that the Army Estimates would be proceeded with to-morrow evening.

House resumed; Resolution to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

ROAD THROUGH ST. JAMES'S PARK.

QUESTION.

Mr. KINNAIRD said, he rose to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the recommendation of the Committee which reported in 1856 in favour of opening a carriage way from St. James's Park to Trafalgar Square would be carried out, and if not, what were the reasons for such decision on the part of the Board of Works? He thought that there was at present a favourable opportunity for carrying out the Report of the Committee, owing to the Board of Works having purchased Berkeley House, and having widened the opening from the Park into Cockspur Street. The House, perhaps, was not generally aware that a Committee sat on this question in 1846, presided over by the present Lord Ilanover, and they reported in favour of such a communication being opened; but the difficulty was the expense, which at that time would have been very considerable. This great and necessary improvement might now, however, be made by the purchase and removal of one house, which had only a lease of eleven years to run. Any one who would look at the neighbourhood would find that there was an immense traffic at the bottom of the Haymarket, and a crowd of carriages around the fine exhibitions open in Pall Mall. When Her Majesty held a levée or a Drawing room the power of moving was still further impeded by the carriages pouring into St. James's Street. There was, indeed, no part of London more obstructed in the afternoon than that extending from Pall Mall East to Trafalgar Square. The obstruction arose from the traffic being unnaturally forced from the south-west along this thoroughfare. A continuation of the road by Hanover gate straight to Trafalgar Square would be of the greatest possible advantage to the public. He had seen a letter the other day signed "A Parishioner of St. James's," which stated the case so clearly and ably that he should like to bring it under the notice of those who had not read it. The writer said:—

"The present moment is a favourable one for calling attention to the urgent necessity of diverting by every means in our power the overwhelming traffic which at present chokes the London thoroughfares. To do this will, in many instances, call for a vast outlay of capital; there are, however, a few cases in which little beyond good sense, good feeling, and energy are required to effect immediate relief. One of the mauvais pas of London, for instance, most detrimental to carriages, and most favourable to coachmakers, is the eastern end of Pall Mall, between Waterloo Place and Trafalgar Square. To the innumerable vehicles which, rolling down St. James Street, and crossing St. James's Park from the western suburbs, pass along Pall Mall proper, are added, as soon as they reach the Athenaeum Club House, the whole northern traffic of London. Omnibuses from Baker Street, Kentish Town, and Hampstead, pour furiously down through Regent Street and the Haymarket on their way to the Strand and to Westminster, while the crowds of carriages waiting at the doors of the various exhibitions—of which there are no less than five within 300 yards of each other—contract the gangway and increase the dangers and delays of the conflux. An obvious mode of relieving this nuisance exists. Were a gate opened from St. James's Park into Trafalgar Square, and were the public permitted to use the deserted road within the park, every private carriage which now crosses from the south-west into Pall Mall, or which comes down St. James's Street, bound

TAX BILLS—PAPER DUTY REPEAL BILL.

LORD FERMOY said, he rose to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he intends, in consequence of the Bill for the abolition of the duties on paper having been rejected by the House of Lords, to remit some other tax equivalent to the amount of the paper duties? The present position of the taxpayers of this country, and of the House of Commons, was a very peculiar one with regard to the question of the Paper Duties Repeal Bill, which had just been rejected by the other House. That question involved two different features—the one financial and the other constitutional. As to the constitutional view of the case, he, for one, was prepared at the proper time to go to the utmost length in vindicating the rights and privileges of the House of Commons. The position in which the House of Commons stood before the country with reference to this question was, as he had said, a very peculiar one. The position was not owing to any act of their own, and he trusted that proper steps would be taken at the right time to vindicate their rights and privileges. He, for one, did not at all approve of the course which Her Majesty's Government had thought fit to take with reference to this question. It appeared to him that the proper line to have been adopted by the Government, when the other House rejected a Money Bill, was to have re-introduced the Bill immediately with a different name, and to tack to it Resolutions to the effect that the House of Commons were determined to vindicate their rights and privileges. Instead of doing that the Government had sheltered themselves under a Committee, which had no power to take cognizance of the financial portion of the question, and would only have a very partial power to deal with the constitutional portion. With regard to the financial part of the question—and that was the part to which his question principally referred—he thought it would be seen that the House was in a very peculiar position. The state of the case now was this—that the people of England, in consequence of the rejection of that Bill, were about to be called upon to pay £1,500,000 of taxation, to which taxation their representatives in that House had not agreed—nay, more, £1,500,000 of taxation which the representatives of the people in that House had condemned, and had declared ought to have been repealed. He wished to ask whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer was gratified or disappointed at the present state of things? Having confidence in the sincerity of the right hon. Gentleman's convictions, he believed that he was sadly disappointed, but he thought it right to say that there were many persons throughout the country who were of opinion that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, so far from being displeased at his present position, was rather pleased that he had got more money at his disposal. He thought he was acting rightly in giving the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity of removing that impression. During the debate that took place in that House about two months ago on the question of the paper duties the right hon. Gentleman declared that if the Paper Duties Bill were rejected—[An hon. MEMBER: In this House.]—he would come down before many days had elapsed and ask the House to repeal the war taxes upon tea and sugar. The House was then discussing the financial view of the question, and he would ask his hon. Friend who had reminded him that that promise only referred to the contingency of the rejection of the Bill by the House of Commons, what difference did it make, as regarded the financial view of the question, whether the Bill was defeated in the House of Lords or in the House of Commons? His opinion was, that Her Majesty's Government ought to have come down before two days elapsed to that House to ask them to pass a Bill for the repeal of the paper duties. But, as they had allowed time to pass away, he assumed that they were not prepared to adopt that course. If they were not prepared to adopt that course, he would ask them to consider, not only the injustice which had been done to the Commons of England by this invasion of their rights and privileges, but the injustice done to the people of England in calling upon them to pay £1,500,000 of taxation more than their representatives in that House had declared to be necessary to meet the exigencies of the State. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was in this dilemma—he either thought that the Earl of Derby was right, and that the other House of Parliament was right in the opinion which they had pronounced upon his Budget, but then he was unworthy of the confidence of the House and the country; or he believed he was himself right, but then he was bound described as selfish considerations as not to repeal the taxes on sugar for the sake of saving 1d. or 2d. a pound of income tax. It suited the rests of hon. Gentlemen who wished paper duty repealed to keep out of altogether the tea and sugar duties: the working classes, who were not of their tools, must see that there was a practical opposition between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and those who were trying to agitate the repeal of the duty. They said it was a question between the paper duty and the income tax; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his discussion on the Motion of the hon. Member for Somerset (Sir M. Miles), distinctly stated that, in his opinion, it was a question between the duty and the lowering of the duties on tea and sugar; and if it were put to the working classes, he (Mr. Stansfeld) believed that nine out of ten would prefer the continuance of the paper duty to the advance of the tea and sugar duties. He said that he should be surprised if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would invite the House to consider all of the tea and sugar duties; but it much more likely that the right gentleman would be granted a considerable amount of revenue on him. He thought, however, time was come when the Chancellor of the Exchequer should make some opinion whether the duties in a few months ago were likely to be lowered. Many people were of opinion that the circumstances had altered those calculations. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was in a very awkward position; those disturbing circumstances were very apparent—namely, the Government were not in a position to make an ultimatum, and that they were obliged to do so. He should be obliged to the gentleman would afford him information with regard to the second question. The reduced duties had been in operation for some time, and the right hon. Gentlemen were of opinion that the revenue so much as to be lost would be only a small amount, calculating upon an increase of 35 per cent. In the last three months only at the rate of 10 per cent. here were no greater losses than nine months, the duties of 6 and 35 per cent. were tail a much heavier loss than £515,000. Although he did not wish to lead the House into a debate upon a financial question, they had a right to expect to hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he adhered to the estimate which he made of the amount of revenue; and, if so, whether he would carry out the pledge which he gave to the House upon the supposition that the paper duty was not repealed? He would conclude by asking Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, having declared, in case of a similar contingency with regard to the Bill for the Repeal of the Paper Duty to what now has occurred, that he should take the earliest opportunity, probably within a few days, of inviting the House to repeal the War Tea and Sugar Duty, he still adheres to that intention; or what contingencies, then unforeseen, prevent such a course? Also, whether he is still of opinion, from the quantities of Wine entered since the lowering of the Duty, that consumption will increase to the extent of 35 per cent, and entail on the Revenue a loss, compared with last year, of only £515,000?

MR. CAVE: As representing to some extent colonial interests in this House, I beg to thank the hon. Member for Cambridge for bringing forward this question. Tea and sugar have much reason to complain of the inconsistency of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I am not going to quote Hansard, for I think that too much time is already occupied in the House by hon. Members elaborately proving what every one acknowledges, that in these latter days statesmen have frequent occasion to change their opinions. But in this case the old love has been thrown over with more than usual heartlessness. The breach of promise has been unusually flagrant; for not only have those interested in tea and sugar been disappointed of their just hopes, but so far from reducing the duty, the right hon. Gentleman has imposed two additional quarters per cent, one without any pretext at all, the other on the pretext of furnishing information which it can never do, and which is already furnished at the expense of the merchants. A duty so oppressive, and involving so much extra account keeping that I really believe for every shilling paid into the Exchequer, another is lost to the taxpayer in increased trouble and risk; tea therefore may well lament that the Chancellor desires to introduce wine into the cottage of the labourer instead of "the cup which cheers but not inebriates." Sugar is differently situated, for I believe its consumption will be increased, in order to render palatable the class of wines likely to be introduced under the Treaty; and this makes it still more essential that it should be purchaseable at a low price. But here I will take higher ground, and here I claim the concurrence of the President of the Board of Trade, and I will say that a tax of this kind is a serious tax upon knowledge. Everything which raises the price of the necessaries of life is a tax upon knowledge. When you see a country, or a portion of the community in a state of gross ignorance, you do not say, "What a tremendous tax there must be upon paper!" but you see that the material condition of the people is low, and that the necessaries of life are scarce and difficult to be procured. Juvenal does not tell us that we should not have had the immortal works of Virgil if tablets had been dear, or if there had been a duty on papyrus. He says, "Si tolerabile deesset hospitium caderent omnes a crinibus hydræ." And this corresponds with the ordinary course of experience. When a man earns wages he first satisfies his stomach, he then clothes his back, and if he has any surplus he spends it possibly on his brains; but unless he has that surplus, however cheap you may make knowledge, he cannot avail himself of it. Now, the tax on sugar is so onerous that it prevents its being used for many purposes for which it is essentially fitted. Any one who has been in the West Indies during harvest knows how soon lean cattle are fattened on the refuse of the boiling house. Sugar, were it cheaper, might be used as fodder, which in a season of scarcity of hay, such as this last spring, would be most valuable, and enable the farmer to keep his stock cheaper, sell them cheaper to the butcher, who would sell his meat cheaper, and so the working man would have a much larger surplus to spend on education. But it has been said that the paper duty has been condemned by the House, and how often have not the tea and sugar duties been condemned by successive Chancellors of the Exchequer, and by none more than the right hon. Gentleman himself; therefore, Sir, in the name of those who eat meat, as well as in the name of those who drink wine and tea; for the sake of education, and still more for the sake of his own consistency; I venture to express a hope that the right hon. Gentl^e will be able place in the other House of Parliament, or they entirely differ from their Friends there who took part in that debate. Of course I am aware that the Earl of Derby did not know at all that the hon. Member for Somersetshire (Sir W. Miles) had ever discussed the paper duty in connection with the income tax in this House; and if he was so entirely ignorant of what his Friends were doing here, it is not unfair to assume that his Friends here do not know anything of what he was doing there. Now, if the hon. Gentlemen opposite had observed the debate, they would have discovered—what everybody, I presume, who knows anything of that debate must have discovered—that it was not a question then whether the paper duty was a good or a bad duty, or whether it was a better or a worse duty than the duty upon tea and sugar; but they would have learned that the whole ground of the case is this—that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, supported by the House of Commons, has not provided adequately for the Ways and Means for the service of the year. That was the argument used in the other House of Parliament—and upon that argument almost entirely was based the policy which was adopted of rejecting that Bill. If that be so—and I am not about to discuss whether that argument was rightly founded or not—it clearly is not very reasonable to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to introduce some other Bill which shall remit an equal amount of duty—which Bill, I presume, could not become law, upon the new theory of the Constitution, without the consent of the other House of Parliament; and if there be any validity in the argument for the rejection of the Paper Duty Bill—namely, that the House of Commons had not sufficiently provided for the Ways and Means for the year—then clearly that House, upon the same argument, would not only be justified, but would be compelled to reject any new Bill that should be sent up, instead of the Paper Duty Repeal Bill. Therefore, I presume that the House would not expect the Chancellor of the Exchequer to take that course; and I am only surprised that any hon. Member in this House should have imagined such a course was possible. Besides we must take into consideration that although the sugar and tea duties are mentioned in what was called the “Budget speech,” yet that now we have got new masters with respect to the question of taxation, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will have to consider much more minutely, and take far more circumstances into his view than heretofore, when he is deliberating what taxes he shall propose to remit, and what taxes he shall propose to impose. The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Steuart) looking in this direction, took the liberty of making some reference to what he calls agitation out of doors. Hon. Gentlemen opposite have not themselves been altogether free in past times from the charge of endeavouring to get up agitations on questions which they deemed of importance to their peculiar interests. But they had always this extreme difficulty in their way, that the causes they advocated, the measures they propounded, the principles upon which they acted, the course they recommended, all have been precisely of that nature that the great bulk of the population of this country utterly disapproved of them, and would not in any way assist them in the promotion of their objects. With regard to this very matter, surely the hon. Gentleman does not wish that a great question like this—one so great that the noble Lord the Member for the City of London thinks there has scarcely been one so grave and important during the period of his political life—that a question so grave shall not be discussed by a people of a free country. Does the hon. Gentleman presume—does he dare to say, or is he so afraid of his own case as to say, that if any hon. Member of this House takes the liberty before any audience of fairly and openly discussing this question, whatever his opinions may be upon it, he is not doing service to the people of this country in enabling them to judge of the facts of this case and the principles upon which the House of Commons may be called upon to act. I should not have been dissatisfied at seeing the House take some more expeditious mode than that proposed with reference to this matter. But I am bound to admit, looking to the past proceedings of the House, and so far as I have been able to examine or learn of them, that the course which the Government have taken is that which has heretofore been followed in similar cases. A Committee has been appointed. That Committee has already sat, and its sittings will be continued next week. Evidence will be taken in a few days, and the whole matter, so far as it can be discovered, will be laid before the House, and I have great confidence that during that time the question will be more discussed in the country, and more reflected upon in the House. If it should happen that the Committee should report that the course taken by the House of Lords has infringed upon the just, recognized, and constitutional rights of the House of Commons, I confess I should feel ashamed of being a Member of this House if I thought that a large majority of the Members of it would not take such steps as may appear right for the purpose of resisting any such infringement of their privileges and their rights. I do not think that we could commit a greater treason to every branch of the Legislature, to the Crown, to the Commons, and to the House of Lords itself, than to permit a matter of this kind to be passed over as if it were of no importance, and I think the posterity of the existing generation of Englishmen would have reason to look back—with contempt, I will say—upon the Parliament of 1860, if it did not thoroughly sift this question to the bottom, and act in accordance with the principles of the constitution in the defence of those right and liberties, if we find that they have been in any degree assailed.

RELATIONS WITH PERSIA.

RETURN OF SIR HENRY RAWLINSON.

QUESTION.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR, in rising to ask for an explanation of the circumstances under which Sir Henry Rawlinson had resigned or been recalled from the post of Her Majesty's Minister to the Court of Persia, said that it would be in the recollection of the House that that gentleman had been appointed by the Government which preceded that of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, and he had given up a very lucrative appointment on the Indian Council, to proceed, as it was understood, at the special request of the Government, to Persia, where affairs were then in great disorder. It was, consequently, with infinite amazement he read a few days ago that Sir Henry Rawlinson was coming back from Persia, and that his successor had been already appointed. It was believed that the cause was that Sir Henry Rawlinson differed from the policy which Her Majesty's Government wished to carry out in Persia, and had declared that if the old and unwise course characterized as "the bullying policy," which had failed so completely on former occasions, were persevered in, he should be obliged to send in his resignation. It was also rumoured that no answer had been vouchsafed to his despatch, but that directions were at once telegraphed to Mr. Alison at Constantinople to take his place. Looking to the difficulties which had recently arisen, to our relations with Persia from the beginning of the present century, and to the important strides which Russia was making in the East, this question assumed a very grave character. The favourable impression created in Persia by the embassy of Sir John Malcolm and the men who accompanied him—all officers of promise, who afterwards attained the highest stations in their respective departments—still existed in that country. At that time, and down to the year 1835, the selection of officers was made by the Governor-General of India and the Indian authorities, and during that period they had never had a single difference with Persia, and the British name was respected in that quarter. In 1836, however, the Whig Government of the day transferred the control of Persian affairs from the Indian department to the Foreign Office. In two years afterwards the Affghanistan war broke out. Within three years the British Minister, Sir John M'Neill, struck his flag for the first time in Persia, and ever since there had been a succession of embittering quarrels and disgraceful petty disputes. In 1846, when he visited Persia, all the English residents lamented the loss of British influence and the extent to which our Embassy had deteriorated; and he himself found it pleasanter to travel as a Russian than as an Englishman, the British name, during the time that Colonel Shiel was there, not being much respected. But, although the British Embassy at Teheran then exercised very little influence either over the Court or the people of Persia, he found that one Englishman had left such a name among every class of Persian society that a letter from him would have been a passport throughout the whole of Persia. That gentleman was Major Rawlinson, of Bagdad, who was supposed to be gifted with almost supernatural powers, as he could dispute with the Mollahs of Ispahan, could write and speak the Persian tongue, was deeply skilled in the political learning of that country, and had filled with credit the highest posts during a disastrous war. It was due to his singular qualities and deep knowledge of the country that during the insurrection in Cabul the province of Candahar and the southern portion of Affghanistan were preserved intact. He was not guilty of exaggeration when he stated that there was no European who had made such an impression on the population of Persia, and that not merely on the learned societies or the higher and polished classes, which had been aptly called "the French of the East," but his influence extended to the wild chiefs of Koordistan, who respected him as the best shot and the boldest rider they had ever seen. When he went into their district, in which scarcely a European had before set foot, he was able to tell the genealogy of each chief, and possessed an intimate acquaintance with the customs and early history of the inhabitants. From hearing so much of him in 1846 he was led to ride all the way to Bagdad for the purpose of visiting this wonderful man, and the beginning of a friendship was then laid which he was happy to say had lasted till the present time. Colonel Shiel had remained in Persia from 1846 till 1853, and, although a Company's officer, pursued a totally different policy from his predecessors appointed under the Company's administration; he shut himself out from the Persians and carried on that bullying policy which in too many instances it was unfortunately the habit of England to adopt towards weak nations. On the return of Colonel Shiel at the outbreak of the Russian war in 1854, his successor might have been chosen from men who had served with distinction in Affghanistan or in India, and it was of the utmost importance that the credit of the British name should be maintained in Persia. What, therefore, must have been the astonishment of every one to find Mr. Thompson selected as the Chargé d'Affaires? During the crisis of the Russian war, notwithstanding the opportunity which Persia, from her position on the borders of Russia, had of hampering that great empire, no effort was made to obtain her assistance—we had not even at the time a Minister at Teheran. At that period he gave notice of a Motion, but believing that he did not possess sufficient influence with the House he had not ventured to bring it forward; but seeing what had been the result of the course taken by the Government, and fearing that a similar rule in the selection of officers was again about to be acted on, he felt unable any longer to abstain from the discharge of his duty in calling the attention of the House to a policy which had caused a vast expenditure of blood and money, and might do so again. During the early part of the Russian war England had only a Chargé d'Affaires at Teheran, who, notwithstanding his personal character, never possessed the smallest influence, and, consequently, during the period of his stay in Persia was a mere cipher, while Russia was successful in carrying out her designs. But the example of British Envoys who had gone before was strictly followed in quarrelling about small matters and in striking his flag on the question of protecting a Persian usurer, who was said to be a British subject. At last a Minister was chosen; but instead of being a gentleman thoroughly acquainted with the country, he was a man who had never before set foot in Persia, and was best known to the public by his work on North American Indians. Mr. Murray was selected for the post, though men like Sir H. Rawlinson or Major Edwardes, thoroughly conversant with Eastern diplomacy, could have been procured. It was true that Mr. Murray had smoked a pipe for a short time with Mehemet Ali in Egypt; but no acquaintance with Egypt, where European States are so powerful and Mahomedans so weak, could fit him for a post like that in Persia, where the power of western civilization is not directly felt, and an Ambassador, having to rely on his own resources, requires an intimate acquaintance with the habits, customs, and modes of thought of the people. In a crisis like the Russian war, looking to the pressure which Russia naturally exercises on Persia, the Ambassador chosen by the British Ministry ought not to have been a person who had then to make his first essay in the difficult diplomacy of Central Asia, but one who, like Sir Henry Rawlinson or Colonel Edwardes, was already thoroughly experienced in those matters. The result necessarily was that before he had been six months in Persia, Mr. Murray had quarrelled fully a dozen times with the authorities. Mr. Murray had begun his mission by setting about teaching the Persian King and the Persian people the rules and customs of their own country; and nobody could read the despatches written after his appointment without seeing how unfit he was to fill the position which he occupied. He quarrelled with the Shah and his Ministers because the husband of the sister of the Shah's wife was not allowed to be the agent of the British Embassy and to go to Shiraz; and hence had arisen those miserable disputes which gave rise to that ill-feeling between England and Persia for which we had to pay so dearly. Mr. Murray had, however, eventually struck his flag, and the matter had at last got into the hands of an able man—Lord Stratford; the result being that the Persian Envoy had not been at Constantinople six weeks before that nobleman had obtained at the hands of the Persian Government what England, through the medium of Mr. Murray, had failed to secure. We had spent £3,000,000 sterling on the Persian war, nominally because Persia would not give up Herat; but we were informed by our own Envoy at Teheran that the object of seizing that city was to give it up to England in order to purchase peace. When, however, we were squandering the best blood of the nation in prosecuting that war, we seemed to have altogether forgotten that the Shah of Persia was the head of the Sheah sect of Mussulmans, who constituted one-seventh of the population of India, and who regarded him with the same sort of veneration as members of the Roman Catholic persuasion did the Pope. The consequence had been, as was shown by the evidence taken on the trial of the King of Delhi, that he had disseminated proclamations throughout India, and that the combustible matter which existed in that country had ultimately been set on fire. Mr. Murray, when he went back to Teheran, was told that if any proclamations from Persia were found to exist in India, it must be borne in mind that they had been issued during the war, and that the Government of Persia, peace having been concluded, were ready to lend their aid to destroy, as far as possible, the effect of those proclamations. He (Mr. D. Seymour) believed that the thanks of the Foreign Office had been sent out to the Persian Prime Minister for his candour in making that statement to Mr. Murray. Now, seeing the discontent which the conduct of Mr. Murray had excited in Persia, he was of opinion that Sir H. Rawlinson had been most justly and sagaciously selected by the Government of the Earl of Derby to bring about a better state of things. The result of that appointment had been that in a very brief space of time England began to be as much respected as ever in Persia; the favour in which Sir H. Rawlinson was held being so great that the Shah jocularly called him his Prime Minister. At a moment, however, when he was getting on so well he was removed.

It might, indeed, be said that he was incurring too great an expense; but when it was considered that we had been paying Dost Mahomed at Cabul £10,000 a month for the last few years, it might well be doubted whether, if Sir H. Rawlinson asked a few thousands a month to make the customary presents in Persia, the money ought not to be regarded as well laid out. He should, under those circumstances, wish to ascertain from the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs what policy he proposed to carry out in Persia, and to what cause the recall of Sir H. Rawlinson was to be attributed. He had been informed that the moment Major Taylor and the other Commissioners left Herat, after the treaty had been signed, almost all the stipulations which it contained had become a dead letter there. The Shah had proceeded to coin money in his own name, and to do other acts in defiance of the provisions of the treaty, notwithstanding that we had made war in order that Herat should be independent. He knew that Afghanistan was in a precarious position, Dost Mahomed being an old man; but he would entreat the noble Lord to follow out in its case and in that of Persia the policy which he desired to pursue with respect to the Italians—namely, to allow them to manage their own affairs in their own way. The sound way of acquiring influence in Afghanistan was by means of commerce, which was daily on the increase. He should conclude by asking the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to lay upon the Table of the House Papers relating to Sir Henry Rawlinson's recall or resignation.

ENGLISH ARTISANS IN FRENCH DOCK-YARDS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. H. B. JOHNSTONE called attention to the fact of some hundreds of English artisans leaving our dockyards for the purpose of obtaining employment at Cherbourg, where it was reported that they were paid much higher wages than they received in this country. In the absence of the noble Lord, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, he would defer the consideration of the question until Monday.

CAPTAIN SAUNDERS AND THE BARQUE "CHIN-CHIN."—QUESTIONS

MR. WYLD said, he would beg to ask the noble Lord, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, if the Government have been informed by the Governor of Hong Kong of the trial, at the Supreme Court, of Captain Saunders, of the British barque Chin-Chin, for the murder of one of the crew of the Custom-house Boats in the Port of Swatow, and if there is any objection to lay the despatch upon the Table of the House? At the solicitation of Lord Elgin, Englishmen were appointed foreign Inspectors at some of the Chinese ports. At the port of Swatow Mr. Lane acted in that capacity, and held a commission from Commissioner How. The barque Chin-Chin was lying in the port, and in the middle of the night some of the Custom-house officers demanded to be admitted on board. Captain Saunders, thinking that the parties demanding admission might in reality be pirates, refused their request; and told them that if they persisted in boarding, he should resist. They did so; he resisted, and one of the Chinese officers was killed. Captain Saunders was tried on the charge of murder, but was acquitted; but the owners of the vessel had taken an action against Mr. Lane, the Chinese Commissioner, for the damage done to the barque. This showed the inconvenience of having Englishmen to act in such a capacity. He might add, that he thought that if the noble Lord had given more consideration to the question he had ventured to put to him on a former evening, he would not have given the answer he did.

ITALY.—TORTURE IN SICILY. QUESTION.

MR. DUDLEY FORTESCUE said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is in possession of any information confirmatory of certain statements made in a Pamphlet recently published in Paris, and quoted in The Economist Newspaper of Saturday last, relative to the proceedings of the Police Authorities in Sicily; and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay such information upon the Table of the House? The House was, no doubt, aware of the barbarous treatment endured by Neapolitan prisoners, in utter violation of law and justice. The despatches of our own Minister at Naples described how persons of every age and condition of life were dragged from their homes, and thrust into prison, where they languished for years without inquiry, until all recollection of their cases had passed away, and no record remained of the circumstances under which they were apprehended. They were aware, too, that the director of police at Naples exercised an almost despotic sway; and that every commissary under him had his own peculiar species of torture, to which he subjected those whom he might think proper to arrest. Recently a Pamphlet had been published in Paris which threw light on some of these atrocities. He had not been able to provide himself with a copy; but an extract from it had appeared in The Economist of last Saturday, which he would read.

"Every commissary, every gaoler," says M. De La Varenne, "has his own method of applying torture. It is revolting to come to details, but they are unhappily exact and confirmed by official authority. The famous Pontillo owes his reputation to the species of torture which he applies in his own Commissariat. He makes the victim sit down in a railed arm-chair, set with razor blades, under which is placed a pan of burning coals. The inspector, Louis Maniscalco, the namesake of the General Director, applies to the accused little iron hands provided with a closing screw. This is called, in the language of the police, 'the angelic instrument.' The gaoler, Bruno, belonging to the Police Commissariat of the odious Carrega (there is a prison in each Commissariat), strips the victim of his clothes and binds his head between his legs. Others employ the torture of the tour-niquet, drawing a cord with a stick inserted in it tight round the head of the accused till the eyes start out of the head and the skin cracks. Others have recourse to starvation, to blows, to the privation of light and of breatheable air. But the one satellite of the Director General who outstrips all the others is the notorious Captain Chinnici, a robber by profession, and now an officer of police, and rich proprietor. Sent by Maniscalco into the town of Nicosia, in order to discover the assassin of a certain Gorgone (a captain of this district, killed in consequence of incredible excesses of ferocity), from among thirty individuals, thrown into prison on the vaguest suspicion of complicity in this crime, Chinnici chose two, at hazard, to make an example of them, and to slake his thirst for torment. These two unfortunates were Rosario Chimera, and Pizzolo. They underwent the most atrocious tortures, such as the 'silence-hood,' the 'angelic instrument,' hunger, the bastinado in excess, without choosing to confess an action which they had never committed. The police agent then got hold of the wife of Chimera, a young and beautiful woman, twenty-two years old. After heaping on her the most horrible violence, he caused her to be tied naked on a bench, and gave her up to the brutality of his men. She remained there three days in this state, without food, till, half dead, the unhappy woman deposed that her husband had formerly said that he would 'kill the Captain Gorgone.' This evidence, extorted in this manner, is immediately received by a judge sent for the purpose, and Chinnici, delighted at having got his first piece of evidence, returns to the dungeon of the two wretches to tell them the confession of Chimera's wife; and as they persist in their denials, he has recourse, this time to a torture of such monstrous obscenity that it is im-

BRITISH TRADE IN CHINA.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BUCHANAN said, before the noble Lord replied to the question put to him by the hon. Member for Bodmin (Mr. Wyld) he wished to allude to the appointment of foreign inspectors in the Chinese ports. Now, as it seemed that we were to have another war with China, which he trusted would soon be followed by peace, it was more necessary than ever that British affairs in China should be put on such a footing as would meet with the approval of the British subjects resident there. From what fell from the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary a few evenings since, he seemed to think that there was a perfect concurrence and unanimity in this country in regard to the well working of the present system of inspectorship, but that was by no means the case. He was aware that some persons thought it the best one, but there were very many strong arguments against it. It was certainly a most anomalous state of things that foreign merchants should collect the revenues of another Power and should hand over to its Treasury the funds that might be employed in carrying on hostilities against their own country. He would also call the attention of the noble Lord to the position of Hong Kong. At the present moment that port was a free port; but if this country was to persist in establishing a cordon of Custom-house ports along the whole coast of China, what would be the result as regards our own possessions? Why we should be actually doing our best to destroy the interest of the British establishments in that quarter, and the large amount of British property invested in Hong Kong. It was almost impossible that a complete organization of those Custom-house ports could take place. He doubted whether the Treaty powers would cordially co-operate in that arrangement. The French certainly had but little interest in it either way; but it was the opinion of those connected with the Chinese trade, that the Americans were very unwilling that the system should be adopted. At Shanghai they had declined to become joint assessors, and at Canton had also raised difficulties, in fact, had refused altogether. At Swatow the same objections were raised. He could not, therefore, conceive it possible that a full system of Custom-houses, with European inspectorship, could be introduced along the coast of China. But if it were not a complete system, the duties would be charged only at the regular ports, and smuggling would be encouraged at other points to the detriment of legitimate trade. He certainly hoped that the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office would give the subject his full consideration, and take the opinion of those who were most competent to form one, before adopting the system as if it were universally approved of.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he wished to say a few words in consequence of the disparaging remarks which the hon. Member for Poole had made against a deserving public servant. In the course of his historical sketch of our relations with Persia the hon. Member came to the name of Mr. Murray, and asked who he was, at the same time answering his own question by saying that he was a gentleman known to the public only through his having written a work upon North America.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR: I said he was best known to the public by that work—not that he was known only by it.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, that neither of these disparaging descriptions was justified by Mr. Murray's previous career. Mr. Murray was a gentleman of extreme ability, talent, and energy, who had filled several situations of trust and responsibility, and he had always discharged his duties in a manner that gave complete satisfaction to those who appointed him. Was the hon. Member not aware that Mr. Murray was for a considerable period Consul General at Cairo—an office of very great importance, which brought him in direct connection with Constantinople, and commanded the key to all that was going on both in Persia and India? Than such a situation there could be no better training school for the high diplomatic employment which that gentleman had since obtained. By his acquirements as a linguist Mr. Murray was also eminently qualified for the position he had held. With respect to the transactions connected with the late war with Persia, his conduct might or might not have been prudent. The matter had, however, been fully sifted in that House at the time when the hon. Member for Poole was himself in office; and, as the hon. Member did not then raise his voice against these transactions, he left it to be inferred that they had his fullest approval. Having had the privilege of Mr. Murray's acquaintance for thirty years, he trusted the House would excuse the few observations he had made.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH, as a personal friend of Mr. Murray, also wished to say a single word in his behalf. (Cries of "Spoke" when the hon. Gentleman resumed his seat.)

THE CHRISTIANS IN TURKEY.

QUESTION.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD: The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary has so many very important questions to answer as to affairs in different parts of the world, that I would have postponed the inquiry which I now wish to address to him had it not been intimated that this would be a convenient opportunity for giving the House some information on the subject to which I am about to call his attention. A question was some time ago asked in this House by the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. John Locke) with reference to an incident that took place at St. Petersburg. The statement made was that the Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs had called together the Ministers representing England, France, Austria and Prussia, omitting the representative of the Sultan, and had expressed to them the opinion of the Imperial Government that the time had come when representations ought to be made to the Turkish Government with reference to the condition of the Christian subjects of the Porte, and more particularly with respect to the fulfilment of the promise given by the Sultan for the enforcement of the Hatti-Humayoun in favour of the Christians. When we remember what for a length of years has been the policy of the Russian Government with reference to that subject, and particularly when we recollect that it was a question with regard to it which gave rise to the Russian war, I think that the adoption of such a course as this by the Russian Government is an incident calculated to cause anxiety to all who are watching the course of events abroad. It becomes a matter of still greater moment when we recollect that the interference suggested by Prince Gortschakoff is hostile not only to the spirit, but even to the letter of the treaty of peace by which the Russian war was concluded. In reference to a matter of so much gravity it is important that we should know, not in the loose manner in which it was stated some time ago, but precisely and definitively, exactly what the communication of the Russian Government was. I wish to know from the noble Lord exactly the terms in which this communication was made to the Ministers of the Four Powers by Prince Gortschakoff at St. Petersburg. I should also be glad to know whether that communication has been repeated to him by the representative of the Russian Government in this country, and, if so, whether it was repeated in writing, and what were the exact terms in which it was made. The next point to which I wish to call the attention of the noble Lord is one of not less importance—namely, the course which it is said has been pursued, or is likely to be pursued, by the French Government with reference to the same question. This, I know, is delicate ground, and I will therefore not discuss the question whether it is probable that such a communication would have been made by the Russian Government unless there had been some understanding between the Imperial Courts in the first instance; but I cannot forget that not very long ago Prince Gortschakoff stated that it was possible that engagements—written engagements—might subsist between the Court of France and that of St. Petersburg, but that all that he could undertake to say was, that no English interests were menaced by those engagements. I only allude to this because it marks the extreme importance of our knowing exactly the course which the French Government have pursued, or propose to pursue, with reference to this delicate question. I shall therefore be glad to hear from the noble Lord whether he has had any correspondence with the French Government on the subject, and of what nature that correspondence has been, so far as he feels himself at liberty to communicate it. When a question was asked of the noble Lord with reference to this subject a short time ago by the hon. Member for Southwark, he stated that the Minister for Foreign Affairs at Paris, M. Thouvenel, had expressed an opinion, that if any such representation was made at Constantinople it ought to be made by the Five Powers, and not by Russia alone, as the adoption of the latter course might place that Power in the position which she occupied before the war, of claiming to be the protectress of the Christian subjects of the Porte. I will only remark that I cannot but think that such an interference as that on the part of the Five Powers would be quite as contrary to the spirit and letter of the Treaty of Paris as the original proposition made by Prince Gortschakoff. I wish further to ask the noble Lord whether he has communicated upon this subject with the Courts of Austria and Prussia, and whether he feels himself at liberty to state the views entertained by those Courts upon this question. My next question is the most important of all. It is whether the noble Lord can inform us what answer he has thought it his duty to return to the proposition made by Prince Gortschakoff to the English Government. It is possible that the noble Lord may not think himself at liberty to communicate the exact nature of that answer, and, if so, I should be the last person to press him unduly for it. This, however, I think I may say, that there are two points upon which it is most desirable that the noble Lord should either here or in his despatch express a decided opinion. One is that Prince Gortschakoff suggested, that a representation should be made by the Five Powers to the Turkish Government with reference to the policy of the Sultan as to the enforcement of the Hatti Humayoun, is contrary both to the letter and to the spirit of the Treaty of Paris. On another point, also, I should be glad that the noble Lord should express a decided opinion. A proposition has been made that this question should be investigated by the Five Powers through the medium of their consular agents in the East. Now, I know that it was the opinion of the late Government, and is that of those whose experience of Turkish affairs give every weight to their opinion, that no more dangerous course could be adopted than one which would afford encouragement to the consular agents of the European Powers to act in such a manner as would interfere greatly with the prestige of the Turkish authorities in the internal arrangements of Turkey itself. That is the opinion of our representative at Constantinople, and I have good reason to know that he has expressed that opinion in the strongest manner to our consular agents throughout the Turkish Empire; and I should very much regret that the sanction of the noble Lord should be given to any proposition whatever by which the consular agents of the various European powers should be encouraged to make these inquiries as to the condition of the Christian population, and should thus be placed in a position to destroy the prestige of the Turkish authorities, and to interfere with the arrangements of Turkey in a manner which would be conducive neither to our interests nor to those of the Ottoman Empire. There is only one other subject to which I wish to call the noble Lord's attention. There is, I am aware, in the Foreign Office a despatch, written either by Mr. Alison, during the time that he was Chargé d'Affaires at Constantinople, or by Sir H. Bulwer, with reference to the fulfilment of the Hatti Humayoun. In that despatch it is pointed out how far the Hatti Humayoun has been carried out, in what respect it would be beneficial that further advances should be made in that direction, and how some portions would be rather more hostile than favourable to the interests of the Christian population; and there is also in it a statement of the difficulties which the Turkish Government would have to encounter in carrying out the promise which they gave to the Powers in the Treaty of Paris. I should like to know whether the noble Lord will feel himself at liberty to place that most valuable document upon the table of the House along with any other correspondence upon this subject.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I will endeavour to answer the various questions—and they certainly are very various—which have been addressed to me; and, perhaps, if I should omit to answer any of the inquiries which have been made by the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, he will have the goodness to remind me of it before I conclude my observations.

The first question, relating to Persia, was put to me by my hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. D. Seymour), and is connected with another which was asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard (Mr. B. Osborne). In the first place, I should say that the story which my hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. D. Seymour) has heard, that there were differences of opinion between Her Majesty's Government and Sir Henry Rawlinson as to the policy to be pursued in Persia, and that in consequence Sir Henry Rawlinson has been recalled, is altogether fabulous. Sir Henry Rawlinson is a very able man, and exceedingly well acquainted with the East. The influence which he exercised in Persia was very considerable, his policy was entirely approved by Her Majesty's Government, and I was in hopes that he would have continued to discharge the functions of Her Majesty's Minister in Persia. The cause of his return is that to which my hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard (Mr. B. Osborne) alluded. My noble Friend at the head of the Government, on finding that the affairs of Persia had been committed to the Secretary of State for India, inquired of my right hon. Friend (Sir C. Wood) and myself what we thought of that arrangement. We both said that we were ready to abide by his judgment, and either to continue the arrangement as it stood when he took office, or change it. My noble Friend, after taking some time for consideration, said that he thought the chief part of the business in Persia, though there is other business, no doubt, connected with India, was to settle and carry on the relations between Persia and this country and Russia. That certainly is the case so far as my experience goes. Questions do arise between this country and Persia, and between Persia and Russia, and if there is a question between Persia and Russia, the English Minister is asked his opinion upon it; and whenever there is a question between Persia and England, the Russian Minister is consulted. My noble Friend, therefore, came to the decision that it was better that the Persian mission should again be placed under the Foreign Office. I accepted that responsibility, and I was then certainly in hopes that Sir Henry Rawlinson would have remained in charge of that mission. Not long after the intelligence that the change was about to be made had reached Persia, however, a gentleman in the Foreign Office informed me that he had received a private letter from Sir Henry Rawlinson, telling him that as soon as the change was officially announced—and the official announcement had at that time gone out—he should resign his office and come home. I do not know that I should fairly represent his objections if I attempted to do so; but I believe that they turned chiefly upon the difference between the mode of conducting business in the India and in the Foreign Offices, and one of them certainly referred to the greater latitude allowed by the former in giving presents, which had never been permitted by the Foreign Office. After a time, Sir Henry Rawlinson informed me by a private letter that he had sent in his resignation, and at the same time I received his formal resignation of his office. I did not think it was desirable that he should remain in Persia after it was known that he was about to resign, and I, therefore, immediately advised Her Majesty to accept the resignation of Sir Henry Rawlinson, and to appoint in his place a gentleman

whom I have never had the good fortune to see, and with whom I have no acquaintance whatever, but a gentleman who has been long in the diplomatic service in the East, whose despatches (when he has been in charge of the Embassy at Constantinople) and Reports I have often had occasion to receive, and whose intelligence I have admired—Mr. Alison. The hon. Gentleman will, therefore, see that Sir Henry Rawlinson has not been recalled—that he sent in his own resignation, and that for reasons which, although satisfactory to his own mind, I cannot but regret, he no longer serves the Queen in Persia. Our Persian policy is easily explained, and it has none of the characteristics attributed to it by the hon. Gentleman. It is to maintain the integrity and independence of Persia, but at the same time to recommend the Persian Government not to make aggressions upon other independent States. To that advice the Persian Envoy here has willingly assented, and the relations between the Shah of Persia and Her Majesty are of the most friendly nature. There is no question which we wish to press upon the Persian Government, or to coerce them about. Our interest is merely to maintain their authority, and to give them such advice when we are asked as may conduce to the maintenance of their independence. There is, however, one point upon which our opinion may perhaps be deemed peculiar. It is natural there should be and from time to time there has been a sort of rivalry between Great Britain and Russia in Persia. The effect of this has been that the supporters of Great Britain have always some story of oppression on the part of Russia, and those who are in favour of the Russian interest are in the habit of going to the Minister and even to the Sovereign, and informing them of some misdeed on the part of Great Britain. I confess I have thought it best to discourage that rivalry, and when I have had occasion to write to St. Petersburg, and to speak to the Russian Minister here I have always said that, provided we found Russia maintaining the independence of Persia, we were quite willing to join with her in giving the same advice; that we had no interest in Persia specially directed against Russia; that our only object was to support the Persian Government, which was always weak, and often threatened with internal dissensions; and that we trusted Russia would act in the same spirit with us. The answers we have received from Russia have tended to show the same disposition, and therefore we have every reason to believe that the course of the Persian Government will in future be more equable than it has sometimes been.

The next two questions relate to China. I am informed that no despatch has been received at the Colonial Office with respect to the trial of Captain Saunders for murder. With regard to the appointment of inspectors, I am inclined to think that the hon. Member for Glasgow supposes that I have given a more distinct and decided approbation of that arrangement than I intended to give. It certainly is a very anomalous system that foreigners should be put in the collection of the revenue of China; but the Earl of Elgin and others have said that there is a great deal of bribery and favouritism in the Chinese Custom-houses, and that the appointment of a few foreign inspectors would tend to put an end to many abuses and give greater confidence to merchants. I have not given to the new system that decided and unqualified approbation which the hon. Member for Glasgow, Mr. Buchanan supposes, but I think it is one which ought to be tried, and that in the meantime we should refrain from approving or condemning the system.

An hon. Gentleman (Mr. D. Fortescue) has asked me some questions with respect to Sicily. He must be aware that the pamphlet which has been published is one to which we can give no authority. It rests entirely upon the responsibility of the gentleman who has put his name to it; but I am sorry to say there are in the Foreign Office reports from our Consuls—two or three in 1857, one which I hold in my hand dated the 24th of July, 1859, and some others—giving an account of cruelties, and even of torture, practised by the police of Sicily. The subject is a very painful one, and I do not wish to go through the details of it; but there are accounts given by our Consuls of men who have come themselves and stated to our representatives that their wrists had been fastened together, that they had been gagged with an instrument called the “cap of silence,” and that they had suffered various other inflictions which may be properly described as torture. I have no doubt that these things, together with other circumstances, have brought Sicily to its present state—a state, let me add, which to those who have known what the Government of the King of the two Sicilies has been for some time past cannot be at all surprising.

I now come to the very important questions which have been asked by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Horsham (Mr. S. FitzGerald). Perhaps the best way of answering those questions will be to give a complete account of what has taken place at St. Petersburg and elsewhere with respect to the affairs of Turkey. The hon. Gentleman has alluded to what took place at the end of May. But before that, at the end of April, the Minister for Foreign Affairs at St. Petersburg, Prince Gortschakoff, informed the Turkish Ambassador at the Court of Russia that the accounts which were received from the different Christian provinces under the Sultan, especially from Roumelia, Bulgaria, and Bosnia, showed such sufferings and at the same time such exasperation on the part of the Christian subjects of the Porte as might lead to an insurrection, and he added that if an insurrection should take place, and if it should produce massacre on the part of the Turkish troops, the Emperor of Russia would not remain a tranquil spectator of events. The Turkish Ambassador immediately sent an account of this conversation to Constantinople. A few days after that intimation a despatch was written to Paris to the same effect, and on the 5th of May the Ministers of the Five Powers were assembled at the office of Prince Gortschakoff, in St. Petersburg. Prince Gortschakoff began by making the same statement which he had made to the Turkish Ambassador and written to Paris. After a good deal of discussion three propositions were drawn up by the French Minister in the presence of the meeting, and were so far agreed to that the different Ministers said they would send them to their respective Courts. The first of these propositions was that the present state of the Christian provinces in Turkey had become intolerable; the second, that an inquiry should be made, such inquiry to be conducted by the officers of the Sultan, assisted by the Consuls of the five Powers; and the third, that the Hatti-Humayoun having failed in securing to the Christian subjects of the Porte that toleration and tranquillity which it was intended to produce, it would be necessary to have a new organization for the government of the Christian provinces. Nothing, it will be seen, could be more important than these different propositions. After receiving them we said, with respect to the first, that Her Majesty's Government had not received any such accounts as entitled them to say that the present state of the Christian provinces was intolerable. The House is aware that we can at no time speak with any great approbation of the Government of the Sultan in the interior of his dominions. We can hardly speak of it much more favourably than we can of the government of the King of the Two Sicilies; but, at the same time, we have no accounts showing to us that there has been that which the Government of Russia has from old times always laid peculiar stress upon—misgovernment and oppression, especially as regards the Christian subjects of the Porte. I have not only read carefully the different reports which have been received, but I have conversed with persons who have come from the Christian provinces of Turkey, and who have been engaged in the service of Her Majesty in one capacity or another, and they have invariably said to me that it is impossible to praise or to defend the details of the Turkish Government, but that the Christian subjects of the Porte are not the victims of any peculiar oppression; that their Mahomedan countrymen are quite as great sufferers from the irregularity of the Government. With respect to the third proposition, that of a new organization of the Government of those provinces, we said it was quite impossible we could agree, whether with reference to general principles or with reference to the Treaty of Paris of 1856, to a new organization of the Turkish empire. The House will recollect that the 7th Article of the Treaty of Paris guarantees and respects the integrity and independence of the Turkish empire. The 8th Article declares that if at any time dissension should arise between the Sublime Porte and any one of the Powers who signed the Treaty with respect to the interpretation of its articles, which might threaten a disturbance of pacific relations, neither the Sublime Porte nor that Power should have recourse to arms without endeavouring to obtain the mediation of the other Powers for the purpose of procuring a peaceful settlement of the difference. The 9th Article records that the communication of the Hatti-Humayoun is the spontaneous act of the Sultan, and goes on specially to declare that the contracting Powers acknowledging the importance of that communication record them, understanding that in no case it gives to the Powers the right to interfere collectively or respectively in the relations between the Sultan and his subjects, or in the internal administration of his territory. Now, the treaty being so positive in that respect, nothing but extreme urgency, insurrection, or the determination of a foreign Power, in spite of the treaty, to take the part of the insurgents and make war on the Sultan, would, I think, justify the other Powers of Europe in at all interfering in the internal government of Turkey; but, on the other hand, after such a declaration on the part of so great a Power as Russia, having, as we know, so much influence with the Christian subjects of the Sultan, which not only she does not disavow but has always professed and boasted that she holds, it would not be prudent to remain aloof and say that we do not concern ourselves upon that matter. We, therefore, consulted with other Powers, and at the same time expressed our own opinion that while we could not consent to the first and third proposition, yet it might be proper to make inquiry with respect to the present state and government of the Sultan's Christian provinces; but that that inquiry ought to be made by the government of the Sultan himself. The Austrian Government, in the same spirit, said that their object was to maintain the independence and integrity of Turkey, and, at the same time to procure, by their influence and by that of the other Powers, a remedy for grievances which tend to provoke resistance and insurrection. The answer given by Prussia was not very different, though, not having consuls and agents spread through Turkey, she declared that she required further consideration before expressing her opinion as to the present state of the Christian provinces of Turkey. The Government of France has appealed to us to know what is our opinion on the subject, and M. Thouvenel stated that from his personal knowledge of Turkey he was aware that very great abuses and misgovernment prevailed there, and he thought that remedies might be pointed out which, while they provided securities for the European subjects of the Sultan, would give greater strength and stability to the Turkish Government. The opinion of a man of his ability and experience in Turkish matters must be allowed to have weight in the consideration of any remedies. At the same time he declared that any inquiry that should be made ought to be made with the greatest regard to the authority of the Sultan, and ought not to have the appearance in the slightest degree of impairing or shaking the Sultan's authority. Our opinion with respect to that point is of the same kind. We said that if it appeared to the Sultan that the Consuls or other Agents of the Christian Powers, might participate in the inquiry, we should be ready to take that view, but that if the Sultan, on the other hand, thought they could not participate in the inquiry without diminishing his authority, we were not ready to press a point of that kind upon an independent Sovereign whose authority we wished to maintain and were bound to support. Sir H. Bulwer, whose influence I must say here, by way of parenthesis, has always been exerted with the wish to maintain the authority of the Sultan, and increase the welfare of the people of Turkey, who has always, in my opinion, taken the most judicious means to effect those purposes, and by the mode in which he has given his advice, has obtained great influence with all the Turkish Ministers who have been successively in power, thought it was advisable to have the inquiry, but to have it by means of the Sultan's own officers. There has lately been a change in the Turkish Government. Redschid Pasha, who formerly held the office of Grand Vizier, is reinstated in that position; and the French Minister at Constantinople advised that the Grand Vizier should in person visit Roumelia, Bulgaria, and other places, with full authority from the Sultan to punish those guilty of outrages and establish such remedial measures as might be calculated to remove the evils complained of. In that advice the British and Russian Ambassadors concurred, and we have yesterday and to-day learned that the measure has been adopted; the Turkish Ambassador having communicated the intelligence that the Sultan willingly adopted the advice which has been tendered, and the Turkish Grand Vizier is to exercise those powers without any control or interference on the part of the Representatives of European States. I conclude that, as the Russian Ambassador has assented to the plan, the Prussian Government will very likely be also ready to assent to it. I cannot say what the effect of the proceeding will be, but it is one which preserves unimpaired and undiminished the authority of the Sultan, and likewise gives hope for the future. Of course, no man would be bold enough to say what may be the future course of the Turkish Government or the future destinies of these Turkish provinces, but I cannot but believe, from all I have observed, that there has been a considerable change of late years and for the better. Sir H. Bulwer declared that since he has known the country there has been a considerable improvement, greater anxiety being shown by the Government for the due execution of justice and the due observance of all the rules of good administration. Still, he was dissatisfied with the present state of things. Though this proposal of the Russian Government at first appeared to contain in it something derogatory to the authority of the Sublime Porte, yet, as at present arranged, I hope there will be no dissension among the Powers of Europe with respect to it; for if ultimately we have to give advice to the Porte I believe we may do so in such a way as not to offend the just pride of an independent Sovereign, and finally that the advice we give and the remedial measures we suggest will be such as to benefit the population, and promote the stability of the Sultan's throne.

TRADE COMBINATIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. HUBBARD said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the renewed agitation of the Metropolitan Operatives for a diminution of the time of labour to nine hours; and whether the Government will be prepared to protect independent labourers against the coercion and violence practised towards them on a former occasion, should similar illegal proceedings be attempted by the men on strike. He had no objection to legitimate combinations carried on by fair means; but the agitation from which the Metropolis had but scarcely recovered was of a different character. It professed to be founded on the circumstance that the introduction of machinery had lessened the demand for manual labour, and instead of offering more labour for the same price the operatives proceeded to offer less; in other words, they demanded ten hours' pay for nine hours' labour. The absurdity of this proposal ensured its failure; but in the attempt to carry it out the society men resorted to coercion and intimidation against the more rational and independent workmen. Workmen who did not join the unions were abused, illtreated, their tools were stolen from them, and in some instances they were compelled, in self-defence, though against their will, to join the forces of the rebellious labourers. That was a state of things which deserved the serious consideration of the Government, and summary means should be taken for the future to protect workmen who wished to maintain their independence. He entertained no distrust of the natural good sense and good feeling of English labourers generally; but the very honesty of their nature made them peculiarly liable to deception by the persons who professed to advise and to guide them. The nature of the rules drawn up for adoption in trade societies was such that no one could be astonished at the results which had developed themselves. The Friendly Society of Masons, for instance, was one of the most powerful and most advanced of these societies; and one would, therefore, expect to find in their rules nothing inconsistent with sound principles of general policy. But in the preface to their rules the following sentence occurred:—

“As no degree of human happiness can possibly exist without society, it is the great principle of the Friendly Society of Operative Masons to bring into force among its members the truly valuable object of self-protecting power against the selfish and unprincipled proceedings of the capitalists.”

Now, when he read an assertion so utterly at variance with common sense, sound principle, and proper feeling, he could not but entertain considerable suspicion as to the rules which were to follow. In point of fact, he found this compilation to be not only a code of Friendly Society's rules to which allegiance might properly be given, but also a code regulating the action and proceedings of the members in all their relations with their masters, and amongst other matters containing a chapter on strikes. These strikes were not only advocated for the purpose of promoting the interests of workmen, but as an instrument of attack on masters when, by their selection of other than Society men, or by giving piecework, they incur the opposition of the Society. He was not surprised that, with such rules before them, workmen were apt to confound the obligations which, as members of the Society, they might properly observe, and those rules which he believed to be most illegal. He ventured to think that some notice should be taken by the Government of the illegality of these documents, seeing that the rules were not certified under the Friendly Societies Act. During the existence of the strike last year, Mr. Potter, the Secretary of the United Trades Association, encouraged the men in their resistance to the authority of the masters by assuring them that, with the exception of the master builders, every person of position, influence, and wealth, sympathized with the operatives. A more unfounded assertion never was made, and it was so far from being true that you could find no man of intelligence, whatever might be his position, who did not entirely condemn proceedings so illegal in their character, so detrimental to the public at large, and so injurious to the prospects of the operatives, and the interests of their suffering families. It seemed that they were about to witness a renewal of those miseries; but he hoped the Government would feel it their duty to interfere to protect honest and rational workmen in carrying their labour where they pleased, and to warn those who, perhaps from ignorance of the law, were, he feared, about to break the law.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: The fact to which the hon. Gentleman has referred—namely, that the building trades of London contemplate a renewal of the strike of last year—is only known to me by the ordinary means of intelligence open to every Member of this House. No communication has been made to the Metropolitan police upon the subject, nor has their assistance been in any way applied for. With regard to the statement which has been made that violence and intimidation were practised in the strike of last year, there is no doubt that it is, to a certain degree, well founded. But the general character of the strike was an abstinence from violent measures. No doubt some exceptions did occur, and I believe some cases were brought before the magistrates. What the results may have been I do not at this moment remember; but I think I am borne out in saying that, considering the length of time during which the strike lasted, and the large number of persons engaged in it, its general character was an abstinence from violent measures. I have inquired of the Commissioners of Police and I am not aware that in any instance they failed to afford assistance when applied to on the part of persons who were threatened or intimidated, and I am also informed that the Commissioners of Police are not aware that any complaints were made of any want of assistance upon their part during the continuance of the strike. I will only say, upon the general question, that I conceive it to be peculiarly the duty of the Executive Government to hold itself perfectly impartial with regard to these unfortunate occurrences, for unfortunate I must consider them. I think experience has shown that the policy of strikes is one which, in the long run, and upon general experience, is eminently disastrous to the working classes themselves; therefore I look upon an occurrence of this sort as disastrous. At the same time I shall feel it my duty, as a Member of the Executive Government to hold the balance with a perfectly even hand between the two contending parties, looking to no other principle than that of maintaining the ascendancy of the law, and of preventing, so far as is in our power, intimidation and violence. Before I sit down I will call attention to the fact that a Committee of this House has been sitting during the present Session upon the state of the law as between masters and workmen. That Committee have made recommendations, one of which is, that a Bill should be brought in to enlarge the facilities for arbitration between masters and men upon the occasion of strikes. I cannot say that I am myself very sanguine of the success of any such measure; but the proposal will come under the consideration of the House, and if any hon. Gentleman has any proposal to make for the Amendment of the existing law, that Bill will afford a favourable opportunity for its consideration.

Motion agreed to. House at rising to adjourn till Monday next.

The Order of the Day being read, for the Committee of Supply;—On Motion that Mr. SPEAKER do now leave the Chair—

THE CHINESE WAR.—QUESTION.

QUESTION.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he would beg leave to ask the Secretary for War, Whether he had any objection to produce an Estimate of the expenses to be incurred in the China war. It was now quite clear that this country was in for a war involving very considerable outlay, and it would be desirable for the information of the House that it should at least have an outline of the expenses, so far as they could be ascertained. There would, he thought, be no difficulty in framing an estimate, giving the probable expenditure on account of the naval and military forces engaged, of transports, stores, the Native forces which would be despatched from India, and the increased pay and allowances to which soldiers and sailors were entitled when serving in that part of the world. There could be nothing more affronting to the House than to ask it to vote vast sums of money without its knowing the manner in which it was to be expended. He wished to know if the right hon. Gentleman had any objection to lay on the table an Estimate of the probable expense of the expedition to China?

THE GUARDS.—QUESTION.

MAJOR STUART KNOX said, he would beg leave to remind the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War that he had omitted to answer the question which he had put on the previous evening, as to whether, when the command of the brigade of Guards fell vacant, it was intended to fill it up again? The right hon. Gentleman, in answering the multiplicity of questions put to him, appeared to have overlooked that.

THE WARRANT OF 1858.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, that he wished to state that, with reference to the Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the defences of the Colonies, he thought that the Government had done injustice to two of the distinguished civilians who had been engaged in that inquiry, namely, Mr. Godley and Mr. Hamilton; their recommendation being that the allowance made by the State should be in proportion to that provided by the colony, and not that the Colonies should be left wholly to their own resources in providing means of defence. He would also urge that the claims of those officers who retired under the general warrant of 1826 upon the captain's half-pay, taking the step in rank, had not been fairly considered. Many of them were still living upon the captain's half-pay, though there was at least an implied pledge in the arrangement under which they retired from active service that they should have the advantages of increased pay as they succeeded to the higher ranks by seniority, equally with their contemporaries.

SYSTEM OF ENLISTMENT.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he wished to call the attention of the Secretary for War to the manner in which recruiting sergeants pursued their avocations. It was said that the British Army was an army of volunteers, but it was the common practice of the persons who were employed as recruiting sergeants to entrap young boys under age and unfit for the service, and under the influence of liquors induce them to enlist. He was acquainted with a case in which one of those persons, who were perpetually wandering about the streets of the Metropolis for the purpose of snapping up volunteers for the army, drugged a youth under sixteen years of age, and induced him to give a false name to the authorities before whom he went to have his enlistment properly attested. The youth was dismissed by the examining surgeon as unfit for the army. Within a few days after, he believed, the same person induced the poor child to submit himself at another depôt for examination, and, he believed, the same surgeon who, six or seven days previously, rejected him as unfit, certified that he was fit for service in the army. He wished to know whether this system of entrapping and drugging youths had the sanction of the Horse Guards and was pursued by all recruiting officers, and whether the army was composed of persons who had been caught by these underhand means. Would the right hon. Gentleman give a guarantee that children who wandered from their parents should not be entrapped into the army by persons who had the sanction of Her Majesty's principal Officers of State?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he had to state, in answer to the hon. Baronet (Sir H. Willoughby), that not only had he no objection to lay an Estimate of the expenses of the War with China on the table, but it would be his duty to do so. It would be necessary to bring forward such an Estimate, as it would be obviously impossible to meet the expenses of the war in which we were unfortunately involved with China without a Parliamentary Vote.

With regard to the question of the hon. and gallant Officer (Major Knox), the facts of the case were these:—Formerly the command of the Brigade of Guards was taken in turns by the field officers in waiting—namely, by the Lieutenant-Colonels of each of the three regiments. That course, no doubt, produced bad results. There was a constant change of hands, and along with it often a change of system. It was represented by Sir Colin Campbell (now Lord Clyde), when Inspector of Infantry, that the officer in command had so little acquaintance with the interior economy of the Guards, that, though he could inspect them on parade, he was not acquainted with their interior financial arrangements, which, as was well known, differed in many respects from other regiments. Therefore, an officer was appointed to command permanently the Brigade, which the House knew was much larger than Brigades usually were commanded by Brigadiers in England. He believed that was the state of the case.

COLONEL LINDSAY said, he rose to explain that the right hon. Gentleman was not quite accurate in his statement. Lord Panmure when at the War Office divided the whole army into brigades, the Guards being constituted a brigade under the command of a brigadier. Sir Frederick Love, who was now the Inspector of Infantry, was the inspector of the troops over the whole country, and he had nothing to do with the internal economy of the regiments.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he apprehended that the duty of the Inspector General of Infantry was to inspect every portion of the infantry of the British army. [Colonel Knox intimated that he never inspected the Guards.] No, but he could; and, in the same way the Inspector of Cavalry had been sent to inspect the Guards. The opinion of Lord Clyde was that, from the peculiar organization of the Guards, there ought to be a Guards' officer to inspect them, and that arrangement was made. What might be done in future he was not prepared to say. It was a subject that must come under the consideration of the military authorities.

The gallant Officer behind him (Colonel Sykes) complained that last night the Report made by the three civilian officers on the Colonial Military Expenditure had been received by the Government in a very unfriendly spirit. - The hon. and gallant Member was not present in the House when he alluded to the subject, and was quite mistaken in supposing that he had mentioned the Report in an unfriendly spirit. He had the highest opinion of the talent of Mr. Godley, who had, he thought, contributed a very valuable paper to the public documents. It had been alleged against the Report of the Committee that it laid down a theoretical principle without any exceptions, but he was not at all certain that this was a departure from the duty of such a Committee, since it was for the Government to consider how far they should apply those principles, and what exceptions should be taken. It was, as he had said, a valuable paper, but there was also much that was valuable in the exceptions taken to that Report by Mr. Elliot, but he should be the last man to undervalue the labours of Mr. Godley. He would not again enter into the case of the officers who retired on half-pay under the general order of 1826. He held the opinion he expressed the previous night, that there were two parties to be considered in the matter. They must look at the terms of the engagement, and he could not read them as the hon. and gallant Gentleman did. If he so read them, he would not hesitate for a moment to acknowledge the bargain, however improvident it might have been. He could not understand that an officer going on half-pay should have, not only all the advantages of full pay, but also advantages which he would not have if he had remained on full pay.

With regard to the last question put by the hon. Member for Dudley (Mr. Sheridan), it was one of very great difficulty. There was no doubt that, although the days of Sergeant Kite were gone by, yet that in many cases young men, in thoughtless and heedless moments, when they were overcome by liquor, entered into engagements which they afterwards repented of. The same thing happened among all classes; but people did not instantly break their bargains. The apprentice, for example, might dislike his trade, and change his mind. Youth was fickle. It resolved hastily, and repented at leisure. Still, they forced the apprentice to abide by the articles of his apprenticeship, and in the same way they forced the soldier, when he had entered, to abide by the terms of his attestation. Whenever a clear case was made out that fraud had been practised he thought it his duty to bring the matter before the Commander-in-Chief. There was a certain sum, the payment of which released a soldier from his engagement, if his regiment was not much below its number. But if, on the other hand, the regiment was much below its complement, and was about to go upon foreign service, then every man was necessarily held to his bargain, for the good of the service and the good of the State. But if there were frauds—and he durst say that on the part of recruiting officers frauds were occasionally committed—there were also frauds on the other side. The best course to be taken in every case where a young man had enlisted with a declaration that he was of a greater age than was really the fact was to prosecute the party for that false declaration. The man who told a lie, too, in the first instance might tell it in the second. In one or two cases certificates of birth had been produced before the Adjutant-general, and had been followed by the release of the soldier, when it afterwards turned out that the certificate of birth belonged to a different person. It was extremely difficult to ascertain the identity of a person from a piece of parchment brought from a distant part of the country. It was the duty of the military authorities to release men when it could be proved they had been enlisted under false pretences; but, on the other hand, persons who had made false declarations ought to be punished. At the same time when a man merely changed his mind there was no sufficient reason why he should not be held to his bargain, if the exigencies of the service required it.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, that the young man to whom he referred was both under age and under size. He should take an early opportunity of bringing the case under the notice of the House.

LORD HOTHAM said, that the principal ground which the hon. Member for Dudley had for complaint was that a person had been enlisted under the proper age. The hon. Gentleman could not be aware of the difficulty of ascertaining the age of recruits. A rule existed that no youth's service should begin to count until he arrived at the age of eighteen. But this regulation was insufficient to check the practice of false declarations of age. The recruiting sergeant had no means of knowing a youth's age, and if a young man appeared to be eighteen, but was only seventeen, how could the sergeant know that he was under age?

COLONEL DICKSON said, that no man was attested until twenty-hours after he was enlisted, and he went for that purpose publicly before a magistrate. He would venture to speak from his own experience, and he believed that such cases as had been described could not occur. He did not believe a magistrate in the country could be found who would attest a person under the circumstances which had been detailed.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he was glad to find that the right hon. Gentleman proposed to give an estimate of the China war. He confessed, however, he did not know on what elements the right hon. Gentleman could frame that estimate. He might give an estimate for the armaments, the cost of transports, and the ammunition; but how he could give an estimate of the cost of the war he could not understand. He hoped he would give a large lump sum and a wide margin. The right hon. Gentleman said that the former system of the field officer in waiting being in command of the brigade had been followed by bad results. He would rather say that the present system had given better results. No troops were in a state of better discipline or had rendered more gallant services than the Guards. He thought the Guards were the finest troops in the world. He would admit, however, that the frequent change of commanding officers did sometimes give unfortunate results. With regard to the complaint made by the hon. Member (Mr. H. B. Sheridan), being an old officer, and having had some thousands of recruits brought under his notice, he did not remember a single instance of a man complaining of having been entrapped into the service. Nor did he think that the practice of drugging was ever had recourse to.

MAJOR PARKER observed that a recruit could within twenty-four hours after his enlistment, if he desired, obtain his release on the payment of a small fine, called the "smart money," and not exceeding £1. It was utterly erroneous to suppose that men were enlisted in a drunken or unconscious state.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he did not think that a case had been made out for the continuance of an Inspector General of the brigade of Guards. The office had only been created about four years, and it was understood at the time that it was created for a certain officer. Those Guards ought to be the most disciplined troops in the world. [Colonel LINDSAY: So they are.] So they ought to be. But there was no reason why they should not be inspected by the same officer as the regiments of the Line. To show how the Guards were favoured above the Line, he would mention that out of the officers who entered the army from the 1st of January, 1841, to 1st of January, 1849, seven battalions of Foot Guards created 43 Lieutenant-colonels, while 164 battalions of the Line created only 28 Lieutenant-Colonels.

Colonel Dickson

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.—ARMY ESTIMATES.

House in Committee of Supply.

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

1. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £387,285, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge of the Miscellaneous Charges of Her Majesty's Land Forces at Home and Abroad, exclusive of India, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1861, inclusive:"

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he hoped the Secretary for War would give the House some information as to the system of providing chargers for the officers of cavalry regiments. Formerly, each officer found his horse on his own responsibility; but under the new system the horse was provided by the Government, the officer paying a fixed price for it. It appeared, however, that the chargers were furnished from the ordinary service horses of the regiment. He thought that a superior class of animals was required for officers, and should be separately contracted for at a higher rate. The miserable deduction from the forage allowance of officers ought not to be continued.

COLONEL KNOX said, he would beg leave to make a few remarks with reference to the dépôt battalions. He was able to say from experience and study that there was but one opinion prevailing with regard to the dépôt system. It was truly said that it was the most vicious and demoralising system that could be adopted. They brought together simultaneously a number of young officers and raw recruits in the same barracks, and it was difficult to bring them under control. Belonging to different regiments, unaccustomed to discipline, and destitute of any esprit de corps, these young men, both officers and privates, inevitably acquired habits which proved in after life seriously detrimental to themselves and the service. He had been told by many commanding officers that they looked with alarm to any young officer who came from a dépôt battalion, because they said, and with justice, that he was not amenable to the same control and discipline as one who came fresh to his own regiment. There was every reason to believe that the authorities viewed with doubt and suspicion the policy of the system. He had no hesitation himself in saying that it was the worst and the most expensive which could possibly be imagined. Of course it was not easy to change it suddenly, but as it was not beneficial to the service he hoped that the Vote would not appear again in the Estimates.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to call the attention of the House to two or three items in the Vote which this year presented a very large increase. Thus the charge for hospitals was £148,018 this year, against £90,714 last, and deducting the stoppages of pay, the net figures were £45,668 against £5,515. That was an extraordinary difference, and required explanation. So, again, the charge on account of deserters was last year only £3,000, whereas it was now double that sum—a fact which afforded striking evidence of the vast increase that had taken place in the number of desertions. The charge for subsistence of men in civil gaols and military prisons was £12,000 this year against £8,000 last. On page 12 there was an item of £5,321, "Repayment to the Indian Government for the forco maintained at Labuan." He had hoped that that settlement had been abandoned. It was formed by a private individual, Sir James Brooke, for his own advantage; and who, finding the speculation an unprofitable one, had endeavoured to get the Government to take it off his hands and pay him a certain sum for it. But the settlement was of no use whatever, and two years ago the Government distinctly stated not only that they had determined to abandon it altogether, but that the Vote then taken was the last that would be asked for on account of it.

AN HON. MEMBER here remarked that such important Votes ought not to be discussed in the presence of so few Members, and moved that the Committee be counted. Notice, however, being taken that there were forty Members present, the debate was resumed.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, that there was a growing feeling that the system of dépôt battalions was not satisfactory, and that impression was felt not only by junior officers, for some of the most experienced officers in the service were opposed to it. Indeed in such a congregation—for they could not be called regiments—it was impossible to have that morale and esprit de corps which were especially necessary at the commencement of the career of a young officer. He did not blame the Government for having adopted the system, because the circumstances of our army were very different from those of other armies, as there were generally three-fourths of the troops serving out of the kingdom, and there was a great difficulty to know what to do with new levies of officers and men. He did not know whether it was expensive, but any system which did not produce a good morale could not be economical. He believed that a commanding officer, a major, and an adjutant were appointed to these battalions, and that they were efficient, but the task imposed upon them was extremely difficult. If the system were found not to succeed he hoped the Government would see the necessity of devising some new arrangement. Nothing like the system of dépôts was known in foreign services. In the French army each regiment had three or four battalions, and the field officers were certainly arranged on a much more economical system than ours. There was but one lieutenant-colonel to each regiment; the other field officers were chefs de bataillon or chefs d'escadron. Some mistakes had been made in the debate of last night as to the number of troops in this country. The number of actual troops of the Line disposable for battle did not much exceed 30,000, but there were about 20,000 recruits in the dépôt battalions. If these were so disposed that there would be only a certain proportion of young soldiers and young officers in each battalion, the amount of the disposable force would be very greatly increased. He knew it was a serious operation to change an existing system; but he earnestly hoped that the Secretary for War would seriously consider the expediency of making some alteration in the system of dépôt battalions.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he agreed very much in what had been said with regard to the dépôt battalions. He had served a great deal with dépôts, and he thought the system a very bad one. It brought a great many young officers together without the control of old officers. To establish second battalions might no doubt at first involve a little more expense, but he did not believe that the system would be found more costly in the long run. The French plan was to have three battalions belonging to each regiment always ready for service, and a fourth, always less numerous than the others, to serve as a depôt and to feed the rest. The same system prevailed in the Prussian army, and he did not believe that the right hon. Gentleman could do better than to follow the example. There are several points in the Estimate which required explanation. He found that the charge for the depôt battalions had increased from £32,317 for last year to £35,807 this year; and lower down in the Vote there was a further increase for miscellaneous depôts, &c., from £4,185 to £5,797. He found that the levy money in 1860-1 was £42,000, and in 1859-60, £69,000; and yet the charge for marching allowance and cost of conveying recruits, escorts, &c., was £6,000 for the smaller sum, and only £4,000 for the larger. He supposed the increase in the levy money was to be accounted for by an augmentation in the bounty. The total charge for the recruiting staff for the current year was £22,241 against £18,660 last year. Last year the total charge for the purchase of horses was £75,830, this year it was to be £105,030. The cost of remounts in this country was higher than in any other country in the world. It appeared from a Return which he had obtained some time back that the amount voted during the last five years for remounts for the cavalry was no less than £1,054,804, which was an enormous sum. To be sure, in consequence of the Crimean war, the expense in 1856 was £742,688. The following year, 1857-8, it was reduced to £32,978. In 1858-9 it rose again to £98,278. In 1859-60 it was £75,830. In 1860-61 it was £105,030; these items making together the amount he had stated. Now he believed in no foreign army did a horse last for so short a time as in England, and yet nowhere was there better stabling, better forage, or a higher breed of horses. He was surprised that the hon. Member for Lambeth had not perceived that the discrepancy in the hospital charges did not arise from any extravagance, but solely from causes over which the War Office had no control. He found that last year the estimate for the subsistence and expense on routes of deserters and their escorts, and rewards for the apprehension of deserters, was £3,000, while this year the Estimate was £6,000. Thus it would be seen that the estimate in respect of deserters had doubled. He thought that as the army was so much improved in administration this extra expense was unaccountable. It certainly required some explanation how it was that, with improved training, improved camps, and a better state of the army generally, they had this large sum in the Vote.

Notice taken that Forty Members were not present:—House counted, and Forty Members being found present—

SIR FREDERIC SMITH proceeded to say that a great increase was likewise observable in the item for subsistence of men in confinement, which for the year 1860-61 amounted to £12,000 as compared with £8,000 in 1859-60. He also found that for the movement of troops last year £129,000 was required, while this year £138,000 was asked for. Now this increase was hardly justifiable. Perhaps the items were in themselves small, but they altogether amounted to a large sum—[Mr. WILLIAMS: Hear, hear!]
—and they ought to receive the careful attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War. Under the next head he found that this year for religious books and the carriage thereof the cost would be £3,000, while last year it was only £2,000. Now, unless the army increased very rapidly, this charge ought not to appear in the Votes; and if the right hon. Gentleman had spoken to the Chaplain-General, some steps might be taken to diminish or to put an end to it. The whole cost for five years for moving the troops had been £165,000, and for religious books for the same period it was upwards of £11,000.

COLONEL LINDSAY said, he wished to draw attention to the question of provisional depôt battalions, not so much as regarded their organization, or their discipline and drill, but as regarded their organization for colonial purposes. These battalions were necessarily mixed up with the system of colonial service. There were some 80,000 men in India, and two-thirds of the army served in the Colonies. The consequence was, that the whole system of reliefs, deranged by the Crimean war and the Indian mutiny, was totally altered, and it would be difficult to keep up, under the present system of organization, the system of relief necessary. With reference to recruiting, although the state might be able to raise sufficient recruits to keep up the efficiency of the army, the great question was, whether they would be able to get the best description of persons. He believed that it would not be so, and that the service had not arrived at that position whereby they would be enabled to get the best of the working classes into the ranks.

It appeared to him that the length of the colonial service had a great deal to do with the general popularity of the service, and that the service in India and in the Colonies was much too long, and the fact would force itself more strongly upon the Government every day that it was impossible to maintain the depôt provisional battalions as at present constituted. On the question of re-enlistment, they all knew the value of old as compared with young soldiers, and it deserved consideration whether some slight addition might not be made with advantage to the pay of old soldiers who were willing to re-enlist. Indian depôt battalions could never, he maintained, be regarded as a force available for the defence of this country. They might number 10,000 or 15,000 men upon paper, but the larger number of these were now about to embark for India, and their places would be filled by raw recruits, whom it would be necessary to instruct. Allowance must at all times be made in the Military Estimates for troops who were actually at sea, and for invalids returning from abroad. Now, what was required in order to give security to the country was, that the number of regiments at home should be adequate to her defence.

COLONEL SYKES said, the great source of expense in regard to the army of India was, its transit across the ocean, and the expense would be much greater in future years. Every man sent out to India cost the Government £100 before he was ready to take the field, and the longer therefore that he could be kept there the better. He did not see what practical good could follow from these discussions of the Estimates hour after hour. In consequence of lump sums being inserted, they must trust to the statements of the Secretary for War, for they had no details which were sufficiently full to enable them to judge for themselves, and they certainly had not the means of drawing comparisons between the past and present years. For instance, for the purchase of horses last year £23,000 was required, and this year the Government asked for £38,000, but there was nothing to show what number of horses had been bought. The number ought to be given, "so many horses at such a cost." So as regarded the Staff of the depôt battalions, the Estimates had risen from £32,000 last year, to £35,000. The number of lieutenant-colonels, majors, and adjutants was given for this year, but not for last, so that it was impossible to institute a comparison. Had the increase taken place in superior officers or in instructors of drill? With respect to hospital expenses, the sum for medicines and treatment of the sick amounted to £44,663. Some explanation as to the increase that had taken place ought to be given, although it was admittedly an item of expense in which less hesitation ought to be shown than in any other. As regarded the administration of martial law, there was a total charge of £4,305 for the Judge Advocate General and his department. The Judge Advocate General had £2,000, and his deputy 1,200 per annum. Were the duties of this department of the army so extensive as to require the services of both of these officers at this cost? Then, as regarded the cost of military prisons, while the cost last year was £50,299, the cost for the ensuing year would be £58,312. Did this mean to imply that there was an increase in the number of military prisons, or a great increase in the number of the prisoners? As regarded the movement of troops, the estimate for those at home last year was £75,000, this year £80,000; land and water carriage in the Colonies, £53,000, this year £64,000; the total being £144,000 for the ensuing year as compared with £128,000 last year. Under the head of regimental agency the increase was as £25,000 to £27,500, and the allowances to agents for postages and stationery £1,200 as compared with £1,000. The House ought to have the fullest means of forming their opinion with respect to the propriety of these Estimates, which were increasing from year to year, without the means being afforded of verifying the necessity for the increase.

COLONEL DICKSON observed, that he had been for a long time quite opposed to the depôt battalions; but that, having had several opportunities of seeing how they worked, and having heard the speech of an illustrious personage (the Duke of Cambridge) in "another place," who had very clearly pointed out that the proportion of officers and men fit for duty exceeded under the present system that which was furnished by the old four company depôts—he had been led to change his opinion on the point. It was said, indeed, that the present depôts were a bad school for young men; but it was but justice to the officers in command to state that he had perceived a great improvement had taken place in that respect, although it was, perhaps, desirable that some further modifications should be made with respect to the junior officers. He wished, in the next place, briefly to advert to the extraordinary increase in the item set down in the Estimates for the purchase of horses. Now, while there was so large an addition made to the horses for the Cavalry of the Line, he did not see that there was any corresponding increase in the number of men. He found from a calculation which he had made, founded upon the Estimate, that those for the Household Cavalry would last about eight years, and those for the Cavalry of the Line about six years. The horses for the Artillery would, by the same calculation last four years, and those for the Military Train from three to four years. He might also be permitted for a moment to advert to the boon of allowing the service to make choice of its own chargers. The system of officers selecting their chargers from the ranks certainly did not carry with it all the advantages that might be supposed. He had seen nearly every regiment in the service, and he could not say they rode that class of horses he could wish them to ride. One half the regiment were generally mounted on what were technically called "screws." He thought it would be a greater boon to give cavalry officers forage for their horses without charging them the drawback than the option of taking horses from the ranks. Again, the Vote of £148,000 to defray the expenses of the removal of troops at home, for the last two years, was unnecessarily large. He thought that under that head a great saving might be effected, and a great deal of money was unnecessarily thrown away, and he wished the hon. Member for Lambeth would bring it to a substantial issue, in order to see whether some of these items could not be reduced. He certainly was not for reducing the efficiency of the army, but he was sure if the money were properly applied they might have a far more efficient army.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, that with reference to the charges on account of the military establishments in the Colonies, both the Colonies and the country should understand that neither the House nor the Government had expressed any opinion in regard to the question of the defence of the Colonies which formed the subject of discussion on the previous evening. In that discussion many of the Colonies had placed to their charge establishments for the cost of which they should not be at all held liable. He would take the case of Tasmania as an example. Until lately, Tasmania was a convict station. In 1853 it cost, as such, £184,000, and entailed a military expenditure of £64,000 for troops. In 1854, by the decrease in the number of the convicts, the cost of the convict establishment was reduced to £154,000, and that led to a reduction of the military expenditure to £47,000, but in neither case could this colony be charged with the expenditure. The case of Western Australia was the same. In 1853 the military expenditure was £73,000; in 1854 it was reduced to £57,000. It had likewise been decreasing since with the decrease in the number of convicts, and he had no doubt that circumstances would be found in regard to the other colonies which would also exonerate them. He hoped that the Secretary at War would fulfil the promise he made the House last year, in having an annual return supplied, setting forth the sanitary condition of the British troops in their several quarters.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he would endeavour to answer the questions, as far as he could, in the order in which they had been put to him. With respect to the question raised by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Devizes (Mr. D. Griffith), he had no doubt that the experiment of providing officers' horses from the ranks, by way of diminishing their expenses, would on trial be advantageous; but still some modifications in details might be required, and a suggestion had been made that a higher class of horses should be bought, with a view to be taken at a higher price by cavalry officers. The hon. and gallant Member for Chatham (Sir F. Smith) had moved for a return, which had not yet been printed, of the cost of cavalry horses in this country. Some surprise had been elicited by there being an increase of the charge for cavalry horses this year as compared with last. But it should be recollected, in the first place, that they had two regiments of cavalry coming home from India which it was necessary to remount; and the estimate for horses must vary every year. When the Estimates were framed it was pretty well known what was the deficiency in horses. That, of course, must be replaced; at the same time, there was the ordinary charge for replacing cavalry horses every year, and by combining these two they got the probable expense, of course fluctuating in amount. With regard to the condition of the horses, it was true that they lasted longer in some regiments than in others. In the Military Train especially, the horses were used up more rapidly than in any other portion of the service, because they did an enormous amount of labour. They were used in the arsenals, and performed a great deal of heavy work, and he had no doubt that those horses were used up to a much greater extent than horses which were not subjected to the same amount of labour. It was also quite true that our horses cost more than in foreign armies, and, according to the gallant Officer, did not last so long. They could, however, always purchase horses abroad cheaper than in England. The article, perhaps, was not so good; but it was cheaper. On the other hand, he believed all classes in this country, civil as well as military, used up their horses sooner than people abroad. We drove at a greater pace; our horses were capable of going at a greater pace; they could do more, and more was got out of them; the consequence was that they were sooner used up. These facts, combined, accounted for that difference which he should expect a priori to exist with reference to the charge for horses, though I am unable to speak as to the fact. With respect to a question put by his hon. Friend (Mr. Williams) as to a considerable increase in hospital expenses, it was said that was a sign of a greater degree of sickness in the army. He stated on a previous occasion that there had been a marked improvement in the health of the army, and that the amount of mortality and sickness had decreased. During the last two or three years there had been great improvements effected in the construction and accommodation of hospitals. These alterations were excellent in themselves, and tended to increase the efficiency of the army; but they all cost money. He had been asked to explain the cause of the increased charge for escorts to deserters. These Estimates were certainly very difficult to frame. The Estimates for future years had to be calculated according to the degree with which in practice the actual expenditure exceeded or fell short of the Vote taken the year before. In 1858-9, the year before last, there were 7,547 men lost to the service by desertion. In the year 1859-60, the number fell to 4,652. There was every reason to believe that that diminution would be maintained in the present year; but it was necessary in framing the Estimate to take an average of previous years. The increased charge for imprisonments was due to the same cause; they had to correct the Estimate of the coming year by the expenditure of the one preceding. With regard to the movement of troops, all military officers held it to be of great disadvantage to allow troops to remain very long quartered in the same place. It led them to enter into too intimate relations with the civil population, and contracted what was the despair of all who had to do with the army—namely, marriages. The soldier who married with permission and his wife either lived in a barrack-room with many other men—a system hardly compatible with decency, or the country had to build separate quarters for married soldiers and their families, which certainly enhanced their comfort and their cost too. These separate quarters had already been provided at Portsmouth, and the same course was being steadily pursued at other places. Next year he hoped to see the arrangement extended to Woolwich. Considering that the men entered the service at eighteen and could leave at twenty-eight, he could not see that there was any great necessity for their getting married at all; but if they did so it certainly added materially to the expense of the army. This year, however, he had made a reduction in the Vote for the removal of troops, because it had been found on examination that the expenditure under this head was usually in excess of the Vote, and care had been taken to secure accuracy in the present Estimates, although it might nominally appear high in amount. The pay of a Lieutenant-General had been struck off at Malta. That fact was accounted for in this way:—There had lately been at Malta a Governor, Sir Gaspard le Marchant; and a Lieutenant General in command of the forces, General Pennesfather. It was thought better that the plan of placing the civil and military Government in the hands of one person, which was found to work well at Gibraltar, might be adopted at Malta, and the united functions had accordingly been entrusted to Sir Gaspard le Marchant and General Pennesfather had received other employment in England. It had been asked why the stockpurse of the Guards remained identically at the same sum. The reason was that the Guards themselves remained at identically the same number. Some complaint had been made that these Estimates were not minute enough in their details. He thought many of them were already extremely minute, and, indeed, it was often asked, "What is a man to do with all this enormous mass of figures?" He believed as a matter of fact, that the Estimates would be more generally intelligible if given in less detail. To use a vulgar phrase, far more Members were "choked" by the present mass of details than were starved by their insufficiency. There were very few of the proposals made night after night with regard to the army which, if adopted, would not involve an increased expenditure; and if he were to yield, as the representative of the Government, to all the suggestions made to him with respect to these Estimates, he believed that balancing the cost from some with the saving from others, the pecuniary gain to the country would be nil. Different branches of the army had been put upon a better and higher footing; but each branch thought itself injured because others had had a particular grievance removed while its own case had not been dealt with. Thus, the expense of the army increased to an extent that was very dangerous, because if they were to have a very costly army they must make up their minds to have a very small one. He frankly avowed that he thought it most important to keep down our military expenditure as far as possible. A question had been put to him with regard to the sanitary Reports. A director of the medical department of the army had been appointed, who devoted his attention to such subjects and to the sanitary statistics of the service. A sanitary Report had been drawn up, and the moment it was ready it would be laid upon the table. He hoped also to be able to produce before the close of the Session another most important document—the Report of the Barrack Commission, which was now in draught, and which would exhibit, in the greatest detail, the state of the various barracks in the United Kingdom. The question as to dépôt battalions had been discussed by hon. Gentlemen in a very fair spirit. Of course on such a subject he could not speak with any authority. He had had no experience of it, but some of the points in dispute were perfectly obvious. The pamphlet that had been published anonymously, but with the sanction of a gallant Officer opposite, and which was attributed to a high authority that none had greater respect for than he had, itself admitted that for effecting relief dépôt battalions were of great advantage. Four company dépôts existed when he was himself first officially connected with the army. The feeling against them was then as strong as that now entertained against dépôt battalions. It was said they were only a refuge for officers who shrank from colonial duties, that they fostered idleness, laxity, and a want of discipline. But distance "lends enchantment to the view," and now four-company dépôts were much praised and set up in contrast to the modern dépôt battalions. He had heard the discussion on this subject in "another place" to which allusion had been made, and he thought the best of the argument certainly lay with the Commander in Chief. If they divided the regiments into two battalions, and made one whole battalion the dépôt for the other, they got a better organization for the other battalions. And, again, if they divided the regiments into three, they would get two battalions that would be very good. But let them not imagine that that change would not be costly, because, if they divided a regiment from two into three battalions, they must have a still larger Staff with an increased proportion of field officers. That alteration would probably add from £20,000 to £50,000 to their expenditure. What was our position as regarded a foreign war? We had a great Colonial Empire, and also the part of the Empire at home to defend, leading to one-third of our men being at home, and two-thirds abroad. But if war broke out, it was to their fleet that they must look for the defence of the Colonies, while it was to the interest of the country to have some of their best battalions at home. Under the two battalion system, however, if the battalion at home was always to be the feeder of the battalion abroad, we should have little but raw levies at home; while all our seasoned troops would be in the Colonies. When the Guards went to Canada, one battalion remained at home to feed the other, and very effectually it fed it; but what was the result as to that battalion? Out of 640 men only 400 were fit for duty. A second battalion at home would be the dépôt for the other, and the men in it could never be as well seasoned as those who formed the battalion on foreign service. It was true that there were a good many young officers at these dépôt battalions, but that evil had been diminished by an order of the Commander in Chief, and it must be remembered that neither the captains nor lieutenants were young officers. For these reasons it appeared to him that there was not sufficient evidence upon which to condemn the dépôt battalion system; and he should be sorry to see it abandoned for the system of second battalions, which, as far as he was informed, would be more costly and less efficient. The gallant Officer the Member for Westminster (Sir De Lacy Evans) complained that we had too many field officers, and instanced the French system as being more economical in this respect. The fact, however, was that in the French army there were more field officers compared with the number of men than there were in ours. In our army there were three field officers to a regiment of 1,077 men, while in that of France there were six in a regiment of 1,920 men; thus, in the French army there was one field officer to every 320 men, while in ours there was only one field officer to every 359 men. He should be sorry to see any great reduction in the number of field officers, because one great hardship arising from the constitution of armies was the small proportion of employment which you had for officers of the upper grades. In each regiment there were 10 or 12 ensigns, and 10 or 12 lieutenants, who became 12 captains, and then had to be reduced somehow or other into two majors and a lieutenant-colonel.

COLONEL STUART said, he hoped the Secretary at War would be able to inform the Committee that it was likely some arrangement would be soon made by which soldiers undergoing sentences would be placed under military discipline, instead of being made the associates of thieves and other abandoned characters in a common prison.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, there was one item in the Vote to which he felt compelled to take exception, namely, that of £5,321 for repayment to the Indian Government for the force maintained at Labuan. Sir James Brooke had taken possession of that district upon speculation for his own advantage, and for some time held it unconnected with the Government. Finding, however, that it was not a profitable speculation, he had endeavoured to induce the Government to take to it. A long discussion had taken place on the subject a few years ago, and it was then stated by Government that they expected that would be the last time the House would be called upon to vote the amount. He should therefore move that the Vote be reduced by the amount of that item.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, the station was useful as a coal depôt, and might become of considerable importance in carrying on the operations against China. The amount was £429 less than last year, and it was required for the payment of expenses already incurred.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that the idea of sending vessels to Labuan for coal was ridiculous, and he trusted the House would not throw money away on a station which was of no earthly use.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question put,—

“ That the item of £5,321, for repayment to the Indian Government for the Force maintained at Labuan, be omitted from the proposed Vote.”

The Committee divided.

MR. WILLIAMS was appointed one of the Tellers for the Ayes, but no Member appearing to be a second Teller for the Ayes, the Chairman declared the Noes had it.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2). £220,000 to complete the sum for the Embodied Militia,

COLONEL DICKSON said, that at present the Militia was in a most unsatisfactory state. No regiment knew what was to become of it. The system of twenty-eight days' drill was a perfect farce. The men were not forthcoming when they were wanted. If the Militia were put on a proper footing, they might have a great reduction in the expense of the army, coupled with greater efficiency. Unless he received an intimation that the Militia was to be placed under a better system of organization he should move a reduction of the Votes.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he had had some experience of the working of the organization of the Militia, and he had come to an opposite conclusion to that at which his hon. and gallant Friend had arrived. It was complained that some regiments were disbanded, while others were kept in training, but that was a matter which must be regulated by consideration for the public advantage. He believed that that the Militia force were at all times prepared to do their duty, whether embodied or disembodied.

COLONEL SMYTH said, he should support the Vote, believing it to be necessary that the Militia should be embodied, in order that they might acquire a knowledge of the duties they were required to perform. For that purpose, however, he would recommend that the drills in the first year should be prolonged to eight or ten weeks. The training of soldiers was in the present day more scientific than it used to be, and it was impossible to make a man properly march, move about, and use the delicate weapon now placed in the soldier's hand in twenty-eight days.

GENERAL PEEL perfectly concurred with what had been stated by his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War on a former occasion. He did not think that the Militia should be embodied in a time of peace; they should be kept as an army of reserve in time of war and embodied only on occasions of great emergency. Twenty-one or twenty-eight days' training was not sufficient to make the Militia good troops; but if in the first year they were sent to camps of instruction for three or four months, then twenty-eight days in the year would be sufficient afterwards to keep up the knowledge of what they had learnt. The hon. and gallant Member for Limerick (Colonel Dickson) complained of the want of notice to regiments of their intended disembodiment. He was of opinion that if the Government gave them a longer notice than usual of their disembodiment it would be impossible to keep up the necessary discipline. He thought that the advantages of a good Militia could not be overrated, and that the time would soon come when this question of an efficient Militia would become one of the most serious consideration.

COLONEL DICKSON explained. All he intended to say was this, that if three or four regiments were embodied they could reckon with security upon a greater number of the Militia being always ready when called upon. Under the present system officers did not know that they had men to command, and the men did not know that they had officers to command them. Scarcely half the number came up last year for training as was expected. He had himself to disembody upwards of 1,000 men three months ago, and he was convinced that only about half the number would come up if called upon the next day. His own regiment was perhaps the only regiment in the south of Ireland that did not show strong symptoms of mutiny. Much dissatisfaction was felt at the system that took men suddenly from their homes and as suddenly dismissed them. He thought that three months' good drill in one year would suffice for three years. He was anxious to see the Militia placed upon a more satisfactory footing than it was at present.

MAJOR PARKER said, he wished to urge upon the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War the propriety and importance of altering the present system, so as to prevent the loss and inconvenience to the men themselves of calling them out, in the agricultural districts particularly, at seasons of the year when they were receiving good wages for their labour, and when their services were of the utmost value to the farmer. If that could be avoided no doubt a greater number of men would be induced to enlist.

LORD FERMOY thought there was only one safe and sound principle to act upon in the disembodiment of the Militia, namely, to take them in the same rotation as that in which they were called out. He could not agree with the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Colonel opposite, that the Militia should be called out for drill during three or four months. It would be impossible to keep artisans and other men of fixed habits three or four months from their homes. The best system of national defence was the Volunteer system. He thought the Government were quite wrong in not sanctioning the introduction of the Volunteer system into Ireland. A large body of men could be picked out by any one who understood the country, and would prove most loyal.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he thought economy would be promoted by appointing retired paymasters officers of Militia.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, the question was, how best to provide an army of reserve in case of invasion, it being on all hands admitted that the number of regular troops was, and must be, small. Now, having been for many years employed in the training of troops, he was quite convinced that twenty-one or twenty-eight days were quite insufficient to effect this object. In that time a man learnt next to nothing, and went back as little of a soldier as when he left home. If, however, you first of all made a militiaman thoroughly master of his business by training him for five or six months, no further drill would be necessary for two or three years. When men were harassed by being called out for twenty-eight days' training year after year, their regular habits were disturbed, and, after all, they were not made good soldiers.

COLONEL SYKES said, he thought scant justice had been done to the only constitutional force in this country—the Militia. He believed that militiamen had the same physique and the same “pluck” as soldiers of the Line; and, as an old adjutant, he could say that a shorter time was required to enable a man to go through the regular parade drill than was generally supposed. The chief point was to give them confidence and train them in the use of the musket. This was of far greater importance than merely teaching them the goose step. It should be remembered that the battles of the French Republic were all won by men who had not been drilled at all, but who, though only recruits, beat the highly-drilled Austrians. Too much reliance, therefore, ought not to be placed on mere mechanism. If men possessed enthusiasm they would do anything, and he did not, therefore, under-estimate the Militia, as it appeared to be under-estimated in that House.

COLONEL STUART complained of the disappointment felt by young officers who had raised the proper proportion of men for the Militia, in the hope of getting a commission. When men were much wanted, hopes were held out that commissions would be granted; but after the number of men required had been raised it was found that commissions were not easily got. He suggested that a certain number of commissions should be set aside to be given to young Militia officers under certain conditions. He also thought that some steps should be taken for the more effectual punishment of deserters from Militia regiments, and that the time they were away from the regiment should be deducted from their period of service. Complaints were also made in the large agricultural counties that the Militia were called out at an inconvenient period of the year, and that insufficient means were taken to advertise the place and the time at which the men were to be drilled.

MR. DODSON said, he wished to ask what number of men they were to have for the £300,000 to be voted. He quite concurred in the expediency of calling out the Militia at a convenient period of the year. Inattention to this matter discouraged the labourers and farmers to such a degree that they refused to enlist after the expiry of their term.

MR. HENLEY said, the statements brought forward in the course of the debate had been so curious and conflicting as to leave doubts whether we had a Militia at all, and whether the men referred to were real men or only appeared on paper. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War would excuse him for asking what his whole number should be on paper, how many of all ranks were embodied, and how many had enlisted in the course of the last twelve months into the Line.

CAPTAIN ESMONDE said, that with reference to a statement made by the hon. and gallant Colonel opposite (Colonel Dickson) he wished to observe that though a Militia regiment in the south of Ireland mutinied in a moral point of view, yet they did not really mutiny. The men were exasperated at the harsh manner in which they were treated by the authorities, and the uncertainty of the regulations. He alluded particularly to the North Tipperary Regiment, which was the only regiment in which any symptoms of insubordination had been shown.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), that the discussion had not shown any great amount of unanimity on the part of those who had engaged in it as to the manner in which the Militia should be constituted. He would, however, remind the Committee that the Vote before them was for the embodied Militia, while they had been discussing the disembodied. He had prepared Returns showing the number of men who had deserted to the Line and how many had joined the Line with the consent of their officers, which Returns would give full information as to the embodied Militia. The number of Militia last year was 70,000, of whom 25,000 were embodied, and the remainder, 45,000, disembodied. He also thought that the object of the force had been mistaken by those who sought to make the Militia as efficient as men of the Line. It was neither the desire nor the intention of the Government to make the Militia as efficient as the Line, for, if they did, the men would be unfitted for Militia service. He could not approve of the suggestion that militiamen should be taken out of their counties for three or four months for the purpose of being drilled. The employers of labour would feel greatly aggrieved if that course were adopted. It had been stated by a gallant Officer opposite (Colonel Stuart) that much inconvenience arose from the time of the year at which the Militia were called out.

The Commission reported that it would be a great advantage if the regiments could all be called out as nearly as possible at the same time, and they were told that the best time for doing so would be the month of May, before the hay harvest commenced, when the men could be best spared. This could not perhaps be universally adhered to, as the hay harvest was found to be later as they went north. In the northern counties the month of June would probably be the most convenient season, and in Scotland still later. If the regiments were called out in winter, as had been suggested, the short days and bad weather would prevent their having the same facilities for training that they had in May. The gallant Officer opposite had also suggested that it would be of advantage to give commissions without purchase to Militia officers who brought a certain number of men over to the Line. He must say, however, that he hoped they would soon be able to discontinue, to a great extent, the embodied Militia. The return of soldiers from India and other places would, he hoped, enable them to do this. The best thing they could do for the Militia was to let them alone—to follow the old constitutional system of never calling them out, except on great emergencies. Those who served in embodied regiments were a class of men who liked the service, but preferred the five years of the Militia to the ten of the Line. These men would go into the Line. On the other hand, if a regiment of Militia when disembodied was filled with men of fixed habits well known in their counties, they might be depended upon in circumstances of danger, but if they were to be made permanent soldiers they would have nothing to do with the Militia. The original design of the Militia, that they should be a disembodied force, only trained annually for service, was that which ought to be adhered to. The question, therefore, put to him about recruiting for the Militia fell to the ground. When the ill-treatment of the Militia was asserted, he agreed with hon. Gentleman who declared that the Militia were ill-used, but did not agree with them as to the manner in which they were ill-used. It must be heartrending to those Lieutenant-colonels who prided themselves on the efficiency and appearance of their regiments to see their best men taken from them for the Line. With regard to the notice given to officers of the disembodiment of their Militia, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman (General Peel). Some officers asked for an early notice, but others, on the contrary, deprecated a too early announcement of their disembodiment, for they said it unsettled their men, and rendered them disinclined to perform their duties.

GENERAL PEEL said, he wished to remind the right hon. Gentleman that he had not answered the question of the hon. Member for Sussex (Mr. Dodson) as to the number of the Militia the Vote would provide. Unless the Militia were disembodied immediately, it was doubtful whether the Government would have the money to pay the men voted by Parliament. The object of calling out the Militia was to represent the Line, and to make up for them, and as soon as the regiments arrived from India the whole of the Militia regiments must be disembodied. The Government had not taken money for more than the troops that had been voted by Parliament. He had heard for the first time that night that three or four Irish regiments had been in a state of mutiny, and he had been very much surprised at the statement.

COLONEL HERBERT said, he thought it desirable that the attention of Parliament should be directed to the small force of troops now in the United Kingdom. Striking out the depôts there were only thirty-three regiments of the Line at home. Adding to them the seven battalions of Foot Guards, we could not turn out more than 28,000 or 29,000 men, which was not a sufficient force to act as a nucleus for the defence of our shores. The embodied Militia mustered about 17,000 men. Was there any prospect of receiving 17,000 regular troops to supply their place at the end of the financial year? Two regiments of infantry were on their way from India. [MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: Six of infantry and two of cavalry.] Yes, two regiments of infantry were actually on their way, and four more were expected. They might muster altogether 4,000 men. The China war was now an accepted fact, and there was no chance of those regiments that had been suspended in mid air coming home. Those six regiments were the only troops upon which we could rely to reinforce our home army and to supply the loss of 17,000 embodied Militia. This was a point well deserving attention, and he hoped that the Secretary for War would state what were the views of the Government on this point.

COLONEL DICKSON said, there was an old saying that, if they wanted to roast an Irishman, they could always get another Irishman to turn the spit. He did not think that his observations should have called forth such a host of antagonists. He would not be guilty of the bad taste of making any comparison between his own and other regiments. That was a matter to be judged of by the superior officer. He did not say that his regiment was the only regiment that was not in a state of mutiny, but he said that his own regiment was the only regiment in the south of Ireland at that time disembodied that did not show symptoms of discontent, or break out into a state of mutiny. That occurred in 1856, at the close of the Crimean war, when the Militia had great reason to complain of the way in which they were treated by the Government. It was actually proposed to send the men out of the barrack-yards without clothes.

GENERAL PEEL said that, when he was Secretary of War, he had never heard of any case of mutiny on the disembodiment of the Irish Militia regiments.

COLONEL DICKSON explained, that he was not talking of the time when the gallant General was Secretary of War.

COLONEL HERBERT said, he recollected that in 1856, when the regiments were disembodied, a promise was made that they should receive 14*s.* each man; but that an order was subsequently issued stating instead of 14*s.* they were to have 4*s.* then, and 10*s.* at a later period, and that every man went away stating that the treatment was bad, and that faith had not been kept with them. That caused great difficulty in the way of recruiting for the Line, and he hoped no such practice would again be followed.

MR. W. WILLIAMS remarked that he could not understand the discrepancies between the statements of the gallant Officers and the number of men voted by the House. Last year, for instance, 136,906 men were voted, and that, allowing 40,000 as being on Colonial Service, there ought to be 97,000 men in the United Kingdom. The late Secretary for War (General Peel) stated on the previous evening that, though the whole numbers were not on paper, they were actually raised; but the gallant Officer who had just spoken asserted that there were in the country only 33 battalions, numbering less than 33,000 men. He wanted to know what really was the strength of the home force. This year they had voted 145,000 men, and yet they were told the defences of the country were insufficient. If there were only 33,000 men in the country, he must say he thought that force was insufficient for the defence of our shores.

COLONEL HERBERT said, what he had said was that there were at the present moment in the United Kingdom only 33 regular battalions of the Line, or 40 with the addition of the Foot Guards. There were 18,000 men in the depôts belonging to Indian regiments, including invalids who had come home, recruits not yet trained, and recruits who, having been trained, were on the eve of departure. The depôts of regiments at home or in the Colonies amounted to about 12,000. The Artillery force at home amounted to 14,000, the Cavalry to 10,000, and the Militia to 17,000. The total, therefore, was about 70,000 or 71,000. But what he wished to press on the attention of the House was that the depôts were not available to meet the enemy. They were not fit to bear the shock of battle. The idea that they formed a force which the country could rely on as the nucleus of our home defences, if we were seriously attacked, was an utter delusion and imposition, although he was sorry to say it had met with encouragement in high quarters. The only infantry troops that could be put forward to meet a foreign army were the regular battalions, which, including the Foot Guards, were only 40 in number, and could not turn out more than 30,000 men. With a proper force of regular battalions, and a large contingent of Militia, the officers of the British army would be perfectly ready to meet the troops of any other country; but the reputation of our arms and the safety of our country were not secure as long as the force that could fairly be called on to meet the foe was confined to some 40 battalions, which did not number 1,000 men each.

MR. W. WILLIAMS held that if the depôt battalions were perfectly useless, as the gallant Officer had just told them, they were throwing away money in paying for them.

GENERAL PEEL repeated what he had stated on the previous evening, that the number of men proposed to be voted for the whole army was 228,854, including the force on the East India establishment, and that not only was every man raised, but the force in existence at this moment was actually in excess of that number. He made that statement on the authority of the War Office Returns.

MR. W. WILLIAMS: That is all very well, but where are they?

GENERAL PEEL said, he included in his calculation the depôts of regiments. He admitted they were not as efficient as the regular battalions, but that could not be avoided in a large army.

COLONEL HERBERT said, that he questioned, not the accuracy of the figures, but the soundness of the conclusions of the late and present Secretary for War. He repeated that in including in their Estimate not only the depôts of regiments at home, but those of regiments on Indian and Colonial service, with such an overwhelming proportion of recruits and so large a number of invalids, they gave a very false idea of the strength of the army available for the defence of the country.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £34,000 to complete the sum for the Volunteer Corps.

SIR WILLIAM MILES said, he regretted the absence of the hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir R. Peel) who had given notice of an Amendment on this Vote. In the meantime he wished to say a few words as to the condition of the Yeomanry force. It was impossible to imagine that a force could be efficient which was only called out once in three years, for the horses required to be kept in training, as well as the men. At the last muster of his men he had eighty recruits out of a regiment of 380, and of these eighty, thirty were mounted on two-year old horses. No doubt, the intelligence and zeal of these men enabled them to become efficient in an extraordinarily short space of time, but still the want of being called out threw great difficulties in their way. He had hoped that the Government would have placed in the hands of the Yeomanry the improved breech-loading rifle, with a range of 800 yards, and he believed that if they were provided with such a weapon they would make a most efficient mounted rifle corps. With the common smooth-bore carbine, which they now used, having the ridiculous range of eighty or 100 yards only, he had seen excellent practice made, and with a superior weapon he had no doubt they would turn out excellent marksmen. In 1803 the total number of Volunteers, Artillery, Riflemen, Cavalry, Yeomanry, and Infantry, was no less than 319,000. At the present time there were 14,000 enrolled Yeomanry and 130,000 Riflemen. They were not under the same war pressure as in 1807, and he had no doubt of the success of the present volunteer movement, seeing what had already been done. He had no doubt that, as hitherto, the Rifle corps and the Yeomanry would continue to co-operate without the slightest approach to jealousy. He hoped, however, that the embodied Yeomanry corps would be placed upon such a footing that they might not disgrace themselves when called upon to act for the common defence of the country. The regiment of Yeomanry which he had the honour to command had been called out in aid of the civil power since 1804, seven times as a regiment, and sixty-nine times in divisions, squadrons, or troops. He supposed that other regiments had been called out as frequently, and he therefore thought the Yeomanry had done good service.

COLONEL KNOX said, the Government were, by every means in their power, endeavouring to forward the volunteer movement, and he entirely agreed that they could not forward or foster it too much; but, while doing so, they were completely putting an extinguisher, for the present at least, upon the Yeomanry Cavalry. If the country was in such a state as to require the aid of the volunteers, he thought they ought at such a time to take every means in their power to make the other forces as efficient as possible. He should press upon the right hon. Gentleman the necessity of properly arming the Yeomanry if they were to continue them. They would become a most efficient force if armed with the breech-loading rifle, for the practice he had seen with that weapon at 800 yards was perfectly marvellous. He was sorry the Government did not intend to call them out, and if they would not take the matter into consideration and postpone the Vote he should feel bound to divide upon it.

MR. SELWYN said, he wished to repeat a suggestion he made last year with a view to increasing the efficiency of the Volunteer Rifle corps. He had then called attention to the great difficulty experienced by the Volunteers in obtaining proper practice grounds. The difficulty still existed, but it could be lessened or obviated without the expenditure of a single shilling of public money. It was found impossible to form an efficient Rifle corps except in a populous neighbourhood. For a proper practice ground a long range was required in the immediate vicinity of the place where the corps was raised. But rights of way and the number of proprietors rendered it difficult to obtain such a practice ground, and he would suggest that a short Act should be passed, giving, at all events, permissive powers to Rifle corps to acquire land, and embodying the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, at the same time providing that the inspector of Volunteers or the Secretary of State and also some local authority should first agree on the necessity of the acquisition of the ground, and on its proper selection. If there were any objection to compulsory powers, there could be none to permissive powers being given, and the very fact of there being these powers would put a stop to many of the vexatious claims which were now raised. That course had been pursued in respect to other undertakings, such as docks, railways, and canals, and the importance of Rifle corps was sufficiently acknowledged to authorize its being adopted for the purpose to which he had alluded. He agreed, however, with the Secretary of State, that it would be unadvisable to make any grant of public money for the purpose, as it would lead to the exaggeration of these claims and a waste of the public revenue. He hoped, too, that greater facilities would be given for enabling members of Volunteer corps to go through a course of training in the Government schools of musketry.

SIR WILLIAM RUSSELL said, he had commanded a regiment of cavalry during the Indian mutiny, and they had used Sharpe's breech-loading rifles, but they were found to be totally useless. He did not, therefore, think that the efficiency of any corps would be increased by being supplied with those weapons.

COLONEL KNOX said, everybody knew those rifles had signally failed, but Westley Richards' breech-loading rifle was as efficient an arm as could be desired.

MR. DEEDES said, it was notorious that the arms with which the Yeomanry had been supplied were perfectly useless, for it was only by knowing the particular points of each weapon and making allowance for it, that anything like precision of aim was attainable. The Government had supplied the volunteer Riflemen with the most efficient weapon that could be had, and the Yeomanry ought to be treated in the same manner. One of the effects of not calling out the Yeomanry this year would be that the recruits who had joined since the last training would not get the benefit of exemption from the horse duty.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman, under the advice of what military authority the addition of 200 foot riflemen had been made to the Wiltshire Yeomanry Cavalry, and to what fund in the Estimates had the expenses of their equipment been charged? This mixture of forces had always been condemned by the highest military authorities, and it had given great dissatisfaction in Wiltshire.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: I do not at all object to the question put to me by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Devizes (Mr. D. Griffith). His impression, I think, is that some addition has been made to the corps of Wiltshire Yeomanry beyond its quota, and that some exceptional favour has been shown to it. That is not the case, because the establishment of the corps is 583 officers and men. They have 400 effectives of privates and non-commissioned officers, so that there is a considerable margin within which these men may be recruited, without passing the prescribed establishment. This plan of attaching to a cavalry regiment a certain number of men armed with rifles was suggested by the colonel of the regiment, and was submitted to Sir J. Scarlett, at that time in command at Portsmouth, who reviewed the regiment last year. It is not for me to say whether he considered the regiment to be in a high state of efficiency or not, but he was a good deal taken with this plan of Lord Aylesbury's, and he expressed his opinion that it deserved a trial. Application was made to the Commander-in-Chief for permission to try the experiment, and the Commander-in-Chief replied that it would be well worth while to make it in case the corps desired to do so. That is the whole history of the transaction; but there has been no excess, and no charge incurred by the Government. The next question is as to the horse duty. I think, if my hon. Friend (Mr. Deedes) will look at the last paragraph of Lord Grey's letter he will find it stated that the intention of the Government is, that the Yeomanry shall be allowed the duty for the year 1861, ending the 5th April, 1862, although they are not to be called out for duty. They were exempted last year because they were called out for training the year before, and they will be exempted this year. I stated last evening that the Government had no intention of discontinuing the services of the Yeomanry—they entertain too high a sense of the value of a force which time has shown to be efficient, and which in successive years has kept up to pretty nearly the same strength, so that we may always depend on having 14,000 or 15,000 men. The hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel Knox) has spoken of my sincerity in encouraging the volunteer movement. I have certainly done my best to give the Volunteers what encouragement lay in my power, and I am well rewarded by seeing them attain to such numbers and such a degree of efficiency as could not have been anticipated by any person when the movement first commenced. Still I do not think there is any reason why the Yeomanry should be sacrificed. We do not want to exchange old lamps for new; I have great faith that the new lamps will burn long and brightly, but I know that the old ones also have burnt continuously and well. The suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Selwyn) well deserves consideration. I very much objected to the proposal which was made, that Government should give aid to the 500 or 1,000 corps already in existence in the purchase of rifle ranges. In many cases these can be procured on the sea coast, at no great cost; but in the neighbourhood of large towns the matter is by no means so easy, and it is wonderful what an increased value attaches to land once it has been looked at by a Government surveyor. I have calculated that it would cost something like a million to procure ranges for all the different corps, and certainly the appearance in the Estimates for the year of a million for this purpose would not have increased the admiration of the public for the gratuitous service which forms so large a portion of the merit of the volunteer system. I hope the explanation which I have given may be satisfactory to the officers of Yeomanry corps. I shall be very glad to issue improved arms to them, but as yet the cavalry of the Line are not fully armed. Great difficulty has been found in procuring breech-loading carbines of the best construction; and certainly the experience which we have had in the case of Sharpe's carbine has shown how necessary it is not merely to trust to the ordinary trials at butts, but that the weapon shall undergo the test of actual service. We hope that Mr. Westley Richards may be more successful, and we have sent some to China to be tested.

Mr. Sidney Herbert

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that, as an old Yeomanry officer, he was glad to hear the statement just made by the Secretary of State for War, but he would at the same time venture to call his attention to the competition at present taking place between the Yeomanry Corps and the new mounted Volunteer Rifles. He had always believed that the efficiency of the Yeomanry could be improved by a better system of inspection, tending to develop the peculiar qualities and merits of the force. In the towns there could be no collision between the Yeomanry and the Volunteers, but in the country the new corps must come into competition with the Yeomanry—first, as to their officers, who would be drawn from exactly the same class; and next as to the men. In the one case these would be required to find themselves in everything, and to sacrifice a considerable amount of valuable time, while in the other accoutrements and weapons would be found them, they would be freed from horse duty, and would likewise receive pay during the period they were called out for service. At the very time that the two forces were thus brought into competition, the Government, by not calling out the Yeomanry, created an impression that it was their wish to favour the new Mounted Rifleman. The ratio of armed men was now 15 in 1,000 of the general population, and was rapidly increasing, while a few years ago it had only been 10 in 1,000. It was, therefore, obvious that in future the volunteer element must be largely relied upon, and it became important to lay down at the outset some clear and consistent plan of action.

MR. KNIGHT said, there was a strong feeling that the Volunteers had not been liberally dealt with, for only £15,000 had been voted towards the maintenance of that force, in lieu of the £35,000 usually devoted to the Yeomanry, which this year were not to be called out. Government gave £20,000 less than usual, though it had 120,000 additional men under arms for the protection of the country. The Volunteers did not ask for pay when they were called out, but if the Government intended that the corps should be continued they ought at least to be provided with that instruction and organization which he had understood was promised. They were, he might add, when they had first sprung into existence, on good terms with all other corps, although perhaps some little jealousy between them and the Militia and Yeomanry might since have arisen.

LORD ELCHO said, that as one who was an earnest Volunteer, he wished to protest against the supposition that any ill-feeling towards either the Yeomanry or the Militia existed on the part of that body. For his own part he greatly regretted the disbandment of some of the Militia regiments, and the fact that the Yeomanry were not called out, inasmuch as he had no doubt that such conduct was likely to lead to feelings of irritation. The only hope and wish of the Volunteer Rifles was to be a useful auxiliary force to the other branches of the service—the regular Army and the Militia. He might further observe that he should wish to see his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War directing his attention to the expediency of making a combined force of the Yeomanry and Volunteers—the former being constituted mounted rifles. He should, he might add, be sorry that the impression should go forth that the breech-loader was a failure, the fact being that he could state from his own experience, that that of Mr. W. Richards had proved most successful with respect to accuracy of range and facility of loading. He should, before he sat down, wish to call the attention of the Committee to a letter on the subject of Volunteer Corps emanating from a high military authority, who was supposed to be unfavourable to their organization. He meant Sir John Burgoyne, who, in the letter to which he referred, stated that nothing could be more unjust than to include him among the “professional old bigots” who despised the volunteer movement, from which, on the contrary, he anticipated great things. He saw at the same time, however, many grave disadvantages under which they laboured, and he believed that his desire to lessen those disadvantages, and place the force in the best position, had given some grounds for believing that he wished to crush it. He did not, however, at all wish to support the notion that when we had say 300,000 Volunteers, we should have no necessity for any other force, because they by their bravery and skill would be enabled to hover round and destroy any enemy. Now, he (Lord Elcho) had not the slightest desire to see the Volunteers supersede the regular army, and it was, he confessed, with something like dismay that he had heard it stated by an hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite that we had in this country only 30,000 regular troops upon which to rely in case of need. [“Infantry.”] Yes, Infantry, inclusive of the Guards. [Mr. OSBORNE: But not the Marines.] Be that as it might, he could not allow the present opportunity to pass without expressing his thanks to his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War for the zeal and kindness which he had invariably exhibited in the cause of the Volunteer corps, and also to his noble Friend who held the office of Under Secretary in the War Department, to whose hands the management of matters connected with those corps had been committed, and who, in the discharge of his duties in that capacity, had shown the utmost tact and judgment, as well as anxiety for the success of the movement—he might add, the utmost freedom from anything like red-tapeism.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to know the reason for the charge of £3 a man for contingent and clothing charges for 14,000 Yeomanry, when it was said that they were not to be called out this year. There were other items swelling the total amount to £88,000. It seemed extraordinary to expend this amount on a body of men who were not to be called out. On the other hand, there was only £15,000 for 133,000 Volunteers. That was a manifestation of loyalty the like of which had never been seen in any country.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: That sum was only for the adjutants.

MR. BASS explained that the £3 a man formed a fund out of which the general expenses of the Yeomanry corps were defrayed, and out of which sufficient was saved to find new clothing when it was required. He quite agreed that a change in the training of the Yeomen was desirable—less importance should be given to movements in line, and more to discipline and personal efficiency in the use of arms.

MR. RIDLEY deprecated the calling out of Rifle corps in aid of the civil power, as had in one instance been done. The object of those corps was simply national defence.

SIR WILLIAM RUSSELL said, the only use of carbines in the hands of cavalry was for purposes of alarm. The objection to breech-loaders was that the men would fire away all their ammunition in five minutes. Besides, in trotting the powder would shake out of the piece, and it would then be very difficult to extract the bullet, and to make the weapon again efficient.

LORD ELCHO said, he would merely observe there was a danger of troops firing away their ammunition too fast with breech-loaders.

MR. H. B. JOHNSTONE said, he would declare in the face of all the world that the Army Estimates were already too small, and he thought the Secretary for War deserved the thanks of the House for the way in which he had endeavoured to meet the wants of the country.

MR. BUCHANAN explained that in the case which had occurred at Hamilton, the police had requested two companies of Volunteers to come to their assistance, which they did, and the Sheriff tendered them his thanks on the following day.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that with regard to the occurrence at Hamilton, he wished to observe that the Volunteers were by Act of Parliament exempted from the liability to be called out to put down riot and disturbance. On this occasion the Volunteers had gone out of their own good will, and they deserved great credit for what they had done.

Vote agreed to.

BANK OF IRELAND BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMAN'S moved the second reading of this Bill, the object of which was to remove the restriction by which the Bank of Ireland were now prevented from advancing money on real property by way of mortgage. There was no such restriction imposed on the Bank of England or the Bank of Scotland, and the effect of the Bill would therefore be to put the three establishments on precisely the same footing in this respect.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

Lord Elcho

LORD MONTEAGLE thought the present restriction imposed on the Bank of Ireland was a wise one, and ought to be continued. A bank should always have money in the readiest and most available form, so as to be in a position to meet its engagements without delay. It was a total misapprehension of the true principles of banking to lend money where it was not immediately available. If the Bank of Ireland was in a position to lend its capital on the landed property of Ireland when land was so much depreciated there, it would not be for the benefit of either the landlords of Ireland or the Bank of Ireland itself. The Bank of Ireland was the pivot on which all other credit rested; and they could not reduce the value of its security without damaging public credit. He was ready to admit that the Bank of Ireland had hitherto conducted its business with great prudence, and did not believe that this Bill would induce a departure from that conduct; but he thought it very unwise to give them an unlimited power of investing their money on the security of real estate.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, the noble Lord appeared to forget that the Bank of Ireland was not the only banking corporation in that country, and that it only furnished one-third of the note circulation of the country. It was unjust that the Bank of Ireland should be subjected to a restriction which was not imposed on the other banking establishments with which they were brought into competition. It was matter of common complaint that landed proprietors of Ireland could not obtain accommodation from the Bank on the best security, a landlord with a rent-roll of £5,000 had the greatest difficulty in getting a bill discounted for a few hundreds, while small traders could get their bills discounted to the amount of thousands at little or no expense. The restriction which the noble Lord called wise and salutary, was placed on the Bank of Ireland so long ago as 1782 — about the period when an Act was passed to prevent Roman Catholics from lending money on mortgage of land. In a country where agriculture was the principal interest, everything ought to be done to facilitate the employment of bankers' capital on land.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMAN'S said, the objections urged were immaterial. It was a simple matter of justice to remove from the Bank of Ireland a restriction to which no other banks were subjected.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly ; and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

House adjourned at Six o'clock.
till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, June 4, 1860.

THE REFORM BILL.—QUESTION,

MR. STEUART said, that if they should arrive at the stage of going into Committee on the Reform Bill, he would submit a Motion to the effect that some other Member of the House than the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Massey) do take the Chair. As that hon. Gentleman had an important notice with reference to the Bill on the Paper, it was desirable that they should have the benefit of his deliberations in Committee. He would therefore beg Mr. Speaker to instruct him as to the proper moment when such a Motion should be brought forward. He (Mr. Steuart) learned from Mr. May's valuable work on The Law and Practice of Parliament, that such a Motion was competent, but that if it were made in Committee Mr. Speaker would require to be called in.

MR. SPEAKER: Had the hon. Member put on the paper the Motion which he proposes to make, I should have been able to answer his question with more positive certainty than I can now undertake to do. My impression is that if any such question arises in Committee that will be the proper time to call for the assistance of the House to decide it.

THE WESTMINSTER PALACE CLOCK.

QUESTION.

MR. BOWYER said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether there is any objection to giving orders for means to be used for causing the Clock to strike the hours upon the largest quarter bell (the chimes being silent) until a new great bell shall have been cast and fully approved? Also, whether the cause of the defect in the great bell has been ascertained, and if another bell is to be provided?

LORD HOTHAM said, he wished to add a question on the same subject. It was when the right hon. Gentleman will be prepared to lay before the House notice of the determination to which he may have come with reference to the great bell, and whether he will do so before any further outlay of money has been incurred?

MR. COWPER replied, that he had had the good fortune to secure the advice and counsel of gentlemen who stood highest in those scientific attainments which would particularly guide them in coming to a conclusion on the state of the great bell. The inquiries of those gentlemen were not yet completed, and so far as they had gone he should not be justified in saying that the bell could be again struck without considerable danger; or, on the other hand, that it was absolutely necessary to abandon the use of the bell. He considered that the best course to be taken as a temporary arrangement was to use the largest quarter bell for striking the hour, and the other three-quarter bells for striking the quarters. If that were done the House would be spared the loud and dismal strokes of the great bell, which they must all remember, and which occasionally drowned the voices of hon. Members, and diverted attention from the business before the House. By using the largest quarter bell, which was as large as the bell of St. Paul's, the neighbourhood would be informed of the hour without exposing the House to the serious inconvenience to which he had alluded. He thought it was rather hard upon the House that, for the sake of half the county of Middlesex being informed what o'clock it was, hon. Members should be prevented hearing themselves speak. This arrangement would be economical, and, he believed, satisfactory.

THE CHINESE WAR.—QUESTION.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, what provision has been made for the cost of the War in China?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said that, as he had only received the Notice of the hon. Member that day, he had not had time to communicate with the Secretary for War, to whom, rather than himself, it pertained to answer the question. He believed, however, that the House was already aware of the provision which had been made for the cost of the Chinese war. It amounted to the sum of £850,000, which was taken as a Vote of Credit for the financial year 1859-60, but only a portion of which was paid during the financial year, the remainder continuing to be available for the present year. The provision for the war also included a sum in the Estimates of £1,100,000 or £1,200,000 for the present year; and, further, a Vote of Credit proposed to be taken during the present year to the amount of £500,000. That was the provision for the cost of the war as announced to the House four months ago; but, as they were aware, circumstances had changed somewhat since then, and the Secretary for War had intimated that it would be his duty, on an early day, to call attention to the subject in the course of the discussion on the Estimates. No accounts had yet been received, but there were materials for estimating the probable charge beyond what were previously possessed, and full information would be given to the House on the earliest opportunity.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he understood from the Secretary of State for War that the Government would lay upon the Table an Estimate of the probable cost of the Chinese war, and he wished to know when it is likely that that Estimate will be laid on the Table.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that was a question which the Secretary of State must answer, rather than himself; but he supposed, from the materials which were in the possession of the Government, it would be on a very early day.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—COMMITTEE.

FIRST NIGHT.

Order for Committee read.

MR. HUNT rose, according to his notice, to move

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee, that they have power to provide increased facilities for polling at Elections—”

MR. SPEAKER: It is proper that I should state to the hon. Member and the House my reason for thinking that the Instruction, which he proposes to move, would not be in order, and it is this:—That the Committee already possess power to do that which the hon. Member desires they should do, and it is a rule of the House that no Instruction shall be given to a Committee to do that which they already have the power to do. Under these circumstances, it appears to me that the proposed Motion is not in order.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. HUNT: I will at once bow to the decision of the right hon. Gentleman; but, perhaps, if I read the Instruction which I propose to move, that decision will be found not to apply. I propose to move that the Committee have power to provide increased facilities for polling at elections in the United Kingdom. The title of the Bill is to “further amend the Representation of the People in England and Wales.” As the Instruction extends to the United Kingdom, I thought it did not fall within the rule just stated.

MR. SPEAKER: That Motion is not according to the notice of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. HUNT: I beg leave to state to the House the reasons why I think it is possible to agree to my Instruction, consistently with the strict rule of the House.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I rise to order. I should like to put it to you, Sir, whether, as the hon. Member is now stating it, there is not another objection in point of order to the proposed Instruction. The Bill before the House is a Bill for Amending the Representation of the people in England and Wales. It seems to me, therefore, that an Instruction for converting it into a Bill which will be applicable to purposes connected with the United Kingdom does not come within the purview of the Bill. It is for you to say, Sir, whether an Instruction referring to the general representation can be given to the Committee on this Bill.

MR. HUNT: I speak to order. There are no doubt other Bills on the table which have reference to other parts of the United Kingdom. It is doubtful from the present state of business whether these other Bills will advance another stage this Session. There is an evil in regard to the election of the representatives of the people of the United Kingdom. I wish to see a remedy introduced for that evil, not only in regard to the representation of the people in this kingdom, but also in regard to the people of Ireland and Scotland. I therefore desire to propose that any new provision for the election of the representatives of the people shall apply to the United Kingdom, so that every part of the United Kingdom shall have the advantage of it, even though the House shall be unable to pass either of the other two Bills through a further stage.

MR. T. S. DUNCOMBE: I apprehend, if the hon. Gentleman opposite is out of order with his Instruction, that I am equally so in regard to mine of which I have given notice—

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee to give greater facility, and render more frequent, the Registration of Voters.”

There can be no doubt that the original Act of 1832 was merely to amend the representation of the people. Therefore, if the hon. Gentleman opposite is out of order, I am of course out of order. I confess, however, that when I gave notice of my Instruction, my impression was that I had the power in Committee to move clauses for improving the registration. The only thing that raised a doubt in my mind upon this point was the existence of separate Bills for the registration of voters. The Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) in 1859 was according to its title not only a Bill to amend the representation of the people, but also to facilitate the registration and the polling of electors. In regard to the addition of the words “United Kingdom,” I consider the objection taken to them a mere quibble, and unworthy of the noble Lord.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: I apprehend the rule is clear upon the point. You cannot properly move as an Instruction what the Committee can do without any Instruction. Now this is a Bill which upon the face of it is confined to England and Wales only; but the reason given by the hon. Member for Northamptonshire for his Instruction is that he desires this provision to apply not only to England and Wales, but to all other parts of the United Kingdom. I apprehend, if my hon. Friend proposed such a provision Committee on the Bill, he would be stopped on the ground that it went beyond the purview of the Bill. The hon. Gentleman therefore thought proper to give notice of his proposition in the shape of an Instruction to the Committee, and, with submission to you, Sir, I apprehend he is quite in order.

MR. DODSON said, he had given notice to introduce a provision for taking votes in the election of Members for the Universities by voting papers. He had inquired of high authority whether it was competent for him to move that clause in Committee without having previously moved an Instruction to the Committee to entertain the question, and he was informed that the subject was sufficiently germane to the Bill to be entertained without any Instruction. He therefore conceived it was competent for the hon. Member to move a more extensive question than the subject of voting papers.

MR. SPEAKER: As the notice of the hon. Gentleman stands on the paper, I think there is no doubt that the objection I have made to it is a valid objection, and that it is not competent to the hon. Member to move that Instruction. I think the addition of the words which he now proposes would rather increase the irregularity than diminish it; because as there are already two Bills before the House upon the subject of the representation of Scotland and Ireland, it will be anticipating a discussion upon those two Bills, which it is not in order to do. I therefore, think the addition of the words “in the United Kingdom” would not place the hon. Member in order, and give him power to proceed with his Motion. As to the question asked me by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Finsbury (Mr. Duncombe), I think the Instruction which he proposes to move would also not be in order, because the Committee certainly have the power to do that which he proposes to empower them to do. In the original Bill, which bears the same title, namely, “A Bill to amend the Representation of the People of England and Wales,” provisions were made for the registration of voters, and it will be perfectly competent for the hon. Member to move in Committee any clauses which he may desire to move on the subject of registration.

MR. HUNT: I feel bound, of course, to bow to your decision. But I wish to ask you, supposing that there were no Bills on the table applicable to the representation of the people of Ireland and Scotland, whether I should be in order in moving my Instruction to the Committee upon this Bill.

MR. SPEAKER: It is one of my duties to give decisions upon points of order as they arise; but not to give anticipatory decisions on hypothetical cases.

MR. HUNT: Then I withdraw my Motion.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH, who had a notice on the paper to move

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee, that no Borough shall be deprived of One Member until it has been ascertained by an actual census of the population of such Borough, whether or not the present number of its population falls below the limit of 7,000 inhabitants.”

Then rose—

MR. SPEAKER: I feel bound to state that there is an objection also to the Instruction which the hon. Member for De-vizes proposes to move. The hon. Member has given notice to move,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that no Borough shall be deprived of one Member until it has been ascertained, by an actual census of the population of such Borough, whether or not the present number of its population falls below the limit of 7,000 inhabitants."

It cannot be competent to the Committee to inquire with regard to the census. The Committee have to deal with the Bill which is placed before them, and cannot entertain any question outside its limits; therefore in my opinion this Instruction is not in order. There is another objection in point of form—that it is mandatory on the Committee as to what they are to do. The real intention of an Instruction to a Committee is to give them power to do a certain thing if they think proper to do it, not to command them to do it. For this reason, also, I think the hon. Gentleman's Motion is not in order.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he bowed to the decision of the Speaker; but if he were allowed to proceed, he thought he should be able to state to the House grounds for their assenting to his Instruction. Since he had placed his notice on the paper, the hon. Member for Rye (Mr. Mackinnon) had also placed a notice on the paper which included the object of his proposition. He was, therefore, happy to resign the matter into his more experienced hands.

MR. BENTINCK rose to move

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee not to proceed further with the Bill till provision has been made for giving to the Counties in England that share in the Representation to which they may be shown to be entitled by population and by property"—

MR. SPEAKER: The same objection exists to the hon. Gentleman's Instruction: it is mandatory in form. In fact, the House has directed the Committee to proceed with the Bill, and the hon. Member proposes by his Instruction to direct it not to proceed with the Bill until it has done something which in due course of proceeding it would be competent to do if it thought fit. The Committee may enter into the question referred to in the Instruction of the hon. Member, if it thinks fit, and dispose of it in any way. It is not necessary for it to receive an Instruction. Therefore, in my opinion, the Motion is irregular and out of order. I am bound to state that in my opinion there is no objection to the second Instruction of which the hon. Member for Norfolk has given notice. It perhaps would have saved the time of the House if I had stated generally the objections which appear to me to present themselves to the various Instructions of which notice has been given; but I thought it more respectful to each Member to wait until he rose to state the objections to his particular Instruction. There are objections to the other Instructions, some of them of a different nature to those I have stated; but I reserve any observations upon them until the time arrives for moving each of them. The second Instruction of the hon. Member for Norfolk relates to bribery and corruption. Those subjects have been dealt with almost universally by distinct Bills, and, if the Committee thought fit to deal with that question in this Bill, it would require an Instruction to enable them to do so. If, therefore, the hon. Member thinks it right to move that Instruction, in my opinion, he will be in order.

MR. BENTINCK: In reference to the first Instruction that stands on the paper in my name, I believe that it would not be competent for me, after the decision of the Speaker, to move such Instruction; and, therefore, I beg leave to rise for the purpose of speaking to order. I would commence by saying that no man in this House is more disposed to treat with the most respectful deference any decision coming from your lips, Sir, whilst sitting in that Chair. It is, therefore, far from my intention to impugn any decision you may come to. But it is clear, even in cases like the present, that there may exist a wide difference between the letter and the spirit of a rule of the House: and I think, with the permission of the House, I can show that in the present case—assuming even that your decision is strictly in accordance with the letter of the rules—that the spirit of those rules is of a character that would rather justify my proceeding with my Instruction. I am induced to persevere in it because I think that any point of this kind arising, and upon which, you, Sir, have favoured us with your opinion—if there be still any doubt upon the question, that doubt should be solved by the decision of the House. I believe that is the general rule, and with the greatest deference to your decision, I wish to bring the matter before the House. The Instruction I am moving goes to this effect—that the Committee shall not proceed further with the Bill until provision be made for certain purposes. I think it is quite clear to the House that it is impossible to move this Instruction if the Committee have already the power of dealing with the matter referred to. I would, however, suggest that it would not be competent for the Committee to deal with this particular matter unless they were empowered to do so by an Instruction. Upon these grounds I submit that I am fully justified in taking the opinion of the House as to whether my Instruction is one which ought to be dealt with on the present occasion. In no shape or way, nor by any clause, could I ask the Committee to deal with this question, so as to induce them, without an Instruction, to do that which I for one hold as a mere act of justice, and indispensable to fair dealing with this measure. Very few Members in this House will deny that taxation and representation are convertible terms; and I think that the most ardent Reformer in this House, even in the extreme sense of the word, will be prepared to admit two things—firstly, under the present state of things the rural districts are inadequately represented; and secondly, that if the Bill now before the House pass into law, they will virtually cease to be represented at all—

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE: I rise to order. There is no Question before the House.

MR. BENTINCK: Sir, I am speaking to order. ["Chair, chair!" "Order, order!"]. If the right hon. Gentleman will be good enough to favour me with his views when I have finished I shall have much pleasure in listening to him.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Allow me for one moment ["Order, order!"—"Chair, chair!"] I apprehend when a Gentleman rises to speak to order it is not before any Question has been put from the Chair, but when the Question is under discussion. There is no Question before the House on which the hon. Gentleman opposite can speak. I should like to take your decision, Mr. Speaker, on that point.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE: Exactly so. The hon. Gentleman opposite is, I apprehend, out of order, seeing that we have no Question before us.

MR. SPEAKER: I certainly understood that the hon. Gentleman intended to conclude with a Motion.

MR. BENTINCK: Sir, I undertake to conclude with a Motion:—I will move the adjournment of the House. My object in addressing the House now is to submit the interpretation of the question at issue to its decision. I do not understand upon what grounds hon. Gentlemen opposite are attempting to stifle discussion. ["No, no!"] It is very difficult for me to avoid repetitions when such pains are taken to interrupt the free discussion of this Question. I was arguing that taxation and representation are convertible terms; and that it is obvious, in the present state of the counties, that the people there are inadequately represented, and still more obvious that under this Bill they will not be represented at all. It is impossible if we go into Committee that we should be able to deal with this Question in a manner satisfactorily to solve the difficulty I have raised; and I argue that it is only by the authority of a direct Instruction from this House that the Committee can deal with the subject of remedying the gross injustice of which I complain. I hold in my hand a document which refers to this point, and deals with the question most ably. It is a speech made some time ago to his constituents by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli). The right hon. Gentleman with great clearness and ability went into this Question, and showed how monstrous was the present state of things, and how such a Bill as the present would aggravate the injustice to such an extent that it would be impossible to assent to it. The right hon. Gentleman, as I was observing, showed that there is such a discrepancy between the county and town representation that the counties in England are entitled to 132 Members more than they possess at present; that is, that the representatives of the counties are 132 short of the number they are in justice and fairness entitled to. My hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) and other hon. Members have made similar calculations and have come to a nearly similar conclusion. The smallest number claimed in addition to the present representatives is 132, the largest 137. Now, I do not think it is in the power of any hon. Member to disprove that. If so, I hope we shall have the case fully argued and dealt with before any further attempts be made to go on with this Bill. A curious document has been placed in my hands—one which shows how completely the present state of things is at variance with what has been really intended by the constitution of this country. ["Order, order!"] The hon. Member for Finsbury calls me to order. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will be kind enough to state the grounds of his opinion in considering me out of order.

MR. T. S. DUNCOMBE: Yes, I will state grounds. I called the hon. Gentleman to order for this reason:—He gave notice of an Instruction to the Committee bearing on the very question on which he is now speaking, in these terms:—"That it be an Instruction to the Committee not to proceed further with the Bill till provision has been made for giving to the counties in England that share in the representation to which they may be shown to be entitled by population and by property." You, Sir, having decided that the Instruction cannot be given, he then rises and says, "I shall move the Adjournment of the House," and proceeds to make the speech which he had intended to deliver on the Motion relative to the subject of county representation. I say that is out of order. If he moves the Adjournment of the House, he must give the reasons why the House should adjourn, and not why the counties should have more representatives.

MR. SPEAKER: There has been, without doubt, an irregularity in the course pursued by the hon. Member. The hon. Gentleman rose, and said that any decision or expression of opinion which I might give with regard to an Instruction to a Committee was subject to the confirmation of the House. It is perfectly true that any decision of the kind by myself is subject to confirmation or rejection by the House; and I understood the hon. Member to question the correctness of my decision, and that he proposed to submit it to the decision of the House. I certainly must point out to the hon. Member that the course he is now pursuing, in moving the adjournment of the House for the purpose of making his speech, is not in accordance with the statement which he made or in conformity with correct practice. It is necessary for the hon. Member, if he questions the decision given from the Chair, to conclude with a Motion framed so as to subject that decision to the judgment of the House in a distinct form.

MR. BENTINCK: Sir, I moved the adjournment of the House because I understood you to say that it was not open to me to deal with the subject in any other way. But if you think that the more correct course for me to pursue is to move that in the opinion of the House the Instruction I propose ought to be given to the Committee, I am perfectly ready to take that course. You, Sir, must be extremely obliged to my hon. Friend for having voluntarily undertaken a portion of your very onerous duty. As you, Sir, did not interrupt me I went on presuming that I was in order, until the hon. Gentleman called me to order, and in so doing attached some blame to you for not having stopped me sooner; but as you did not, I must presume that my hon. Friend is rather premature in interrupting me. In order to satisfy my hon. Friend, who seems to be so sensitive on points of order, I will adopt what I now understand to be the proper course of proceeding by moving that this Instruction be given to the Committee. I hope that will satisfy my hon. Friend. Well, when my hon. Friend was good enough to interpose I was about to say that in the paper which I hold in my hand there is a passage regarding the state of the law in an early period of our Constitution, and which shows the vast difference between the existing state of things and those of that time in respect of our county constituencies.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I rise to order. In the hon. Gentleman's argument I understood him to say that he was about to move—and it certainly was a very proper Motion and one quite competent for him to make—that it be an Instruction to the Committee not to proceed further with the Bill. The words he has given notice of to that effect would be in order, and could be properly considered by the House. That is a perfectly intelligible proposition, and it is quite competent for the hon. Gentleman to proceed with his argument; but it is not competent for him to state that, according to the argument which he is about to put forward, the counties are not properly represented; because, supposing him to prove that the counties ought to get 130 or 150 Members more, it would not advance him in his argument. What he requires to show is that he could not move that in Committee.

MR. BENTINCK: I ought to feel extremely grateful at the kind attention and considerate courtesy shown me by hon. Gentlemen and noble Lords opposite. I cannot be insensible to the kindness of the noble Lord in coming to help me, seeing the lame way in which I am proceeding; but with great deference to the noble Lord, I am not at all sure that I cannot make good my case in my own way without his able assistance. The noble Lord uses a most extraordinary argument. He says I am perfectly in order in my Motion, but then he objects to my endeavouring to show that the counties are not fairly represented. Why, that is the whole gist of my argument. If I do not prove it I prove nothing. He says, "go into your objection, but do not go into the subject-matter of it." Merely reminding the House that these delays are not of my seeking, and trusting that I may not again excite the sympathy and enlist the support of hon. Members, I will again refer to the pamphlet of which I have already spoken, which most forcibly establishes the inadequacy of the representation of the rural districts. "In the early periods of the Constitution," it states, "the tax-payers were divided into two distinct classes, the landed proprietors and the tradesmen; and it was required that these two classes should be kept wholly distinct." ["Question, question!"] Perhaps some other Gentleman had a suggestion to make.

MR. RICH: Yes, I have. I beg leave to ask a question. I wish to know whether it is competent to a Gentleman who rises to argue whether the decision of the Speaker is right or wrong to assume that the question has been carried in his favour, and to proceed to argue a question which you, Sir, have decided he ought not to argue.

MR. SPEAKER:—I have been unwilling to interrupt the hon. Member for West Norfolk, but certainly what was stated by the noble Lord is perfectly correct. The hon. Member ought to proceed to show why the Committee have not the power to do that which, in the opinion I have already declared, is within their province. The question is not whether the counties are adequately represented, or whether the boroughs have too many Members and the counties too few; because it will be perfectly competent for the House in Committee, if they think fit, to take from the representation of the boroughs and to add to that of the counties; and the hon. Member, if he feels it right to do so, will have the power of moving in Committee that a subtraction be made from the number of borough Members and an addition to the county representatives. Of course, I am only stating what it will be competent for them to do. I must point out to the hon. Member, though he rises to order, that it is possible to be not in order in the statement which he is making on the subject of order, and that the sufficiency of the representation of counties or boroughs is not the question which is now before the House.

MR. BENTINCK: I repeat that nothing is further from my wish than to gain-say any opinion of yours, Sir, or to violate any rule of the House; but I distinctly understood you to lay down that I was at liberty to refer a decision of yours on the rules of the House to the House. I am doing that in a legitimate and proper manner. ["No, no."] In order to do that I must state the grounds on which I dissent from the opinion which you have given; otherwise it seems to me that it would be impossible for me to make out my case. ["No, no."] I have no wish to go on in despite of the opinion of the House. If the House think that I ought not to proceed with the point I shall not do so; but I must bid the House bear in mind, and the county Members bear in mind, that I thought I should have received more assistance from them in fighting the battle of their constituencies, and that if those constituencies are fleeced and thrown over by this Bill it is not my fault. I shall go on with the Instruction which you, Sir, have decided to be perfectly regular, and which has reference to a subject which is of vital importance to the welfare of the country and also to the character of this House itself. The present mode of treating bribery and corruption is not only a scandal to the House of Commons, but tends to make it the laughing-stock of the country. The omission of all attempts to deal with this evil is one of the most glaring omissions of the present Bill. Such a provision is most essential in a Bill of this kind; because, in the main, the sole feature of the measure was to extend the franchise among that class of the electors who, whether justly or not, have always been esteemed to be the portion of the constituency which is most liable to the temptation of bribery. It appears to me that this hiatus is of itself sufficient to prevent the House from proceeding with the Bill till the deficiency is supplied. What has been the case up to the present time? What has been the Parliamentary history of bribery and corruption? I am not prepared to say for how long, but for centuries past there have been petitions, election Committees, Royal Commissions, and, above all, and at all times and all occasions, the strongest expressions of reprobation and disgust from the House of Commons, but more especially from the Liberal side, whenever their ears were offended by the recital of these vicious and mischievous practices. And what has been the result?

[First Night.]

The whole thing has ended in one result—a very considerable outlay, and a very considerable cost for Committees and Commissions. Beyond that not a single step has been taken to check bribery and corruption. The records of those Committees and Commissions we have on the shelves of our library; and they state very remarkable facts. I shall not weary the House by long quotations, but I shall take the liberty of referring to one or two passages. The Committee on the Wakefield Election make a very short Report; but in it they say that at the last election for the borough the Member was guilty of bribery; it cites various cases and winds up in these words:—"There is reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the last election for the said borough of Wakefield." That is a very large and very populous Liberal constituency; yet the Committee declare the corruption to have been general; and it is clear that either a majority of the electors participated in the bribery or did not show themselves to be very much shocked at it; because there can be no doubt that if a large majority of the electors of Wakefield had set their face against bribery, that fact must have put a stop to its extensive prevalence. Therefore, even though a majority were not guilty of it, it is only by their connivance it can prevail. The Committee on the Gloucester Election wind up their Report by saying "The Committee believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the last election for the city of Gloucester." That is another large Liberal constituency. There is another Report which contains a somewhat similar statement with reference to Huddersfield. In 1854 a Commission sat upon election proceedings in Hull, and their Report and the other documents to which I have referred prove to demonstration that the practice of this House is not to deal with the question of bribery. Persons have been named as guilty of that offence, but no consequence has followed—they go about as if nothing had happened, and are looked upon as favourably in this House and out of it as if it had not. The Commission to which I have just referred to reports, "We find that systematic corruption has uniformly prevailed at all the elections for Hull to which our attention has been called?" What has been the result? Have any steps been taken to put a stop to the bribery and corruption in Hull? I am not aware that any act followed the publication of the Report contained in a very voluminous Report which I hold in my hand. The same Report says, "We find that at the election of 1841 there was systematic bribery on behalf of Sir Walter James, with his knowledge and consent." I do not know that any step has been taken against him. The Committee also find that systematic bribery prevailed on behalf of Sir John Hanmer. They make the same finding with respect to James Clay, Esq., and also with reference to General Perronet Thompson, though they express some doubt as to whether the gallant Gentleman was cognizant of the fact. They further find systematic bribery on behalf of Lord Goderich, though they are not satisfied it was committed with his knowledge, and they give him the benefit of the doubt. Looking at all this, it is impossible to resist the conclusion that whenever a discussion has taken place in this House on the subject of bribery and corruption, the whole thing has been nothing but a broad farce, strong though the denunciations and eloquent though the speeches have been on those occasions. Committees and Commissions simply mean shelving the question. Is this state of things to continue? What does the Bill of the noble Lord propose to do? As I have already observed, it proposes to extend the franchise among the very class of men who are allowed not to be the most unassailable by this species of corruption. The noble Lord must acknowledge this:—it is a fact that poor men are more open to the temptations of electoral bribery and corruption than those in better circumstances. They would be more than human if they were not. The noble Lord knows that a large proportion of those whom he is about to enfranchise only value the franchise for what it will fetch. That is notoriously the case. I appeal to hon. Members, not only on this, but on the other side of the House, to state here what I have heard them admit in private, namely, that hundreds of those to whom the noble Lord is about to extend the franchise will stand aside at any election waiting to see how much they can get for their votes. Are you, then, prepared gravely and deliberately to increase tenfold the area for bribery and corruption without taking any precaution against it? Will the noble Lord rise in his place in this House and defend such a course? Will he rise and say that the effect of his Bill will not be to extend largely the area for bribery and corruption? I do not anticipate that I shall hear the noble Lord do anything of the kind. If not, will the noble Lord be good enough to tell us on what ground he proposes to enlarge the area of bribery and corruption without taking any precautionary measures? It is a very curious fact, but one not the less true—that the last fifty-seven cases of bribery which have been investigated by Committees of this House have been, without exception, committed in boroughs. There has not out of these fifty-seven been one single case of bribery in a county. What is the result of this? That the boroughs are returning Members who are sent here under the influence of disreputable practices, and who in consequence of the manner of their election have no right to seats in this House; but who, nevertheless are, by reason of their number, sufficient to override and decide the fate of those who have been fairly and honestly returned. Is this a just state of things? Is the noble Lord prepared to defend that? If he is, it will require more than his usual ability to enable him to accomplish his task. There are certain penalties provided in the case of bribery and corruption, but no attempt is made to inflict them, and therefore the whole thing becomes a farce. Again, there is a regulation that men holding certain posts under Government shall not have the right to vote. If, because a small salary arising from an office, the duties of which a man discharges faithfully, is likely to sway his vote, and therefore he is not to be looked upon as an independent voter, and is to be deprived of his vote, might we not be as scrupulous with regard to our own character, and see whether we could not produce a measure to remove imputations against the character of the Members of this House? I cannot see on what ground a man who keeps a post-office at £4 a year is not to vote for a Member of Parliament, when a right hon. Gentleman on the Treasury bench, who receives £5,000 a year, is allowed to vote on every question that is brought before us. That seems to be an anomaly which, when we are dealing with a question affecting the representation of the people, and when we are going to attempt to prevent bribery and corruption, ought not to be lost sight of. Whatever may be the crime, the disrepute which attaches to the voter with £4 a year, who is induced to go, not strictly according to his conscience, in voting for the most eligible Member of Parliament, that disrepute is increased ten thousand-fold in the case of the Minister who is receiving a very large salary, and is compelled at various times to vote, not confessedly but notoriously, against the opinions which he entertains. It, therefore, appears to me to be essential, in order to relieve public men from one of the greatest stains that can be possibly attached to their character, that no man should be allowed to receive a salary, and to vote in this House. Unless you are prepared to do this, you cannot remove the stain which attaches to the proceeding I have mentioned; and you never will persuade the electors or the public that you are dealing fairly with the people on the question of bribery. I again say, is any comparison to be drawn between a man with £4 a year, giving an occasional vote, and the Statesman with many thousands, voting against his convictions, not once, but perhaps many times, during a Session? The House can hardly be prepared to say that they should not be relieved from such an imputation on their character. It must, at all events, be very distasteful to them, to hear the comments often made on the subject in this House, and in the journals; they must writhe under the imputations, and there is but one way of doing away with them—namely, to put the voter and the Minister on the same footing, and say that no money should pass in either case where there was a vote; that the Minister should have the choice of the salary or the vote. We should then know whether men served their country for ambition or profit; and that seems to me to be a most desirable item of knowledge. At all events, it would relieve Ministers from the imputation that they take large salaries for doing that for which many poor voters are prosecuted. Therefore, whenever the time comes, I shall move that no Minister in this House, receiving a salary under the Crown, shall be allowed to have a vote. I again appeal to the noble Lord, whether he is prepared to say that the effect of his Bill will not be to largely increase the area of bribery and corruption; and unless he is prepared to make that statement, I will ask him to state on what grounds he is prepared to defend its enactments. The hon. Member concluded by moving,

That it be an Instruction to the Committee, that they have power to make provision for the better prevention of Bribery and Corruption at Elections.

Lord JOHN RUSSELL: It has been
[First Night.]

the usual course to deal with the subject of the representation of the people and the collateral one of the prevention and punishment of bribery and corruption by means of separate Bills. That, in my opinion, is a course to which it is desirable to adhere. The questions of the extension of the suffrage and the re-distribution of seats are in themselves extremely important, and it would not, I think, be conducive to the public interest that we should introduce in a measure dealing with them provisions relating to bribery and corrupt practices. I have, however, no objection that the House should in Committee take the matter into consideration; nay, more, it appears to me that we are bound to lend to any proposition which the hon. Gentleman may make with the view of preventing, as far as possible, the recurrence of that offence, a favourable ear. But while I am of that opinion I entirely dissent from the view of the probable operation of the present Bill which the hon. Gentleman entertains. I do not think its tendency will be to increase bribery and corruption; still less do I imagine his proposal that Members of this House holding office under the Crown should be deprived of the right to vote would prove conducive to the public advantage. Holding the view which the hon. Gentleman does on the subject, he must, it seems to me, be prepared to go one step further and to preclude Members of the Government from having seats in this House. Now, that is a question which was a century and a half ago very much debated, and, in fact, our whole system of Parliamentary Government is based on the provisions then adopted, after being discussed at great length; and I for one do not think it would be advisable to adopt the change. The hon. Gentleman is probably aware that the offences of bribery and corruption have lately been the subject of investigation before a Committee up-stairs, which has reported and sent us down some thirty or forty Resolutions as the fruit of its labours. These afford matter for consideration on the part of the House, and will probably be found of sufficient importance to form the subject of a separate Bill. For my own part, however, I must say that, having had a good deal of experience in matters of this nature, I am not very sanguine with respect to the efficient working of any legislative provision for the prevention of bribery. If, as I have repeatedly observed, both parties to the offence are disposed to commit it—if the candidate is willing to pay £5 to an elector for his vote, and the latter is willing to receive it—they will not have much difficulty in acting upon their individual inclinations. The best mode of preventing bribery under those circumstances is, in my opinion, to preclude those who are guilty of it from obtaining the results which they proposed to themselves to accomplish. If a candidate, after having spent some £3,000 or £4,000 on an election, finds that for having done certain illegal acts he is deprived, by means of a Committee of this House, of his seat, much will be done to prevent bribery, inasmuch as it will come to be regarded as useless and unprofitable. I do not deny that while there are men having long purses who are desirous of bribing the poor voter, it will, as a matter of course, be difficult to provide against the offer being accepted—it was so before the Reform Act, and it is so now—it was the case at Gloucester and Wakefield, and may be again. But, on the other hand, if the rich man who is guilty of such practices fails as a consequence in securing the object for which he seeks, he will be deterred from repeating the offence. Be that, however, as it may, if the hon. Member for West Norfolk or any other Member thinks he has any proposal to make which will put a stop to bribery and corruption, I am not disposed to prevent an Instruction being given to the Committee.

MR. WHITESIDE: Sir, I confess I have heard the observations which the noble Lord has just made with some degree of disappointment. The question which we are engaged in discussing is not, I would remind him, one with respect to which the practical reformer can afford to indulge in speculation. It is, upon the contrary, one which addresses itself to the good sense and experience of the House, inasmuch as it involves the consideration whether the Bill of the noble Lord, as I will endeavour to prove is the opinion of the noble Viscount at the head of the Government, would not turn out to be more injurious than otherwise to the country if the question of bribery and corrupt practices were not in the first instance dealt with. The noble Lord told us in what the offence of bribery consists, alluding to an offer of £5 made by a candidate and accepted by the voter; but he furnished no answer to my hon. Friend the Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), who clearly demonstrated from the documents to which he referred that bribery and corruption have been more prevalent since the passing of the Reform Act, and that it has prevailed more in boroughs than in counties; and having demonstrated that such was the case, he contends that the present is the proper time to grapple with so great an evil. Now, the subject is one to which our attention has already been drawn in the course of this Session. I find that on the 24th of January last a rather sharp discussion took place in this House on the Motion for issuing new writs for Gloucester and Wakefield. The Government was upon that occasion asked whether their contemplated Reform Bill would contain clauses striking at the root of the offence of which we are now speaking?—and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department met the inquiry with his usual good sense. The right hon. Gentleman said there had been a Reform Bill and a Corrupt Practices Act, in order, as I suppose, to cure the mischiefs of the Reform Act. But my hon. Friend contends that the system heretofore pursued of having a separate measure for the Amendment of the representation, and then a separate measure to cure the evils which the representation Bill may cause, is an ill-advised course, and that, therefore, we ought to endeavour to grapple with the evil you mean to create, as the noble Lord does by his new Reform Bill. The right hon. Gentleman, on the occasion to which I have alluded, said, The Government have under their consideration—I do not place so much reliance on that—the Government have under their consideration a measure on this subject; we are prepared and hope to be able to introduce a Bill for materially altering the Corrupt Practices Act, and also for amending the procedure for the trial of election petitions. I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman that that subject is important—much more important than the Reform Bill, because it goes to the purification of the House, whereas the noble Lord's Bill may add to the corruption that at present exists. I have no complaint to make of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, because he announced that the intention of the Government was drawn to this subject in connection with the subject of Parliamentary Reform; and the proposition of my hon. Friend is in exact consistence with the course which the right hon. Gentleman threw out. Then I find the hon-

and learned Member for Nottingham (Mr. Mellor) a supporter of the Government, but an independent one, on the 31st of January brought in a Bill to accomplish something in this direction. That Bill had the great merit of being intelligible; and it would be important to say as much if one could of this Bill to amend the representation of the people. The hon. Member proposed to punish those who took bribes, and change, in some respect the law of evidence, and do several other things to enable him to grapple with the evil. On that occasion the noble Viscount at the head of the Government made a speech which showed his great knowledge of mankind and of Reform Bills, and I would, for a moment, draw the attention of the House to a single sentence spoken by the noble Viscount on that occasion.

MR. SPEAKER: That was a speech made in the present Session of Parliament, and it is irregular for the right hon. and learned Gentleman to refer to it.

MR. WHITESIDE: I have seen it somewhere in print, Sir. Our memory is sharp and good whenever the noble Viscount speaks, and on the occasion to which I allude he spoke so plainly that it was impossible to forget what he said. He differed from the noble Lord. He said the liking of bribery is not in the House of Commons, but among the lower class of the electors of the country. It is the inclination of the lower class of electors who have votes to be bribed that causes the mischief. This was the argument of the noble Viscount. The seat of corruption is not in the House of Commons—no body of gentlemen can be more anxious than they to put down corruption; but what can we do when we have a low class of electors willing to be bribed? What, then, is the Bill of the noble Lord? It will increase the number of those who are ready to be bribed, and so add to the mischief—not intentionally to be sure, so far as the noble Lord is concerned, for there is not a more sincere advocate for purity of representation than the noble Lord; but latterly he has been labouring in vain, for according to the noble Viscount the lower class of electors are the cause of the existence of bribery. That opinion, so announced by the noble Viscount, sufficiently justifies the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for West Norfolk; because the projected Reform Bill will increase the mischief unless we grapple with it at once. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Suffolk

[First Night.]

(Sir F. Kelly) had also a Bill on this subject; but it was distinctly stated and admitted that unless the Government took up the subject, unless the Government either introduced clauses in the Reform Bill or brought forward a measure to accompany the Reform Bill, this great evil will never be redressed. The hon. and learned Member for Nottingham's Bill was read a first time, and on the 15th of February he got the advice invariably given by official men to their supporters, in this way:—Your Bill is excellent, the intention is good; but it will be better to leave it for future consideration. Let the matter rest; you have done your duty by bringing in the Bill; we do not intend to carry it; it is well meant; we will have a Committee—that is the usual way of shelving a subject of this nature for the Session. The hon. and learned Member was accordingly induced to give it up. [Mr. MELLOR: It stands on the paper still.] Well, it stands still, and is, I suppose, likely to stand still in all time to come. I thought it had been given up when the Committee, moved by the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone, was appointed to deal with the Corrupt Practices Act. The Home Secretary pronounced a strong opinion on the provisions of that measure. He said that a Committee or Commission had declared the Corrupt Practices Act to be of no avail, and therefore he intimated that the Government had some large, statesmanlike measure to put down corruption. The Committee were appointed; the Committee sat, and, as the noble Lord has stated, they drew up a formidable Report, containing thirty or forty recommendations. If that be so, we are now in a very favourable situation for dealing with this question; and I put it to the good sense of the noble Lord that it would be well to withdraw his Bill, which, according to the noble Viscount, by increasing the lower class of electors, will add to the mischief, and increase the corruption complained of. This will enable us to proceed with a measure that will do all the noble Lord anticipates, and put a check on practices against which the morality and virtue of this country have so loudly pronounced. The hon. and learned Member for Nottingham said the evil was not in the character of the people, but in the infirmity of the law. Where there is an inclination to be bribed, however, where poverty and destitution prevail, where there is a low class to be tempted by money, you cannot eradicate bribery and corruption; but you may do something to show your sense of the evil and its magnitude. I therefore think the Government are bound either by this Bill, or one accompanying it, to deal with this subject in the manner in which my hon. Friend has pointed out.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: The hon. and learned Gentleman has made a speech in support of a Motion for an Instruction to the Committee, giving them power to insert certain clauses relating to bribery and corruption; and with a view of supporting that Motion he recommends my noble Friend to withdraw the Bill into which those clauses are to be introduced; thus, so far as I understand, rendering the Motion he supported entirely nugatory and absurd. I have no wish to engage the House in a premature and fruitless discussion on the subject of bribery and corruption. The hon. and learned Gentleman has given a perfectly accurate detail of what passed on the subject during this Session. It is quite true that I stated that Her Majesty's Government had the subject under their careful and detailed consideration; and it is true that they had prepared certain measures which, under other circumstances than those which have since occurred, they would have been prepared to submit to the House. But some other Bills were brought in which were referred to a Select Committee. A Select Committee was appointed to inquire into the operation of the Corrupt Practices Act. Of that Committee my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and myself were Members. It sat a great many times, took most important and valuable evidence, and framed a large number of Resolutions, which embraced the whole of the subject of bribery, and also the question of the amendment of the present Corrupt Practices Act. That Report is on the table, although it has not yet been circulated among Members, and will afford a basis for a reconsideration of the law whenever the time arrives when that task can be undertaken. I, therefore, think that, although the Committee may obtain under this Instruction the power of introducing these clauses, it will be far more convenient to consider the subject in connection with the amendment or rearrangement of the Corrupt Practices Act. That will be a far more advantageous mode of approaching the subject than that proposed by the hon. Gentleman. With regard to the question of the Members of the Executive Government having their seats in this House, it is wholly unconnected with the subject of bribery and corruption. The present law is, that in general persons holding office under the Crown are not disqualified for voting for Members of Parliament except those connected with the Revenue Boards, and that is the cause why postmasters are disfranchised; but I believe there is no truth in the doctrine that persons holding office under the Crown generally are disqualified.

MR. KNIGHTLEY said, he had put a Notice upon the paper to move that it be an Instruction to the Committee that they should have power to provide for taking the poll at elections by means of voting papers. He believed that voting papers would, in a great measure, do away with direct bribery; but, upon consideration, he would not press his Motion. It was not unworthy of remark, however, that much of the bribery recently brought to light had taken place in the model boroughs—such as Wakefield and Huddersfield for instance—which owed their very existence to the passing of the old Reform Bill.

MR. WYLD had heard with extreme satisfaction the observations of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Bentinek) about the necessity of adopting measures to put a stop to bribery, and he had hoped as the hon. Gentleman moved the Instruction to the Committee, that, as he had seen the evil, he would be prepared to furnish a remedy. However, he would himself propose to add to the Resolution of the hon. Member what would be a sufficient remedy, and that was, that the votes of electors should be taken by ballot. The hon. Member thought that the Bill for the amendment of the representation of the people would extend the area of corruption. He (Mr. Wyld) had no doubt that it would extend the area not only of corruption but of intimidation. The hon. Gentleman stated that bribery existed only in boroughs and not in counties; but those who were conversant with counties knew that, although there was no bribery there, yet there was intimidation to a great extent. He believed that the only remedy for this evil was the adoption of the vote by ballot. He should not have presented himself to the House at that moment but that he intended to move a clause in Committee to carry out that object. The necessity for some remedy was felt by every Member of that House. Unless some remedy against corruption was provided, he thought the Bill of the noble Lord would extend instead of diminishing the evil. He therefore begged to propose, as an addition to the Resolution, the words "And for that purpose that the votes of the electors be taken by ballot."

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is not in order. He will have it in his power to effect his object, by moving a clause in Committee; providing for the taking of votes by ballot, and therefore it was not competent for him to add words to the Resolution authoritatively directing the adoption of such a clause.

MR. MELLOR said, that no person had a greater desire than himself to see the laws for the prevention of bribery and corruption put on a sound basis; but a more inopportune Motion than that of the hon. Member for Norfolk he could not conceive. Why were they to mix one question with another? The country would not believe that this Motion was a real, a sincere, and an earnest Motion, brought forward under the circumstances under which it was brought forward. He should not hesitate to recommend to all persons on this side of the House not to vote for the Instruction of the hon. Member for Norfolk, because he felt that they would not proceed to consider that Instruction under circumstances at all favourable. Believing this to be a Motion not honestly designed to advance the amendment of the law, but simply to delay the progress of the measure of the noble Lord, he hoped hon. Members would not fall into the trap. If they did they would do so with their eyes open, and would lend themselves to the delay and prevention of the passing of this important measure, which he believed, notwithstanding all that had been said, the country did desire to see passed.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, that it was very well for the hon. Member for Nottingham to pretend to a monopoly of purity and to cast reflections upon other hon. Members, but he begged to remind him of a scene which he witnessed in that House only the other night. He then heard the Attorney General state the necessity under which he felt himself of prosecuting two persons against whom charges of bribery had been made; and he saw several hon. Members rise up to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman not to enforce the full severity of the law. Among those who were most earnest upon that occasion was the great apostle of democracy, the hon. Member for Birmingham. With that stain upon the reputation of those who sat upon the Ministerial side of the House in respect to purity of election, it did not become the hon. Member to cast reflections upon those who sat opposite to him. They had every reason to proceed with this Instruction to the Committee. They had had from two Ministers of the Crown declarations more calculated to raise alarm in the minds of those who dreaded the increase of bribery than any that it had ever before been his fortune to hear. The Home Secretary had recommended—and perhaps with great justice—that they should not proceed by way of Instruction, but should rely upon a Bill that was still to be brought forward, which would embody the recommendations of the Committee which had so long sat to investigate the subject. If that recommendation stood by itself it might deserve their attention; but then the noble Lord the Member for London said he had little faith in the passing of the measures that might be proposed on the subject of bribery: and they all knew what weight to attach to despairing words like those coming from a Minister on the 4th of June. If, therefore, no Instruction of this kind were adopted, and the Reform Bill were to pass, it would pass without there being any sincere intention on the part of the Treasury Bench to accompany it with a measure to secure purity of election. There were two ways in which the noble Lord's Reform Bill would increase bribery, which it was their duty to counteract. It both increased the number of bribees and the number of bribers. Which of two classes of men was more likely to accept bribes for their votes—those who could live without them, or those who could not? There could be no doubt that the man who had the most difficulty in maintaining himself free from embarrassment and debt would be the most likely person to sell his constitutional right. That opinion did not rest upon mere theory—it was proved by pregnant facts. What was the case with our Municipal Corporations? Had not bribery to an enormous extent been discovered in them? Yet in these Municipal Corporations the franchise was lower than in Parliamentary elections. On the other hand, in the counties, where the suffrage was considerably higher than in the boroughs, they knew perfectly well that not one case of bribery had been discovered, although many had been discovered in the boroughs. At Gloucester, Berwick, Norwich, Beverley, Hull, and other notorious places, there were large numbers of freemen; and that was the class from which the noble Lord proposed to take his new constituents. As they extended the area of the suffrage they would therefore also extend the area of corruption. But it was not merely on the bribees that the noble Lord's Bill would have this effect. It would have a direct influence in increasing the number of bribers. He did not believe they would ever reach that millennium when the poor man would refuse £5 when offered to him for his vote. But bribery might possibly be got rid of through the action of public opinion upon the class who offered bribes. What, then, would be the position in which they would stand after this Bill passed? They would have the power of legislation taken from the well-to-do class and placed in the hands of the poor. The power of taxing the rich would be possessed by the poor. All those questions of finance which that House now debated would then be decided by people who had not to bear the burden. When that tyranny existed was it to be supposed the wealthier classes would submit without a struggle to regain their rights, or make no attempt to restore that just and equal taxation which this legislation was refusing to them? On this point they had the example of America before their eyes. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory), in a speech which much delighted and astonished the House, proved that in no place did bribery prevail on a larger scale than in that model Republic. There, when matters became very bad and the rights of property were likely to be infringed, the wealthier inhabitants of the same county or state united together and bought up all the elections at one fell swoop. If this Bill passed the same course would assuredly be taken in self-defence by the richer classes in this country. If, following the example of America, political power were transferred here to those who did not pay the taxes, depend upon it our wealthier classes would be found imitating the course pursued by the corresponding class in America, and endeavouring by corrupt and illegitimate means—but still by the only means left open to them—to obtain the justice that was denied to them. The subject of voting papers, which an hon. Gentleman (Mr. Knightley) had referred to, deserved the serious consideration of the House in reference to the question of bribery and corruption. The hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) had lately attempted to prove, in a very able speech, that the ballot prevented bribery in Australia, but he had only succeeded in showing that it would prevent what might be called "afternoon bribery; that was, it would prevent the purchase of votes by rival candidates who were running each other very close late in the day, by keeping from them the knowledge of the state of the poll. Now, by the system of voting papers "afternoon bribery" might be effectually prevented, for if a large number of voters sent in their voting papers only a short time before the close of the poll, it would be impossible for the candidates to discover at the polling places how the contest was going on, and, therefore, its adoption would secure all the advantages claimed for the Ballot without any of the debasing associations which belonged to secret voting. This was one only of many suggestions that might be made on the subject. In conclusion, he urged upon the House that the main danger to be apprehended from this precipitate change was a vast increase of electoral corruption, and that they would not be doing their duty to their constituents unless they bound up indissolubly the questions of reform and purity.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, the practical question before the House was, what was the best mode of checking practices which they all equally condemned. The hon. Member for Norfolk wished to accomplish that object by introducing clauses for the purpose into a Bill which he said would increase corruption, because it would extend the franchise. That was the chief burden of the hon. Gentleman's song. The hon. Gentleman was for insulting the constituencies about to be reconstructed by adopting stringent provisions for arresting that deluge of corruption which he so confidently predicted. That, however, was neither the right time nor the right way for dealing with this question. A Committee to whom the subject had been referred, had, after much deliberation, made their recommendations to the House, and they had almost a pledge from the Home Secretary to bring in a Bill embodying those recommendations and enabling the House to deal practically and substantially with this question. The hon. Member for Norfolk was not anxious to expedite the passing of the Reform Bill; his great anxiety was to stop corruption, and his mode of doing that was by tacking on to this Bill provisions which he hoped would have the effect of destroying it altogether. How did the matter stand before the House? They had six Resolutions to be moved on the Question "That the Speaker do leave the Chair," and also eight pages of Amendments to discuss when they got into Committee. Without imputing motives to the noble Lord who spoke last, he must ask, that if to the eight pages of Amendments already on the paper were to be added ten or twelve more on the subject of bribery, what possible chance could there be of passing this Bill? The real object of the hon. Gentlemen opposite, although they had not the courage to avow it by making a distinct Motion to that effect, was to delay this Bill, so that it might not reach the House of Lords. He hoped the House would not consent to an Instruction that would only make confusion worse confounded.

SIR GEORGE GREY wished to explain that his noble Friend (Lord John Russell) said that he would assent to the Instruction but without pledging himself to the details. All the noble Lord said he would do was, that if the hon. Member for West Norfolk wished to propose in Committee some provisions tending to prevent bribery and corruption, he would not shut him out from doing so; and to that extent only was he prepared to accede to the Instruction. He desired merely to reserve for the consideration of the Committee whether it was expedient to mix up those provisions with the Reform Bill, or whether it would be better to proceed by way of a separate Bill, founded on the recommendation of the Select Committee to whom the subject had been referred.

MR. A. MILLS said, he repudiated, in common he believed with those on his side of the House, the imputation cast upon them by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Bouverie). He desired, and he said it conscientiously, that this Bill should be passed in an amended form during the present Session, and it was a monstrous and very unfair imputation to make against those who were desirous merely of moulding it into a satisfactory and statesmanlike shape, that their suggestions were made with a view to delay the measure. He had a specific reason for supporting the proposition of the hon. Member for West Norfolk, because it raised the question whether into this so-called Reform Bill they should introduce clauses to purify the representation of the people, or leave that object to be attained by a separate Bill based on the recommendation of the Select Committee which had just reported on that department of the subject. For his own part, he thought that provisions against bribery and corruption at elections should form part of a great measure for reforming the representation of the people. Out of doors far more interest attached to this question than to the problem of extended representation. The Corrupt Practices Amendment Bill, if passed this Session, would have precisely the same origin and the same objects as the Corrupt Practices Bill itself; and it would be in the recollection of the House that a right hon. Gentleman who had sat in Parliament for a quarter of a century had declared, before a Commission appointed to inquire into the corrupt practices of a certain borough, that he had always treated that Act as a dead letter. Now, it appeared to him important that they should frame their laws in such a way that hon. Members should have their attention called to such measures, and should not treat them as "dead letters." Some hesitation would be felt, for instance, in saying that a Reform Bill, if passed, was at any time to be considered as a "dead letter." With respect to the causes and remedies of electoral corruption, many theories and opinions had been advocated. It had been said that the effect of the Bill being to increase the number of electors, it would necessarily increase the amount of corruption. He did not think this at all a necessary consequence, nor that corruption would be necessarily increased by lowering the franchise. He did not believe that the very poorest people were the most corrupt; but he did believe that the main source of the evil was to be found in that House itself, in the principle, or more properly speaking, want of principle, by which hon. Members sought the suffrages of the electors. He, therefore, maintained that it would be absurd and useless to attempt to pass any Bill for a real Reform in the representation of the people so long as such practices as those which were disclosed before the Wakefield and Gloucester Commissions were allowed to take place with impunity. He did not allude to any of the cases of bribery that actually occurred; but when a right hon. Gentleman who had been upwards of twenty years a Member of that House, stated that he had employed a gentleman to send down £500 to a certain borough; when it was admitted that that gentleman passed under a false name, and was at the same time employed in bribing another town; when it was further proved that the agent selected by the right hon. Gentleman employed a sub-deputy who shammed illness at Gloucester, and employed a barmaid to telegraph to London for more money, under the name of "medicine;" and when that right hon. Gentleman, upon being asked whether he did not consider the sending of £500 under such circumstances a corrupt practice, protected himself by saying it was an unfair question, he (Mr. Mills) maintained that when such subterfuges were practised it was idle for them to attempt any legislation. He said, let them make an effort, if they could, to improve the system in that quarter in which it most needed improvement—namely, in the principle upon which hon. Members attempted to obtain the suffrages of those electors whom they aspired to represent. If they voluntarily closed their eyes to the inevitably corrupting tendencies of their own acts, what was the use of legislating against them? If, however, they did attempt legislation, let them not trust to chance, or depend upon the results of a Select Committee, but deal with bribery and corruption as the most scandalous of those abuses which they were called upon to eradicate by a great and comprehensive measure of Parliamentary Reform.

SIR JOHN HANMER said, in allusion to an observation made by a previous speaker, that, as far as he remembered, he might have stated that nineteen years ago the payments at Hull were made in the way of head-money; and he remembered that, when the Report to which the hon. Member had alluded was issued, he had not agreed with the Committee about that election, and for a very good reason; namely, that it was then not at all certain whether the payment of head-money was illegal. After 1841 a Bill was actually passed declaring such payments illegal: and this showed that the doubts he had entertained were tolerably well founded. But, however, with regard to the principal question now at issue—namely, what was the best way of stopping illegal practices at elections?—he certainly thought it a great mistake to suppose that bribery would be promoted by an extension of the suffrage, or that the disposition to accept or offer bribes was to be found more in one part of the community than another. It was a simple fact—he would not mention names—that the most corrupt election that had ever taken place since the Reform Act, was a county election. He knew, of his own knowledge, that that election was petitioned against; and that the Member thought himself an exceedingly lucky individual when he got out of the Committee-room by resigning his seat. ["Name, name."] It was quite unnecessary to mention names; the fact was recorded in the blue-books, and he was ready to show it to any hon. Member who wished to see it. It was not an election in which he was concerned. For his own part, he thought the best way of putting down bribery was greatly to extend the franchise; because his experience had taught him that the most honest of all electors were the "scot-and-lot" voters [laughter]. This, he could assure hon. Gentlemen was a simple fact. Bribery might be likened to the dry rot, and ought to be treated in a similar manner by being "put down," as soon as it was discovered. The best way was to put in force the laws against bribery. The existing laws against bribery were stringent enough; and if the process of disfranchisement had been resorted to oftener, it would have removed the necessity for this Reform Bill, which was troubling everybody, and consuming unnecessarily the time of the House. As soon as a constituency was discovered to be corrupt, it ought to be wholly or at least partially disfranchised; and a vacant seat should not be suspended, as in the case of Sudbury and St. Albans, but transferred to a more deserving constituency. Had that course been pursued in times past, not only would a great impression have been made upon bribery and corruption, but the state of the representation would have been considerably improved. Let the House deal with constituency by constituency, applying the law in every case of proved corruption, and there would be no occasion to pass "comprehensive measures of reform." If a Reform Bill were to be passed at all, he said, as he had said many years before, that the most extensive measure was the best.

Mr. H. BERKELEY said, though he was not a great admirer of the Bill, he would accept it; but he desired that it should be known throughout the country that the obstruction that had been offered to the Bill did not proceed from that (the Ministerial) side of the House. Nothing could be more mean than the opposition to this Bill on the other (Conservative) side of the House. ["Order, order!"] He would correct the phrase, and say nothing be more improper than the way in a great party opposite had banded themselves together to oppose this Bill in an indirect way. After the numerous speeches they had heard, none of them ending with any Resolution whatever, and after the numerous adjournments they had had, it was rather calling upon their credulity too much to ask them to believe now that they desired to make purity a prominent element of the Bill, and that that was the reason why they sought to amend it. The country was perfectly well aware that the Bill was excessively distasteful to hon. Gentlemen opposite, and that they would do everything in their power to prevent its passing. Something had been said about protecting people by means of voting papers. If the noble Lord (Lord R. Cecil) were decidedly in earnest, and wished to correct the impurities of our elective system, he would not talk of voting papers, but he would adopt the only real remedy—namely, the Ballot. This Bill would certainly be thrown out, for it could not stand against the delays that had arisen to stop its progress. It was perfectly understood that it would be thrown out by indirect means. He did not think the Government were in fault, for they had done their best to pass it. All he would say was, let those hon. Gentlemen who thought proper to reject the Bill take the consequences with the people on their own shoulders.

Mr. COLLINS thought that if the House wished to put down bribery and corruption, they ought not to throw upon individuals the great expense of Election Committees, which, in the case of the Berwick Committee, was estimated at £1 per minute. Bribery was the only offence put down at the private cost of individuals. If hon. Members were in earnest in wishing to put a stop to corrupt practices at elections, the only course was to throw the cost of prosecuting the inquiry, if a prima facie case were made out, upon the Consolidated Fund, or some other public fund. The inquiry was a matter of public concern, and the expense ought to be defrayed by the country; which was actually done in the case of an Election Commission.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. H. Berkeley), not having the fear of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock before him, had thought fit to prolong this already long debate, and to make a sweeping charge against all who sat on that (the Conservative) side of the House, as if they, and they alone, had been the cause of the delay that had occurred at the several stages of the Bill.

[First Night.]

But the hon. Member would remember, that of all the speeches that had been made on the second reading of the Bill none was so animated, so vehement, and so damaging to the Bill as that he had himself delivered. Great wits were said proverbially to have short memories, and it was perhaps excusable, therefore, considering the early period of the Session at which it was made, that the hon. Member should have lost sight of his own opposition. He (Lord John Manners) could not, however, permit the charge so unnecessarily and unjustly brought against the Opposition by the hon. Member to pass without a word of protest. He must also remind the hon. Gentleman that after the declaration made by the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) the House might have passed from the Instruction moved by his noble Friend (Mr. Bentinck) to other Motions of which notice had been given; for the noble Lord said he had no objection to this Instruction. Upon the principle that there was "nothing like leather," the hon. Gentleman evinced untiring energy in the cause of the Ballot, and put it forward on every occasion as the only remedy for bribery and corruption; but had it not been for such speeches they would have long since passed this stage of the Bill, and have been discussing the next step. Again, he protested generally against the charges that had been brought against the party with which he had the honour and privilege to act. If there had been any delay in the progress of the Bill through the House, it was to be attributed, not to hon. Gentlemen on that (the Opposition) side of the House, but to the unpopularity that had attended it from its first introduction.

MR. SLANEY said, it was greatly to be lamented that hon. Gentlemen should attribute motives, and that charges should be bandied about; such personalities were not favourable to the progress of the Bill. He believed that if both sides would make fair and candid concessions some practical result might be arrived at. He could not forget that hon. Gentlemen opposite had brought forward a large measure which showed they were in earnest in responding to the desire of the country for a settlement of this question. No Reform Bill could pass through Parliament without mutual concessions, and, if the present measure were considered in that spirit, a Bill might be framed which, if it were not put into shape this Session, might pass in the next Session. The question of Parliamentary Reform might thus be put to rest for a quarter of a century to come. It was most desirable that a settlement should be come to now, when the country was in the enjoyment of peace and prosperity, for if the adjustment were deferred, times of difficulty and trouble might interpose an effectual barrier to its proper consideration. If the borough franchise proposed by the noble Lord's Bill were too low—and he believed it was too low—let a clause be brought in raising it somewhat. There were many Members on the Opposition side, and he also knew there were many Gentlemen on his (the Ministerial) side of the House, who thought the £6 rental too low. Let them, therefore, go into Committee and see whether a £6 rating, or some other qualification, could not be adopted to meet these objections. Everything might be arranged satisfactorily by mutual concession, and it was most important that such a measure should be carried in a period of tranquillity. He trusted that there would be no more bandying of accusations from one side of the House to the other, and that they would all endeavour, in a spirit of good feeling and mutual concession, to settle this important question.

MR. STEUART said, as there was but little chance that such a spirit of mutual concession as the hon. Member who spoke last had recommended, he trusted that he should not be chargeable with creating unnecessary delay to the progress of this Bill if he expressed his regret that it was not accompanied by some measure for putting down bribery and corruption, for it appeared to him essential that provisions for the prevention of corrupt practices should accompany any enlargement of the constituency. The payment of the travelling expenses of voters, for instance, was one of the most insidious and prevalent forms of bribery, and it should be prevented. The Reform Bill which was introduced by the late Government a twelvemonth ago did contain some provisions which would have had that effect, because the system of voting papers would have removed all those opportunities of bribery and treating which were presented by the conveyance of electors to the polling places. It was now proposed, by giving the franchise to every £6 householder, to extend the area within which bribery might be exercised. He would not inquire whether voters of the poorer class were more liable to corruption than those belonging to a grade above them; but with regard to the municipal franchise, it appeared from the Report of a Committee of the other House that bribery and undue influences did prevail to a very large extent amongst those who were entitled to exercise the municipal franchise; yet it was now proposed to extend the suffrage in Parliamentary elections to that very class. He could show cases in which the influences created at the municipal elections, by the payment of ten shillings or some other small sum to voters upon those occasions, became afterwards the most insidious means of gathering parties together in the borough, and securing the votes of a certain class at the Parliamentary elections. He thought, therefore, that the noble Lord and the Home Secretary ought not merely to have assented to the Instruction moved by the hon. Member for West Norfolk, but should have pledged themselves to introduce, as part and parcel of the Bill, provisions for dealing with bribery and corruption. Before many days it was probable that the recommendations of a Committee of the House of Commons on the best means of putting down this great evil of electoral corruption would be laid before the House, and it would be right to take that subject into consideration. He would not, therefore, pledge himself to support this Reform Bill in its future stages, and he did not think this late period of the Session would admit of its being passed into law; but he would sincerely and entirely disclaim any disinclination to add to the existing constituency at least as large a number of persons as the noble Lord's Bill proposed to add to it, though he differed with the noble Lord as to the means by which it should be done, and he thought the principle of selection would give a purer and better class of voters less liable to be acted upon by corrupt motives. He was quite willing to adopt a test of fitness, which would place the franchise in the hands of the most intelligent portion of the working classes.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he protested against the principle which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor for the Duchy of Lancaster had seemed to lay down, that if the noble Lord agreed to the Motion, and the House adopted these Instructions, the Committee should only accept them with certain limitations. He demanded that these Instructions should go to the Committee without any limitation whatever, inasmuch as they related to a most important part of the present subject of legislation. It was in vain to talk of extending our electoral system, unless we first did something to purify it; the very first step, whether in moral or physical operations, must be to purify the elements with which we had to deal. He did not wish to deny that very honest voters might be found amongst persons in a low class of society; but there could be no doubt that the persons of that class who were open to corruption might be tempted by a bribe of much lower amount than those in a different social position, and this he said without meaning to cast any imputation upon their morality, as compared with other classes. The natural gradations of society found distinctions in themselves; and 5s. might bribe one man while £100 would not buy another. The whole subject had lately been exposed to the House in the case of those boroughs which had been shown to be stews of corruption. At the close of last Session the writ was moved for Berwick, when it must have been perfectly well known to hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury bench that there was a corrupt engagement between the two parties that one should vacate the seat and another should take it. He objected to the writ being issued, but if he had called for a division he should not have had a teller to go into the lobby with him. Corruption was encouraged on the Treasury bench, and every Government, formed from whichever side of the House it might be, was under the temptation to wink at transactions when they operated in its own favour. If it were really desired to extinguish corruption, the Members of peccant boroughs should be transferred to new constituencies, as was proposed in the case of East Retford. The noble Lord adopted that principle in his Bill of 1852, and it was the only way to obtain purity of election. It was the first step which they ought to take, and therefore nothing could be more germane to the Committee than the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for West Norfolk. He required and demanded that it should have full operation as an Instruction to the Committee, and he disclaimed any participation in any understanding which would mitigate the responsibility of the Committee to give full effect to it.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, the hon. Member for Shrewsbury (Mr. Slaney) who was well-known and esteemed for his philanthropic views, had made an appeal which was rather an appeal to their charity than anything else. But he was inclined to take an uncharitable view of the appeal, and the more so because the hon. Gentleman was one of those who last year had the opportunity of doing that which he was afraid the hon. Member did not do — namely, allow the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire to go into Committee. Considering the charitable view which the hon. Member takes of things, I think it was rather hard of him to seize this opportunity to deliver a body blow at the noble Lord's Bill; because he intimated that in Committee he should endeavour to raise the franchise above that which was proposed by the noble Lord.

MR. SLANEY: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. I did not say it was my intention to do so, but that I could wish to see it done.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR believed the hon. Gentleman said he should like to see it done, which was very much the same thing. The whole argument of the hon. Member for the Flint burghs (Sir J. Hammer) was also opposed to the Bill, which he well described as giving trouble to every one and satisfaction to no one. He was perfectly satisfied that nothing could be more honest than the intentions of the hon. Member for West Norfolk, and he could not conceive a more opportune moment for proposing such an Instruction. It was of the utmost importance that, if they passed a Reform Bill, they should introduce means to put down bribery. It was said that hon. Members on that side were taking this course merely for the sake of delay; but he wanted to know why hon. Members on that side were debarred from taking any constitutional course possible against a Bill to which they objected. The Bill was a very simple one, it was true, but it gave a preponderating power to one class of electors. The noble Viscount at the head of the Government said last year:—

"I feel quite as much as many do that you ought not, by admitting a large numerical majority of the least instructed part of the community, to swamp the better class of voters and overwhelm the fair influence of property and intelligence. I am ready to admit that it is not only ignorance that ought to be excluded from governing intelligence; but those who have no property ought not to be the persons to direct the legislation applicable to those who have property." He (Sir M. Farquhar) maintained that no speech could more strongly militate against this Bill. This Instruction was an endeavour to carry out the principles there laid down, and he should therefore give it his cordial support.

Sir Minto Farquhar

Motion agreed to.

Instruction to the Committee that they have power to make provision therein for the better prevention of bribery and corruption at Elections.

MR. HASSARD rose to move—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to frame and insert in the Bill a form of Oath in lieu of those now taken, to be taken by each Member of this House on taking his Seat, without any distinction as to religious denomination or profession."

MR. ENNIS had also given notice to move—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that it is expedient that one uniform Oath should be administered to all Members on taking their Seats in this House; and that such Oath shall be in future that of allegiance and fidelity to the succession only."

MR. SPEAKER: It appears to me that the two Instructions, both of the hon. Member for Waterford and the hon. Member for Athlone, are equally out of order, and for a reason entirely different from that which I was obliged to assign in the previous cases. Those Instructions were out of order, because it was competent to the Committee to take the subjects of them into consideration without an Instruction; but the Instructions to which I now allude are out of order, because it would not be competent to the Committee to take the subject of them into consideration, even if these Instructions were agreed to. It is a rule of the House that all Bills and Motions relating to the oaths of Members must pass through a preliminary Committee of the Whole House, and be introduced afterwards on the Report of the Resolutions of that Committee. If it were attempted to introduce into this Bill in Committee a clause relating to the oaths of Members, it would be passing over that preliminary stage which this House has thought important, and indeed essential, in regard to this subject. I believe this to be a fatal objection to the proposal of both Instructions.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD asked, Whether it would be competent to move an Instruction to the Committee to insert in the Bill such provisions with reference to a new form of Oath to be taken by Members as should hereafter be agreed to in Committee of the Whole House, and reported to the House?

MR. SPEAKER: I think it would be an irregular and inconvenient course to give the Committee a conditional power—a power to do something in the event of something else being done. It is entirely unnecessary, also ; for if the proper steps are taken, if a Committee of the Whole House is appointed, and alterations in the oaths agreed to and reported, it would be competent then to move an Instruction to the Committee to insert such alteration in the Bill. As this can be done when the act has been effected, I would not recommend the House to take an anticipatory step.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I rise now to move that you do now leave the Chair ; and in doing so I cannot refrain from noticing the objections which have been made, not only in this House but out of doors, to the provisions of the Bill ; and I will also take the opportunity of stating what course the Government intend to pursue. In the first place I will answer the Question put to me by an hon. Gentleman on this side of the House a short time ago, whether it was the intention of the Government to proceed with the Scotch and Irish Bills in the course of the present Session. I said then that I could not give him an answer, at the moment, but that I would state the views of the Government on a future occasion. I now say that considering that, according to our opinion, the English Bill should go into Committee, and a settlement of the franchise be agreed on and assented to by the House before these two other Bills are proceeded with, we cannot expect that either the Irish or the Scotch Bill could be proceeded with in the course of the present Session. As regards Scotland and Ireland, therefore, the series of measures we have proposed for a reform in the representation would be incomplete. But that does not seem to be any reason for not proceeding with the Bill which stands for Committee to-night. Well, Sir, with regard to this Bill, I must state the position of the Government and of the House in respect to it ; and in doing so I do not intend to state the position of either one side of the House or the other, nor to make any reproach to the other side of the House with regard to their conduct on this Bill ; but I will simply state the position of the House generally, including both sides. In doing so, I wish seriously to call the attention of the House to the subject, because, if the character of the Government is involved in the measure which they have introduced and in their time of introducing it, the character of the House is also implicated in the mode in which they deal with it. There are two different questions arising in regard to the Bill ; first, as to its substance ; and next, as to the time at which we propose to go into Committee on it. With regard to the substance of the measure, I will only mention one point ; but it is the point on which during the debates on the second reading almost all the objections taken to the Bill, and all the descriptions of it as a measure destructive of property, giving ignorance power over intelligence, and tending to create confusion in our representative system, were based. What I speak of is the borough franchise, and that franchise, without now going into the rate at which it is proposed to fix it, is intended to give the right of voting and certainly greater power in the representation to the working classes. Now to that proposition various objections have been made. It must be admitted, without entering into what was done in 1832, that at the present time very few persons belonging to the working classes have the right of voting. In the debate last year an hon. Gentleman, now the Member for the West Riding (Mr. F. Crossley), stated that though he had many men in his employment—men of great intelligence, householders, in whom he had great confidence—not one of them had the right of voting. Similar statements have been made in debate in the course of the present year. Is the objection to this Bill, then, that some of the working classes would be admitted, or that it would give them overwhelming power over the rest of the community, and thereby an undue influence over property ? With regard to the first objection, so long ago as 1852 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks stated that he was glad—I do not quote from Hansard, but I have the passage perfectly in my memory—that I admitted that the working classes ought to have the franchise. Again, when we were discussing the measure of last year, the Motion which was submitted by me to the late House of Commons and carried by a majority, in the first place objected to the proposed transfer from the counties to the boroughs of the county freeholders, and in the next place, to the non-reduction of the borough franchise—that is to say, to the non-admission of the working classes. When the Parliament was dissolved upon that vote, on our return here the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks stated, in words which I have quoted on a former occasion, that the Government to which he belonged, and of which he was the organ, agreed that the country had made up its mind that there should be a reduction of the borough franchise, and that they were prepared to assent to such a reduction, accompanied with such provisions as would guard the safety of our institutions. The right hon. Gentleman spoke, and I hope he still speaks, as the organ of the great party opposite; though I have seen it stated—and I have seen it in print—that the right hon. Gentleman has no longer the confidence of that great party. [Cries of "No, no!"] I have seen it in print, and I will state where I have seen it; I read it the other day in a periodical which is supposed to be the organ of the Conservative party—I happened to be coming into town, and I read it in The Quarterly Review. There was great abuse of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer—I was not surprised at that. There was great abuse of myself, and a number of motives were invented for me by this obscure writer. I was not surprised at this, either. But, as I read on, I was very much surprised, for I found that this organ of the Conservative party declared that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, to whom certain faults were imputed, was unworthy of the confidence of the great party of which he is the head. ["No, no!"] I quite agree with the expression of dissent from that opinion, because the right hon. Gentleman has won his way to the high position which he holds by his great ability in the conduct of public affairs; and, whenever it has been his fortune to pass from that side of the House to this, and to lead the House, his management of business has shown that he was fully equal to the discharge of the high functions entailed by his position. Therefore, I may take notice of the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman as one who has long possessed, and who still possesses, the confidence of that great Conservative party. [Cheers.] Then, I say, with regard to the question whether or no any of the working classes should have the franchise, and whether there should be a reduction of the borough franchise for that purpose, we have not only the affirmation of the Liberal majority of the last Parliament, but we have the consent and co-operation of the right hon. Gentleman the organ of the party which last year sat on the Government benches. Well, we have proceeded in this direction. The present Government have introduced a Bill which they thought did not carry the franchise lower than it ought to be placed. We may be told—you may decide—that we have had too much confidence in the intelligence, too much faith in the integrity, of the classes who live in houses at a moderate rent. That you may say; but it is not a question of principle; it is only a question of degree. And, indeed, if you dissented altogether from the reduction of the franchise, if you thought on principle that there ought to be no reduction, it is quite clear that you should have opposed the second reading of this Bill. You did not do so; and, therefore, I conclude that you are ready to consider the question of the reduction of the franchise, and how far it should go. And, consequently, I think I am justified in asking both sides of the House to go into Committee; because, the principle being admitted, the next point is, to what extent should that principle be carried? I stated that, after mature deliberation, we had proposed the franchise contained in the Bill. I have since heard many objections to that franchise. I have heard it said that it would quite overwhelm property and intelligence. That again is a question for Committee. And this I will say, that, if you will propose any of the measures that have been mentioned this evening either for raising the franchise by making it a rating instead of a rental franchise, or by increasing the amount of the rental, or in another way that has been pointed out, by admitting a great number of voters who are distinguished by property, or by a high degree of knowledge from those belonging to the working classes, any proposition of the kind shall be fairly considered by us in Committee. We certainly shall not declare ourselves so completely wedded to the franchise which we have put forward that we will not submit to treat on the subject. If, in Committee, such a proposal as I have alluded to be made, and if the House should prefer it to that which we have originated, it will be our duty to see whether the Bill with such an alteration would be a valuable measure, whether it would extend the franchise in a manner that would strengthen the institutions of the country; and, in that case, though we might not think it a change for the better, we should be ready to adopt that alteration. I will not speak—there is no necessity to speak—of other parts of the Bill; there is certainly no need to refer to the county franchise, which, of course, would greatly depend on the opinion held by this House, with regard to the extent of reduction in the borough franchise. I will only say that I think we are in a position to go into Committee on the Bill, and to decide this important question. If you objected altogether to the reduction, it was your duty to have opposed the second reading, and you should have refused to name a day for the committal of the Bill; but, having agreed, without opposition, that the Bill should be read a second time, it is now the duty of the House of Commons to consider in Committee the particular proposals which the Government is to submit. I will take the first objection which has been urged—with regard to the time at which this Bill is brought forward. Notice has been given of other Amendments, but the objection to which I particularly allude is one taken by an hon. Friend of mine (Mr. Mackinnon), whom I understand to contend—

“That in order to obtain a safe and effective reform, it would be inexpedient and unjust to proceed further with the proposed legislative measure for the representation of the people until the House has before it the results of the Census authorized by the Bill now under consideration.”

I must say that, without imputing to any hon. Member a desire for mere delay, I cannot reconcile that Motion with any wish to pass a Bill for the extension of the franchise within a reasonable period. The Census will be taken in 1861, but it can hardly be before the House in a full shape before the end of the Session of 1862. This is, therefore, to propose that we should not undertake a settlement of the Reform question for the next three years, whatever might be the circumstances, whatever demands might be made, however strong might be the feeling that there ought to be an Amendment in the representation. Why, that is a proposal to put it off for ever—nobody could understand it to be otherwise. And on what excuse is this proposition founded? I have spoken of the objections that Gentlemen have entertained to the borough franchise. Now, I may say the exceptions taken to the borough franchise do, in fact, comprehend all the salient objections to the Bill. During the six nights' debate on the second reading of this measure those were the questions that were raised, those were the objections that were entertained—I am not imputing now that they were not very sincerely entertained—but how does the Census of 1861 bear on the discussion? We have returns—you say that you find fault with them—but we have returns up to the year 1858 which do not depend on the Census of 1851, but which are dependent on the rate-books of the year 1858, and which you might have for any time, even to a later period. Therefore, that question, which is the one mainly in dispute, has nothing to do with the Census of 1861; and it is a mere evasion of an obligation, it is merely putting off, on a very hollow pretence, that which is really the question before the House. I will say—and can any man contradict me?—that neither the £6 franchise for boroughs, nor the £10 franchise for counties, are in any way affected by the Census. You may say that a £6 householder is too poor, that he is ignorant, that is too likely to be bribed. When you have all the volumes of 1861, and a precise enumeration of persons, and the number of men, women, and children in every house in every parish, you will be no wiser as to the character of £6 and £10 householders than you are now. There is only one part of the Bill that it does affect—a portion of the Bill which it has been said, and with very great truth, does not much alter the question, and is capable of being argued at one side or the other—I allude to the redistribution of seats. We have taken a certain number of seats from places containing less than 7,000 inhabitants—not because the number of 7,000 is absolutely, geometrically, and arithmetically necessary in order to entitle a borough to return two Members, any more than, according to the Bill proposed last year by the Government which then sat on these benches, the number of 6,000 was necessary to entitle a borough to send two Members to Parliament; but we said it is desirable that places with a very large population which are insufficiently represented should return some of those Members now elected by boroughs which are at the bottom of the scale. There may be a transposition of one or two of these boroughs, but no one can alter their position in fact—these are the boroughs which have the smallest populations and are of the smallest importance. It may be that one will be able to show that its population has risen, while another has fallen off to the extent of 500 below the number named, and by waiting till 1863 we may arrive at a knowledge of that curious fact as relates to some particular borough; but as regards the general interests of the country—as regards the great question of representation—as regards Yorkshire, Lancashire, Manchester, Leeds, and Birmingham—such questions have no importance in themselves, and in the eyes of men who wish to deal with the subject of Reform can hardly be made a ground for postponing this Bill for three years. I wish to view these questions with reference to the character of the House of Commons. I am speaking to this point not with any reference to the opponents of the present Government, as if they were bringing forward questions with a view to delay, for the proposition to which I am referring is brought forward by a supporter of the Government. But I put it to the House of Commons as a serious question for them to consider. If they think this a dangerous and revolutionary Bill, they may say that they do not think it is their duty to entertain it further, and in so doing they would come to a clear and deliberate conclusion. But if they say that having given a second reading to this Bill, having nominally entertained it and professedly given consideration to it, they will now put it off on the paltry pretence that three years hence we shall have more information on the subject, nobody will believe in the sincerity of the assertion. I come now to other excuses with regard to time which I have seen put forth. One of these is that it is now the 4th of June, and too late to enter into the consideration of this measure, because we have the remaining Estimates for the year to discuss. If this were a question of the Army or Navy Estimates I could understand the objection, because they certainly are Estimates of very grave importance; but when it has reference to the Miscellaneous Estimates I cannot conceive, when we have a measure of such supreme national importance before the House as that involved in the representation of the people—for even those who oppose it must admit its importance—I cannot conceive how it should be pretended that there is such need for haste in the consideration of those Estimates that we cannot, in consequence, proceed with the Amendment of the representation of the people. Recollecting, partly, what has passed in former years, I looked into the record of our proceedings to see what were the times when, no dissolution of Parliament having taken place, this House has usually considered the Miscellaneous Estimates; and I found that in 1851 they were considered on the 7th, 11th, 14th, and 17th of July; that in 1853 they were considered on the 4th, 5th, and 8th of August; that in 1854 they were considered on the 3rd, 6th, 7th, 24th, 25th, 27th, and 31st of July; in 1855, on the 26th, 30th, and 31st of July, and 1st and 2nd of August; and in 1858, on the 5th, 8th, 9th, 12th, 14th, and 15th of July. Such, therefore, has been the custom of the House of Commons for six or seven years, when there was no dissolution of Parliament. It may be urged that in several of those years there were measures of such supreme importance before the House, that it was agreed on account of them to put the Miscellaneous Estimates off for a time. But it is quite clear that though these Miscellaneous Estimates furnish very interesting occasions of discussion—though they very often give rise to interesting debates on education in Great Britain, and education in Ireland, on questions of religious liberty and endowments connected with the Regium Donum, on the administration of criminal justice, and the application of the fine arts to the Houses of Parliament, and other matters of a similar kind—yet it has not been in the power or the inclination of the House very much to reduce these Estimates. I remember that once, indeed, the House refused permission to the Crown to purchase two pictures of Sir Edwin Landseer's—admirable pictures of animals, which, no doubt, were very desirable for the decoration and adornment of the House of Lords. On another occasion the House refused to sanction the salary that was paid to a gentleman who was sent abroad by the trustees of the National Gallery to choose pictures. But the practice of the House has been to pass the Miscellaneous Estimates without any reduction; and I think if I were to appraise the economy effected in Committees of the House during the last few years at £2000 a year, I should be exaggerating. Then, how can I believe that all of a sudden there has sprung up such a desire for economy, that such a spirit of reduction and retrenchment has seized upon the House that the Reform Bill cannot be proceeded with, because the Miscellaneous Estimates have to be considered? I am told that in the last year or two there has been a change made by which there is not such a large surplus left as used to be in the hands of the Government, to be applied to the Civil Service at the end of July, or the beginning of August, without taking any vote; and, therefore, it might be necessary for the Secretary to the Treasury, as he did the other day, to ask from time to time for a Vote on account. But that is a question of detail, which it is not now necessary to consider. I say again, as I said with regard to the Census, that if this House were to determine, from a sudden zeal, to reduce the Civil Service Estimates, or to discuss such questions as the fine arts or education in Ireland, that they would not consider this Bill till the Month of August, then I believe that the sincerity of the House would be much distrusted, that the country would not believe in this sudden zeal for retrenchment; but that it would attribute the course they had taken to a desire to get rid of the Bill without having the manliness to do so by a direct vote. With regard to the time at which we have arrived, I have to say that we are now at the beginning of June. The Session generally goes on till the beginning, the middle and sometimes to the end of August. There is no reason why there should be an earlier prorogation this year than usual. There is no time positively fixed for prorogation. We are not, like the American Congress, under the necessity of proroguing on a certain day; and if we have important business before us—business that it is desirable to settle—there is no reason why we should not do so. Why the House of Lords should not undertake that, I do not see. They have undertaken many measures of importance at the same time at which they may receive this Bill; and I do not see why they should not receive it at a period when it would be possible for them to arrive at a decision regarding it. I have thus stated the reasons why I think the House should go into Committee on this Bill. Let me remind the House that it is uncertain at what other period you would be able again to bring forward this measure. You have decided to give the Bill a second reading after six nights' debate. If it were brought on in another Session, you would have to go through the second reading again, and hear all those arguments over again; probably with much the same result. That would be a consumption of the time of the House, and a very unnecessary delay of the measure. But who can insure that you shall have a fit occasion on which the question might be raised. Who can answer for the state of the public mind or the altered condition of the times? You might have, as we have now, a time of tranquillity at home, and also of peace with all the nations of Europe; but you might have a period of commercial distress at home, and war threatening us abroad, when men would be loth to enter into questions of this kind, and when, certainly, you would not be able to give them calm and deliberate consideration. If you can make up your minds as to what the franchise should be; if you can either adopt the proposition of the Government, or some other proposition that would seem to be wiser, and better fitted to improve the representation with safety to your institutions—then, I say, is it for you calmly to consider whether or not you ought to come to a decision now. We have done our duty in bringing the question before you; and it is for you to deal with it and dispose of it. Do not forget, likewise, that the language used with regard to the £6 householders, and with regard to the poorest of those who by means of it may come to have the franchise, has been such as may in a time of prosperity be lightly passed by, but that it may come back to the memory in a time of commercial distress, and may well cause irritation. I have alluded to an article in a periodical which is generally supposed to represent the great party opposite; and this is the way in which they speak of those who may be enfranchised by this Bill:—

“Some say that the publicans will be our masters; others declare that it will be the Trades Unions. It is a blessed choice between debauchery and crime.”

That is language which is likely enough to sink into the minds of the people. I believe that among the working classes many are to be found possessing greater intelligence and equal integrity with householders of £10 a year, many of whom are beer-shop keepers and small shopkeepers. What will they think if we debate this Bill upon the question, “Whether we shall be governed by debauchery or crime?” Can such insulting language be expected to produce no effect? If you enter upon the consideration of this Bill, and settle what your franchise shall be—extend it as you please—it will have a composing effect, and will tend to satisfy the country that you have fairly considered this subject; but if you leave the question with the declamation that took place on the second reading—erroneous as that declamation was—depend upon it you will dig a trench between the working classes and the richer classes, which you will afterwards repent. I therefore ask the House anxiously and earnestly to go into Committee upon this Bill, and examine its provisions carefully and narrowly. If you think its provisions are rash, insert safer provisions; but do not attempt, with such a question before us, either to evade or conceal its importance; for if you do you will produce a feeling of doubt as to your sincerity, and sacrifice all respect for your decisions. I move, Sir, that you do now leave the chair.

[First Night.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I am not surprised that the noble Lord should have seized this occasion, after the preliminary discussions we have had, to take a general review of those discussions, and to attempt to meet some of the objections that have been raised. In the few remarks that I shall make, I hope I shall do so in the same candid spirit as that in which the noble Lord has addressed the House. It appears to me that the noble Lord has occupied half the time devoted to his observations to giving reasons why the Conservative party should have consented to the second reading of his Bill, and then to complaining of the Conservative party for having allowed the second reading to pass. The noble Lord has stated accurately enough—and if not with perfect accuracy in no spirit of unfairness, I am confident, but perhaps from his being misled by the interval that has elapsed since the casual observations I made respecting the franchise and the working classes—he has stated to the House that so long ago as 1852, I being then a Minister of the Crown, expressed my opinion that if a measure of Reform were again brought forward—the noble Lord having recently failed in one of his attempts—that it was much to be regretted that both in the measure of 1832, and in subsequent measures of the noble Lord's, the fair claims of the working classes had not been considered. That is not an opinion that I expressed in 1852 only, or which the great body of Gentlemen on this side of the House professed on that occasion solely. That has always been our opinion, and I think in 1859, although there may be a difference respecting the mode and means by which we endeavoured to carry that view into effect, there is no one doubts the sincerity of our attempt to give in some degree a direct representation to the working classes by the measure we then proposed. The noble Lord also states that, after the last general election, I, on the part of the Conservative Government and my political friends generally, recognized that the verdict of the country must be taken as one in favour of some reduction of the franchise in boroughs. I am not aware that any one on this side of the House wishes to shrink from that opinion. But the inference that the noble Lord has drawn from these circumstances appears to me to be rather inconsequential. It may or it may not be a necessary deduction from all that has passed that we should vote for the second reading of this Bill for the representation of the people; but it is not one of the necessary consequences of those opinions or of those pledges, that we should approve of the policy of the noble Lord in this matter, or of the mode in which he has attempted to carry that policy into effect. Assenting to the general principle of the measure, we did not oppose the second reading; but when the noble Lord says all the rest is matter of detail, he has quite forgotten that he came forward on the earliest occasion when he introduced this measure in a spirit very different from that by which any Minister had before been animated with reference to this question, and pursued a line of reasoning very different from that which had been adopted on any previous occasion. The noble Lord came forward and introduced a Bill for the amendment of the representation of the people of this House, and recommended it for adoption as being founded on the principle of numbers. Having laid down that principle, he very properly said—"Documents shall be placed in your hands from which you will be able to collect an opinion as to the data on which the policy of the Government is founded, and sanctioned, and recommended." The noble Lord cannot pretend that the accuracy of these estimates has not been gravely impugned; he cannot pretend that the objections to their accuracy are not of a weighty description. He cannot forget that, in "another place," the question has been considered so important as that the labours of an eminent Committee have been unceasingly given in order to arrive at the truth upon this subject; and if we are to believe general rumour, the result of their investigation is in accordance with that generally and widely circulated opinion which the people of this country generally entertain upon the subject. But while the policy of the noble Lord depended on these facts—the policy of the noble Lord being that of entrusting political power to a certain number, and being the first Statesman who ever came forward in this House and said we ought to lay down such a rule. The statements of the noble Lord being not only suspected but impugned—he cannot be surprised that Gentlemen on both sides of the House, although willing to consider the question of the Amendment of the representation of the people—though they may be ready and desirous to a certain extent that all classes in the country should be directly represented in this House — still, at the same time, should recoil with apprehension from a measure which is, perhaps, founded upon grave inaccuracies, and upon statements which, if incorrect and acted upon, may entail upon the country the gravest consequences. So far with reference to the general observations of the noble Lord with respect to the opinions of those who sit on this side of the House, and on the apparent inconsistency in their conduct. I think the noble Lord failed in that—failed in succeeding to establish any inconsistency. We accept and adopt that which we have always professed; we are not the enemies of the working classes. I think we have shown that often and I think the general policy of the Tory party, as it is termed, has been one not unfavourable to the interests of the working classes. But feeling that the political franchise is not to be considered as the privilege of a class, but as one to be exercised for the benefit of the country—we have to consider when a class is brought forward as claiming the franchise, not merely whether they shall enjoy the personal privilege, but whether that privilege shall be enjoyed to such a degree that it shall give that class a preponderating power contrary to the general interests. Therefore, so far as the observations with which the noble Lord prefaced his remarks are concerned, I do not think he succeeded in establishing any fair cause of complaint against Gentlemen sitting on this side on account of their Parliamentary conduct in this respect. If it be a matter of complaint by the noble Lord that the most important measure a statesman can bring forward in this country—one which affects the depository of power has been severely, and perhaps, completely examined, I am sure the noble Lord must feel that there have been on his own measure, and on his own side, critics as keen, as able, as eloquent, and as assiduous as any on this opposite bench. I could understand the tone of the noble Lord if he were about to fulfil the important programme with which he commenced the Session. I could understand the noble Lord if, remembering the late period of the Session, and the objections to proceeding with the measure at the present moment, the noble Lord were to say, "Gentlemen may urge these as exceptions to my conduct, and argue that the time and season are no longer fair and opportune; but I, on the part of my Colleagues, give my assent to the great policy we have recommended. All your objections are of a trifling character in comparison with our convictions of the importance of our policy; and whatever may be the convenience or inconvenience to the House, or the menacing features of the times, we still believe that this is a policy of a vital character, that ought to be pursued and carried, and, whether or not the Parliamentary Session be continued without prorogation for six months longer, carry it we will." That, however, is not what the noble Lord has said; but he talks of the paltry objections which have been made to his measure, and of the paltry course of conduct pursued in the House in regard to it. But what does the noble Lord himself do? Parliament is to be reformed, and he commences the Session by introducing three measures of Parliamentary Reform. The representation of England, of Ireland, and of Scotland are all to be amended. The representation of England, however, is to be the model representation, in accordance with which the others are to be fashioned; and the noble Lord is stern and stiff as to the conditions upon which this Amendment of the representation of the country is to be accomplished. The noble Lord remembers very well that, when in opposition, he gave a programme upon which he claimed a verdict from Parliament which led to its dissolution, and which forced the country somewhat against its will to what probably was a premature decision, speaking under the responsibility of an expectant Minister, he defined the franchise on which he called for a verdict from Parliament and an opinion from the country. But what have we heard to-night? That two of the three Reform Bills are to be given up! And that, with regard to the other, the House may do what it likes with the franchise! Thus the high policy which destroyed a Ministry and dissolved a Parliament has melted away! He will accept anything, if the House will but agree to something that may shuffle this great impediment to progress out of the course. Anything the House will settle by the end of the Session will be accepted by the Government! Well, that may be very discreet; it may be a very wise course for the noble Lord, in his present position, to give these moderate counsels and make these temperate offers; but, I ask, is this the Minister who ought to talk of "paltry" behaviour on the part of the House of

[First Night.

Commons? Having just occupied such a position, and made such an address as the noble Lord has done, while all that has occurred is still fresh in the memory of Parliament and the country, is this the Minister who should regard the conduct of this House as "paltry?" The House listened, I am sure, with no hostile feeling while, calmly and in well-selected words, the noble Lord stated the course he intends to take; but every one must have felt that the policy he has recommended to-night offers a strange contrast to the policy he recommended from this bench with respect to Parliamentary Reform. And the tone and temper with which this measure was brought before us when the House first met, contrasted with that of the statement made by the noble Lord to-night, must not be looked on merely in relation to the convenience of the Minister, or as a mere consequence of the party conflicts of this House. The question is too great and has too deep an interest for such considerations. The noble Lord, after all his fanfarronade in Opposition, after having fully matured his scheme, in the responsible position of a Minister of the Crown, comes forward to-night and proposes that we should reconstruct the whole constituency of England, totally omitting the consideration of the constituencies of the two sister kingdoms. To say nothing else of it—is this a constitutional course? I will not say it is a "paltry" course, but certainly it is a way of cutting the Gordian knot which I think the House, on reflection, will hardly sanction or admire. We have always heard, when this question of Parliamentary Reform was brought forward, that the Bills reconstructing and revising the constituency of the three kingdoms should proceed pari passu; and that there were sound constitutional reasons for such a course in 1832 no one can dispute. But of late years other questions have arisen. We have had claims by Members for Scotland and by Members from Ireland for a greater share in the representation to those countries. We have always told them that the proportion of Members could not be settled in a manner satisfactory to us without taking the claims of English constituencies into consideration. What will Members from Ireland and Scotland say now, when they are told that the question of the representation of England is to be decided in this month of June, 1860, and that the revision and resettlement of their constituent bodies is to be postponed certainly for another year? What will become of their claims for an increased representation? I give no opinion on those claims now—it is unnecessary. But I must remind the House that no Gentleman from Ireland or from Scotland will be able to urge such claims with any effect when the question of the English representation has once been settled to the satisfaction of this country. Suppose, notwithstanding the tranquil state of public affairs,—and certainly we have a description of the present state of things which, coming from the lips of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, must be considered most encouraging—suppose the tranquil state of affairs happens to be changed in the course of next year, what then would be the situation of Gentlemen from Scotland and from Ireland? It may be most inconvenient—nay, it may be impossible—to amend the representation of Ireland and Scotland next year. Notwithstanding the all-pervading tranquillity of Europe, the noble Lord may find troubles next year which may so absorb and engross public attention, and so monopolize the care and watchfulness of the Government—especially of the statesman who occupies the office which the noble Lord now fills—that we may not find time to amend the Representation of Ireland and Scotland. Well, and what are you going to do with the amended representation of England? Do you mean to appeal in the interval to that revised constituent body? Are we to have a partial dissolution of Parliament? Are the Members of Parliament for England, elected by the new constituency to meet here the Members for Ireland and Scotland elected by the old? Or, in the midst of your difficulties, will you seek to avoid this embarrassing state of affairs by having no dissolution whatever? What, then will be our position? We who represent England will sit here in a condemned Parliament. Session after Session, year after year, we shall have large bodies of our countrymen saying—"That man calls himself the Member for Buckinghamshire. I have a vote in the election of Members of Parliament, but I never voted for him; and he has no right to be there!" Though I can, perhaps, bear such a test as well as most, I can well conceive a state of things that might be very embarrassing to some hon. Gentlemen on either side of the House. When is this to happen, and at what time is it that Parliament is to be placed in so uncertain and inconvenient a position? I cannot agree with the noble Lord in that sanguine view, which, animated by his faithful adherence to the principles of Parliamentary Reform, he has to-night taken of the prospects of the country. I am not and I never have been an alarmist. I know it is possible to exaggerate danger, and that exaggeration of danger is as likely to lead to a depression of public feeling, as it may sometimes induce a high and patriotic tone of mind; but taking the calmest and gravest view of public affairs, I think I am justified in saying that much is going on that may, and should, excite the anxiety and engross the attention of the country. Is this, then, a period when Parliament should be left in the dislocated state in which the plan—for I cannot call it the policy—of the noble Lord contemplates leaving it? I cannot believe that on calm reflection the House can sanction the policy of dealing with the representation of England, without at the same time dealing with the representation of the sister kingdoms. I cannot believe that the House will run the chance of leaving the representation of England condemned as a Legislature with the prospect of meeting next year in the midst of immense danger, and amid all those circumstances which will require that the country should look up to us with respect and confidence, which cannot be if an Act passes both Houses declaring that the representatives of England are not competent to the performance of their duties, and are not worthy of public confidence. This is a grave position. The noble Lord has come forward to-night, not to make a mere ordinary observation on going into Committee of Supply, but to announce a policy in dealing with these measures which will startle the whole country. He has made an announcement which, in a constitutional, in a national point of view, is one of the gravest announcements ever made to Parliament—namely, that we should reform the representation of England without any security that the representation of Ireland and Scotland shall be reformed. Such a proposition has never before been made to Parliament by any Minister. Is there anything urgent that we should pursue so unprecedented, so indecorous a course? On the contrary, the noble Lord, even at this immense price, does not contemplate accomplishing the policy which he recommends. Whatever he has said respecting the working classes, he has no conviction of the absolute and Imperial necessity of the measure which he originally brought forward; nor has he any conviction that if it were carried it would accomplish and fulfil its purpose. What does he tell us? "If you do not like this, for God's sake, propose something else, and I give you to understand that your proposition will be received by the Government in a candid and fair spirit." What does that mean? It means that the Government have no settled policy whatever which they intend to carry out. Giving up Ireland, giving up Scotland, coming to the Members for England and asking them to place themselves in the despicable position described, calling upon the House to legislate in this scrambling fashion—all this proves that there is no conviction of the necessity of this measure, no confidence in its provisions. It shows that the noble Lord, from the first exercising a fatal influence—as I told him when I sat opposite to him, and he occupied these (the Opposition) benches—exercising a sinister influence on the fortunes of his party and on his own reputation, was induced to recommend a policy in Opposition which it is impossible for him to accomplish as a Minister. It shows that the noble Lord is hazarding the safety of the country, in order, not that he may realize a fair reputation, but that he may terminate the question in a manner nothing dignified, and which is hardly respectable, by recognizing that in Opposition he was exempted to pursue an unwise, immature, and—I will now say—even a factious policy. Then the noble Lord turns round with what I should have thought was mock indignation to one of his supporters, who had absolutely been so presumptuous as to conceive some decent means to extricate himself and his colleagues from the painful position they occupy. One hon. Gentleman thinks it would be just as well that we should wait till we have accurate, authoritative information as to the number of the population. This the noble Lord thinks paltry, compared with his own conduct. Why, the noble Lord has virtually confessed to-night that he is prepared to give up the marrow of his Bill, that he is prepared to change the rate of franchise which when in Opposition he laid down as indispensable; and with what face or reason can the statesman who brings forward a measure for amending the representation of the people, and who founds his measure on the principle of numbers, turn round and reproach his supporter for saying, "If this be the principle on which your measure is to be based, let us at least take care that we have the most ample, the most authentic, as well as the most novel and recent information on the subject?" I make these comments on the remarks of the noble Lord. I think they are fair and just comments. Yielding none of the opinions which I have ever expressed in this House upon Parliamentary Reform—believing, as I hope I may, that upon this subject, the Quarterly Review notwithstanding, I am expressing the opinions of Gentlemen around me—I am not afraid to say that I think it most impolitic at this moment to attempt a settlement such as that projected by the noble Lord. If, indeed, the noble Lord had the power to deal comprehensively and completely with this question—if he came forward and said, "I have here a comprehensive policy for England, for Ireland, and for Scotland, and the principles and conditions upon which we propose the power should be allotted in these countries have been long considered and deeply matured; by them we are prepared to stand or fall; and even perhaps with impending war and impending revolution we feel that such a policy will strengthen the commonwealth, increase the public courage, and animate the public spirit of England"—in that case we might deem the noble Lord and his colleagues rash; we might think them ill-advised; we might regard the occasion as full of danger; but all must admit that this would be the policy, assured and determined, of eminent men, such as they undoubtedly are, and that, if not entitled to adoption, it would at least command respect. But when, in a moment of undoubted danger, when at a period of almost certain peril, the noble Lord comes forward after all with no policy, with a compromise which, to use his own epithet, I must, indeed, call "paltry," I see no safety in such a course, I recognize no security in such proceedings; but I feel that at a time when this House should stand high and the country should be united, we are recommended to take a course which will enfeeble the one and may dishonour the other.

MR. MACKINNON rose, pursuant to notice, to move a Resolution that, in order to obtain a safe and effective reform, it would be unjust and inexpedient to proceed with the proposed legislative measure for the representation of the people until the House had before it the result of the Census authorized by the Bill now under its consideration. He was fully sensible of the importance of the question now under the consideration of the House; having been so long a supporter of a Liberal Government, he was aware the situation in which he was placed was an extremely awkward one; he, therefore, felt it to be his duty to state to the House the reasons that induced him to take the course which he was about to adopt. He might add that he had given notice of his Motion without any communication with Her Majesty's Ministers. He had for the last ten years conscientiously given all the aid in his power to the policy of the noble Lord at the head of the Government in the hour as well of his adversity as of his prosperity, while during that period he had never received at the hands of the noble Lord a single favour either for himself or for any member of his family. It was with some reluctance, then, being, as he was, a general supporter of the policy of the present Government, that he felt called upon to make the present Motion. He did so, however, in the belief that the measure was not popular in the House or in the country, and not because he entertained any objection to it on personal grounds; for neither his own seat, nor that of a near connection of his, would, he believed, be at all endangered by it passing into a law. It was, he might add, a somewhat singular fact that a Motion, such as that to which he was now about to ask the House to assent, he had himself made in reference to the Reform Bill of 1831. In submitting that Motion to the House in his maiden speech in the July of that year, he contended that it was not expedient that the House should proceed with the Reform Bill then under its notice until the Census of 1831 had been taken. The Motion was rejected; but, in considering the cause of that rejection, it must not be forgotten that the cry at the time was, with respect to Reform, "The Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill;" and that almost every person who was returned to that House stood pledged on the subject. Yet, notwithstanding that state of things, his Motion was defeated in a full House only by a majority of 74. What, let him ask, followed? The Bill was not passed that year; and the next year the Census he advised in his Motion was actually taken. Now, he should wish hon. Members for a moment to consider the different position in which the question of Reform at present stood as compared with the year 1831. In that year the country was mad for Reform, and the middle classes were determined to put down the system of borough-mongery. At the present day the state of public opinion, to the progress of which he had paid the utmost attention, afforded a marked contrast on the subject. Some few of the upper classes at present were, perhaps, disposed to wish to see the county franchise lowered to £6. The middle class, which was most influential, was against this Bill, for the simple reason that they were likely through it to be swamped by numbers. If one in a hundred among the middle class could be found in favour of the measure, that was the largest proportion. Then what necessity was there to push on the Bill at railway speed before the Census of 1861 was obtained? In Marylebone, where he resided, a vast amount of wealth and population had been created since the last Census, and yet it was proposed, in reference to the Reform Bill, to pass over the great increase which had taken place in the prosperity of the country, and to go back to the Census of 1851. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. James) had distinctly stated that, if the present Bill was passed in this year, another Bill must be passed in the next. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) had also distinctly declared that he was not satisfied with the present Bill, but regarded it as a stepping-stone to another, being resolved to take all he could, and then to get more. The Reform Act did not pass until after the Census of 1831, and at that time the country was anxious for the measure; but now it was proposed to pass the present Bill before the Census of 1861, though the country did not care a farthing for it. Could anything be more absurd? Now, with regard to the lower classes, what was their opinion about the measure? They had little or no opinion on the subject. He happened to know something of the working classes, having for two successive Sessions been the Chairman of the Committee for considering the state of the law between masters and operatives, and in consequence he had obtained some insight into the feelings of the lower classes, and he could honestly and conscientiously say that the lower classes—he was speaking of the operatives, who had very great power in this country—were by no means anxious for the Bill. It might be said that this was mere assertion, but he would prove it. He had had the opportunity of speaking very often to the persons forming Committees of working people throughout the country, and among the working classes were to be found men who, though of no great education, were of extremely strong minds. He would read a letter from one of those individuals, a member of the Executive Committee of the National Association of United Trades in London, whom he told to express honestly and candidly his own opinion and the opinions of his fellow workmen, observing that the writer would get into disgrace with them, when his letter should be published, if it did not state the circumstances truly and fairly. The letter was dated the 16th April, 1860, and was as follows:—

“ Sir,—Seeing the use which some parties seem desirous to make of the working classes in order to secure the passing of the Reform Bill of Lord John Russell, allow me, however, to assure you that as far as I am able to judge of their feeling on the matter, they are perfectly indifferent about it, and, for all the excitement or agitation that exists, there might be no such measure before the country. In London, if there is any feeling at all upon the matter, it is rather against than in favour of the Bill, because it entirely and intentionally excludes the most thoughtful, sober, and intelligent portion of mechanics from its operation, simply from their inability to do more than occupy apartments, though many of them pay £15 or £20 a year rent. A Reform Bill which purposely excludes this portion of the people from its operation cannot be very captivating to them, and therefore the House of Commons need not be surprised at the evident apathy and indifference of the working classes to Lord John’s little Bill; nay, further, their very silence is not perhaps so much indifference as it is positively contempt for the measure; but, whether or not, they are evidently indifferent whether the Bill becomes law or whether it follows the fate of its predecessors. The only demonstration held by the working classes arising out of the Bill was that held in Hyde Park on Sunday, April 15, when it was denounced in no very complimentary terms as a sham, a delusion, and a snare, and other terms not very flattering. There is another point to which I wish to draw your attention, and that is the appeal of Mr. Bright to trades’ unions, to send delegates to meet in London and so to bring a working-class power to bear upon Parliament. This, however, is a vain and empty appeal, which Mr. Bright knew very well, if he knew anything of trades’ unions, that in every one of which, in every part of the country, political questions of every shade and complexion are most rigidly excluded, and for this reason—if political questions were permitted to form a part of trades’ unions, their discussions would lead to dissension, dissension to dissolution—a consummation which would no doubt be highly gratifying to the hon. Member for Birmingham, but which would be regarded by the working classes as a great calamity. This being the case, you may depend there is no danger of trades’ unions responding to Mr. Bright’s appeal. It is the same with regard to the various friendly and benefit societies of the country. The hundreds of thousands of working men forming those institutions are all strictly forbidden or prohibited from introducing to their meetings all questions of a political character, so that these societies are not likely to endanger their existence by becoming the instruments of any political party to ensure their interests."

The letter was signed "Edward Humphries," and in every point of view he sincerely believed that it was a correct representation of the feelings of the working people. He did not know whether it was worth while to trouble the House with any further testimony of the same kind. He would read one other communication he had received:—

"To Mr. W. A. Mackinnon, M.P.

"Sir,—I have observed through the public press that you have given notice in your place in Parliament to move, on going into Committee on the Reform Bill, that it is inexpedient to legislate upon that question until after the census is taken in 1861. This course I believe to be sound policy, because the measure is based upon old and unreliable data. Many of the present Parliamentary boroughs which are proposed to be partially disfranchised have, since 1851, materially changed their character in point of population, wealth, and importance; others, proposed to be retained, have diminished on all those points, and will still continue to grow less in importance, and yet still will send representatives in equal force with the large constituencies of the country. The Bill does not give satisfaction to any class, because it is framed upon a false basis. It has been recommended for its simplicity, but it closes the door against all who do not pay their own rates, and shuts out of the list men of intelligence, station, wealth and independence of character, to make room for men who, in all probability, will be forced to the poll in shoals to vote for their masters or the masters' nominees. I believe your Motion to be an urgent necessity, in order to prevent injustice being done to the people at large. To legislate upon evidence nine years old would be to commit a great error, and in many instances great wrong. The Bill, if passed to-morrow, would leave the question as unsettled as ever. It is an ugly shaped piece of mechanism, unseemly to the eye, uneven in construction, and unfair to a large mass of the people of this country. I hope you will be successful in your Motion, because it will allow time for a proper Bill to be matured on a safe basis—one that shall secure to intelligence and moral worth a voice in the country, as a counterpoise to the ratepaying class.

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
THOMAS WINTERS.

"No. 3, St. John's Place, Smith Street, Kennington, May 1860."

Was it not absurd then, he asked, to suppose that the lower classes felt at all interested in the passing of this Bill. Nor was the Bill more acceptable within the House than it was popular out of doors. He had asked one hon. Member, for instance, what he thought of it, and the reply he received was, "Oh, I hate the Bill; it is a good-for-nothing, bad measure." "But," he asked, "How will you vote?" "Oh, I will vote for the Bill." "Why, will you vote for a bad Bill?" "Oh," was the reply, "the Lords will throw it out, and so we shall get rid of it." He asked another Member how he meant to vote? The reply was, "I hate the Bill, but I think I shall vote for it." "Why?" "Because the British lion would be up." Upon which he replied that the British lion would be done by the Bill, for the lion's teeth and claws—the army and navy—if the Bill passed, would be reduced, and the British lion would then become a sneaking wolf. He did not like to make personal observations. His wish was to treat the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) with all the courtesy to which he was entitled. He regarded him as a man of strong mind, but he must frankly say that hon. Gentleman did not possess that power which he seemed to suppose. He had some influence over the lower classes in Manchester, in Birmingham, and also in Rochdale, but there his influence ended. He had seen a flock of sheep, while enjoying their verdant pastures, driven by a butcher's boy and his dog into a pen and there slaughtered, and the scene reminded him of the Member for Birmingham driving the House of Commons into the Reform Bill. They were called upon by this Bill to introduce a new element into the representative system which would swamp all the others. Was it fair or right that individuals with little or no education or property should legislate for all the other classes of society? As Chairman of the Committee in relation to masters and operatives, he had put a number of questions to Mr. Potter, the Secretary of the Associated trades of London, who stated that he corresponded indirectly with 600,000 operatives throughout the country; and over whom he had a certain influence. Let them consider for a moment the great danger of admitting that number of operatives to the elective franchise. The noble Lord calculated on the enfranchisement of 200,000 £6-pounders; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that this was a great mistake—that the number admitted would be much less. All this showed clearly that neither had very distinct or accurate notions on the subject. He believed they would have at least 600,000 operatives entitled to the franchise. They must take not only those who now were £6 householders, but those who would be £6 householders. In every city, town, and borough, speculative builders would run up £6 houses; and what would be the result of having 600,000 operatives invested with the franchise, acting under one head? They would swamp the entire constituency. The lower classes, without education, or property, would be making laws for the educated and wealthy. Either the middle and upper classes would be so frightened about their property that they would court a sort of dictatorship, as had occurred on the Continent, or the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whoever he might be, would, to please the people, abolish indirect taxation, and substitute direct taxes of 20, 40, or even 60 per cent—a very comfortable way of depriving all the middle and the upper classes of their property. If this Bill passed into law the rights of the Crown would not be respected, and, as it was said to the Sardinians, "If you cannot fight for liberty you do not deserve it," so he said to the gentlemen of England, "If you cannot preserve the Constitution you do not deserve to have one."

SIR HENRY TRACEY seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,—

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'in order to obtain a safe and effective Reform, it would be inexpedient and unjust to proceed further with the proposed Legislative Measure for the Representation of the People until the House has before it the results of the Census authorized by the Bill now under its consideration.'"

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: It will not be necessary for me to trouble the House at any length in answer to the observations of my hon. Friend. The speech which he has delivered is in fact, as it seems to me, a complete anachronism. It must have been intended to have been delivered upon the second reading of the Bill, as an introduction to a Motion for reading it a second time that day six months; but my hon. Friend unfortunately forgot to deliver it upon that occasion, and has presented it as a preface to a Motion relating to a totally different subject. I therefore hope that the House will not expect me to follow him through the oft-iterated topics of which we have heard so much during the last few months with regard to the large addition to the constituency which would be effected by the present measure, the overwhelming of knowledge and property by ignorance and poverty, and those other general arguments which have been so often used on one side of the House, and so often answered on the other. The most weighty part of my hon. Friend's remarks, as it seemed to me, was one of the two letters which he read to the House, and which he stated were addressed to him by members of the working classes, or at any rate, by members of some of those committees connected with trades which constitute themselves for the time the representatives of the working classes. I understood that letter to assert the Bill before the House to be "a sham, a delusion, and a snare," which I took to mean that this Bill, professing to enfranchise the working classes, would not, if passed into law, confer upon them any substantial political power. Unless that was the meaning of the letter, it seemed to me to be totally destitute both of meaning and applicability. Well, Sir, what I wish to know is, how is that view of the Bill to be reconciled, not only with the view which is taken on the other side of the House, but with that taken by my hon. Friend himself, who argued that this was a democratic measure, and that it was inconsistent with the maintenance of the influence of property and intelligence, and of the Constitution as by law established? The plain and obvious tendency of that letter, which he paraded to the House as a great discovery and as a great revelation of the esoteric feelings of the working classes, was in fact a complaint that this Bill did not go far enough, that it was too limited in its operation, and that it did not include within its provisions a sufficient number of the working classes. There was one expression, indeed, which it was somewhat difficult to comprehend—namely, that this Bill excluded all the thoughtful portion—I think that was the expression—all the thoughtful portion of the working classes. Now, I profess myself utterly unable to comprehend by what process of interpretation the author of that letter was able to discover that a franchise which admitted the occupiers of houses of between £10 and £6 a year rental to vote for Members of Parliament, would include the thoughtless portion of the working classes, while it carefully excluded all the thoughtful portion of that section of the community. I think that, when the House

[First Night.]

reflects upon the contents of that letter, it must come to the conclusion, first, that it is founded upon a very partial and imperfect view of the facts of the case, and in the next place, that it was utterly inapplicable to the purpose to which my hon. Friend applied it; and that, so far as it had any logical effect whatever, it entirely disproved the conclusion which he sought to establish. I will now, during the few moments which I shall detain the House, address myself to the proper object of my hon. Friend's Motion—namely, the postponement of the further proceeding with this Bill until the Census of next year shall have been taken. In the first place, the Census of next year will, if the Bill now upon the table receives the sanction of Parliament, be taken in the month of April next, and its result cannot by possibility be in the hands of Parliament in time to form the foundation for legislation during next Session. Therefore, the necessary effect of postponing all proceedings upon this Bill until after the results of the Census shall be in the hands of Parliament will be to render legislation on Reform during next Session impossible. That may be matter of congratulation or not to hon. Members; I merely state it as a fact that those who give their votes for the postponement of the Reform Bill until the Census shall have been taken will vote for its postponement beyond the period of next Session, and until the year following. With regard to making the Census a reason for postponing the proceedings upon this Bill there is one obvious remark which must occur to every one—that is, that the Census has no bearing upon that which is the disputed and contested part of this Bill. Those who have attended to the debates upon the second reading of this measure must be aware that they turned almost exclusively upon the question of the franchise; they turned mainly upon the question of the borough franchise—whether or no it should be lowered from £10 to £6, or any amount lower than £10. To a very slight extent did they turn upon the question of the transfer of seats in the manner proposed by the present Bill. Therefore, the ground of postponement now alleged applies exclusively to that portion of the Bill which is not the main subject of dispute in this House. With regard to the question of the Census itself, and to the ground which has been taken for the transfer of seats, there is no clause in the Bill which says that all boroughs under 7,000 of population shall lose one of its seats. That is a proposal only mentioned in debate by my noble Friend in introducing the measure. All that we ask the House to agree to is the partial disfranchisement of certain boroughs, and the transfer of the seats to certain other boroughs and counties. It is stated as a ground for the selection of these particular boroughs that they come within the line of the 7,000. But there is no peculiar charm in the number 7,000 any more than in the number 6,000, the limit proposed by the late Government. It was necessary to take some number by which the disfranchisement should be governed, and it is quite immaterial whether it should be 7,000 by the last Census or 7,500 according to the Census of next year. The material point is—what is the relative position of the boroughs selected as compared with the other boroughs or districts? And if it should turn out, according to the next Census, that the boroughs we have selected stand in the same relative position to other towns, it is perfectly unimportant whether the population of the highest of them should prove to be 7,000 or a few hundreds over that number. Unless, therefore, it can be shown, as I maintain it cannot, by probable argument, that the relative position of these boroughs is likely to be materially influenced by the Census, the reason assigned for delay by my hon. Friend must entirely fail. I defy any hon. Gentleman to prove that there is the smallest justification for postponing our decision till the Census shall be taken. That which is material is to ascertain what are proportionally the twenty-five—or any other number you choose to select—lowest boroughs in point of importance and population to be subjected to disfranchisement. That fact is not likely to be altered by waiting for another Census. The ground assigned for postponing our decision is so utterly inadequate, so trifling, as to have all the appearance of a mere pretext for the sake of delay. The line can be equally well drawn under the Census of 1851 as under that of 1861. Let me add I am much inclined to think that, even if we have the option, it is better to adopt the Census made at a time when there was no prospect of a Reform Bill being proposed which was to be made the foundation of disfranchisement, such disfranchisement to be based upon population, than to adopt a Census which will be taken with the knowledge that its results will affect the representation of particular towns. I have consulted the Registrar General on the subject, and he assures me that he would repose far more confidence as to the numbers which are to guide disfranchisement in a Reform Bill in the Census of 1851 than he could place in the Census of the next year, in which there is no doubt that in towns which are near the 7,000 line a very great effort would be made to influence the result with reference to the known intentions of Parliament. I do not mean to say that any deliberate fraud would be perpetrated, but there can be no question that in an operation which is necessarily of so loose a character as the counting of the population a desire will exist in certain towns, and an endeavour be made somewhat to enlarge their numbers, so as to raise the population above the disqualifying figure. I cannot admit, then, that the slightest valid ground has been shown by my hon. Friend upon the merits of the case for postponing our further proceedings on this Bill until we have the Census of 1861 in our hands. If the House are of opinion that this measure is founded upon just principles—if it is desirable to take the limit of population as a ground of disfranchisement, according to the principle adopted by the Bill of last Session as well as by the present Bill, I confidently maintain that no case can be made out in favour of delaying legislation till we have the results of the Census of 1861 before us, and that the Census of 1851 offers a most secure and sufficient basis for such legislation. If, therefore, the House seriously purpose to proceed with this measure—if they are not merely looking to this Motion as a means of procrastination, but are ready to discuss the Bill upon its merits, and to entertain the question of disfranchisement upon the ground of population, I entreat them to reject this Motion. Some Gentlemen may think that, instead of disfranchising according to population we ought to throw in the element of property, or that in lieu of taking population you should take the number of voters. All these facts are in the possession of the House. They are questions which may be fairly raised in Committee. The Government considered these various alternatives before making their proposals. I am aware it may be said there are certain towns with respect to which, by adopting the number of the voters instead of the population, you would arrive at a different result. If we had proposed to disfranchise according to the number of voters instead of according to population, then it would have been urged that our standard was capricious, and that we ought to have taken that of population. In short, whatever single principle is adopted, it is quite certain Gentlemen will be found to maintain that some other principle should govern disfranchisement. I have, therefore, no expectation that unanimity will prevail with respect to the most desirable test of disfranchisement that can be adopted; it can only be decided by a majority of votes when we get into Committee. But I must again call on the House to remember that no useful object will be gained by delay, that all the materials for the decision of this question are already in their possession, and that the country would hardly believe that we are seriously bent on the consideration of a Reform Bill if we were to assent to the Motion of my hon. Friend.

SIR HENRY TRACEY said, he had risen immediately after the very excellent and lucid speech of the hon. Member for Rye, because he thought his proposition a very fair and reasonable one, and one that ought to meet with the acceptance of the House. If population was to form an element in their legislation surely they ought not to come to a decision at a time when that standard could not be accurately applied, and when the basis on which it was proposed to legislate would be cut from under them in so very short a time as next year. There was every reason to believe that Her Majesty's Government had fallen into many errors in reference to the facts upon which their Reform Bill was professedly based. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone and others had clearly shown this; and he had been informed by the town clerk of Yarmouth that a £6 rental franchise would more than double the number of the present voters in that borough, for it would raise the constituency from not quite 1,400 to 2,850 electors; and the preponderance of power would thus be transferred from persons of some property and education, and who paid income tax, to persons who had comparatively little property or education, and who paid no income tax. The noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs had in that Bill a sickly child, whose life he would find that the aid even of the professors from Birmingham would not enable him much further to prolong. The noble Lord had had many opportunities of withdrawing the measure, but, with the fondness of a parent for his rickety offspring, he had refused to turn them to any account. They had been told by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire that there were but two persons in the House who approved of the Bill, and that statement had met among hon. Members with very considerable marks of assent. The right hon. Gentleman had also said that the measure was in itself a bad one, and three-fourths of the House had responded to that observation. A short time afterwards the hon. Member for East Kent (Mr. Deedes) recommended the noble Lord to postpone the Bill until the next Census should have been taken; but with that recommendation the noble Lord had refused to comply. Then came the proposal of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Massey) for referring the Bill to a Select Committee, which had since been so politely and condescendingly withdrawn. He (Sir Henry Stracey), believed that if the noble Lord had embraced any of those opportunities of giving up the measure, the noble Lord at the head of the Government would have been very much obliged to him. The hon. Member who had brought forward the present Amendment had alluded to the very interesting evidence which had been given by Mr. Potter to a Committee, of which the hon. Gentleman himself had been Chairman. Mr. Potter had shown in the course of that evidence that he believed he possessed a dominion, or at least a considerable authority over so large a mass as 600,000 individuals. The hon. Member put the question to Mr. Potter, how many out of those 600,000 would be voters? Perhaps he put it very fairly when he stated that great numbers would be added. But the numbers actually doubled those given by the Treasury Bench. Then, however, came in the extraordinary power of combination, and it was clear enough that this Mr. Potter held in his hands a great power of combination. He telegraphed from the central Committee to other Committees, and if a strike were thought desirable by that Central Committee a strike took place. On one occasion a telegraphic message arrived at a provincial Committee in the morning, and before noon not a single operative, out of many thousands, was at work. This would show the extraordinary powers of this man, or this union, over which he presided, in the way of combination. He (Sir Henry Stracey) would have thought that the capacity of the voters' minds would have been made a point for consideration. He would have thought that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have advocated this point. On the Bill brought forward by the late Government the right hon. Gentleman said the fault he found was that the Bill went too far. Surely the present Bill went somewhat further—at any rate it did not pay much attention to the mental power of the voters. Yet the right hon. Gentleman not only sat on the same bench with the noble Lord, but supported him in the advocacy of his Bill. There was one point which he would touch upon, although there was a certain delicacy in referring to the hon. Member for Birmingham in consequence of the frequent allusions to him in the House. But that hon. Member had said on a former occasion, as had been also said to-night by the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. H. Berkeley), that he accepted the Bill. Why did he accept it? Simply because it was a stepping stone to something more. Well, that would be universal suffrage. Now, universal suffrage—

MR. BRIGHT: Is the hon. Gentleman pretending to quote me?

SIR HENRY TRACEY: I am presuming, though I may be wrong, that when you said you accepted the Bill as an instalment, your ultimate object was universal suffrage. It may be household suffrage.

MR. BRIGHT: My object has always been plainly stated in this House, and I hope the hon. Gentleman will not say anything which he is not prepared to prove. I have never uttered a word in favour of universal suffrage either in this House or elsewhere. Perhaps, therefore, the hon. Gentleman will be good enough to correct himself.

SIR HENRY TRACEY: I believe the words of the hon. Member were that he accepted this Bill as an instalment.

MR. BRIGHT: When I spoke of a further measure I referred exclusively to the question of the re-distribution of seats. I never was an advocate for universal suffrage.

SIR HENRY TRACEY said, he would be very sorry to misrepresent the hon. Member, but it seemed to have struck other hon. Gentlemen, as it had struck him, when the hon. Member for Birmingham spoke of "an instalment." Perhaps he ought to apologize to the hon. Member for referring to him, but considering the prominent part the hon. Member took as a democratic leader he could hardly expect that he would not be made a subject of comment and reference.

Mr. BRIGHT: That is no reason why you should misrepresent me. ["Oh!"]

SIR HENRY TRACEY: The position of the hon. Gentleman was a somewhat peculiar one, for he received the greatest possible deference to his opinions from the Treasury Bench. He had gone into power, certainly without place, but he had reason to congratulate himself on his influence with the Treasury Bench. But was this the proper position for the Treasury Bench, the proper position for the Government of the country, as an independent Government, to assume? Was it not rather a lowering position that they should feel themselves subservient to the few votes commanded by a private Member of the House? Would it not be a higher position for the Government of the Crown, if they did not, in obedience to the opinions, he would not say of the hon. Member only, but to the opinion of another most leading hon. Member, and one who was not a properly accredited diplomatist to a foreign country, if they did not bow to a democratic array in that instance as they did in all others, and at the same time sanction the subserviency shown by the noble Lord at the head of Foreign Affairs in the same quarter with regard to this particular Reform Bill? He saw behind the Treasury bench men who, he was sure, felt as hon. Members ought to feel. But he saw others who, by the expression of their countenances, were most unwilling supporters, at any rate, of the noble Lord. Their faces said plainly enough video meliora proboque, but they must unfortunately add, deteriora sequor. He saw certain hon. Gentlemen who sat there in helpless disapproval; or they would come forward and support the noble Lord in this conjuncture. They might pride themselves on being "honourable men." They might pride themselves on being, like Chevalier Bayard, in one respect, sans peur, but, believe him, if they voted for the present Bill against their convictions, it would be a thorn in their sides, and they would never be able to add as he could, sans reproche.

Mr. GREGSON said, that although he sat behind the Treasury bench, he must be allowed to deny that he was in the unhappy state described by the hon. Baronet who had just spoken. The hon. Baronet had spoken of the Bill as a sickly child. If it were so, it was the hon. Baronet's duty to nurse it instead of endeavouring to murder it as he had done. He would entreat the House to go into Committee and endeavour to pass the Bill by making such Amendments as might be desirable. There could not be a more opportune moment than the present for passing a Reform Bill. The country was profoundly tranquil, and we were at peace with all Europe. If the Bill were not passed this Session, Parliament might be obliged by the country to pass a measure much more extensive and objectionable. Nothing less than household suffrage and vote by ballot might then satisfy the country.

Mr. BARROW said, he quite agreed in opinion with the hon. Member for Lancashire, that this was a proper time to pass a Reform Bill: but he wished to pass a Bill that would last for a few years; and he thought the Bill before the House would not last more than a few months. The House had not before it the various measures which had been announced as likely to be introduced by Members on the other (the Ministerial) side of the House; and, therefore, he hoped the Bill would be postponed till there was information on that point, as well as with regard to the number of voters the Bill would add to the constituency, and which could only be furnished by the coming Census. Without additional information it would be a waste of time to discuss the Bill in Committee. When charges of want of manliness for not opposing the second reading of the Bill were made, he felt bound to say, for himself, that he had tried to catch the Speaker's eye, and that he was equally opposed to the present measure as well as to that of last year, disapproving as he did the principle involved in both. The ancient principle of the Constitution, that property ought to be the basis of the county constituency, had been overlooked in both Bills. This might be considered in Committee. His objection to the Bill of 1832 was, that it destroyed the representation of classes—that it destroyed the representation of scot-and-lot boroughs, of boroughs where the constituency were freemen, where the working classes had the power, if they chose to exercise it, of sending to the House representatives of their own classes, and at the same time gave to the master, manufacturer, and capitalists, the opportunity of having Representatives in the House: and at this moment he would, as a matter of expediency, rather see a few, a fair, and reasonable number of such boroughs existing, and sending their Representatives to Parliament, even if they had no property, than that they should not be re-at all. This might not be an opinion which he held in common with other Members of the House; but, nevertheless, it was an opinion which he held most strongly. He thought property should be represented, but he thought that industry should be represented also. He saw much weight in the opinions advanced by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Massey). He was as convinced as any man could be that it was necessary to have some alteration of the existing representation; he was anxious, however, that it should be such an alteration as would last some time; for the inconvenience to the public business by the perpetual discussion of this subject was very great. He desired, therefore, that any legislation on the subject should have the character of permanence about it, but that he was unable to perceive in the present measure, and he was satisfied that it could not be until the House had more information than was in its possession at present.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID thought the ground of delay till the next Census had been made was the most unreasonable that could be urged. So urgent was the question of Reform, that more than two years ago the noble Lord at the head of the Government found it necessary to promise a measure of reform, and the Government which succeeded the noble Lord's previous Administration was obliged to bring in a Reform Bill to satisfy the demands of the country. He would warn the opponents of the Bill that it was not safe to play at "bob-cherry" with the rights of the people; and to delay the measure until they had the results of the next Census would be a loss, not of one, but of two years. The only question of importance that the House had now to determine was, whether the borough franchise should be lowered, and hon. Gentlemen should have helped the noble Lord to determine that question, instead of blocking up his way with piles of Resolutions. Hon. Gentlemen opposite were no doubt rejoiced at the suggestion that the Bill ought to be delayed till the next Census was obtained. It was strange that they did not think of asking last year for a postponement of the Bill of the late Government on the same ground. He hoped that on neither that nor on any other ground would the House delay the Bill of the noble Lord.

MR. BOVILL said, that the abstinence of hon. Members on the Opposition benches from discussing the question of the disfranchisement of boroughs, had led the Home

Secretary to imagine that the main objections to the Bill were directed against the franchise, and that there were no great objections to other parts of the noble Lord's scheme; but he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that there were many Members on that side of the House, though not occupying seats on the front benches, who felt a deep interest in the question, and who had refrained from expressing their opinions on the second reading of the Bill rather than lay themselves open to the charge which had been so frequently repeated, that there was an intention unnecessarily to delay the progress of the measure at that stage. The question now before the House was whether they should pass at once to the consideration of the Bill in Committee; and one naturally looked to see what materials the Government had laid before the House, and whether they had availed themselves of the best materials at their command, or whether they had adopted a principle with respect to the disfranchisement of boroughs which was altogether fallacious and unsatisfactory so far as that question was concerned. What, then, were the materials to which they should look in proposing the disfranchisement of a borough? Ought they to take the test of population which included men, women, and children, and embraced a vast number of persons whose political existence was entirely ignored, or ought they to act upon the relative importance of boroughs, or upon the number of voters in each, or upon the number of voters in relation to the number of inhabitants? These last materials they had before them in the returns of voters on the register in 1859-60; but granted that there were, as the Home Secretary had stated, objections to acting upon the number of voters; was there not another test which had already been adopted by this House and the House of Lords on the occasion of passing the Reform Bill of 1832? Population had been proposed as a test of disfranchisement in 1831; but after giving it the most deliberate consideration, it was found to be so fallacious that it had to be abandoned. A new scheme was therefore proposed in 1832. The most eminent men of the day were consulted upon the subject, and the result was that the Government determined not to proceed upon population or the number of voters; but upon the relative importance of boroughs determined by the number of rated inhabitants and the amount contributed by each borough to the direct taxation of the country. Acting upon that test, the Government were enabled to carry out an extensive disfranchisement, for the principle recommended itself to every one. Now, the materials upon which the Government of 1832 proceeded were quite as accessible to the present Government, but they were not disposed to act upon them. What they proposed to do was to adopt population alone, and to place the franchise in the hands of a class who were without property, influence, and education; to take it from those who possessed these qualifications, and transfer it to those whose property was next to nothing, many of whom were wholly, or almost wholly, uninstructed, and who were liable to be influenced, not by their own honest and independent judgments, but by appeals addressed to their passions in the inflammatory language of demagogues. Moreover, in re-opening this question at the expiration of a period of twenty-eight years, when they said that a change of circumstances required an alteration in the representative system, and acting upon population they proposed to go back nine years, to the census of 1851, for the materials upon which to legislate in 1860. When they produced their scheme, how was it met by Gentlemen below the gangway opposite? Why, they plainly told the Government, that they did not receive the measure as a final settlement of the question, but only as an instalment. Such being the language held by hon. Members opposite, surely it was no more than reasonable, if they were resolved to adopt the principle of population, that they should wait until the next Census had been taken, and ascertain what the real statistics of the population were before they committed themselves to any legislation founded upon mere numbers. They had been told by the Home Secretary that a certain arbitrary number of the population had been adopted by the Government for the disfranchisement of boroughs; and having rejected the precedent of 1832, of the relative importance of boroughs, as well as the test of the relative number of voters, or the number of voters in relation to the number of inhabitants, and determined to proceed on the basis of population alone, how did they propose to act in respect of that basis? As to the disfranchisement of boroughs, the present Government took an arbitrary line, and said that whereas the late Government took

6,000 as the line of demarcation, they would take 7,000. But the late Government went on the principle of ascertaining what were the requirements of the country, and then they determined to disfranchise as many boroughs as would meet the required want. But what principle had been adopted by the present Government? Not any; they merely said that as 6,000 was the amount of population decided upon before, they would choose a little higher, and take 7,000. They then took 25 seats from boroughs of England; and returned only 21 seats to England and gave two English seats to Scotland and two to Ireland; it was notorious, however, that the principle of population was not applicable to Ireland, because the population of Ireland had decreased and not increased. He would not then go into the question of the right of the Government to transfer English seats to Scotland and Ireland, but he would say that in transferring these seats to Scotland and Ireland, and also to other boroughs and counties of England, Government had taken the present condition of the population, in 1860 for distributing the seats whilst the boroughs were to be disfranchised upon their population of 1851. By way of example he would take the case of the town of Birkenhead, which had an enormous population. No one could doubt that in its present condition it ought to have a representative; but if they were to take the town as it stood in 1851, they would have a totally different state of figures represented. Might there not be among the towns it was now proposed to disfranchise, places which had so increased in relative population and importance as to be more deserving of having two representatives than many of those towns which it was proposed should retain their two seats. He would take the cases of Tavistock, of Tiverton, and of Tamworth, and consider them in reference to the scheme of the Government. He would begin with Tavistock, which was to retain the privilege of returning two Members to Parliament. At present its number of electors was 433, and the contemplated addition, estimated according to the data afforded by Her Majesty's Government, would be 59; so that its total number of electors, if the Bill passed in its present shape, would be 492. He would compare that with the case of Guildford, which it was proposed to deprive of one of its Members. Guildford had 723 voters at the present time;

[First Night.

therefore it had more than 200 voters above the number that Tavistock would have if this Bill were passed; and if they took the number of electors that Guildford would have, supposing the present Bill to be passed, the estimated addition being 207, they would find Guildford with 930 electors, while Tavistock would have only 492—yet Tavistock was to retain its two Members, while Guildford was to be deprived of one of its representatives. In like manner the noble Lord had not disregarded the interests of Devonshire in his distribution of seats to the counties. In South Devon there were now eight boroughs, and altogether returning 14 Members; yet by this Bill it was proposed to give an additional member to South Devon; while West Surrey, with only one borough, namely, Guildford, and four Members, was to be deprived of one Member. Let them take relative importance or any other test they chose, but he must say that data nine years old afforded a most unsatisfactory test. The borough of Tiverton had at present 526 voters; if the Bill were carried in its present form the addition of voters would be 242, according to the Returns before the House; so that, after the passing of the Bill, its constituency would be 768, whereas Guildford would have 930 voters. He did not object to Tiverton having its two Members. The House was proud to receive both the Members from Tiverton, but he had said enough to show that they had adopted an improper test for disfranchisement. Then as to Tamworth, there were at the present time in that borough 520 voters; the contemplated addition under the present Bill, according to the returns, would be 98; making together a constituency of 618.

SIR ROBERT PEEL begged to assure the hon. Member that that Return was entirely erroneous.

MR. BOVILL said, the grounds on which it was erroneous had been explained to the House, but he was obliged to take the Returns the Government gave them. If the Returns were erroneous in one case they might be so in all, but they were the only materials before the House; and the probability that they were erroneous made the grounds for postponement stronger, and he had no doubt the hon. Baronet would, therefore, cheerfully give his vote to prevent further proceeding with the Bill. But it would be immaterial if they took the same scale with respect to all the boroughs. They had the fact then, that Tamworth, under the Bill, if it were passed, would have only 618 voters, while Guildford had already 723 voters, and would have 930; so that Tamworth, after the passing of the Bill, would have fewer voters than Guildford had at present. These figures he thought sufficiently showed the fallacy of the test it was proposed to apply. There were many other boroughs which would come properly under consideration if the Bill went into Committee, but he had referred to these particular boroughs, because they were rather distinguished on account of the representatives they returned to that House. What were the other principles set forth in this Bill. As regarded taking 7,000 instead of 6,000 as the line of demarcation for the disfranchisement of boroughs, he should like to know upon what principle it rested. The Government, as he understood, merely said that they adopted the principle of the late Government. Then, again, with regard to the franchise, the noble Lord said that if the House did not like a £6 franchise it might adopt a £7 franchise, or an £8 franchise—or, in fact, anything the House liked! Then why was it that the noble Lord proposed his famous Resolution of 1859? If the noble Lord said the question of a £6 franchise was not one of principle but of detail, why might not that question have been settled in Committee last year as well as now? It seemed, then, that after the great Resolution of the noble Lord, which had necessitated a general election and a change of Ministry, the question of whether the franchise was to be fixed at £6 or at £7 or £8, was to be still left for settlement in Committee. They were now asked to go into Committee without proper information, and with information which had been condemned by both sides of the House as incorrect. Were they to act blindly and in the dark as to the increase in the number of electors by an extension of the franchise—particularly when they were about to throw open the door to numbers in preference to property and education? These were important considerations, and by voting for the Amendment they would give Her Majesty's Government an opportunity, if they persisted in adopting that fallacious principle of population as a test of disfranchisement, of having more accurate data upon which to proceed. But was this Bill considered satisfactory by anybody? Was it satisfactory to the noble Lord himself? To any of his colleagues, or to any single Member of the House? Was it proposed that the measure now under consideration should be taken as a final settlement on the matter? Some hon. Members on the other side did, indeed, affect to be satisfied with it, but only as an instalment: and was it not likely that to proceed at this time without accurate information, would render their case more complete when they came forward with their further demands? If he were not mistaken, an outcry had been raised among some of the Gentlemen opposite with respect to what they called the rotten or nomination boroughs. What did hon. Members think would be the opinion of hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House with respect to a borough like Calne? Did they not think that that would be put forward in the following year as a reason for introducing another scheme? Would Arundel also be left untouched, and would it not be used for a similar purpose? The hon. Gentlemen opposite, to whom he had referred, were only too happy to take this measure as an instalment, when they saw Tamworth, Tiverton, and Tavistock, Calne, and Arundel, were not now to be interfered with, because these and other similar boroughs would be an addition to the instalment they would certainly ask on a future occasion. But there were other matters that might not be considered undeserving the attention of hon. Gentlemen. The right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir George Lewis) had hinted at a principle upon which this question might be determined—namely, to look at the relative importance of boroughs. This was a test that had been acted upon with success on a former occasion in 1832, and if it were now adopted, no one would have a right to complain; but, even then, proper information and data were requisite. It would not do to decide such a question upon the information obtained nine years ago; since that time some boroughs would have decayed, and others increased, in importance, and for these reasons he should give his cordial support to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Rye. The Amendment, if carried, would give the Government an opportunity of retracing their steps, and of introducing a Bill founded upon facts, arguments, and reasoning, which would be incontrovertible; instead of being based upon the fallacious principles and the uncertain facts upon which the House was now asked to give its opinion.

MR. BAINES said, the House would certainly require to know what was implied in the postponement of the Bill until the results of the Census should be known;—for he could see from the speeches that had been made on both sides of the House, that this was not at all understood. They would not only require to know the change in the population that would be made evident by the Census of 1861, but also the change in the civil condition of that population. Having investigated this question he found that that portion of the Census of 1851 giving the number of the inhabitants was published in 1852; but the report bore date 21st July, 1852; and therefore that first portion of the information derivable from the Census would not have been available for legislation until the following year, 1853. But when were the other portions of the Census, and which were equally important for the purpose in view, published? The part containing the ages, civil condition, occupation, and birthplace, of the people, was not issued until 1854, the report bearing date April 29, 1854, after which a considerable time must have elapsed before it could have been printed; so that that information would not have been available until 1855. The part relating to religions, another most important element, bore date December 10, 1853, but was not published until 1854. The report upon educational statistics was dated March 31, 1854, but could not have been legislated upon until 1855. But the case with respect to Ireland was still more remarkable. The part relating to ages and education was not published until December 20, 1855, and the General Report of the Registrar General was not published until June 28, 1856. It was evident, therefore, by parity of reasoning, that if they now waited for the Census of 1861 they would not be able to proceed to legislation upon it until 1867. But had they, as the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Bovill) had intimated, information of no more recent date than 1851 to proceed upon? On the contrary, the paper moved for by that hon. and learned Member himself, and which he (Mr. Baines) then held in his hand, contained the number of houses rated to the poor, the amount of taxation, and the relative importance of boroughs according to those facts up to 1856, besides the number of registered electors in 1859-60. He trusted the House would not compromise its character by consenting to a postponement which would be considered unnecessary and frivolous, and adopted for the purpose, not merely of delaying, but of defeating, any measure of Parliamentary Reform. He was quite convinced that if, after each opposing Government had in turn presented a Measure on that important subject, after four or five successive Governments had taken it up, and Her Majesty had as many times announced it in the Speech from the Throne, the House were further to delay the serious consideration of it, that course would be considered by many in the country as an insidious mode of getting rid of a subject which some thought disagreeable. He honestly believed that if the Conservative party in that House, and in the community, wished to settle the question at a time favourable to their own opinions, they ought eagerly to embrace the present period, when a condition of general prosperity, never exceeded within his recollection, caused a degree of political tranquillity, and almost political stagnation, such as might never present itself again.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR expressed his entire concurrence in the eloquent and interesting speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Bovill), who had so clearly given his reasons for supporting the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Rye (Mr. Mackinnon), and for objecting to the test adopted for the partial disfranchisement of boroughs in the Reform Bill now before the House. Had his hon. Friend moved the Amendment of which he had given notice for to-night, he should have had great satisfaction in seconding it. In the two speeches of the noble Lord the Member for the City (Lord John Russell), and of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary (Sir George Lewis), two points had been particularly dwelt upon—in the former with respect to the working classes, in the latter with reference to the disfranchisement of boroughs, with which he entirely disagreed. Taking the latter point first, he must distinctly say that he thought the rule laid down for partial disfranchisement according to a test of the amount of the population in 1851, both arbitrary and unfair, and he was at a loss to understand why the Government had departed from the principle established in 1832, when disfranchisement was regulated according to the relative importance of boroughs, as judged by the number of houses they contained, and the amount of direct taxation they paid. It had been said that the late Government took the test of population for the fifteen boroughs which they had intended to disfranchise. It was a poor reason indeed to give, that because a bad example had been set by one Government it was therefore to be followed by another; and certainly the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) ought not to put forward such an excuse, for he had twice tried the test of population, which had been objected to and rejected by Parliament, and he had himself adopted that of the number of houses, and of the amount of direct taxation paid in his Reform Bill of 1832, which ultimately became law. He thought he could prove that this test of population was not a just one, and one which the House ought not now to accept. On the 24th of November, 1831, Lord Melbourne, then Home Secretary, for whose memory every Member must have the highest respect, wrote thus to Lieutenant Drummond:—

“The Government having determined to found the Reform Bill upon a new basis, I request your assistance to enable them to ascertain the relative importance of the smaller boroughs in England and Wales. It is proposed to take the number of houses and the amount of assessed taxes for the year ending April, 1831, together, as the test of disfranchisement.”

On the 12th of December, 1831, Lieutenant Drummond replied to Lord Melbourne, enclosing a list of boroughs drawn up according to the instructions which he had received. He said—

“The principle on which the list is founded, consists in allowing equal weight, in the estimation of the relative importance of a borough, to the number of houses which it contains, and amount of assessed taxes which it pays; and the method adopted for carrying this principle into effect may be stated in the following words:—1st. Take the average number of houses contained in the boroughs to be arranged, divide the number of houses in each borough by this average number, and a series of numbers will be obtained, denoting the relative importance of the different boroughs with respect to houses.—2nd. Take the average amount of the assessed taxes paid by the same boroughs, and proceed precisely in the same manner as described with respect to the houses, a series of numbers will result, showing the relative importance of the different boroughs with regard to assessed taxes.—3rd. Add together the numbers in these two lists which relate to the same boroughs, and a series of numbers will be produced denoting the relative importance of the different boroughs with respect to houses and assessed taxes combined.”

Well, upon this question of relative importance a debate arose in Committee on the 20th of February, 1832. The principle was impugned by Mr. Pollock, but the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) not only justified it, and also Lieutenant Drummond's calculations, but stated that so satisfied was he of the accuracy of the test that he had referred it to Professor Airey at Cambridge, Professor Wallis at Edinburgh, and Sir John Herschel, who had authorized him to say that they approved of it; and Mr. Davies Gilbert, a high authority on such a point, declared that although opposed to the principle of the Reform Bill, he could not withhold his testimony to the accuracy of Lieutenant Drummond's test. That was the test adopted by the noble Lord himself in 1832, and then accepted by Parliament, and yet now he had reverted to the test of 1831 rejected at that time by the House, instead of taking that which he had himself adopted, and which had been accepted by Parliament. His hon. Friend the Member for Guildford had illustrated the injustice of the Government proposal by a reference to the circumstances of the borough which he represented. Possibly the House would permit him to give a few similar figures in the case of Hertford. Now take the number of voters registered as £10 householders, which afforded a good test of the importance of a borough. He found that the numbers were relatively—

Hertford	462	Lichfield	401
Bridport	434	Bridgnorth ...	374
Wycombe	407	Tavistock	430
Cockermouth ...	455	Buckingham ...	353

Thus, as far as these voters registered as £10 householders were concerned, the result was in favour of Hertford. Then, looking to the number of electors, he found there were in Hertford,

Hertford	541	Tamworth	520
Bridport	496	Tavistock	433
Wycombe	412	Buckingham ...	356
Cockermouth ...	455

Again, the preponderance was in favour of Hertford, and yet Hertford, was to lose a Member, whilst the other boroughs named were to retain two. He had next a return of male occupiers at £10 and upwards, and at £6 and upwards, assessed to the last poor rate, made before the 7th November, 1859.

Male occupiers at £10 and upwards.	Male occupiers at £6 and upwards
Hertford	779
Bridport	752
Wycombe	540
Cockermouth ...	567
Lichfield	624
Malton	665
Tamworth	563
Bridgnorth ...	621
Tavistock	473
Buckingham ...	496
Stamford	557

Notwithstanding these figures, Hertford and Guildford were to be partially disfranchised, although they were the only Parliamentary boroughs in their own counties, and were likewise county towns. The injustice was still more glaring when they looked at the returns, showing the amount of property and income tax charged in different boroughs under schedules A, B, D, and E, for the year ending the 5th of April, 1857. The amount was:—

Hertford	£4855	Bridgnorth ...	£3810
Penryn	3416	Lichfield	2522
Buckingham ...	4730	Newcastle-under
Wycombe	3210	Lyme	3484
Cockermouth...	2719	Stafford	4210
Bridport	2999	Tamworth	2755
Poole	4273	Malton	3110
Weymouth ...	4548	Pontefract	4834

and yet Hertford was to be partially disfranchised, and these other towns were to retain their two Members! There was further a return of 52 cities paying an amount of taxation (property, income and assessed) of less than £4,500, of which 26 returned one Member, and 26 returned two. Hertford did not appear in the list at all, but Cockermouth, Tamworth, Bridport, Wycombe, Newcastle-under-Lyme, Penryn, Malton, and Lichfield do appear, which are not to lose any Member. It appeared, moreover, by another return that Hertford paid in property, income, and assessed taxes in 1857, £6,030, there being 78 cities and boroughs which paid less, of these 35 returned one Member, and 43 returned two; of the last 25 were to lose one Member, including Hertford, which paid the most of these 25, and which paid more than the following boroughs which were not to lose a Member, taking population as the test, namely:

Cockermouth £3368	Stafford	£4814
Tamworth ... 3453	Barnstaple ...	4950
Bridport	Poole	4999
Newcastle-under-	Buckingham ...	5436
Lyme	Weymouth	5724
Penryn	Pontefract	5731
Lichfield	Berwick	5756
Bridgnorth ... 4660	Bridgwater ...	5868

and yet Hertford was to be partially disfranchised whilst all these boroughs were to retain their two Members. He had endeavoured, then, to show, and he hoped successfully, that if the noble Lord's own test of 1832 were adopted Hertford ought not to be disfranchised. The noble Lord had however, departed from the principle which he had himself laid down in the Bill of 1832, and had reverted to the Bills of 1831, which he had himself abandoned in

[First Night.

1832. There were many hon. Members who represented boroughs proposed to be partially disfranchised, and who, from the manner in which the test of population according to the Census of 1851 affected their constituents, had every right to insist upon opposing this Bill on the Motion now before the House. No charge had been brought against Hertford and Guildford, whilst there were towns such as Wakefield, Gloucester, Norwich, and others, whose constituencies had been proved to have been guilty of corrupt practices, but which were passed over and left untouched by this Bill. Two Members had been taken away from St. Albans, and not only was it proposed to give those two Members to Scotland and Ireland, but also to take away one Member without any sufficient cause, in his opinion, from the county town, which was the only Parliamentary borough in a county of high position and wealth, and whose share of borough representation the Returns before the House showed to be much smaller than that of other counties of less importance. Was that just? He thought decidedly not, and he hoped the House would think not too. He would now leave this subject, and with the permission of the House would comment on certain remarks which had fallen from the other side of the House. His hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Mr. Gregson) had pressed this side of the House to permit the Bill to go into Committee without delay. He would venture to remind his hon. Friend, as he had reminded at an earlier part of the evening the hon. Member for Shrewsbury (Mr. Slaney) of the course he had pursued last year when sitting on this side of the House, and which he seemed to have forgotten—he then thought it quite fair and right to refuse to go into Committee on the Bill of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli). His hon. Friend had changed his side of the House, and also had changed his opinion upon this question of going into Committee. There was what was called doing as you would be done by, and it was a pity his hon. Friend had not acted up to that principle. He must confess that after hearing the speech of the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) to-night, he was astonished to think that he could have moved the Resolution last year which upset the Bill of the late Government. He never heard a speech more condemnatory of the course which the noble Lord then pursued. It had been admitted in that

Sir Minto Farquhar

House, and by a Cabinet Minister in "another place," that the Bill of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) had been unfairly treated, and no doubt it was a Bill far superior to that of the noble Lord. He (Sir M. Farquhar) was in favour of the working classes being admitted to the franchise, and as far as they were concerned it would have admitted, in various ways, the prudent, the thrifty, and the intelligent. At the last general election he had told his constituents that he looked upon the Resolution of the noble Lord as an ingenious manœuvre, and he said so again now. It had been insinuated that they (the Opposition) were anxious to keep the working classes out of the representation—that he emphatically denied. He had said on the hustings last year, "It has been insinuated in the House of Commons that the Conservative party is afraid of the people; I emphatically deny this charge. I wish to know what I, who represent many artisans and freemen, have to fear from them? I am not prepared to beslobber them with lip flattery like some political agitators. No one is more anxious for the advancement of the working classes, but I will not for the sake of popular applause consent to swamp the property and intelligence of the country to mere numbers. I am most anxious to give to every class its fair share of representation, so that one class shall not predominate over the other. ["Hear, "and cheers.] He would, if necessary, repeat the same thing to his constituents tomorrow. This would show that what he wished to see was a fair share of the representation enjoyed by all classes—whether the aristocratic, the middle, or the working classes, but by the Bill now before them a preponderance of power would be thrown into the hands of one class alone, and therefore he objected to it. The noble Lord (Lord John Russell) had referred to an attack in a review on his right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli), and had said the article must have been written by some obscure individual. He knew not who the writer might be, but if he were, as the noble Lord represented, an obscure individual, it signified little what his opinion of the right hon. Gentleman was. He (the right hon. Gentleman) knew what were the opinions of those who sat around him, and needed to care little for those of an obscure writer. The noble Lord had said something about digging a trench between the working classes and the richer classes by the course now pursued; he had no fear of such a result. He denied that the working classes took any real interest in the Bill before the House; if they had, meetings would have been held throughout the country to support it. Where were those meetings? Where the petitions in favour of the Bill? Even since the autumn of 1858, when the hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham began his wandering tour in the provinces, he had been labouring to get up an agitation in favour of Reform, but from beginning to end these efforts, and those to set class against class, had been attended with total failure, and his whole line of conduct showed that he little understood the class whose case he stated himself to be anxious to advocate. The hon. Gentleman, in contradicting his hon. Friend the Member for Yarmouth (Sir Henry Stracey) said that he had never, either inside or outside of the House, proposed universal suffrage. Now he (Sir M. Farquhar) happened to have a paper in his pocket which showed that although the hon. Gentleman had not proposed universal suffrage, he had no objection to the widest possible extension of the suffrage. What did he say at Birmingham on the 27th October, 1858? "Let me say that personally I have not the smallest objection to the widest possible suffrage that the ingenuity of man can devise, not the slightest." Now as such an extension must include universal suffrage, there was not much ground for the hon. Member's indignation at the suggestion that he had approved of such a proposal. This Bill was considered by many to be acceptable as an instalment, an instalment he supposed towards the widest suffrage which the ingenuity of man could devise. Then again, what had the hon. Gentleman said about electoral districts in the same speech:—

"Every elector in the eye of the law is of the same importance as every other elector. Why then should not every elector, in voting for Members of Parliament, vote for the same portion of the whole Parliament that every other elector voted for?"

Was this Bill, then, to be an instalment in the direction of electoral districts? Again, in the same speech the hon. Gentleman had said,

"We will ask ourselves, when we talk of the question of Reform, what is it we really want? I hold it to be this, that we want to substitute a really honest representation of the people for that dishonest and fraudulent thing which we call representation at present. The whole thing, as at present arranged, is a disgraceful fraud, and ought to be put an end to, and if it be not put an end to, your representation will remain in future, as it has been in the past, very little better than a farce."

This was strong language at any rate, and no wonder then the hon. Gentleman supported the Bill, which many looked upon as a mere stepping stone to further extensions of the suffrage. He (Sir M. Farquhar) should certainly support the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman opposite, the Member for Rye (Mr. Mackinnon).

MR. HUNT moved the adjournment of the debate.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he had understood that the Scotch Bill was to be withdrawn; and he might observe that he had just come from Scotland, where nobody cared a straw for the measure, and a good many people wished that the Bill for England was also withdrawn. It would be certainly unfair to pass a Bill for England, but none for Ireland or Scotland, and he thought that the Government should proceed with all the Bills or withdraw all of them.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he had not heard in the confusion—if the matter were of any consequence—what had become of the Irish Bill. [Lord J. Russell: It stands for Thursday.] He had understood that the noble Lord had confined his energies to the Bill for England, and that the Scotch and Irish Bills would not be proceeded with.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL explained that what he had said was that the English Bill would be proceeded with in Committee, but that he believed there would not be time to go on with the Scotch and Irish Bills. The hon. Member (Mr. Blackburn) had objected to the passing of an English Bill without there being a Bill for Scotland. He (Lord John Russell) might be mistaken, but he thought that the Government of last year brought in an English Bill without proposing any Bill for Scotland at all.

Second Reading deferred to Thursday.

MORNING SITTINGS.

HERRING FISHERIES (SCOTLAND) BILL. COMMITTEE.

On the Order of the Day for going into Committee on the Herring Fisheries (Scotland) Bill,

THE LORD ADVOCATE proposed to postpone the Committee to a morning sitting on Tuesday next. Several hon. Members objected : but after some discussion,

Motion made, and Question put, " That this House will, upon Tuesday next, at Twelve of the clock, resolve itself into the said Committee."

The House divided :—Ayes 102, Noes 89 : Majority 13.

THAMES EMBANKMENT.—COMMITTEE.

MR. HENNESSY moved that the Select Committee on the Thames Embankment do consist of seventeen Members, and that Lord Fermoy and Mr. Joseph Locke be added to the Committee.

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON had no objection whatever to the two Gentlemen named in the Motion; but on principle he objected to the number of the Committee being increased without any special grounds.

MR. COWPER hoped the hon. Member would not persevere in his Motion, as the Committee had been already nominated of fifteen Members, the usual number for such a Committee.

Motion made, and Question put, " That the Select Committee on the Thames Embankment do consist of seventeen Members."

The House divided :—Ayes 10, Noes 38 : Majority 28.

House adjourned at a quarter
after One o'clock.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS BILL.—SECOND READING.

THE MARQUESS TOWNSHEND moved the second reading of this Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR did not object to the principle of the Bill, but he thought it required careful consideration, and a better definition of the offences with which it proposed to deal. Of its main provisions he approved, and he should be happy to give any assistance in his power to improve the measure. It could not pass, however, in its present shape, and he hoped the noble Marquess would consent to refer it to a Select Committee.

Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House, on Friday next.

SELLING AND HAWKING GOODS ON SUNDAY BILL.

Order of the day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 3^a.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMANS said, that as their Lordships knew, there were different opinions in this country respecting the manner in which the Sunday should be observed. From the earliest times, however, the law of England had forbidden Sunday trading. Blackstone stated that even so early as the reign of Athelstane "merchandising" on that day was strictly forbidden. In the reigns of Henry VI., Charles I., and Charles II., Acts were passed to the same effect, all providing that no secular business should be transacted on the Sabbath, save works of necessity. The enactment now in force was the statute of Charles II.: but that was one of those enactments which were never practically enforced, and in point of fact, the present measure was not introduced with a view to the attainment of any such object, for it permitted various kinds of trading up to 10 o'clock. Was it expedient to call upon Parliament now to violate a principle which had been so long respected? If it were wrong to sell goods at 11 or 12 in the morning of that day it was equally wrong to sell goods at 9 or 10; and if it were right to sell at the latter hour, it could not be wrong to sell at other times. The existing law was said to be inoperative. No doubt it was to a certain extent. But having regard to the enormous extent of the Metropolis and the denseness of the population, it was impossible to enforce a rigorous obedience to such a law, and he thought that upon the whole, considering the numerous wants of the Metropolis, the Sabbath was not ill-observed within its limits. He would rather trust to the growth of public opinion, the force of moral suasion, the influence of the clergy and of our public instructors to extinguish the system, rather than to suppress it by legal coercion. It had been stated that at one of the great centres of the north, Sunday trading largely prevailed ten years ago, but had of late years much decreased. That seemed to be an argument against legislation; for the same causes were at work here, and would lead, they might hope, to the same results. There were doubtless many tradesmen throughout London who regarded the practice of Sunday trading which they were compelled by others to practice as a burden and a yoke, and who looked for relief to some measure of this kind. But he believed that no ruinous consequences would result to these persons if they boldly closed their shops on Sunday morning, and trusted for support to the legitimate custom which came to them on week-days. But, be that as it may, his opinion was that the Bill would disappoint the expectations of its advocates. Practically, he believed that after the measure passed, shops would be open just as late as they were at present, because if they were kept open to 10 o'clock, the tradesmen would find it impossible to refuse customers who were crowding their shops at that hour. Moreover, the omission of the clause, which provided that the police should enforce the provisions of the Bill, would take away the machinery by which it was to be enforced; and its enforcement by private individuals or by means of voluntary associations would give rise to much ill blood. The measure violated an old-established principle; it would enable a man to do that in London which, under the existing law, he would be unable to do elsewhere; and believing that it would also be ineffectual for its purpose, he could not give his voice in its favour.

LORD TEYNHAM also was opposed to the Bill. The petitioners in favour of the Bill were those who supposed that they should lose by not opening their shops on Sunday. Some persons had no conscience for keeping the Sabbath, and therefore desired to have a conscience made for them by Act of Parliament; others had a particular mode of observing the Sabbath, and they wish to compel others by law to follow the same course. The passing of this Bill would lead to a more coercive and severe measure; and the result by reaction would be to aggravate the evil which it was meant to remedy. In the time of Charles I. the first attack on the liberties of the people was made under the guise of enforcing the observance of the Sabbath; and this was followed two years after by a more stringent Act. The only trade absolutely forbidden by it to be followed on a Sunday was that of a butcher. A reaction set in, and in the 9th year of the same reign the "Book of Sports" of James I. was re-issued, with the addition of keeping the wakes or feasts of the dedication of churches on Sunday, and commanded to be read in churches. Some clergymen read it without making any objection, others read the fourth commandment after it, but many refusing so to do were deprived of their livings, fined, or otherwise punished. The inevitable result of passing the Bill before the House, followed as it must be by more stringent measures, would be that the people would kick against it, and the Sabbath would not be so well kept as now. A great many religious men shrank from this legislation as tampering with the commandment of God. If the law of the Sabbath were a strictly moral law, they had no power to enact exceptions to its observance. If men choose to buy newspapers or periodicals on Sunday, let them do so on their responsibility to their Maker; but let not the House give its sanction to such Acts up to a certain hour. While permitting the sale of newspapers, the Bill did not authorize the sale of a single Bible or Prayer Book on the same day. Another objection to the Bill was its limited range—it was confined to the Metropolitan district—the very worst place for the restrictions it contained. If any difference were to be made, the restrictions ought to have been made in the country districts, and not in the Metropolis. He would not enlarge on the injustice of enforcing this law upon all who lived within what he might call a magic circle, and exempting all who lived outside it. He would proceed to consider the articles of consumption which would be affected by the Bill. Its provisions would tell as much upon the coal and fuel with which food was cooked, as upon food itself. A man might buy a beefsteak or a mutton-chop on Sunday; but he must not buy the coals for cooking it; and thus the poor would be dependent upon the bakers' shops for their cooking. The Bill restricted the sale of bread on Sunday to bakers, and to the law which governed their trade, whereby bread could not be sold on Sunday after a certain hour; but many of the poor of London were in the habit of buying their bread at the chandler's shop; and this Bill would prevent their getting bread at the shops where they had credit. It permitted the sale of pastry at hours during which it could not tolerate that of bread; and was evidently constructed in ignorance of the bakers' Act. So, in order to buy tobacco the poor man would be forced to go to the public-house. This he thought was a great evil. He would further observe that the minimum penalty directed to be enforced by this measure was 5s. A poor woman convicted of selling a half-penny apple was to be punished by a fine of 5s. or imprisonment for one month. This was very severe upon poor ignorant people, who without certain means of knowing the hour of the day might very innocently be led into an infringement of the Act. He thought it would be found impossible in practice to enforce these fines. For these reasons he begged to move that the Bill be read a third time that day three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out "now" and insert "this Day Three Months."

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he had certainly thought that after the very full discussion which this measure had received on former occasions, and particularly after the details of it had been very carefully considered in Committee, and after the subsequent expression of the opinion of their Lordships in favour of the Bill, he should not have had to encounter further opposition at this stage. The noble Lord who had just sat down must not understand him as making any complaint of the course which he had adopted. He must, however, say that the opposition to the measure had taken a totally different shape to that which was presented during the former stages of the Bill; because if he understood the argument of his noble Friend who commenced this discussion (the Earl of St. Germans) the ground upon which he now based his objections was that permission was given to trade on Sunday up to a certain hour, thus, as he said, giving legislative sanction to the desecration of the Sabbath. That objection had never once been urged during the previous discussions; and what was a most remarkable thing was that when the Bill was in Committee, and a proposition was made to allow the selling of certain things up to ten o'clock instead of nine, it was agreed to without any division. His noble Friend had said that he was satisfied that Sunday trading did not prevail now in the Metropolis to the extent to which it did formerly. He (Lord Chelmsford) did not know from what source that information was derived, but he remembered that not long

Lord Teynham

Sunday trading and those who objected to any interference with Sunday trading as an infringement of the rights of the people. Many tradesmen complained that they were almost forced by the competition of their neighbours to open their shops, for otherwise their trade would be entirely lost; and his object had been to relieve those persons from the pressure on them, and to enable them to pursue a course consonant with their own feelings by a proper observance of the Lord's Day. He had had to encounter great difficulties in bringing this Bill forward. He was fully prepared to admit that no legislation would ever induce people strictly to observe the Lord's-day; for that matter must be left to their own consciences; but what he proposed would operate very much in that direction by enabling persons to close their shops on that day, who would otherwise from the fear of competition be compelled to keep them open; by so doing they would adopt a course which would afford a good example, and he trusted that before long there would be a general feeling that it was right to abstain altogether from Sunday trading. It had proved impossible to attempt to provide for the rigid observance of the law as it now stood. Any measure having that object would be denounced as oppressive to the poor, because, unfortunately, wages were still paid so late on Saturday night that working people were unable to procure articles which they required on Sunday until the morning of that day. He had endeavoured, as well as he could, to steer clear of the various difficulties which had beset him; and he trusted that the Bill was now in a shape in which the thousands of tradesmen who had come to their Lordships' House in favour of this Bill, and who earnestly prayed that the measure might be adopted, might have their wishes granted. He had striven as far as possible to remove all objections, and after being fully discussed on the second reading the Bill was carried by two to one. The sanction of their Lordships' House had thus been given to the principle of the Bill. All the petitions presented by the noble Lord (Lord Teynham) had been directed, not to the idea of this Bill being any legislative conservance of the Lord's-day, but to its being in opposition to the rights and privileges of the people. The noble Lord spoke of the hardships upon the poor and the penalties to be imposed; but he was at a loss to understand the noble Lord on that matter, more particularly when they remembered that the 29th Charles II. prohibited trading on Sunday and defined what it was. When he said that this Bill would be oppressive and tyrannical, he knew that it would be only directed against those who violated the law and that it would impose penalties on them. A Bill very similar to the one now proposed was introduced and passed in 1856, and it gave in the same manner the right to trade on Sunday within certain restrictions. In conclusion, he trusted that their Lordships would confirm the decision they had already come to on this Bill, and allow it to go down to the other House.

EARL GRANVILLE did not think the complaints of the noble and learned Lord, as to the opposition which his Bill had met with at its present stage, were justifiable; for the measure in its present shape was quite a different one from that to which their Lordships had given a second reading. He (Earl Granville) had a great objection to the employment of the police in enforcing the provisions of the Bill; but that portion of it having been struck out, he was informed by those who were most competent to give an opinion that the measure had no longer any chance of becoming operative at all. He saw no inconsistency in objecting to legislation for enforcing the observance of the Lord's-day, and at the same time in objecting to give any degree of legislative sanction to practices on that day which they must all deprecate. The noble and learned Lord admitted that an improved moral feeling had been found sufficient in Liverpool to put down Sunday trading; but what was there peculiar in the case of that city, which did not bear a particularly good reputation as regarded drinking? Why should not the Metropolis be equally amenable to moral influences? Indeed he was informed that though there was now more Sunday trading in London than formerly, it had not increased in an equal ratio with the population; and therefore it had in reality diminished. Seeing therefore that this Bill offended the religious feelings of a portion of the community; that it might inflict hardship upon another if it were ever carried out; and as he thought it highly objectionable to pass measures which there was no reasonable prospect of bringing into effective operation, if the noble Lord divided the House on his Amendment, he should support it.

THE BISHOP OF LLANDAFF believed that this was the very first Bill which ever legalized Sunday trading. True, the sale of fish and milk on the Lord's day had been to a certain degree sanctioned, but that might perhaps be justified on grounds of necessity or of charity. Better leave it to every man's conscience to determine how he would observe the Sunday than introduce a principle of this nature. It was asked why moral suasion had failed to produce in London the salutary effect which had been witnessed in Liverpool in this respect. Now, their Lordships last year appointed a Committee to inquire into the spiritual destitution of the country, and the result of that investigation was that in no part of the kingdom was there so lamentable an amount of destitution as prevailed in the Metropolis. In Liverpool, on the other hand, the influence of religion was much more felt, and the people were brought into closer contact with the ordinances of the Church. He opposed the Bill because it was the first attempt of the kind to legalize Sunday trading in the Metropolis, and if, instead of legalizing the matter, means were taken for supplying the people with religious instruction, there would be no occasion for legislation of the kind.

THE BISHOP OF CASHEL had voted for the second reading of the Bill, believing its tendency would be so far to check the desecration of the Sabbath; but there was one clause to which he could not conscientiously give his assent, and should it remain part of the Bill he would not support the third reading. He referred to that clause which legalized the selling of newspapers and periodical publications of every kind before the hour of 10 A.M., which he thought so objectionable and so little called for by necessity or charity that he would move it be struck out of the Bill. He thanked the noble and learned Lord (Lord Chelmsford) for his exertions to promote the better observance of the Sabbath, and hoped he would not resist the Motion to get rid of this clause, which would legalize the sale on the Lord's-day of an immense quantity of vile publications. He wished to know from the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack if it was competent to move the rejection of the clause in question.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, it was quite consistent with the forms of the House to move the rejection of any clause after the third reading.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted.

THE BISHOP OF CASHEL moved the omission from Clause 7 of the words permitting the sale of newspapers and other periodicals before the hour of 10 A.M. and after 1 P.M.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that by omitting these words they would break faith with those at whose request it was introduced, and who, but for its introduction, would have strongly opposed the Bill.

Amendment, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

Bill passed and sent to the Commons.

REFRESHMENT HOUSES AND WINE LICENCES BILL.

SECOND READING.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he did not apprehend that there would be much opposition to the second reading of this Bill. In the first place, it merely provided ordinary machinery to carry out and give effect to the reduction of the wine duties. He should think it necessary on another occasion to state in detail the provisions of the measure; but, considering the state of the House, he should not enter into them on the present occasion, unless he was called upon to do so. He should now simply content himself with moving the Second Reading of the Bill.

THE EARL OF HARRINGTON said, that considering the importance of this Bill, that only one day's notice had been given of the second reading, and that he had only received that notice at twelve o'clock to-day, it would be a very undignified course to press a measure of such importance, and which had occasioned so much discussion in the other House of Parliament, forward with undue haste. He thought it ought to be brought on at a period when there were more Members of their Lordships' House present. As far as he was concerned, if it was of great importance that the Bill should pass this stage, he should have no objection to make the observations he had to make upon going into Committee, or even upon the third reading of the measure.

EARL GRANVILLE assured his noble Friend that it would be a great convenience that the Bill should now be read a second time, and he would fix the Committee to suit the noble Earl's convenience. If, however, the noble Earl objected to that course, he would postpone the second reading.

THE EARL OF HARRINGTON said, he was quite content to make his observations on going into Committee.

Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

House adjourned at Half-past Seven o'clock, to Thursday next,
Half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, June 5, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Tithe Commutation.

CAVALRY COMMISSIONS.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN D. O'CONNELL said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is aware that since the reduction in the price of Commissions in the Cavalry the amount paid over Regulation has increased; and if it be the intention of Her Majesty's Government to enforce the Act of George the Third, which makes it illegal to give or receive any amount in excess of the Regulation price for Commissions in the Army?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT replied that he was not aware that since the reduction in the price of Cavalry Commissions the amount paid in excess of the Regulation had increased. There had been, perhaps, an increase in particular cases, but there had been a diminution in others, and he thought that it would require longer experience of the reduced rate before it could be decided whether it had had the effect of increasing or diminishing the price of Commissions. As to the second question, he thought the Government were bound to reduce, by all means in their power, the extravagant prices which were given for Commissions; but he was not at all certain that the Act of George the Third provided them with the most effectual weapon for the purpose. He believed that in questions of money, and of the value to be got for money, the provisions of an Act of Parliament were rarely, if ever, sufficiently stringent and comprehensive enough to prevent evasion.

CLERK OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he wished to ask the First Lord of the Treassury, Whether, in case of any appointment of a successor to the Office of Clerk to the Privy Council, he will suspend the decision of the salary to be allowed to the office until the House has had the opportunity of considering the subject in the Civil Service Estimates?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that Mr. Bathurst having resigned the office of Clerk to the Privy Council, it was designed that Mr. Helps should succeed him. The office was remodelled some time ago, upon the retirement of Mr. Greville, and the salary was then left at £1,200 a year, at which rate it was intended to continue it. There, would, however, be a saving of £500 when the office of Clerk of Returns fell vacant, as the duties attached to it would be transferred to the Clerk of Council without increase of salary.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH THE UNITED STATES.—QUESTION.

MR. WYLD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if it be the intention of the Government to furnish a ship or ships to survey the Northern Seas for the purpose of testing the practicability of laying a telegraphic cable from England to America by way of Scotland, the Feroe Islands, Iceland, Greenland, and Labrador?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the Government had no objection to furnish a ship to make investigations along part of the distance indicated by the hon. Member, not indeed as regarded all the stations, but at any rate as far as Iceland.

TRANSPORT SERVICE.

COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. LINDSAY said, he rose to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the organization and management of those branches of the Admiralty, War Office, India Office, and Emigration Board, by which the business of transporting, by means of shipping, troops, convicts, emigrants, materials of war, stores, and any other similar services, is now performed, with a view of adopting some uniform system by which such services may be economically and efficiently conducted, under the authority of one consolidated and responsible department. As he had been given to understand the Government intended to make no opposition to the Motion, he would content himself with stating a few facts. At present they had no Department directly responsible to that House for the transport of troops and stores. Such was not formerly the case, for even so far back as 1690, when it was found necessary to send a large force of troops to Ireland, months passed over before the Navy Board could get ships, and a Transport Board was formed which remedied the difficulty. During the late war with France from 1790 to 1816, a similar Board existed, which very satisfactorily and efficiently discharged the duties. In 1816 that Board was abolished, and the business of conducting this service had since then been vested in various Departments. Thus the Admiralty undertook the transport of troops and stores to our various possessions, with the exception of India; the East India Department undertook the transport of the troops which were required in India; and the Admiralty and the Emigration Commissioners were responsible for the transport of emigrants and persons employed by the Government. The various Departments of the Government bid in the market for ships against each other, and the consequence was that the ship-owners, believing that a larger amount of tonnage was required than was really the case, demanded increased prices, and very often obtained them. Even in times of peace the loss in that way was very great, but in times of war the loss was still more considerable. When they first entered into the war with Russia there was no responsible Board to conduct the transport service of the country. He need not remind the House of the consequences which ensued. During the first year of the war the transport of troops and stores cost £5,000,000, and not a less sum than £15,000,000 was expended on the same service during the war. When the war broke out, the Duke of Newcastle, the then Secretary of State for War, proposed to organize a Transport Board and to obtain the assistance of the Emigration Commissioners, who had had great experience in transporting to distant countries large numbers of passengers. The measure was approved, but a difference of opinion arose between the noble Duke and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, who then filled the office of First Lord of the Admiralty, each deeming that the Minister holding his particular office was the proper person to be at the head of the Board. In 1854 the Transport Board was organized, but only as a temporary arrangement. He need not recall to the House the confusion and losses which occurred in the transport service previous to the formation of that Board, nor inflict pain by reminding them of soldiers left to die in the Crimea for want of food and clothes, which had not only been bought but actually sent out. It would be sufficient to state that while the service was conducted by the Admiralty the sailing ships cost £1 7s. 7d. per ton, and when the Board came into operation the price fell to 15s. 10d. per ton, although it was right to add that ships were not in such great demand the second year as they were the first. Still it showed what economy might be effected under an improved system of management. Ships were sometimes engaged by the gross tonnage, and at other times by the net tonnage. Now for the want of a Board of Superintendence familiar with the facts, there was a great loss sustained by engaging ships upon the one kind of tonnage rather than upon the other. In reference to the transport of troops, ships were engaged sometimes according to the rate per head of each man on board, and at other times they were engaged by the run. The latter mode was generally adopted in regard to the transport of convicts. If a Transport Board were considered necessary before, it became still more necessary now when the Indian army was about to be placed under the superintendence of the Minister at War—and when large numbers of European troops would be frequently forwarded to India. Military men could say whether it was for the benefit of the army generally that troops should remain so long a period abroad. If it were considered to be for the interest of the country that they should be oftener relieved from foreign duty, then it was manifestly desirable that there should be some organized system of transport under which they could be moved about with as little expense to the country as possible. He was informed that every soldier landed from this country in India cost £100. The Secretary of the Emigration Board stated that the cost of sending troops to India on an average of five years, from 1852 and 1857, was £14 10s. for each man's passage outwards, including everything that a soldier required; and £32 8s. homewards, making altogether £46 18s. Mr. Wood, who had filled the office of private secretary to Lord Hardinge, and was for some time one of the Emigration Commissioners, had published a pamphlet recently, in which he showed that under a good organized system troops could be sent out to and brought back from India at a cost of £30 per head. Now our trade with India had materially altered of late years. There was a large quantity of what was called dead weight sent to and from India—iron for railways going out, and saltpetre and sugar coming home. A ship filled her lower hold with those materials, and being unable to take a full cargo between decks, she was able to take out troops at a small cost. Those ships could be engaged at a low rate, provided the contract was made with the owner out and home. He did not think, therefore, that Mr. Wood had made too low an estimate when he said that troops could be sent out and brought home at £30 per head. In a pamphlet recently published by Mr. Kirwan in Calcutta, that gentleman, who had been engaged for a period of nine years in connection with the transport of troops to and from India, stated from his experience that there was much suffering experienced by the troops and a great loss of the public money from the want of a properly organized system of transport service. He (Mr. Lindsay) therefore felt that a necessity existed for establishing a new branch of the public service, which should have for its duties the superintendence of all details connected with the embarkation and disembarkation of troops, to whatever part of the globe they might be about to proceed. In case of war the whole energies of the Admiralty were required to fit out a fleet, and to man and provision ships. But at the very moment that the Admiralty were thus engaged orders came to them from the War Office to forward troops to different points, and at the same time other departments of the Government required them to execute their orders. It was impossible for the Admiralty to perform such a variety of work. His object in moving for a Committee was to organize one great Board, or one department of the Government, which should be directly responsible to the House for the conveyance of all our troops, whether to India or any other possession, and for the conveyance of all stores, munitions of war, and whatever else the Government might require to be sent there. Whether the representative of that Board in Parliament should be the Secretary of State for War or the First Lord of the Admiralty he would offer no opinion. That was a question for the Cabinet to decide. If the Committee were granted, he had no desire to rake up old matters before it; he proposed simply to call before the Committee the heads of the different Departments -- such as the East India House, the Admiralty, and the Emigration Board, and to obtain from them their opinions as to the best means of organizing such a system as would conduct the transport service to the greatest advantage to the country and to the troops themselves. There was now a much greater demand in this country for labour than formerly, and the Emigration Board was consequently not so much required as in past years. Indeed, the functions of the Emigration Board had nearly ceased for some time past. But all their staff and machinery being complete that Board might be reorganized under the title of the Transport Board, or any other name, and made most efficient for the carrying out of the transport service. In conjunction with the excellent chairman and secretary of that Board, the co-operation of some experienced military and naval officers might be secured, in order to constitute a most efficient Board.

SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the organization and management of those branches of the Admiralty, War Office, India Office, and Emigration Board, by which the business of transporting, by means of shipping, Troops, Convicts, Emigrants, Materials of War, Stores, and any other similar services, is now performed, with a view of adopting some uniform system by which such services may be economically and efficiently conducted, under the authority of one consolidated and responsible Department."

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, it was not his intention to oppose the Motion of his hon. Friend. He might say, on the part of his right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for India, as well as on the part of the Admiralty, that they would be glad that there should be an inquiry into the matters which had been adverted to in the speech of the hon. Gentleman. But after giving to the subject a good deal of consideration, he (Lord C. Paget) was afraid it would be found to present more difficulties than his hon. Friend imagined. He understood his hon. Friend to propose that the Emigration Commissioners should be formed into a perfectly independent board, and that whenever the War Office required any transports, either for the passage of troops or carrying provisions, or any warlike stores, they should apply to those Emigration Commissioners, with a view to having their arrangements carried out, and that the Secretary of State for India should do the same with regard to the whole Indian army. There was no doubt that the Board, however constituted, would have to perform very important functions, and he was not quite certain that it would not lead into one of the inconveniences which it was the great desire of his right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham) to get rid of when he abolished the Navy Board in 1835,—namely, the inconvenience of two independent Boards conducting services of the same nature. He was not prepared, however, to say that arrangements might not be made by which many difficulties might be overcome; but it was a very important point of consideration that the transport service was not wholly composed of merchant ships, but a considerable part of the transport was undertaken by vessels of war. It was manifest that it would be highly inconvenient that the Admiralty should give up the charge of those vessels which were strictly vessels of war, and place them in the hands of the Emigration Commissioners. On the other hand he was perfectly willing to admit that an efficient Transport Board would be a matter of the greatest importance, particularly at any future time when they might be engaged in serious operations. The Admiralty, no doubt, would be very glad to be relieved of the transport business, but he was bound to say that he had not heard of any great faults in the present system, neither did he see how a Transport Service could work in war time except under the control of the Admiralty. The Admiralty were in almost daily communication with the Horse Guards and the India-house concerning the transport of troops, but he was not aware that any complaints had been made of want of attention on the part of the Admiralty. Having stated that it was not the intention of the Government to oppose the scheme, he had only to suggest to his hon. Friend that he should leave out all the words after the word "performed" to the end of the Motion. He did not think it would be wise, under the present circumstances of the case, and before the matter was inquired into, that the Government or the public, as it were, should pledge themselves to the views of his hon. Friend—as they would do by the words, "with a view of adopting some uniform system by which such services may be economically and efficiently conducted, under the authority of one consolidated and responsible department." He would submit to his hon. Friend that instead of, as it were, adopting that principle, it would be better to leave it to the Committee to inquire into the subject and to report their opinion unfettered.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he was glad to find that the noble Lord did not feel himself called upon to oppose the Motion, which he (Mr. Baillie) considered to be one of greater importance than the noble Lord seemed to suppose. The noble Lord discussed the question rather as one in which the Admiralty was concerned, but he would find that a larger sum would be required for the transport service than he supposed, if, as was stated, the Government were about to maintain a Royal army of 80,000 men in India. Heretofore the transport service had been conducted altogether by the East India Company, but henceforward those duties should be performed by the Government. He offered no opinion as to whether a Board should be established for the purpose, but the service was certainly of sufficient importance to be controlled by a separate department. If India was in future to absorb 80,000 men, and reliefs took place every ten years, 8,000 men must be sent out every year; and, if a deduction of 10 per cent were made for loss of life by the climate, a further reinforcement of 8,000 must be provided. Thus there would be a transport service to India of 16,000 men every year. That was exclusive of the service to be performed in bringing men home. The transport of men to and from the Colonies was also to be considered; so that on the whole there was a very important and extensive field of inquiry for the Committee.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he concurred with the noble and gallant Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty that the latter part of the Motion to some extent prejudged the principle upon which the transport service ought to be conducted, and ought therefore to be omitted. Remembering the ridiculously low estimate formed by a Cabinet Minister of the requirements of the transport service during the Crimean War, he thought it would be a great mistake to sever this department from the Board of Admiralty. It was impossible, however, to overrate the importance of the whole question. The hon.

Gentleman who had just addressed the House assumed that they were in future to maintain 80,000 troops of the Line in India, but he (Sir H. Willoughby) apprehended that the number of men to be so maintained was a question which was yet to be decided. The proposal, however, to maintain in India a Royal army of 80,000 men would necessitate the outlay of half a million of money on the expenses of transport, while eight regiments would have to be kept constantly at sea, and might as well not be in existence. The question whether they could hold India by an army of soldiers of the Line from this country was a very doubtful one. In the latest collection of the Duke of Wellington's despatches and correspondence a letter written by him when Colonel Wellesley was published, in which he distinctly expressed his opinion that it was impossible to hold India by a Royal army, both on the ground of expense and likewise of the loss of life.

MR. MARSH said, he desired to bear testimony to the excellent arrangements of the Emigration Commissioners, by which perfect satisfaction had been given to the Colonies. He was convinced that, in addition to their other duties, they would be competent to undertake the control of the transport service.

COLONEL HERBERT said, he wished to express his satisfaction that the noble and gallant Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty had given the consent of the Government to the appointment of the Committee, because he believed the subject was one of the greatest importance. He believed that great economy would result from the adoption of the system suggested by the hon. Member for Sunderland. The proposal to create an independent Board might be worthy of consideration, but it would be quite necessary that whatever hands authority was reposed in should be thoroughly subordinate to the War Minister. He believed that a medical officer might be advantageously added to the Board.

MR. BENTINCK said, there was one point which had not been adverted to, and to which he wished to call the attention of his noble and gallant Friend opposite. It had always appeared to him (Mr. Bentinck) that the whole transport system had been on a bad footing, and that they ought, except in cases of extreme emergency, never to employ transports at all. Troops were never conveyed with so much comfort in transports as in troop ships. Besides which, there was the additional advantage in maintaining a proper fleet of troop ships—that we would thereby have a large body of regular seamen available for naval purposes in time of war. What he would suggest was that, if possible, the troops should always be conveyed in troop ships, under the supervision of the Admiralty. The only objection that he had heard raised to this scheme was the additional expense which it would involve; but the additional expense would be small, and would be amply compensated for by the more efficient and rapid conveyance of the troops.

COLONEL LINDSAY said, he hoped the Committee would be able to arrange some cheap and well organized system of transport, which would admit of troops being relieved after shorter periods of service both in India and the Colonies. The term recommended by the Commissioners for keeping British soldiers in India was twelve years, but that period had since been modified to ten years, and that period was, he believed, too long, and ought to be reduced to six or seven years. It had been calculated that if a regiment went to India, and were left unrecruited by draughts from home, by the time their period of service had expired the regiment would have nearly disappeared. It was the first year which told most severely upon the raw recruits, and it therefore became desirable to consider whether it would not be better to send out regiments strong to India, only to leave them there a short time, and not to send out any draughts to reinforce them. He believed that the organization and efficiency of the army were involved in this question of reliefs.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he was firmly of opinion that it would be much better to institute a new Transport Board than to have anything to do with the Board of Admiralty. That Board had a great deal too much to do at the present time, and if anything else were added to their duties they would perform them a great deal worse than they were in the habit of doing.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, the facts elicited by the Committee on the Transport of Troops to India, of which he had been a member, convinced him that it was highly important they should look to the overland route as the most profitable means for landing their troops in India. Having had something to do himself with the transport of troops to India, his experience taught him that the greatest loss of life occurred immediately after the arrival of the troops in India; between the time of their disembarkation and when they reached their final destination. This might be avoided by conveying the troops, directly after disembarking, across the belt of country prejudicial to Europeans into a better climate. They might send a certain number every year from the garrisons in the Mediterranean across the Isthmus of Suez, and by the Red Sea to Bombay, from which place they might in a few hours be conveyed by rail to parts of India which were equal in point of salubrity to the south of Italy. At the same time it would be absolutely necessary at all times to take a certain number of men round by the Cape, and he believed that for young men, and especially those of them who had not led a very steady life in this country, three months on board ship was as good a preparation as could be for duty in India. On their arrival in India they might at once be conveyed from the place of debarkation. He agreed with the hon. and gallant Admiral (Admiral Napier) that the Admiralty had already too much to do. No mortals could perform the duties which were imposed on the gentlemen of that Board. He, therefore, thought it would be an advantage if the Transport Board were revived. During the Crimean war it promised to be one of the most useful establishments that period gave rise to.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he desired to express the satisfaction with which he had heard the determination of Her Majesty's Government to grant the Committee moved for by his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland. He did not think that the time for entering into details which would become subject matter of inquiry by the Committee. The only question now before the House was, whether the subject did not present ample grounds for inquiry by a Committee. Whatever arrangement might be made with regard to the army of India, no doubt the supply of that army would render it necessary to adopt the most economic and effective transport. He was glad the attention of his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland had been called to the pamphlet published by Mr. Wood. From Mr. Wood's experience as an Emigration Commissioner, no one could be more competent than he was to deal with the subject. His hon. Friend had quoted Mr. Wood's statement, that by contracting for the double passage, for £25 per man, soldiers might be carried to India and back ; but he had omitted to read the important statement that the present cost of conveying them was £15 per man to India, and £35 back. It was, therefore, obvious, that on the mere ground of economy, if they could arrange a better system of transport they ought to do so. But he confessed that even the cogent ground of economy was not to his mind the strongest reason for inquiry into this matter. His hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Lindsay) had alluded to another, of even more importance than economy, namely, the consideration whether an improved system of transport might not enable us to adopt an improved system of relief for our troops in India and the Colonies. Nothing could be more inconvenient to the service, and more dispiriting to the men, than to keep them in India and the Colonies beyond the time which had been stated to them when they enlisted. As his hon. Friend had suggested, under an improved system of transport they might be able to send out troops to India in battalions, and avoid the sending of draughts.

MR. LINDSAY said, he thought his Motion, perhaps, asked for a little too much in asking the Committee to adopt one uniform system. It might by some possibility happen that the Committee might think the present system of transport the best that could be adopted. He thought the object of the Motion would be gained and the hands of the Committee left unfettered if the Motion concluded at the word "performed." He believed the great strength of the service lay in the mercantile marine. The maintenance of an efficient fleet of troop-ships would cost the nation an infinitely larger sum than the employment of transport ships.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he would suggest that the Motion should stop at the word "conducted."

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed,

"To inquire into the organization and management of those branches of the Admiralty, War Office, India Office, and Emigration Board, by which the business of transporting, by means of shipping, Troops, Convicts, Emigrants, Materials of War, Stores, and any other similar services, is now performed."

CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATIONS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he rose to move a Resolution to the effect that the Civil Service Commissioners should publish, with their annual Reports, all the examination papers submitted to candidates, specifying the proportion in which the maximum of marks assigned to each branch of knowledge was divided among the questions contained in each paper. It was not his intention to trespass long on the attention of the House, but he trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would prevent the necessity of his dividing the House on the Motion. Had the Civil Service Commissioners acted on the opinions to which they had given publicity in their first Report the present Motion would not have been necessary. In that Report they stated :—

"We conceive that it would be very convenient to those persons who may contemplate entering into the public service to be correctly informed as to the rules and qualifications which are prescribed by the various departments."

The Report went on to say—

"We feel, also, that the powers intrusted to us are so novel as to render it our duty to take the first opportunity of giving a full account of the manner in which we have exercised them."

Now, that view had not been carried out, and he could not help regretting that the Commissioners had not in their last Report given the whole of the examination papers, but had confined themselves to giving those only connected with India. The consequence was that an injustice was, in his opinion, done under the existing system to those young men who presented themselves before the Commissioners, and who were left in ignorance of the examination to which they were subjected. The House would remember the feelings that were expressed when the system was first instituted. Lord Monteagle stated in "another place" that its effect would be to transfer the whole of the power of the Crown to three irresponsible gentlemen perfectly unacquainted with the duties connected with the several departments which they were called upon to examine. Lord Brougham also — than whom, on such a subject, there could be no higher authority — declared that people must hold up their hands in astonishment at such a system. Now, it appeared to him that many of the disadvantages which were associated with it might be obviated if the Commissioners would only make their proceedings as public as possible, and in making that suggestion he did not wish it to be supposed that he intended to cast the slightest imputation upon the fairness with which those gentlemen performed their duties, but he thought the system ought to have been carried out in such a manner as to leave no ground for the expression of disapprobation. In dealing with the subject in the course of last Session he had called the attention of the House to the hardships connected with the case of the temporary clerks, and since then instance after instance had been brought under his notice in which gentlemen who had passed sixteen or seventeen years in the public service, and had during that time most faithfully and efficiently performed their duties, found themselves, at a period of life when it was too late to enter another profession, called upon to pass a competitive examination, in which they were but too often defeated by younger men who had been "crammed" for the ordeal, and were, as a consequence, left utterly destitute. He might quote many such cases from a document which he held in his hand, but he should only trouble the House with one or two. A particular gentleman had, for example, received an appointment as landing waiter to the Customs at Bridgtown, Barbadoes, with a salary of £200 a year; he was promoted in 1844, and again in 1845, when he became senior or first-class landing waiter. In 1853 he had been again promoted, and had subsequently been appointed to the situation of a temporary clerk in the Audit-office at Somerset-house, but his prospects had ultimately been destroyed owing to the fact that he failed to pass an examination under a system which had been instituted twelve years after he had entered the public service. Now, he should like to call the attention of the House to the able remarks of the Earl of Malmesbury in relation to the service of unpaid attachés. That noble Lord, in writing to the Commissioners, said:—

"The average service of unpaid attachés is of five years' duration before they are promoted and subjected to this second trial. At this period most of them have attained twenty-four or twenty-five years of age; and, if they are rejected, they are too old to enter any other profession. Within six months you have rejected four young men who were, in my belief, competent to carry out all the duties which are required of attachés; and two of these, I have no hesitation in saying, are remarkable for their general accomplishments, and especially for their knowledge of languages. The result has been that, for a service which was so much in favour in 1852 that I had then a list of thirty-one candidates for attachéships, I have now only two; and, unless the gentlemen whom you have rejected should be allowed to try again, I cannot fill the vacancies."

He should next advert to the opinion expressed by the Lords of the Admiralty themselves, which was printed by the Civil Service Commissioners:—

Mr. Baillie Cochrane

"My Lords are of opinion that the order in Council does not apply to Mr. A. B. Mr. A. B. entered the civil service in July, 1852, as a clerk in Malta Dockyard, where he served till November, 1855. He was then transferred to the Admiralty in London, where he served as a clerk from December, 1855, to October, 1857, and again from March, 1858, to the present time. As Mr. A. B. entered the civil service three years before the Order in Council was issued, the want of a certificate on his first entry cannot now be a disqualification, unless the order is retrospective. If the order be intended, as it obviously is, to guard the public against the admission to the civil service of unqualified persons, no certificate can be necessary or reasonably required in the case of a civil servant whose fitness has been amply and creditably proved."

Now, he complained in the first place that the action of the Civil Service Commission in those cases was retrospective, and in the next place that the examinations were competitive. There was, he contended, no authority for taking such a course in regard to appointments to the Civil Service, except such as were furnished by China. There were, it was true, examinations carried on in Denmark for the Civil Service, and in Germany, but they were not competitive. In France, also, there were examinations, especially of the medical profession; but they were carried on in public; a jury was appointed to examine the answers; the answers were all given in public; they were read out in public. In fact, every possible publicity was given to them. Now, with respect to the examinations in China, Sir John Bowring made a statement, which he should like to read to the House. It was as follows:—

"The war in 1841 was called the Opium War, and he believed it would never have taken place, if the Emperor had not sent down a very learned Chinese—Commissioner Lin—but a man of incontestable ignorance as to countries and nations, and who, above any one, was likely to involve China in a quarrel. He had risen from the ranks; for among the Chinese it was a rule that the humblest may rise to the highest station in the empire. It was all the result of competition. Their educational system invited the children of every village to send their most advanced scholars to one centre for examination, with a view to State appointments, and examiners were sent down from the capital charged with the mission of selecting the most competent."

What he (Mr. Cochrane) asked was, that these examinations should be made public, and that the value of the questions, taking the maximum number of marks, should be put opposite to each question. He did not want to make invidious selections; but he would read to the House a few of the questions set to a young man seeking an appointment in the Admiralty. He would take paper No. 2, and read three questions seriatim. The first of them was as follows:—

"There are two mountains such that if 126 feet are added to four times the height of the lower one, the sum is half the difference between their heights; given, that the lower one is 441 feet high, find the height of the other."

[MR. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] The next was,

"What is the length of the longest day at a place where the sun rises on that day at 3h. 49m. 61s."

and he should very much like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman who cried "hear" would be able to answer it off-hand. Then came another.

"How many entire days have elapsed since the opening of the Great Exhibition in Hyde Park?"

Such questions as the following were also put to candidates for situations in the Admiralty and Somerset House:—

"Explain the terms 'latitude' and 'longitude.'"

"Estimate roughly the latitude and longitude of Madrid, Naples, Pekin, New York, and St. Petersburg." "Name the Welsh counties bordering on the Bristol Channel; the two westernmost counties of Connaught; the two northernmost counties of the Scotch mainland; the counties crossed by a straight line from Lincoln to Shrewsbury." "What counties are drained by the Thames, Severn, Trent, and Ouse respectively? Name the chief ports of their respective estuaries." "Describe the position of the following headlands:—North Cape, Cape Clear, Cape Horn, the Naze, Cape St. Vincent, the Lizard, Cape Guardafui, Cape Cod, Cape St. Rocque."

The following questions were also put:—

"Name (a) the counties which a collier would pass in sailing from the mouth of the Tyne to Gravesend.

"(b) The counties on the coast between Belfast and Dublin.

"(c) The counties of the Highland border of Scotland.

"Describe, as accurately as you can, the positions of Heligoland, Madagascar, Singapore, St. Thomas's Island, Juan Fernandez, the Moluccas, and Vancouver's Island. On what nations are they respectively dependent? Name the productions of those among them which are commercially important."

Some of these questions were excessively difficult to answer; and if the Commissioners were justified in putting them they ought to affix the number of marks to show the value they attached to them. He did not see what objection could be made to the regulation he proposed. It would be only fair to the candidates, because it would enable them to see the value of the questions, and in what manner the maximum of marks was attained. It was very much to be regretted that this system of competitive examination had been introduced, and it was very doubtful whether the country would be benefited by it. It was sometimes said that the old system was aristocratic. The contrary was, however, the fact. It was under the old system that such men as Stephenson, Arkwright, and Hargreaves rose to eminence. If a system of examination had been in existence the country would have lost the services of many of its most eminent statesmen and gallant officers. He doubted whether the country would ever have attained its present eminence under such a system. The qualities most desirable in public men—zeal, diligence, public honour, and private integrity—were precisely those in which candidates could not be examined. The examination failed, indeed, in attaining a knowledge of all those qualities that made men eminent. In their first Report the Commissioners reflected on the ignorance of the civil servants; but he would assert that no country was better served in her civil departments than England. If, however, these examinations were still to be carried on, they ought to be conducted with the greatest publicity and fairness. The Government were bound, also, to be just to those who had served it faithfully, and who had entered the service before the servants of the Crown were exposed to this kind of inquisition. The hon. Member moved that for the future the Civil Service Commissioners shall publish, with their Annual Report, all the Examination Papers submitted to candidates, specifying the proportion in which the maximum of marks assigned to each branch of knowledge is divided among the questions contained in each paper.

MR. BENTINCK seconded the Motion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I must confess, Sir, that in common with my colleagues, upon examining the Motion which my hon. Friend has just brought before the House, I considered it open to very grave objection. But I am bound to say that if there had been any doubt at all as to whether the tone of the Motion was capable of a favourable interpretation, I think the speech my hon. Friend has just delivered would at once have settled the matter to the conviction of every one except those who entertain the opinions which he has so frankly avowed. I cannot consider, and I trust the House will not consider, the Motion apart from the speech, because the granting of the Motion would unquestionably be construed with reference to the speech—a speech the animus of which cannot for a moment be mistaken. My hon. Friend does not for a moment attempt to conceal his views. He gathers together such scraps of authority as he can find—and scraps, indeed, they truly are—to show that, in his opinion the whole idea of examining candidates for the Civil Service is mischievous and absurd. He complains that the examination is retrospective. What does he mean by retrospective? Does he mean that those who were in the Civil Service at the time the system was introduced are required to submit to an examination as the condition of their retaining their offices? That would be a retrospective examination. But my hon. Friend means no such thing. He means only that entering the Civil Service in one department does not of itself secure the right of emigrating from department to department, however incompetent a man may be for the business of that other department, without being subjected to the test of an examination. That was the case put by my hon. Friend. He gave the instance of a gentleman appointed landing waiter in the Customs—I think he said in Barbadoes—who wished to transfer himself to a situation in the Audit Office here—a situation which no man can accept without examination; and then my hon. Friend declared it a gross and monstrous hardship, and can hardly find words to give vent to the strength of his feelings, because the gentleman was not allowed to carry himself from being a landing waiter in Barbadoes to an office in the Audit Department of Somerset House, without being subjected to examination. That is what he calls a retrospective system, and what he considers to be the height of absurdity and injustice. I think it is impossible to exaggerate the mischief which would be done by the adoption of such sentiments as those. I am very much indebted to my hon. Friend for having made no secret of his views. He adopts apparently, the extravagant sentiment which he ascribes to Lord Monteagle—I hope untruly—that this system hands over the whole patronage of the Crown to three irresponsible gentlemen. In point of fact, the question he wants to bring to an issue, and the question which I submit he ought to have put fairly and openly to issue, is, whether the present system should be maintained or should be abolished. The question before us is not the comparatively narrow and paltry matter which the Motion on the face of it expresses. The whole reasoning and arguments of my hon. Friend, so far as they have any end in view, tend towards the abolition and extirpation of the system of examination for the Civil Service. My hon. Friend, who is so much alive to the hardship of examining a landing waiter from Barbadoes before he is allowed to enter the Audit Department in Somerset House, is not at all alive to the evils of another class, which this system was intended to meet, and which I maintain it has done much to extirpate, or, at least to qualify. He does not take into his consideration the vast and huge jobbing power continually at work in the country, and at work not unfrequently through the medium of Members of the House of Commons. Because, although it would be absurd to suppose that any hon. Gentleman who ever had a seat in Parliament, could, by possibility, under any circumstances, lend himself knowingly to the perpetration of a job—yet even Members of Parliament of great eminence—even Members of Parliament possibly who now take a great interest in this question—may unwittingly, wrought upon by designing men from without, be made the instruments of perpetrating jobs against the public. Now, this system of examination was instituted in a spirit of hostility to such a system of jobbing, and with the view of obtaining the best men the public could obtain to discharge the duties of the public offices. My hon. Friend said the public was admirably served under the old system. I rejoice to say that, quite independently of any examination, in many offices the public are admirably served, and that there are many gentlemen who entered into the public service not since the system of examination was established, but long before it, who would be an honour to the Civil Service of this or any other country. But I take leave to join issue with my hon. Friend if he says and thinks that in all departments of the Civil Service the public has been admirably served; or even if he thinks that before this system was instituted all reasonable precautions were taken to secure that the public service was performed in the best manner possible. I do not know what his experience of the Civil Service is which has enabled and authorized him to deliver so confident an opinion on the character of the civil servants, universally, in all the departments of the country. But I do not hesitate to say that there have been many offices in the Civil Service which, so far from being admirably filled, have been miserably filled; and which never could have been thus miserably filled under the system which was established a few years ago, and which my hon. Friend now seeks to abolish. The Motion of my hon. Friend itself is of so narrow a kind that one feels himself degraded in descending from the discussion of the broad principles which he laid down in so uncompromising a manner, to criticise the particular terms of it. But the Motion is one which appears to me decidedly exceptionable. My hon. Friend says, it is exceedingly desirable to give full and fair notice to those who are to be examined under this abominable system, of the nature of the examination which they are to undergo. Now, Sir, there lies a most important fallacy in that doctrine when it is wrongly understood. It is most important—it is required by justice—to explain to those who are about to be examined the general nature of the examinations. But it is not merely not important—it is mischievous—it is fatal to the efficiency of the examinations to explain to the candidates too precisely the nature of the examination they are to undergo. I think my hon. Friend, with such bowels of compassion for the hardship inflicted upon young gentlemen shut up with pen, ink, and paper, and their own brains and nothing else to help them, ought to have moved that the questions be always published, not after, but before the examinations. By that means even the landing-waiter from Barbadoes would be able to make his way into the Audit-office, notwithstanding that oppressive examination which before proved fatal to his advancement. But, Sir, that kind of particular information without bounds and without limits, which my hon. Friend seeks to secure is not a desirable thing. It would tend to destroy the efficiency of examination, the honesty of examination, and instead of encouraging these young men to seek information to put them up to cultivating and furnishing rightly their minds for all the tricks and stratagems which may be applied, and sometimes are successfully applied with fatal effect, for the purpose of vitiating this process of examination and evading those tests which it is the object of the examination to secure. My hon. Friend with great magnanimity said that he was not at all disposed to commit an act of injustice towards the examiners; he would by no means quote particular questions which might be misunderstood; and, having laid down the general principle, he immediately proceeded to quote a string of particular questions which appeared to him very ridiculous. [MR. B. COCHRANE: They all followed each other.] I implied as much when I said a string of particular questions. It was not easy to find a word which would more clearly express that they followed each other. I would venture to say this, however, that there never was a good examination paper set which would not give occasion to a titter if it were read out in a mixed assembly before gentlemen who are not met for the purpose of undergoing examination, but upon matters quite different from scholastic examination. Having listened to those questions, I do not hesitate to say that they appear to me to be extremely reasonable and proper, and very well calculated to test general knowledge and capacity of the candidates, and do credit to the judgment of those by whom they were framed. I do not wish to be interpreted too strictly as to every individual instance; but, having heard the list of questions read by the hon. Member, I unhesitatingly give that opinion as to their general tenor. My hon. Friend says that the value in number of marks ought to be attached to each of those questions. It really seems as if my hon. Friend was determined to do everything to weaken and enfeeble a system which he found himself unable to destroy. Lest there should not be already inducement enough, as there unfortunately is, to avoid the pressure of examination by getting up particular points, my hon. Friend wants to have artificial aids given to candidates in selecting the questions for which they are to prepare themselves, and by answering which they will obtain the greatest number of marks. In the first place such a proposal requires a degree of detail which it would be absurd and ridiculous to ask the examiners to enter into, and in the second place it would be a thing of no manner of use whatever, except to encourage these young men to cram for particular questions. The real question is whether the examiners have given to those who were to be examined that sort of general information as to the character of the examination which is fair and just. And what have they done in their third Report? For once they did publish the whole mass of the examination papers that they had set for the year. For once they did that, in order that there might be laid out before the candidates fair means and opportunities of becoming acquainted with the general scope of the examination. But to pursue the same course year after year, and to publish the whole of their examination papers would, in the first place, load their Reports and the shelves of the libraries of this House with a vast quantity of the most worthless and useless matter. One of the most important branches of this examination, for instance, is arithmetic, and what could be more ridiculous than to call upon the examiners by the special interference of the House, to give in detail every sum or problem in arithmetic which was put before every person who came forward to be examined for the Civil Service of this country? Such a measure would be most mischievous as regards the amount of needless expense to which it would put the country, and still more mischievous from the tendency it would have to encourage trick and stratagem in the young men, instead of leading them to trust to the fair and manly process of a sound and well-conducted education. I think the Motion, framed as it is, lays down principles which are very exceptionable; but if the opinion of the hon. Gentleman and the general opinion of the House really are that the examiners have not done enough to make the candidates acquainted with the general character of the examination, the mere expression of that opinion moderately and deliberately made by those who had looked into the Reports and really considered the questions, when conveyed to the examiners themselves would, I have no doubt, have great weight with them. But I should like to know whether there is in this House any one man who has considered carefully the whole of the papers published in different years by the examiners, and having considered them has made up his mind that they are not sufficient to give fair information to the persons to be examined. Has any man in the House done that—has my hon. Friend himself read them all? I should like my hon. Friend to answer that. He was very ready to speak just now when he had something to say, but he is not so willing to speak now. But if he had, and if he considered that sufficient information was not given, it would be a matter well worth the attention of the examiners, and which I am sure they would take into consideration. But that would be no cause for the interference of the House by a Motion, which, to say nothing of the speech by which it was supported, is in the nature of a censure and a discouragement. The doctrine I would press upon the House is this, that the gentlemen who discharge the duties of examiners ought not to be discouraged but encouraged in their difficult task. What time, again, has my hon. Friend chosen for his Motion? He tries to force us to interfere in this system at the very moment that we have recently appointed a Committee to examine it—when the Committee, as I understand, has nearly concluded its labours and is preparing its Report, but at a time when we are entirely ignorant of the nature of its Report. Thus, in the first place, we appoint a Committee to examine the subject, and then, at the instance of my hon. Friend, we proceed to prejudge a most important matter. Nothing could be, I would almost say, more irrational on the part of the House, and less in conformity with its usual mode of proceeding, than to have selected a body of men in whom we have confidence to look into the whole matter and report to us their opinion as to the nature of the system, and just at the moment when, within a few weeks, or days, we may expect the result of those inquiries, we should, on the speech of my hon. Friend, proceed to anticipate them, and, possibly, to cross and contradict what they would recommend by the adoption of this Motion. Sir, for these reasons, and, if time were not valuable, for many other reasons which could be given, I trust the House will not agree to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, if it is not too late to express a hope that he himself will not press the Motion.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, that having been for a number of years engaged as a public examiner for the East India Company at the Royal Military Indian College, Addiscombe, he could corroborate the justice of the observations which the right hon. Gentleman had just made, with one exception. To publish annually the examination papers of any institution would undoubtedly have the effect of acquainting the Masters of cramming schools with the system of examination, so that candidates would come up, not well grounded in any one of the sciences or branches of knowledge in which they were to be examined, but with a few particular points specially got up for the occasion. He saw no harm, however, in putting on the examination paper of the day the number of marks assigned to each question. That would enable the candidate who could not, as few ever did, answer the whole of the questions within the limited time which was allowed, to select those which would give him the greatest number of marks. These competitive examinations, he was satisfied, tended greatly to improve the civil and military services. No doubt, it was impossible to ascertain all the qualities of a public servant, in either branch, but these examinations afforded a satisfactory test of his information and powers of usefulness. If one could not test the courage or endurance of a young soldier, one could at least discover the calibre of his mind and the general extent of his education. With regard to the publication of the examination papers, he believed that if those of Addiscombe for the last twenty-five years alone were produced and laid upon the floor of the House, they would form a heap five feet in height. It would be well perhaps that the Civil Service Commissioners should occasionally give a sample of their questions, but to publish the whole of them would be perfectly monstrous. If a young man saw that by answering a question in geography he could obtain forty marks, and that by answering a question in algebra he could obtain sixty marks, he would address himself to the question which he was most able to answer.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: They give the value of the answers in the different branches.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, that was true, but they did not give the marks for each particular question, and that made a vast difference. Young men who came up for examination were always nervous, and the knowledge of the number of marks to be given for each question would give them some confidence.

MR. BENTINCK said, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not touched one of the objections which had been raised by his hon. Friend. Indeed, his speech on this subject was as remarkable as many others they had heard from him in that House; and if the right hon. Gentleman had not particularly addressed himself to the hon. Member for Honiton, he should not have known that the right hon. Gentleman was speaking to the Motion before the House. The right hon. Gentleman complained of the animus which was to be discovered in his hon. Friend's speech, but as the House had often listened to many eloquent speeches without being able to discover, after paying the greatest attention to them, what was the animus, he thought that was rather complimentary than otherwise to his hon. Friend. The right hon. Gentleman said that the great object of these examinations was to prevent the possibility of jobbing. If that were so, he thought they might be applied to the Treasury Bench with great advantage to the public service. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say, that prior to the establishment of this system many offices were miserably filled. There was an additional argument why the system should be applied to the Treasury Bench, because it would not be difficult to point out offices which had been miserably and ruinously filled; whereas, with a competitive examination, the holders of them might not, possibly, have been placed in a position where they had done no good to the public service. The right hon. Gentleman asserted that the effect of the system was to establish the general knowledge of the person under examination. That was exactly what his hon. Friend complained of,—that the object was not to establish the fitness of the applicant for the office which he sought to hold, but his general knowledge upon subjects which had no reference to the duties which he would have to perform. The right hon. Gentleman objected also to overloading the shelves of the library, and no doubt the right hon. Gentleman would care little if all records and figures were erased from the memory of the House, as well as excluded from the library. The right hon. Gentleman went on to complain that his hon. Friend had treated the House to a few scraps, as he called them, from the examination papers. In consideration of the time of the House, his hon. Friend abstained from quoting numberless instances of the absurdity of the questions; but, as the right hon. Gentleman seemed to think the scraps of his hon. Friend insufficient, he would try, by the addition of a few more scraps, to make a dish sufficiently large to satisfy the appetite of the right hon. Gentleman. Some questions were so remarkably absurd that it was hardly possible to believe that they could have been drawn up by men of intelligence and education. He would quote from questions submitted to young gentlemen who wished to enter the army.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The Civil Service Commissioners do not examine for the army.

MR. BENTINCK said, he would quote these questions, to show what was the system of competitive examination; and, having demonstrated the absurdity of the questions given to young men who were examined for commissions in the army, he would prove that the Civil Service questions were still more absurd. This was the minor case, he would come to the major directly. All these examinations were based on the same system. One question was:—

“ Make a sketch of a cliff, quarry, or railway cutting; mark the lines of bedding, and the joints by which courses of rock are divided.”

If any hon. Member wished to give up politics and join a marching regiment he would be expected to know—

“ What physical peculiarities and what kind of organic remains especially characterize deposits formed in shallow water, and between tide-marks ?”

These were the questions put to men who were to do duty as soldiers:—

“ What are the principal data for determining the geological age of a stratified rock ?”

“ What peculiarity of structure distinguishes the fossil fishes of the older rocks, and in what strata do the Cycloid and Ctenoid fishes make their appearance ?”

He would read to the House the opinion of a learned critic upon the proceedings of the gentleman whose case was before them:—

“ A general knowledge of history and geography is required of unpaid attachés. The history from 1798 until the period at which the 4th volume of Russell's Modern Europe terminates. Our province is to examine how far the Commissioners have confined themselves to this scheme, and in order to do so we will make use of the papers of their published Report (No. 3), and some questions which have been omitted in them.”

It appeared that some of the questions were so remarkable that they were erased by the Commissioners themselves before they were published. The commentator proceeded:—

“ In some we shall take the liberty of pointing out the absurdity, in others the almost impossibility, of answering them correctly:—

“ No. 11 of Paper III., page 237.—‘ What are the colonial possessions of Spain and Portugal? Describe the constitution of any one of them.’

Mr. Bentinck

“ It would not be difficult to say how the Spanish and Portuguese colonies are governed, but what ‘ constitution,’ in the accepted sense of the term, has been granted it would be difficult to say.

“ No. 4, No. 6.—‘ Point out any permanent traces of Napoleon's conquests still existing on the map of Europe.’”

To this was appended another question:—

“ Is the present Emperor his legal representative ?”

The commentator remarked:—

“ This portion has been very wisely omitted in the public Report; its want of sense needs no comment.”

Another question was:—

“ Who were the following persons—Kutusoff, Haller, Euler, Kant, Lessing, Kotzebue, Darwin, De Saussure, &c. ?”

Not one of them were names of English notoriety. [Sir GEORGE LEWIS: Not Darwin?] He must apologize for having omitted to notice Mr. Darwin's name, but he begged to say that he was not under examination:—

“ In an examination which lasts four hours, in one of the questions the person examined is told to “ ‘ Discuss the most important political questions which have agitated Ireland in the last thirty years.’ ”

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Are those the words ?

MR. BENTINCK said, he was reading from a paper which professed to give a correct copy of questions which had elicited these comments from a high authority called to examine into the system of Civil Service examinations, and if there were any error it was only a clerical error, which he should be happy to correct. The person examined was to discuss the most important political questions which had agitated Ireland for the last thirty years. A debate in the House would be nothing to the extent of the answer. Another requirement was to—

“ ‘ Mention the enactments they have led to, and the most eminent men who have taken a prominent part in connection with them.’ ”

“ This is one of eleven questions, and not that which would require the briefest answer.

“ ‘ Mention, in order, the most memorable battles of the Peninsular war, and describe one of them minutely.’ ”

The commentator asked:—

“ Has the examiner ever read a minute description of a great battle? He had better turn to Jomini and Napier before he ventures on such dangerous ground.”

There were a number of other questions with which he would not trouble the House. He believed that the Civil Service Commissioners were the persons to whom was intrusted the duty of arranging the description of examination for each particular department. He thought that an error, and that the examinations should be defined by the heads of those departments. But the worst feature was the utter want of confidence in the system which possessed the minds of the people of this country, and so long as the Commissioners were allowed to act without any kind of check or responsibility nothing would remove from the public mind the impression that, whatever amount of jobbery there might have been under the old system, it was much greater since the institution of the Civil Service Examinations. Not very long ago a person in humble circumstances came to him to obtain some sort of berth for his son, under the mistaken impression that as he was a Member of the House there could be no difficulty about it. He told the man that he could not help him, that everything now was under the Civil Service Commissioners, that he must qualify his son to pass an examination for the department in which he wished him to be placed, and that then he would do his best to get a nomination for him, and the rest would remain with his son. The applicant scratched his head, and after a moment's hesitation replied, "You see, Sir, that's all very well what you say, I've inquired all about all them examinations, and this is how it is—they as competes, when they's competed, if they ar'n't no friends they gets nothing." That really was the impression on the minds of persons in that class of life as to the way in which the system was worked. So far from the country believing that they had done away with jobbery, the general feeling was that a most offensive and most atrocious system of jobbery had been inaugurated. The chief point, however, to which he desired to direct attention was the irresponsibility which it seemed to attach to the proceedings of the Civil Service examiners. Irresponsible power was a privilege that even Her Majesty's Government would not venture to claim; but then Civil Service examiners not only claimed complete and entire irresponsibility, but it had been established as their right by a vote lately passed by the House itself, when upon a previous occasion he had brought the subject before them. Now, he maintained that so long as this was the case, so long would the system suffer; because whoever might be the men, and whatever might be their character, their position, and their intentions, so long as they controlled the entire patronage of the country, and were deprived of any responsibility to any individual or body in the realm, so long would there exist the feeling of dissatisfaction he had described, and so long would there be a recurrence of such Motions as that then under discussion. It was mainly on the ground of his objection to their having the disposal of the whole patronage of the kingdom, without any responsibility, that he rested his support of this Motion.

LORD STANLEY: My hon. Friend (Mr. Bentinck) objects to the system of competitive examinations on the ground that the Commissioners are entirely irresponsible; but I think that the very fact of our being now engaged in a debate on the manner in which these examinations are conducted is a sufficient proof that the Commissioners are responsible to this House and the public, to whom, through the medium of this House, they make their annual Report. My hon. Friend says, too, that though there might have been jobbery under the old system, you have a greater amount now than before, and that the popular impression is that those who have no friends are always unfortunate in these examinations. There certainly may be some points on which the advantages of the system recently established may reasonably be disputed, but there is one, I think, on which no one has ever questioned the advantage which it possesses, and that is that to the extent to which competition prevails it treats the candidates entirely irrespective of friends in or out of this House. Whether you have got a system or not by which merit is fully tested is one question; but so far as it is tested under the present system it is by his merits alone that a man stands or falls. An expression has been quoted in this debate as having been used in "another place" about the patronage of the Crown and the Government having been transferred to an irresponsible body; but it is the greatest mistake to talk about patronage, in the ordinary sense, being transferred to the Civil Service Commissioners. You might just as well say that a Judge who sits to try a cause in which the right to an estate is involved has the patronage of that estate. Undoubtedly it rests with the Judge to decide to whom the estate belongs, and so it rests with the Commissioners, or their examiners, to decide who are entitled to certain appointments. When you speak of patronage you mean an appointment which is conferred according to the will and pleasure of the person conferring it; but in the case of the examination before the Commissioners there is no question of their will and pleasure in the matter—they are simply called on to say which candidate is thought to be most fitted to fill a certain appointment according to definite regulations previously laid down, from which they cannot depart. My hon. Friend will also be happy to hear that there are no grounds for his complaint that the subjects of examination are fixed by the Commissioners, and not by the heads of departments, who, as he truly says, are the persons principally interested. What takes place is this—the heads of departments state the branches of knowledge in which they require the candidates for their departments to be instructed—that is arranged in correspondence between the Commissioners and the heads of departments, and all the Commissioners have to do, when the scheme of examination has been drawn up, is to set the papers in those branches of knowledge, and to decide which of the candidates who come before them have given the most satisfactory answers. We have heard a good deal to-night on a subject which has often been brought before the House—the supposed unnecessary strictness of the examinations, and the strange out-of-the-way questions which are put. I do not think it is dealing very fairly with the examination-papers to look through perhaps 100 questions—fix upon one which may be considered strange or out-of-the-way, and hold it up as a sample of the whole. Such a mode of proceeding involves this fallacy among others, that it assumes that a candidate is necessarily expected to answer every question. That is not the case. When you are examining men who have not been brought up at the same school, college, or university, but who are brought together from all parts of the country, you must necessarily make as much allowance as the nature of the subject will admit for the diversities of training which will exist among persons brought up in different institutions. The object is, not merely to ascertain whether each man possesses the requisite minimum of knowledge, but, if he possesses more than the usual amount of knowledge on a particular subject, to give him a chance of displaying it. So far from candidates being required to answer all the questions put to them, the fact is that an enormous majority—speaking offhand, I think as many as four-fifths of the whole of those who have failed—have failed not in any abstruse branch of knowledge, but in the simplest and most elementary matters, namely, arithmetic and spelling. If it is a fact, then, that of these 500, say, who have failed, 400 failed because they were unable to satisfy the examiners of their capacity to spell correctly and do simple arithmetic, I ask, was the rejection of those persons an advantage or a disadvantage to the Civil Service? That is a question, I think, to which no Member of this House who looks at the subject dispassionately can hesitate as to the answer which he should give. I hope the House will not consent to interfere with the system by sanctioning the Motion as it now stands. Whatever may be the opinion of hon. Members as to the narrow question now before us, I hope they will not accept this Motion, because a Committee of the House, of which I am a member, is now sitting upon the whole question of the Civil Service examinations. We have concluded taking our evidence, and the Report will before long be considered and laid before the House. We have taken a good deal of evidence as to the way in which the examinations are conducted. We have examined the Commissioners, the persons who have conducted the examinations, and many of the permanent heads of departments, and the result will be to throw some light on the subject of which the House is not now in possession. The House, therefore, I think, will do better to wait for the evidence before discussing the matter further. It is one of the disadvantages of the case that I and those who are associated with me are bound by the rules of order not to refer to the evidence which has been laid before us, and which has not yet been produced to the House. Only this I must say, that whereas I formerly believed, I now know, that whatever incidental inconveniences and disadvantages may have attended the working of the new system, those inconveniences and those disadvantages are light as compared with the total absence of check on the admission of unqualified persons under the system which existed before it was established. That is my firm conviction, and I believe it to be the conviction of all those who know the facts. I cannot of course refer to proofs which are not before the House, and that is, in my mind, one of the strongest reasons why we should not give our consent to the Motion which we are now asked to adopt.

MR. BOWYER said, that while concurring in the objection which had been made on the part of the Government to the Motion; he thought the subjects for examination and the questions put were in many instances very injudicious. The true test of the utility of a system must be its adaptation to the end proposed, which in the present case was to obtain the most efficient public servants, and he did not think the system would stand that test. On referring to the subjects of examination in different departments he found that candidates for the post of unpaid Attaché, though examined in writing from dictation, making précis, in geography, modern history, French, and translation from some other foreign language, were not examined in international law, which was obviously the first thing to which the attention of an Attaché should be directed. A writer in Ceylon, on the contrary, was examined in the elements of constitutional and international law; what use the latter could be to him he was at a loss to know, and he certainly did not believe there was much constitutional law in Ceylon. Sub-inspectors of factories in this country were required to undergo an examination in geography, English history, in Latin or some other language, and likewise in the elements of political economy. The business of an inspector of factories was to examine into the state of the people, and to see whether certain Acts of Parliament had been complied with. For this purpose he should be a shrewd, active man, but it was utterly impossible that Latin, English history, or much less the elements of political economy could be of any use to him. A man who would make a very good inspector of factories might fail through his ignorance of Latin, while a man much less qualified for the particular business, through his acquaintance with the required language, might succeed in getting the situation. By importing into the examination paper matter foreign to the duties of the office which was to be competed for, they were but enabling men, who were not qualified to discharge the duties of the post, to obtain it by a show of other qualifications. He believed that the requirements on entering our diplomatic service were meagre and unsatisfactory as compared with the preliminary education enforced in other countries.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Before the question is put, I am anxious to call attention to a point adverted to by the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), and repeated by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Bowyer), as to which there seems to be a misapprehension. They complain that the examination is not adapted to the special duties of the office for which the applicant is a candidate. Now, in general, there is no attempt made to effect any such special adaptation. When a person is a candidate for a clerkship in a Government Office, all that is attempted is to ascertain if he has had a liberal education; and if he is examined for any department, there is not in general any adaptation of the questions to that department—the object is simply to ascertain that he has had a sufficient education to qualify him for discharging the duties of a public officer in that branch of the service. In military examinations there may be some attempt to examine with reference to more special knowledge—such as the nature of military duties; but that is not generally the case in the Civil Service. The questions which have been read to the House by the hon. Member for Norfolk seem to me, I confess, very proper questions on the subject of geology, assuming always that a candidate is to be examined in geology. I cannot doubt that if any one were to extract from the Cambridge Calendar, or from any authorized collection, questions proposed upon any particular branch of science, and were to read them to the House of Commons in the way in which these questions have been read, a laugh might be excited on account of the minuteness that is necessary in questions of the kind. I must take the liberty of remarking that the object of examinations of that sort is to propose questions not so easy that all candidates can answer them, and not so difficult that no candidates can answer them. Unless the medium is hit between too great facility and too great difficulty, there is no discriminating between the merits of one candidate and another. No doubt there is considerable judgment required in attaining that precise degree of difficulty, but there is no reason to doubt that the examiners employed by the Civil Service Commissioners are skilful, and competent to discharge the duties which they undertake. I cannot conceive any more unfair test than to read questions in such a mixed assembly as the House of Commons, whose attention has not been specially called to the particular subjects on which it is proposed that candidates shall be examined. Before the House proceeds to a Vote, I am desirous of calling attention to the words of this Motion. The Motion is, that for the future the Civil Service Commissioners shall publish, with their annual Report, all the examination papers submitted to candidates. The Civil Service Commissioners act under an Order of Council. That is the only authoritative document under which their powers arise, and by it they are not required to make any annual Report. It rests entirely within their discretion whether or not, or at what period, they shall report to the Crown. In the exercise of their discretion they have annually made a Report, which has been submitted to Her Majesty. Therefore, I apprehend it is not competent for the House of Commons to pass a Resolution that for the future the Civil Service Commissioners shall publish their annual Reports. They publish nothing. The Crown lays the Report they present on the table of the House. Parliament then orders it to be printed, and, if it thinks fit, to be published. But to lay down that the Commissioners shall annually publish Reports is an entire departure from the ordinary rules of the House. Therefore, I trust, not only on the merits which have been spoken to by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and by the noble Lord opposite, but on the point of form, the House will refuse to assent to this Motion.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he wished to protest against the doctrine that the House ought to wait for the Report of the Committee before taking any action itself. The Committee might be useful as far as taking evidence was concerned; but the moment he saw their names he knew quite well what their Report would be. He was himself a Member of the Committee. He knew that his hon. Friend would vote against him, and that he should vote against his hon. Friend. The decision, therefore, was known already, and therefore it seemed an absolute farce to wait for the Report before coming to a decision. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary said the object of the examination was to discover whether the candidate had had a liberal education. But in what point of view could such knowledge as the difference between 'cycloid' and 'ctenoid' be useful? The right hon. Gentleman said the examiners did not lay much stress on particular questions; that might be true, but how was the House to know it? How did the House know the examiners were not bigoted and pedantic, as learned men often were; and being so, that they did not lay great stress on such questions? They had no right to commit all the patronage of the Crown to a secret and irresponsible body. He did not wish the House to review individual cases, but to keep the system under which the examiners acted constantly under their eyes. But no discussion could be raised on it in the House unless they were allowed to see the questions put; without them the House had no means of judging, or bringing any cases under review. If the examiners drove the examination too high, and required more of candidates than the pay of their future employments justified, the result would be the Government would only get those men of talent who were morally worthless. If the Government pay were high, it might secure men of good qualities, intellectually and morally also. But the Government pay was low, and the result would be it would only get a great number of estimable, but mediocre persons, and a few of those clever men who, on account of some moral defect, could not get on in any other profession. This would be very injurious to the public service. Let the House, therefore, see the questions, know the value the examiners put on each, and keep a system which he believed to be full of peril under review.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he should not have risen if it had not been for the observations of his noble Friend and Colleague (Lord R. Cecil). His noble Friend said he knew perfectly well what the Report of the Committee would be. He (Sir S. Northcote) was very glad to hear it, because his noble Friend, though a Member of the Committee, had attended it only once. He himself had been present at every meeting, and he had only seen his noble Friend there once. It was only reasonable to ask the House to wait, not for the Report, but for the evidence. The inquiry was full and searching; many questions were put by gentlemen holding different views; and the evidence brought out in full relief many points that had been discussed in ignorance of the facts.

If the noble Lord had attended the Committee, he would have known that the Civil Service Commissioners offered to lay before it the papers in the case on which it was said information had been refused to the House, if the Committee chose to look into it.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said he wished to explain. He should have been extremely glad to have attended on the Committee, but—

MR. SPEAKER reminded the noble Lord that, having spoken once, he could not address the House again.

LORD ROBERT CECIL explained that he merely wished to inform the House why he had not attended the Committee.

MR. SPEAKER: The noble Lord is out of order.

MR. COLLINS said, his noble Friend merely wished to explain that, being a Member of the Berwick Election Committee and of the Committee on the Metropolitan Gas Bill, he found it impossible to attend the Committee on the Civil Service examinations.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE, after stating that he had not brought forward all the facts in his possession to save the time of the House, but that he knew of numberless cases of injustice, consented to withdraw his Motion.

An hon. MEMBER objected to its being withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question,

“That for the future the Civil Service Commissioners shall publish, with their Annual Report, all the Examination Papers submitted to candidates; specifying the proportion in which the maximum of marks assigned to each branch of knowledge is divided among the questions contained in each paper.”

Put and negatived.

FELONY AND MISDEMEANOUR.

LEAVE.

MR. DENMAN said, he rose to ask leave to bring in a Bill for the improvement of the proceedings in trials for felony and misdemeanour. The Bill consisted only of one clause, and its object was, to assimilate the practice of criminal cases with that of civil cases with regard to the speeches of counsel. It might be objected by some persons that the Bill which he wished to introduce would tend to make trials longer; but they had had six years' experience of the alteration of the practice in civil cases, and the result had not been to lengthen the trials. He proposed this Bill because he had not heard that any similar amendment of the law was contemplated at present; but as the change which he proposed would be of importance on any trial that might arise, he trusted that the House would allow the Bill to be introduced.

MR. W. EWART seconded the Motion.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he thanked his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Denman) for the attention which he had paid to a subject of so much importance as that with which the Bill proposed to deal. He would observe that the question was one of considerable difficulty, and therefore, without pledging himself to any decided opinion with regard to it, he would merely express a hope the House would accede to the Motion.

Leave given.

“Bill for the amendment of the proceedings on Trials for Felony and Misdemeanour, ordered to be brought in by Mr. DENMAN, Mr. WILLIAM EWART, and Mr. COBBETT.”

WAKEFIELD ELECTION—RESOLUTION.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he rose to move the following Resolution:—

“That whereas by the Act 17 & 18 Vict., c. 102, s. 14, it is expressly enacted that no person should be liable to be prosecuted for any offence committed against the said Act unless such prosecution shall commence within one year from the date of the said offence, this House is of opinion, with reference to certain prosecutions commenced at common law against divers persons at Wakefield, for offences committed at the late general election against that Act, but which prosecutions have not been commenced within the time prescribed by that Act, that such prosecutions should be abandoned.”

The hon. and gallant Member was proceeding to make a statement, when—

Notice taken, that Forty Members were not present; House counted; and Forty Members not being present, House adjourned at a quarter before Eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, June 6, 1860.

MINUTES.]—NEW WRIT ISSUED.—For Belfast, in the room of Richard Davison, esquire, Chiltern Hundreds.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Felony and Misdemeanour; Highways, Roads, &c.

2° Tramways (Scotland); Police and Towns Improvement (Scotland) Act Amendment.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION, &c., BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS moved that this Bill be read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. SELWYN said, that he could not but express his surprise that the House should be asked to give a second reading to a Bill of such importance, without one word in explanation being tendered by the right hon. Baronet, the Home Secretary, who had introduced the measure. The course which had been taken by the right hon. Gentleman cast upon him the duty of explaining the provisions of the Bill as well as of stating the objections to it. The Bill was called "A Bill to amend the Acts relating to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the Act concerning the Management of Episcopal and Capitular Estates in England;" and any hon. Member looking merely at that title could have very little idea of what the principle of the Bill was, what was its intention, or what its effect would be; but any one taking the trouble to examine the Bill, and having a sufficient practical knowledge of the subject, would discover that its real object was to vest in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners all the real estates both of the Bishops and the cathedral Chapters and to convert them into mere stipendiaries of the Commission. His objections to the Bill might be summed up in three words—centralization, compensation, and confiscation. By the second clause of the Bill the estates of the Bishops, and by the sixth clause the lands of all the cathedral churches, were absolutely vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. It was material to explain to the House the circumstances under which the Bill was brought before them. A meeting of deputies from the cathedral churches of the kingdom was held in December, 1858, in the Jerusalem Chapter Room. Resolutions were drawn up by the deputies embodying their opinion of the changes necessary to the management of their estates and the application of any surplus. These resolutions were forwarded to the Home Secretary for the time being. Matters remained in that state until June 1859, when a deputation from the same body, consisting of the Dean of St. Paul's, Lord John Thynne, and a Canon of Ely, waited upon the right hon. Member for Wiltshire (Mr. S. Estcourt), who was then Home Secretary. The deputation laid their recommendations before the right hon. Gentleman, and he suggested a course which would have prevented any hostile discussion. He said he would lay the proposals of the deputation before the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and see what observations they had to make; and when the whole case was before him, having regard also to the interests of lessees and the local claims on the revenues of the Chapters, he would see whether a Bill could not be introduced that should do justice to all parties. Parliament, however, was dissolved, and the first vote of the new House of Commons displaced the Government of the Earl of Derby. The deputation of the cathedral churches assumed that the new Secretary of State (Sir G. C. Lewis) would be inclined to deal with the matter in the same spirit as his predecessor, and in an interview in February in the present year they submitted their proposals to the right hon. Gentleman. The answer they received was that the matter would be taken into consideration and that the deputation should hear from him. They had, however, heard nothing from the right hon. Gentleman, and he had now introduced a Bill in diametrical opposition to their propositions, amounting, in fact, to a confiscation of their estates. It might be supposed that the proposals of the deputation were of so selfish a character that they deserved the reception they had met with, but of this the House should judge. Their first proposal, which they desired might be taken as the basis of future legislation, was that in no case and under no circumstances should the income of any dean or canon be capable of any increase. They proposed secondly that—as Parliament had thought fit to suspend some of the canonries in each cathedral and to give the Ecclesiastical Commissioners the right to receive an aliquot part of the income of the estates—a partition should take place, and that the Commissioners should take such portion of the estates as represented the proportion of the income to which the Commissioners were now entitled under the existing law. They proposed, in the third place, that in any arrangement provision should be made for spiritual destitution, both in the neighbourhood of the cathedral churches and of the estates from which their income was derived. The House would agree with him that these proposals contained nothing unreasonable, and were at least deserving of candid consideration. In the present state of the case the right hon. Gentleman ought to do one of two things—either to bring the question back again to the position in which it stood when the right hon. Member for Wiltshire was in office, or withdraw the Bill. If he would do neither he (Mr. Selwyn) must explain the objections he entertained to the Bill. These objections were, as he had stated, three, and were based on the grounds of centralization, compensation, and confiscation. With regard to centralization, vast estates would be vested in the Board of Commissioners in London. Now, the leading Members on both sides of the House had frequently vied with each other in denouncing the principle of centralization. The centralization usually objected to was that of powers such as those relating to highways and sewers, the objections to which were not nearly so forcible as those which applied to the centralization of landed estates situate in different parts of the kingdom. The destruction of local sympathies and interests arising out of the tie of landlord and tenant was involved in such a Bill. A Committee of the other House of Parliament, comprising Lord St. Leonards, Lord Brougham, the Duke of Buccleugh, Lord Lonsdale, and Lord Overstone, had before them a few years ago a proposal to create a general trustee company to manage estates. That Committee thought it would be so detrimental to the public interests to allow large landed estates to become vested in one central body that they rejected the measure. The long association which had existed between the episcopal and capitular bodies, as landlords on the one hand and their tenants on the other, was to be broken by this Bill and the property was to be transferred to a central body in London. As a proof of the extent to which this disruption of local ties and local sympathies had already gone, he might refer to the Appendix to the last Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, for the year ending November 1, 1859, p. 114, in which it was stated that the estates already vested in the Commissioners “are very numerous and situated in nearly every county, which adds materially to the difficulty and expense of management.” It was there also stated that the annual receipts of the estates vested in the Commissioners amounted to no less than £173,556. He asked the House whether it was advisable to extend this centralization, and to add to the duties of the Commissioners the management of all the estates of the Bishops and the cathedral churches? He contended that a Government board of officials was the worst body in which to lodge such a power. He would admit that the Government had been fortunate in the selection of Ecclesiastical Commissioners; they were gentlemen of the highest character, and who had taken a leading and honourable part in the debates of both Houses of Parliament. This eminence, however, carried with it a corresponding disadvantage, because the Commissioners had neither leisure nor opportunity to attend to the details of the management of their vast estates. The result had been, as was proved in evidence before the Committee of this House, that the management of the affairs of the Commission had fallen into the hands of subordinate officials, and that the Commission had simply walked in the path chalked out for them. He disclaimed attributing any blame to any single Member, but it was necessary to investigate the history of the Commission in order to see what the results had been of the centralizing system on which it was conducted. In 1848 a Committee of the House of Commons reported that several of the accounts, those of the architect, surveyor, solicitors, &c., were unsettled, and all the payments were made on account, and it appeared by a subsequent Report that there was brought back to credit on settlement of account with solicitors, architects and surveyors in one year, 1849, £36,192. An Act was therefore passed in 1850 by which the Commissioners were required to render annually to both Houses of the Legislature an abstract of their accounts, and it was further provided that the accounts should be audited by some one appointed by the Treasury. It appeared, however, from the reports of the Commissioners themselves, that from the passing of the Act to the present day no such audit had taken place. For some time the balance-sheet of the Commission was signed by Mr. Morgan, who, although in himself thoroughly competent for the task, was not an independent official appointed by another department, but the actuary of the Board. During the last three years, however, not even a pretence of audit had been made. To save appearances, therefore, a short time ago a Committee of the Treasury was appointed to investigate the accounts and proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. One could not, of course, expect to find any serious blame imputed to the Commission by a Committee so full of official sympathy and fellow-feeling; yet they were obliged, while asserting that considerable improvement had taken place in the manner of keeping the accounts, to admit that there had been no substantial audit at all. When examined before a Committee of the House of Lords in 1858, Mr. Chalk, the Secretary of the Commission, in reply to a question of Lord Ravensworth, confessed that he did not understand their accounts, as they were intelligible only to a professional actuary, which he was not. Yet, obscure and complicated as was their system of accounts, it was proposed in the Bill to treat the Commissioners as model accountants, and that the authorities of cathedral churches should be bound to follow their method. The accounts of cathedral churches referred, of course, to the maintenance of the services and fabrics of the churches, the support of educational and charitable institutions, the augmentation of livings, and so on. By the 18th section of the Bill it was provided that the Estates Committee of the Commission should be entitled to require from every Chapter information in detail as to any of their accounts, and to object to any payment out of the income or funds of such Chapter; and if the Chapter did not withdraw the item objected to, the matter in dispute was to be referred to arbitration, for the expenses of which no provision was made. The Commissioners would thus practically be empowered to dictate to each cathedral church in what manner it should dispose of its funds. There could be no question that the management of estates scattered throughout the country by a central body, such as the Commission, was enormously expensive. In the Report of last year the expenses of management were divided into a great number of accounts and items. At page 83 appeared the following charges:—"Official establishment expenses, £10,776; legal expenses, £1,315; surveyor's and actuary's charges, £855; architect's charges, £414." At p. 85—"Legal expenses, £3,415; surveyors and other charges in respect of valuation, sale, &c., £2,981; architect, £77." At p. 86—"Legal expenses, £468; surveyor, £21; architect £1 1s." At p. 87—"Legal expenses, £6,629; surveyor, £6,205; architect, £88." At p. 91, under the head "Summary of rental accounts from receivers, &c.," the charges of management, agency, &c., were set down as £10,335. The simple expenses of management—excluding, of course, rates, taxes, and tithe out charges—therefore amounted to no less than £43,583 15s. 8d. In striking contrast to the liberal disbursement for management was the amount of subscriptions and donations to church and school funds—£404 11s. 10d. p. 91. The House might also contrast the grants made by the Commissioners for the permanent augmentation of benefices which amounted to £52,600, while the annual payment in respect of new districts was £36,400, making together a sum of £89,000, or little more than double the sum that was spent in management. Excessive as was the present cost of conducting the affairs of the Commission, it would be considerably increased by the passing of this Bill, because additional duties would be thrown upon the officials, and their remuneration would, as was frankly admitted, have to be proportionably increased. The Committee of the Treasury, in their Report, p. 120, stated that the establishment which was required for the efficient working of the office was as follows:—Secretary, assistant-secretary, accountant, chief clerk of correspondence, registrar, book-keeper, two first-class clerks, 10 second-class clerks, 10 third-class clerks (senior division), 10 third-class clerks (junior division), and 8 supernumeraries—in all 46 persons. That was the staff which was indefinitely though very largely to be increased if the present measure passed. With respect to the management of property a curious incident was stated in the last Report, which strikingly illustrated the losses which were occasioned by the system of centralization. In 1848 the Commissioners purchased a house and piece of land at Stapleton, near Bristol, for £11,000, and had since expended on the same property £11,897, making a total outlay of £22,897. On the 25th of February last, however, an Order in Council was issued authorizing them to sell the property in question to the Merchant Venturers of Bristol for £12,000; so that, putting out of the question all expenses of management, there was a direct loss on the transaction of £10,897. How many grants to schools, poor livings, or new districts had thus been sacrificed! He did not attribute any blame to the Commissioners, but such incidents were inevitable as long as the management of estates was intrusted to a body which could not possess any local knowledge of them. He would now direct the attention of the House to the manner in which the estates already vested in the Commission had been acquired. The 36th Clause of the Bill was as follows :—

“ And whereas by schemes prepared by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and orders issued by Her Majesty in Council ratifying the same, arrangements have been made for the transfer by certain bishops and other ecclesiastical corporations, aggregate and sole, of the whole or parts of the estates, stocks, moneys, and property belonging to their respective sees, dignities, or offices to the said Ecclesiastical Commissioners, in lieu of or by way of substitution for sums in gross or fixed annual sums paid or to be paid to or provided for such bishops and other corporations respectively, and considerable parts of the estates, stocks, moneys, and property so acquired by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have been sold, exchanged, and otherwise dealt with by them ; and whereas doubts are entertained whether such arrangements were in all cases authorized by the Acts in pursuance whereof such schemes purport to have been prepared ; all such arrangements as aforesaid shall be and be deemed to have been good, valid, and effectual, and any similar arrangement which may in like manner be hereafter made.”

It was superfluous to comment on such a clause as that. Had any private Member introduced a Bill drawn up in such a manner they might rely upon it that the Home Secretary would not have lost the opportunity of delivering his favourite denunciation of “ ill-digested measures couched in unintelligible language.” In the Acts of Parliament by which the Commission was constituted, and endowed with various powers, provision was made for the disposal of portions of property belonging to Chapters or Bishops, in case they found it convenient or necessary to take such a step for the purposes of those Acts. But, had it ever been intended that either Bishops or Chapters should have power to transfer bodily the whole of their property to the Commissioners, some trace of such an intention would be found in the legislation of the country. He maintained that no Act could be cited to justify such a transaction, and that without the sanction of Parliament it was altogether unlawful for any Corporation so to transfer its whole possessions. This did not rest on his own opinion merely, for on the 25th of July, 1857, a case was heard before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in which the legality of a transfer of all the estates of the See of London to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners was questioned ; and the decision, after a long argument between the hon. and learned Member for West Gloucestershire (Mr. Rolt) and Mr. Roundell Palmer, was that such a proceeding was completely ultra vires of the Bishop and the Commissioners. This Bill proposed to supersede that decision of the Committee of Privy Council, a tribunal which possessed the respect not merely of the legal profession but of the country generally, and to render all “ similar arrangements good, valid, and effectual.” He thought he had established his objection to the Bill on the ground of centralization. He had shown how the Commissioners had disobeyed the injunctions of Parliament, how they had neglected audit, how they had kept their accounts, how great their expenses were, how they had acquired and how they had dealt with their property, and how now they attempted to force a recognition and legalisation of their blunders upon Parliament. He then came to his second head—namely, compensation—and he thought he could show as egregious a failure under this head as in the case of centralization. His first objection to the Bill was that it proposed compensation in its worst and most mischievous form. At present the estates were generally managed by the chapter clerks, who possessed thorough local knowledge of all the details of the property under their charge. The Bill proposed that these gentlemen should be superseded, and that they should receive compensation for the loss of their situations. But from what fund was the compensation to be drawn ? Was it not from the funds that were devoted to the diminution of spiritual destitution, the spread of religious education, and other charitable purposes ? It was said, no doubt, in defence of the measure, that other estates would be given in return for those which were taken. But what earnest had they ever had that such a bargain would be carried out ? In what case had restitution ever yet been made ? He was justly alarmed :

“ Quia me vestigia terrent,
Omnia te adversum spectantia, nulla retrorsum.”

The management of the estates was to be transferred from the chapter clerks to the officials in Whitehall Place, and the former were to receive compensation. But if other estates were to be given in return for those which were taken, then the chapter clerks would be reinstated, and would have to make themselves acquainted with those other estates ; and those who had managed them before would, in their turn, require compensation, so that there would be compensation twice over. His third objection to the measure was on the ground of confiscation. The 6th Clause provided—

“ Whenever and so soon as the payments which the Commissioners may be liable to make, under the provisions of any order or orders of Her Majesty in Council, for regulating the income of any member or members of an ecclesiastical corporation aggregate, or for providing such compensation for diminution of income as is hereinafter mentioned, shall, either alone or in addition to the portions or shares of and in the divisible corporate revenues of such corporation to which the Commissioners are or may become entitled, pursuant to the provisions of any Act of Parliament or order in Council, amount or be equal to three-fourth parts of the divisible income of such corporation, all the lands, hereditaments, and emoluments of or belonging to such corporation (except all rights of patronage and presentation, the cathedral or collegiate church and the precincts thereof, and the residences of the deans and canons, minor canons, lay clerks, officers, and servants, and any lands or hereditaments used for the purposes of a college or school under the government of the chapter, or connected with the cathedral or collegiate church), shall become vested absolutely in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for the purposes and subject to the provisions applicable to other hereditaments vested in the said Commissioners; and in the meantime, and until an endowment has been assigned to such Chapter in manner hereinafter directed, the Commissioners shall pay to such Chapter such annual or other sums of money as may be necessary to defray the expenses connected with the cathedral establishment, as mentioned in the schedule hereto, and to provide the incomes of the deans and canons; and the income to be so provided for the holder of any deanery or canonry shall be that which the holder of such deanery or canonry would have received if this Act had not been passed, or such income shall have been fixed by order in council for members of such Chapter thereafter to be appointed, at the option of the holder of such canonry.”

When the Ecclesiastical Commissioners received three-fourths of the income the whole lands were to be vested absolutely in them; but how was any one to ascertain when that time had arrived? The House would see that this was not a matter of trifling importance, for the title to the whole of the lands would depend upon correctly ascertaining the proper time when the property was to be transferred from its present possessors to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Questions would arise as to the validity of every such transfer. In the simplest case, as if a tenant held over, the question in whom was the fee-simple vested must depend on the prior question, whether the time had arrived when the estates were vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; and a court of justice, in order to arrive at a decision, must necessarily take all the accounts to ascertain precisely the whole divisible income of the Chapter, and what was the proportion to which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were entitled. It would be almost impossible to take such accounts, and he mentioned this as an instance to show the carelessness with which the Bill was framed, and the utterly impracticable character of its provisions. He did not flatter himself that with the best explanation which it was in his power to give he could make it intelligible to gentlemen who had not before studied and made themselves acquainted with the details; but a measure of this importance ought to be intelligible to every man, and every hon. Member ought to be able to see what were the main objects proposed, and the manner in which that which was proposed was to be carried into execution. It was almost if not entirely impossible to arrive at a clear understanding upon this part of the subject, and it would be equally difficult for a court of justice to determine the long series of questions to which the Bill, if it passed in its present shape, must give rise. He need scarcely add that every question would be litigated at the expense of funds which were already insufficient for the purposes to which they ought to be devoted. He begged the House to consider for a moment what were the estates which were thus proposed to be transferred, and for that purpose, to make it less complicated, he would take the instance of one cathedral church which was most intimately associated with the University which he had the honour to represent—the cathedral church of Ely. It formerly consisted of a dean and eight canons, but two of the canonries had been suspended; and, after providing for the maintenance of the church, for the performance of Divine service, for education, maintenance of poor people, and other charitable and religious objects, which were pointed out in the charter, the surplus income was divisible into certain proportions, viz., two-tenths to the dean, one-tenth to each of the six canons, and two-tenths to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in respect to the two suspended canonries. Two of the canonries were attached to professorships in the University of Cambridge, and these being the purposes to which the income was applied, he entreated the House not to be led away by any argument which supposed that there was any contention between the cathedral church on the one hand and parishes and new districts on the other.

Parliament decided nearly twenty years ago what proportion of the funds of cathedral churches should be allotted to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and this Bill did not propose to deal with that matter at all. It was a Bill for the management of the estates, and not to suspend any more canonries. The House would therefore not be led away by any argument based upon assertions of the higher importance of providing for the cure of souls when compared with that of maintaining the present number of canons. He asked the House to consider what were the real purposes for which, by charter, these incomes were provided, and as an illustration he would read an extract from the charter of the cathedral church of Ely, although in the translation it was impossible to preserve the terse and vigorous diction of the original:—

“That Christ's Holy Gospel may be diligently preached, and the sacraments rightly administered by learned and grave men, who, after the example of the primitive Church, may assist the bishop as his presbytery in all weightier matters, that the youth of the realm may be trained up in sound learning, the old and infirm, especially old soldiers, may be suitably provided for, and that thence all other works of every kind of piety and charity may flow forth abundantly to all the neighbouring places to the glory of Almighty God, and the common advantage and happiness of the people.”

“Cætera omnis generis pietatis officia in omnia vicina loca longe late que dimarent.”

He had heard with some astonishment that it was the intention of those hon. Members who advocated local claims to vote for the second reading of this Bill on the ground that it made provision for local claims; but he would ask the representatives of these “vicina loca” whether, if they drew a clause for themselves, they could put more strongly than in the charter he had referred to the right to have local claims attended to out of the revenues of the cathedral churches? If the present members of those bodies were unmindful of that right, the visitor had a control over them; and if the charter was found to be inapplicable to existing circumstances, power was reserved to the Crown in the charter of remodelling it, and all the rules under it, as the exigencies of the time might require. He asked, then, the advocates of local claims whether they were prepared to abandon the chartered right which they now possessed, with a power of appealing to the visitor and to the Crown, for the sake of a Bill which did not recognize their right at all, or at any rate only gave the Commissioners

a permissive power to attend to local claims if they pleased. As to the chance of receiving any benefit under the permissive powers given by the Bill to the Commissioners, he would appeal to the evidence of Mr. Chalk before the House of Lords in 1858:—

“But do you not think it would be well that the Commissioners, when owners in possession of a manor or land which they hold merely as trustees for the especial benefit of the Church, might properly be bound to appropriate the proceeds of such property in sufficiently endowing the cure of the locality before they dispose of such means in other directions?—I think that any liability on the Commissioners as landlords should be placed on a footing precisely similar to that attaching to ordinary landlords; of its proper measure and degree I should think the noblemen or gentlemen who may be responsible for the administration of the affairs of such a Commission would form a better judgment, if unfettered, than any rule which it would be possible for the Legislature to enact, seeing indeed to what diverse circumstances such rule would have to be applied. But if you propose to make the requirement of a local appropriation of the proceeds of all property vested in them a primary function of the Board, it seems to me that you are going in direct opposition to the principle which originated, and which supports the institution of the common fund.”

One of the noble Lords, observing that Mr. Chalk was reading, and not speaking, the answer, said that probably the answer had been prepared with care, and was the result of much deliberation, and Mr. Chalk said that although not authorized by the Commissioners, the answer expressed their deliberate opinion, and that the Commissioners constantly acted upon that view. The advocates of local claims had then to choose between the right which they at present possessed, and the simple option of having those claims considered by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and he thought that upon reflection they would support the Motion for the rejection of the Bill. It might be said that the cathedral functionaries had been unmindful of their duties, and had not made sufficient provision for the increase of livings, from which they derived considerable emoluments in the shape of tithes; but his answer was that the blame should be cast on those in whom the right of patronage was vested. If patrons disposed of important offices for family or political reasons, the responsibility for the consequences must rest upon them, and not on those who had been improperly placed in them. He admitted that there had been times of apathy which all must lament, but the day of sinecures, pluralities, and non-residence had passed away, and they might just as well destroy the parochial system on account of such former abuses, as visit on the present Members of cathedral churches the faults of their predecessors. Let them be reformed if necessary, but let not their property be confiscated. That was so well expressed in a petition which he had had the honour to present from the cathedral church of Westminster that the House would pardon him for reading a short passage. That important body said :—

“ These capitular institutions of the country require to receive progressive expansion and improvement, as is exemplified by the expenditure for the extra evening services in the Abbey and other legitimate demands which are continually increasing, and to fix a limit would not merely be to wrong those bodies, but the sacred interests which are dependent upon them.”

There was hardly a Chapter which had not similar claims upon them, and, according to this Bill, they were to be reduced to the position of stipendiaries, to have a fixed sum allotted, and to have nothing left out of which to meet these great and continually increasing demands. With respect to the prejudicial manner in which it would affect the members of cathedral churches themselves, as well as the sacred interests of which they were the guardians, the same petitioners said :—

“ By the operation of this measure your petitioners will be reduced to the position of stipendiaries and a precedent be made which will weaken the foundations and peril the safety of all capitular institutions.”

He thought the House would be disposed to agree that unless there was something almost amounting to necessity it was not just to reduce these persons from their present position of independence as owners of landed estates to the position of stipendiaries. It was an essential part of the independence of the Church that they should be owners of these estates, and if it had ever been intended that they should be dependant on the Crown there would have been some trace to be found of that intention in the original foundation of these churches. But as the House was aware, the greater portion of the estates which belonged to cathedral churches were derived from Royal foundations and from the gifts of private individuals. The Sovereigns might easily have made the deans and canons mere stipendiaries, but, instead of granting them a varied or fixed stipend, they conferred upon them the estates of which they had ever since been the undoubted and lawful possessors. With respect to private individuals the case was much stronger, because they found the chapters, as corporations, already in possession of other estates, and in many instances, no doubt, not only regard to the corporation and the interests committed to its care, but to the estate itself, had actuated private individuals in making a devise or grant which increased the corporate property. Could it be doubted what any one of those individuals would have said if he had been told that the power of managing the property and the property also would be transferred from that body, of which he perhaps was a corporate member, to a Government Board in London, with no local sympathies and no local knowledge, and not bound to treat the tenants of the estate in the same manner in which for years, he might almost say for centuries, they had been treated? He thought that history taught them that the invasion of the rights of corporations was a sign of bad times present, and of worse evils to follow. It was true that the Emperor of the French had set an example in this respect, but they all knew with what indignation his project for taking the property of all charitable institutions into his hands and paying stipends in return was received, and how the terms “ spoliation” and “ confiscation” were applied to it. The proposal in this Bill was in substance and principle precisely the same. It might be said that it was very unreasonable to complain of the transfer of estates from those bodies to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners because the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were much better able to manage them, and would be sure to realize much larger incomes. But if it was to be put on that principle he wanted to know where they were to stop. Why should not they take away all the property of colleges and universities, and, as the Emperor of the French proposed, the property of all charities? Why should they not take away the real property of the parochial clergy? Some of the holders had their powers impaired by sickness, and, in the case of a corporation sole, there would be much more reason in the argument that a body in Whitehall Place would manage the property better than when it was applied to the wholesale transfer of the property of Corporations aggregate to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. And why should they stop within the pale of the Church itself? Why not extend the benefit of this principle to the Dissenting communities, many of which were become venerable by age and important from the vastness of their possessions? Of course such propositions could not be entertained for a moment, but if the principle were adopted they would be perfectly consistent, and the transfer of property in one case would be quite as justifiable as in the other. The Bill not only applied to the Chapters but to the office of visitor, and he asked upon what possible ground were the powers and authority of the visitor, which had been exercised for a great number of years, to be transferred, and whether it was consistent with the proper dignity and position of the Deans and Chapters that they should have to come like suitors to a Board in Whitehall Place, or some subordinate officials of that Board, instead of to the Bishop of the diocese or to the Crown, for the purpose of determining how the important trusts which were confided to them ought to be administered. With regard to the power of remodelling the charters it might be said that the Crown was not willing to exercise it against the will of the present holders of stalls; but the present holders of stalls were quite willing that the charters should be remodelled and be made applicable to the circumstances of the present time. The petition which had been presented to the Queen from the Cathedral Church of Ely fully dealt with this question:—

“The importance of the purposes to which so large a portion of the capitular revenues have been already diverted, and to which it is proposed to divert still more, is fully recognized, and your petitioners are firmly persuaded that those objects will be accomplished by the capitular bodies themselves, in conjunction with the Bishop and clergy of their respective dioceses. Your Majesty's Petitioners therefore humbly pray, First, That your Majesty may be graciously pleased to take the requisite measures for giving to the Cathedral Church of Ely a new code of statutes.”

Thus, they had these very bodies coming to the responsible advisers of the Crown, and saying they were willing that any necessary reform should be introduced, and praying that if their charter were not according to the spirit of the time, and did not allow them to provide for the spiritual destitution which unfortunately existed, it might be remodelled, and that in all things they would submit themselves to the pleasure and discretion of the Crown. The right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary ought to have vouchsafed some answer to this petition, and to have considered whether the statutes could not have been made suitable to the circumstances of the present time. The proposal had been laid before him and his predecessors, but had remained unnoticed, and this Bill was now introduced to transfer the whole property to the Commissioners. He trusted the House would not be led away by any erroneous supposition that there was anything in the views and wishes of the Chapters which was in the least degree antagonistic to the desire to make the fullest possible provision for the spiritual wants of the people. It was with that object that they had proposed that the Crown should exercise the power of re-modelling the statutes, and that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should receive that fair share of the produce of the estates—one-fifth—to which, under the existing law they were entitled. If they found a rule of law, and a practice founded on it, which had existed for centuries without complaint and without any attempt at alteration, they might feel assured that the rule and practice were consistent with justice, with the Constitution, and with the best interests of the people. They found such a rule in the law of partition, which provided that where two persons or corporations had a right to undivided shares in the same estate, either one should have the power of saying, “This is an inconvenient mode of enjoying the property, and I shall insist on having it severed, so that the portion representing my interest may be allotted to me, and the portion representing your interest may be allotted to you.” Instead of all this cumbrous and expensive machinery of transferring and re-transferring estates, he proposed that that simple law should be applied to the present case. It was not a question whether more canonries should be suspended, or whether the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should receive a larger proportion. The amount had been fixed, and he proposed that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should keep their part and leave to the Chapters theirs, and that no question of account should be left open between them. The laborious process which was involved in the Bill would be avoided by adopting this simple and easy plan. But the proposition in the present measure was, because they were entitled to one-fifth of those estates the remaining four-fifths should be absolutely vested in the Commissioners also. Nothing could be more unjust or more monstrous. With respect to the income of members of the Chapter, they were willing to consent to any measure, however stringent, which would prevent the possibility of any future increase, and they proposed that any additional income should be applied, in the first instance, in the manner in which the charter directed, under the supervision of the visitor and under the supreme control of the Crown. If any new administration was considered to be necessary they might avoid the evils of centralization and compensation by the creation of a local or diocesan Board, in whom local sympathies and local knowledge, so necessary to the existence of proper relations between landlord and tenant, would be preserved. It would be very easy to establish such a body if necessary, and it would be productive of less evil than vesting everything in the power of this all-devouring Commission. He wished to say one word with regard to the lessees, because he was told that the advocates of their interests considered that the Bill would be of advantage to them. The property which they were anxious to have protected was nothing more than this—that for a long series of years they had been tenderly and liberally dealt with by the ecclesiastical bodies, and the habit had grown up of not exacting from them by way of rent or fine the full value of the property they possessed. Something like tenant right had been created, which the Chapters had recognized; and it was the continued recognition of that right which the lessees desired to secure. There was no provision for the recognition either of local claims or of tenant right in the Bill. Only a voluntary power was given to the Commissioners, and if they did not exercise it the lessees would be exchanging their old landlords, whose liberality had given rise to the very claim they now urged, for the tender mercies of the Commissioners, without the slightest guarantee that their claim would be recognized. The Report itself declared the importance of maintaining that kindly sympathy between landlord and tenant which was of great consequence to their well-being, particularly in country districts, where the greater proportion of the estates of these cathedral Chapters were situated; and it was amusing to observe the manner in which it was attempted to be supplied. It would be found that they recommended that two or three of the paid Commissioners should from time to time visit all these estates. That proposal raised an agreeable picture of some noble Lord or right hon. Gentleman released from his duties in Whitehall Place or the Houses of Parliament, after going the round of his own estate, beginning to visit all these other estates scattered over every part of the country. No doubt such visits would be very agreeable to those who paid and to those who received them, and might, perhaps, relieve the lands from the pheasants, partridges, and hares with which they were encumbered; but it could scarcely be supposed that they were likely to supply that local sympathy, and if they liked, those local prejudices which the intimate relationship between landlord and tenant developed, and which the Report admitted it was so necessary to maintain. He ought to apologize for the great length of time he had occupied, but the necessity having been cast on him by the manner in which the Bill had been proposed of citing both sides of the case to the House, he had had to tell them both what the measure was, and also why it ought not to be passed into a law. He trusted he had succeeded in showing to the House that it was based on a principle which involved centralization and compensation in their worst form, and the confiscation, not merely of local interests, but of the interests of the members of these corporate bodies, sacrificing their dignity and position, and also the rights of the visitor, and the power of the Crown. Reasonable, fair, and just proposals had been made on the part of these bodies, and he would urge the House to assist him in placing matters on the same footing which they occupied when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wiltshire (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt) was Secretary of State for the Home Department, and when it was promised that those proposals should be fairly considered, objections stated, and the interests of all parties duly preserved. For these reasons, if the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary did not withdraw the Bill, he should feel compelled to persevere in the Amendment of which he had given notice—that the Bill be read a Second Time that day six months.

Amendment proposed to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. ALDERMAN COPELAND said, he should have great pleasure in seconding

the Amendment. He had looked through the accounts of the Commissioners, and not being able to make anything of them he had put them in the hands of some persons in his employment conversant with accounts, and from their examination it appeared that, in the years from 1853 to 1859 inclusive, the surveyors' and architects' charge relating both to income and capital amounted to £58,883, the legal expenses relating both to capital and income for the same period amounted to £60,313. The expenses of the staff were £52,305, making a grand total of £171,503. In the same space £574,280 had been spent in the augmentation of livings, £36,051 in the augmentation of archdeaconries, and about £200,000 was also expended for the augmentation of Sees and Chapters, making altogether £810,000, so that the working expenses amounted to 20 per cent of the amount actually dealt with by the Commissioners. This was a state of things which ought not to be permitted to continue, and he hoped, therefore, that the Government would withdraw the Bill and institute next Session a searching inquiry into the manner in which the Commission was carried on. A recent return showed a staff of fifty-seven clerks, who, without the paid Commission, cost £8,675 a year, with nine clerks not salaried as per return from the Commissioners dated July 27, 1859. It was impossible that any Government could long support the Commission upon its present extravagant scale.

MR. FREELAND: Sir, however much we may differ as to the merits of the Bill before us, or in the objects which we may have in view, we shall all, I think, agree in the extreme importance of arriving, as speedily as possible, at some definite and practical result with respect to the vexed question which this Bill involves. I earnestly entreat the House to consider well the present position of this question, and the mode in which it has been dealt with. So far back as 1839 a Select Committee of this House urged on Parliament the extreme importance of an early settlement.

"They cannot," say the Committee, "close their Report without recommending that the Legislature will direct its attention as soon as possible to the settlement of this important question; as at present, since the publication of the First Report of the Church Commissioners, and the discussion of the subject in Parliament, such is the state of uncertainty among the Church lessees that they find considerable difficulty in selling or borrowing money on their property, and all improvement is suspended to the injury of both lessors and lessees."

Since the year 1836 we have had, I am afraid to say, how many Ecclesiastical Commission Acts and Ecclesiastical Commission Bills. This Bill itself, since 1857, with various Amendments and modifications, has been brought annually under the notice of the House; and yet, Sir, with regard to those vexed questions which it involves, with regard to those great interests of property which have been disturbed by piecemeal, and incomplete enactments, Parliament has still to legislate. If this Bill pass, as, perhaps, it is best that it should pass, with modifications and Amendments, it will be only a step in a certain direction and not a settlement. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Cambridge University has argued this question chiefly as one between the Chapters and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Well, that shows the expediency of a division of the subject which I took the liberty of suggesting last year to the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department. There should have been at least two Bills, if not more: an Episcopal and Capitular Estates Bill and a Lessees Clauses Bill. My hon. and learned Friend has ranged his objections to the Bill under three heads:—Centralization, compensation, and confiscation. Through his arguments on the two latter heads, I will not follow him; but, on the subject of centralization, he has appealed especially to Members on this side of the House, and, therefore, I feel called upon to say a few words respecting it. To centralization, I object, on general principles, as much as any one. Yet, if it be necessary, in order to carry out a system of general enfranchisement, and in order that the interests of the lessees may be dealt with on one uniform plan, to have Church property placed in the hands of a central Board—to that sort of intermediate centralization I have no objection. My hon. and learned Friend has said a great deal about the Chapters, and about the wrongs done to them and their property. I shall leave the care of them in his hands. I feel bound to say, however, that in many of their proceedings, in connection with this subject, with which I have become acquainted, they have looked very much to their own interests and very little to those of the lessees. My hon. and learned Friend has spoken at length on the keeping of accounts and the management of property by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Surely, these are matters which may very well be dealt with by a separate Bill. The greater the amount of property which you place in their hands, the more important will it become that Parliament should see that the accounts are duly kept, and that the property is well looked after. I shall now, if the House will permit me, offer a few observations on this question, as it affects the interests of the lessees. I owe my seat in this House to my connection with this question, more than to any other cause, and I am anxious, as far as I can, to contribute to a settlement of it. It is, I think, a great misfortune that the course pursued in Ireland with reference to Church leasehold estates was not from the first pursued here. In Ireland questions similar to those raised by this Bill were raised and dealt with satisfactorily by a single measure. And why? Because Parliament passed a measure for the compulsory enfranchisement of Church leasehold estates in Ireland. I am anxious to allude particularly to the Irish Act, because I think that it might be followed, not to the letter, but in its general spirit, with great advantage as regards this country. The Irish Church Temporalities Act was passed in 1833. That Act distinctly gave to Irish church lessees a statutory right to call for enfranchisement in every instance. It recognized and even put a money value on the lessee's benefit of renewal. Lord Derby, then Mr. Stanley, said, in words which contained the pith and marrow of the question, that as the motives which had influenced the Bishop could not exist in an undying Board there was a necessity to give an entire security to the holders of Bishops' leases by enabling them to purchase them in perpetuity. As long as the Government stop short of that which Lord Derby recommended in the case of Ireland, as long as they stop short of compulsory enfranchisement, their Bills will operate unequally where claims are equal, and they will, therefore, be to that extent unjust. If the House will favour me with its attention for a few moments I will endeavour to make my meaning clear. The claims of the lessees arise from that practice of renewal which has continued for more than two centuries. These claims have been recognized by Acts of Parliament and by the Reports of Committees of the Houses of Lords and Commons. I am anxious to read an extract from the Report of a Committee of the House of Lords, no farther back than 1851, because it states clearly and with the weight of an authority that would not belong to words of mine, the position and claims of Church lessees:

"It cannot be denied," say the Committee, "that the lessees, with comparatively few exceptions, have had de facto, for more than two centuries the advantage of renewals on favourable terms, which, although differing in different dioceses, and gradually increased at different times in different dioceses, have been for considerable periods of time uniform in the same diocese, and the long continuance of this practice, rendered almost inevitable by the temporary nature of the lessor's interest already alluded to, has created in the lessees an expectation of renewal sufficiently definite to be treated as between third parties as approaching to a certainty. Leases of this description in consequence of this expectation of renewal have in various parts of the country sold at a considerably higher value, as compared with the fee, than would have been the case had not such expectation existed, and have also become the subject not only of mortgage, but of settlement and devise, with limitations to children and their posterity, indicating a strong impression of the certainty of their continuance, and under the like impression permanent improvements have been made by the lessees on this description of property. . . . In defining the terms of enfranchisement and surrender, it is advisable, and it would be in accordance with the usual course of legislation, that any injury sustained by either party through the alteration of their relative position by legislative interference be considered and compensated."

Such then is the position of the lessees, their claims having all the same origin are all similar or equal. But, according to the present system, one lessee applies to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for enfranchisement, and he gets it with a beneficial allowance in the nature of a compensation. Another with the same claims applies to them and meets with a refusal. His lease is run out and the property is taken away from him. The same thing happens with respect to Bishops and Chapters. One Bishop enfranchises; another, the Bishop of St. Asaph, I am told, refuses enfranchisements. One Chapter enfranchises—I see from a Return moved for by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for South Shields—that the Chapter of Durham enfranchises to a great extent. Another Chapter, that of Lincoln, I am told, refuses all enfranchisements; and why? because they do not like the manner in which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would deal with any money which might be paid for such enfranchisements. That, however, is purely a matter between them and the Commissioners, and is not a reason why they should punish the lessees. Unless, therefore, you pass a compulsory Act, lessees whose claims are equal will meet with unequal treatment and possibly with gross injustice. No doubt, in order to do justice to the property of the Church, it might be necessary to make the claims of the lessees, in certain cases, the subject of special reference and arbitration. That, however, is a difficulty that might easily be dealt with, and is not an answer to the arguments in favour of compulsory enfranchisement. If the House will allow me I will say what I think would be a fair settlement. I would make it compulsory on the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and on Ecclesiastical Corporations sole and aggregate, in contemplation of a change, substituting rack rentals for beneficial leases, subject to fines and reserved rents, to offer to Church lessees the option of three things conjointly:—1. To buy the reversions on arbitration; or 2. To sell their present intererests to the reversioners on arbitration; or 3. To hold their present leases until they are run out. The reversioners should, in the latter event, be empowered to sell the reversions either now or at a future day to strangers. That I venture to think would be an equitable settlement. However, as some difference of opinion prevails on the question of compulsory enfranchisement, it may be better that it should be raised and dealt with by a separate Bill. Before I state my next objections, I must express a hope that the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department will make certain concessions in Committee. If I did not believe that he would do so, I should not vote for the second reading of the Bill. My next objection refers not so much to the proposed new system of letting Church leasehold properties after their re-transfer as permanent estates to ecclesiastical corporations sole or aggregate, as to the political consequences that may flow from such new system. According to the old system of leasing Church property, the lessees were virtually the owners, subject to renewal, fines, and reserved rents. They were at all events politically independent. But according to the new system it is proposed that these properties shall be let on lease at rack rent, or from year to year. That may be a good system in a mere proprietary point of view, but in a political point of view what will be the consequences? A portion of this property is situated in or near cathedral towns which are also Parliamentary boroughs. If these properties are to be let by Bishops, and Deans, and Chapters, from year to year—if the land is to be subdivided and let as accommodation land in the immediate neighbourhood of these cathedral towns, they will some of them become, I had almost said, the mere nomination boroughs of the clergy. [“Oh! oh!” from two or three Members of the Opposition.] Well, perhaps in a literal sense the expression may be too strong. I only mean it to be applied in a figurative sense, and not offensively or unkindly. I represent a cathedral town, and see clearly how these arrangements might operate. At all events, they would give to the clergy an amount of political influence which they do not now possess. I entreat the House, and hon. Gentlemen opposite as friends of the Church, not to allow Church property to become the object of political jealousy. Then, again, if you take from Ecclesiastical Corporations their present, and give them new permanent estates, why should these be in the neighbourhood of towns where they stop all building operations? My next objection is to that part of the Bill which inflicts on a certain class of leaseholders a statutory determination of their tenure in 1884, except in cases in which the Commissioners may consent to enfranchisements. If it be the object of this Bill, which is chiefly an enabling Bill, to facilitate enfranchisements, it seems a strange thing to say to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, “If you choose to enfranchise property before 1884, you must do so on certain conditions favourable to the lessees; but if you do not enfranchise it before 1884, after that you shall have the property discharged from those conditions.” That objection, however, and the objection arising from the non-admission of leaseholders for lives to benefits corresponding to those conferred in certain cases on leaseholders for years, we shall, I hope, see removed in Committee. The last objection, which I shall notice now, arises from the omission of an arbitration clause as applicable to enfranchisements of building ground and house property. A Select Committee of this House, in 1856, recommended the insertion of the clause in question. Mr. Smith, the able surveyor to the Commissioners, calculates that this clause involves a sum of £800,000, that being the amount which represents the difference between his mode of valuing the reversions of Church house property and that contended for by the lessees. No wonder he does not like arbitration! It is, however, a monstrous thing that the opinion of one surveyor to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should induce the Commissioners and Government in this Bill to set aside the recommendation of one of the ablest Committees that this House, I believe, has ever nominated. That Committee produced three blue-books, or, at all events, three Reports. It comprised the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Morpeth, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, my right hon. Friend the Member for Durham, and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for South Shields. Not only did they recommend the adoption of this clause, but it was inserted in 1857 in the Bill which bore on the back of it the name of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton. I shall certainly move its re-insertion in Committee, and I hope that in so doing I shall have the assistance of my right hon. Friend the Member for Durham, whom I see opposite. I have alluded to the noble Lord at the head of the Government. I am sorry that he is not in his place, but I hope that through one channel or another my words may reach him. I am anxious to make an earnest appeal to him. It is, that he will bestow a fraction of his time—which no man is better able when he pleases to make conducive to important practical ends—on a consideration of the question of compulsory Church leasehold enfranchisement. Sure I am that by a measure such as that which I have ventured to point out he would relieve lessees from the uncertainties of a capricious system; that he would give to the cause of agricultural development, and to those building operations which feed the sons of toil, an impetus of which he little dreams. In those wretched dwellings of the labouring poor, which are an eyesore and a disgrace to many of our cathedral towns, and in which the tenure is a barrier to all improvement, he would cause the light and blessings of reproductive labour in a wise philanthropy to shine. As regards the mode of dealing with the Church and its lessees I shall conclude by quoting the words of a witty and thoughtful divine:—

“To create a general impression of justice, if it be not what common honesty requires from any Ministry, is what common sense points out to them—it is strength and duration—it is the only power which is worth having. In the struggle of parties it gives victory, and is remembered, and goes down to other times.”

Mr. Freeland

As to the present Bill it is, perhaps, difficult to say what is best to be done; but believing that the necessary Amendments may be made in Committee, I do not consider it right to oppose its being read a second time.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Sir, the hon. and learned Member for the University of Cambridge at the outset of the copious exposition of his objections to this Bill passed some censure on me for not having offered any observations in explanation of the Bill when I moved the second reading. Hon. Gentlemen will agree, I think, that it is a venial sin in any Member of this House to abstain from addressing any detailed observations to it, but in this case I might defend myself by saying that, inasmuch as I saw the hon. and learned Gentleman had given notice of an Amendment, I thought it very probable that I might be called on to say something in reply to his Amendment, and I was unwilling, therefore, to take up the time of the House by speaking twice. That is not the only reason why I did not trouble the House at the beginning of the debate. This Bill originated in a Committee of this House, of which the noble Lord the Member for the City of London (Lord John Russell) was the Chairman—a Committee which was appointed in consequence of a pressure on the House in a sense quite different from that which seems to animate them at present—namely, a jealousy of the facilities afforded under the existing law with regard to the enlargement of the revenues of Church dignitaries. That Committee investigated the subject very carefully and made certain recommendations, upon which a Bill was framed. It was introduced into this House the following Session; it passed through this House, but at so late a period that it was impossible to obtain the assent of the other House to it. In the following Session a Bill, identical in substance, was introduced into the other House. It was there referred to a Select Committee, which examined into it fully; and it then passed the House of Lords and came down here, but again at too late a period to become law. That is the history of this Bill. It is substantially the same as the two previous Bills, and being aware that it had received the assent of both Houses, and had passed through Select Committees of both Houses, I assumed that its provisions were known to hon. Gentlemen who take an interest in the subject, and that it was unnecessary for me to enter into any detailed explanation of it. It appears to me, moreover, that if the House is prepared to proceed in the way of the policy which has already been adopted, and is in operation in reference to these matters, this is not a Bill for a rambling debate on the second reading; but a Bill to be debated in Committee. Those who were Members of this House some years ago will remember that we were in the habit of hearing long speeches from the right hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) as to the abuse of the power of the Bishops in regard to the property of their Sees. He met with a good deal of support on both sides of the House; other Gentlemen took the same views, and the feeling of Parliament was distinctly in favour of the system which the hon. and learned Gentleman calls a system of confiscation and centralization—the system of vesting Church lands in the hands of Commissioners, and of making the Bishops and high dignitaries of the Church stipendiaries on the fund to be secured by the management of that Commission. Such was the policy in which the present system of legislation originated, and such was the policy on which it has been maintained up to the present time. It is very well to call it confiscation, centralization, or any other odious name; but it was the deliberate policy of Parliament at that time that there should be a limit placed to the incomes of the high dignitaries of the Church, that they should not go on increasing with the increased value of Church lands, that power should be given to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners both with respect to Bishops and Deans and Chapters to enter into voluntary agreements with those persons and bodies to receive from them the transfer of their lands. That transfer has been voluntarily made in the case of a number of Sees and of a number of Deans and Chapters, and it is the legitimate consequence of the policy of the existing law. There is no doubt that this Bill proposes to carry that policy still further. It is a policy which has been recognized by existing Acts, though of course it is competent for the House to stop in that course, and say we will not make any further advance in that direction. I have thought it my duty to bring this Bill before the House, though it is not my Bill, be it observed, but the Bill of the Committees of this House and the other House of Parliament, and it is a Bill which has been passed by both Houses. It is a fair subject for consideration, whether you should advance further in that direction; in my own opinion it is desirable to make that advance; and I believe that was the general feeling of the House some years ago. It is possible that that feeling may have undergone a change, and that the House may wish to arrest or even to retrace its course in the policy which it has hitherto pursued. It is a question of general policy; it is not for the Government to decide upon it, it is a question for the decision of Parliament. When the hon. and learned Member talks about confiscation and taking property away from the Chapters to place it in the hands of the Commission, no doubt in a certain sense he correctly represented part of the Bill; but he entirely omitted to call the attention of the House to another part, which provides that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners shall restore those lands to the Deans and Chapters when the proper time arrives. Although, therefore, it may be confiscation in the first instance, yet, nevertheless, it is distinctly provided by the 8th clause that land producing an income equal in value to that which the Chapter are entitled to receive shall be restored to them as soon as it is convenient. Therefore I think it would but have been fair of the hon. and learned Gentleman, when he heaped so many sins on the head of this Bill, to mention this clause.

MR. SELWYN: I did call attention to it, and I said the provision never had been carried out, and I did not think it ever would be.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: I did not hear that part of the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech, and beg his pardon for misrepresenting him; but I cannot understand how it can be argued against a clause that it will never be carried into operation. It is a mere supposition of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and is distinctly opposed to the system on which the Bill is founded, which never contemplated the permanent retention of the lands by the Commission. If it can be shown that the Commissioners have not fulfilled their trust, that is a fair objection to the Bill; but it is not correct to say that the Bill proposes permanently to confiscate the landed property of the Church. Most of the other objections which have been raised against the Bill are such as may be most conveniently discussed in Committee. The hon. Gentleman referred to the clause which gives compensation to the chapter clerks. Hitherto it has been the practice where voluntary transfers have been made to give compensation to the chapter clerks, who did not receive salaries, but were paid by fees upon leases, and, of course, they lose their fees when the Ecclesiastical Commission takes possession of the estates. This clause is put in in the interest of the chapter clerks, to make the compensation compulsory, which has always been usual. It is a matter in which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are not interested at all. With regard to the 36th clause, I understand that has been put in in deference to the scruples of some persons, who have raised doubts as to the validity of the titles acquired under certain arrangements which have been made. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners do not share in those doubts, and were not at all anxious to have it inserted in the Bill, and if it is thought desirable I shall be quite ready to omit it in Committee. As I have said before, this Bill has already received the assent of each House of Parliament, it has passed through Committees of each House, and it is a continuation of former legislation on the subject; but if the House is of opinion that the system should remain where it is, and that this additional legislation should not take place, let it pronounce its opinion accordingly. I am quite prepared to acquiesce in whatever opinion it may pronounce, but I shall certainly move the second reading, believing it to be founded on correct policy, and to be carrying out that policy judiciously and safely. The staple of the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman was occupied not in objections to the second reading of the Bill, but by an attack on the Ecclesiastical Commission, on the policy on which it is founded, and on its proceedings under its existing constitution. I can only say if the hon. and learned Gentleman's views are to prevail, if it is thought that to make Bishops and Deans and Chapters stipendiaries of a fund derived from Church property is inconsistent with the character of the Established Church, the proper course for the hon. and learned Member to pursue is to bring in a Bill to repeal the Acts under which the Ecclesiastical Commission is constituted, to dissolve the Commission, to restore the estates to the Bishops and the Chapters, and to unweave the web which has been woven so carefully by Parliament for so long a series of years. It is only prejudicing the debate upon this Bill to divert the attention of the House from the real merits of the case, and to make the discussion of the Bill, which is nothing more than a collection of provisions carrying out the spirit of former legislation, the occasion of an attack on the policy of the Ecclesiastical Commission. The hon. and learned Member complained of the manner in which the accounts of the Commissioners are kept, and he thinks they ought to be presented in a form which everybody could understand in a moment. That is a dictum which I have often heard delivered in this House, not merely with regard to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners' accounts, but in regard to the accounts of the public revenue generally. We know how many attempts have been made to simplify them, and we know, too, that notwithstanding the efforts of a succession of Chancellors of the Exchequer it has been found extremely difficult to present anything so complicated as the accounts of the public revenue in a form which "any one could understand in a moment" to use the hon. Gentleman's words. With respect to the accounts of the Ecclesiastical Commission my information leads me to say that they are at present in a very perfect state, and that they are kept in such a form that any person conversant with accounts, and capable of going through a long series of accounts referring to a vast quantity of property and complicated operations connected with that property, would be able to follow without difficulty any operation which he desired to trace, and would be able to check all the accounts relating to it. It is nevertheless true, that it does require some special knowledge in order to go through complicated accounts of this sort; but I maintain—and I believe it will be found, on investigation—that the accounts of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are kept in a most satisfactory manner, and that, if it were desired to submit them to any competent accountant, or to any person capable of investigating such statements of figures, they would be found to convey all the information which accounts ought to supply. As for presenting them in a popular form, in such a form as would enable any hon. Member to understand them by a few moments' casual attention, that I believe will be found an insoluble problem. I have now stated the grounds on which I think the House ought to read this Bill a second time and to allow the clauses to be considered in Committee. The House will collect from my statement that I am perfectly ready to listen to any objections that may be made or to any proposals which may be brought forward for the improvement of this Bill. I am quite ready to give my best assistance for the improvement of the present system under which the Ecclesiastical Commission is managed; but if the House now takes a different view, if they think that the Commission is founded on an erroneous principle, if they wish to follow what I must call a retrograde course, and to facilitate the restoration of the former system under which all lands were in the personal management of Bishops and Deans and Chapters, with unlimited incomes, then let them refuse to consider this Bill. Let them begin by throwing out this Bill, and we cannot expect then that matters will stop there — we cannot expect that a merely stationary policy will be adopted; we must look for the introduction of a retrograde measure which will repeal the essential parts of that system which a few years ago both Houses of Parliament were all but unanimous in considering a great improvement on previous legislation.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had made a very inadequate defence of his silence on moving the second reading of the Bill. He need not have been disquieted by the expectation of having to reply to the Amendment, and therefore being obliged to speak twice, for the Ecclesiastical Commission had another representative in the House in the person of the hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. Deedes), who would have explained the grounds on which the Commissioners supported this Bill. He therefore thought the Government were bound, in the first instance, to state to the House the grounds on which they brought forward this measure. Although he had his attention for some years directed to the consideration of the question, and although he was one of the Committee which sat in 1856, yet he confessed that the shape in which the present Bill came before them was so complicated, that he found it difficult to determine what course of action he ought to pursue in regard to it. He should certainly feel it to be his duty to endeavour to have considerable Amendments made in Committee, but he did not think he could take upon himself the responsibility of saying "no" to the second reading, and thereby stopping all further legislation for the present Session on this subject, after so many Committees, and so many attempts at dealing with matters on which legislation was urgently required. As to the accounts of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. it was true the right hon. Gentleman talked about the impossibility of the accounts being presented in such a form that hon. Members would understand them with a few moments' casual attention; but that was not what was asked for; all that was wanted was that they should be intelligible. The hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. Copeland), was not unused to accounts, and yet he could make nothing of them, and the hon. and learned Member for the University of Cambridge, with all his acuteness, could not understand them. Nay, even Mr. Chalk, the Secretary to the Commission, in his evidence before the Select Committee, confessed that he could not understand them himself. The hon. and learned Member for the University of Cambridge had much understated his case against the Commissioners, for in his calculations he had omitted a large sum which had been spent by them in farm buildings, improvements, and drainage. At first sight it might seem as though this expenditure was for the good of the estates, but the question was one which bore very forcibly on the system of management pursued by the Commissioners. Evidence had been brought under the notice of the Committee of 1856 to show that the expenditure by the Commissioners was not satisfactory. One witness sent by the Commissioners themselves proved an expenditure on one farm of £1,600, where an expenditure of £638 would have been sufficient to put everything in a proper state of repair. In another case there was an expenditure of £6,000 or £7,000 on farm buildings and improvements. The people in Whitehall Place were responsible for this, and he was not for giving them further power. In seven years their office expenses had increased from £4,000 to £14,000 a year. In 1853 these expenses were £4,175; in 1854 and 1855 about the same; in 1856, £5,745; in 1857, £7,592; in 1858, £8,575; in 1859, £10,766; and he found that in 1860 the Treasury sanctioned a scale of expenditure to the amount of £14,060. While agreeing with his hon. and learned Friend that there were some very objectionable clauses in the Bill, there were others which he could not consent to negative. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had observed that the Bill was substantially the same as that which came down from the Lords in 1858; but he (Mr. Mowbray) must observe that in some of its clauses it differed from that Bill very materially. Some of its clauses went to increase the powers of the Whitehall Place gentlemen; and in one of them there was this statement—that “due provision may, if the Commissioners think fit, be made for the spiritual wants” of the localities where their property was situated. Now, one great complaint which was urged against the Ecclesiastical Commissioners was, that they swept large sums of money into the Common Fund and dealt with them without any reference to the quarter from which they were derived. He, for one, had no desire to be left in the matter to the tender mercies of Whitehall Place, and instead of providing that due consideration “may,” if the Commissioners thought fit, be given to the wants of the locality whence the tithes proceeded, he should wish the provision to that effect to assume an obligatory character. His hon. and learned Friend had observed that he was unwilling to surrender the rights which he and those who agreed with him now enjoyed; but what rights did they really enjoy, or could they enjoy, while such a system as that which prevailed in Whitehall Place continued? As a further illustration of the expenditure of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, he would observe that during the eleven years, from 1847 to 1858 they had received a sum of £421,110 from the diocese of Durham. During the same period they expended a sum of £75,000; in addition to which they had made certain compulsory payments to the amount of £21,583, so that the excess of their receipts over the expenditure from the diocese for that period of eleven years was no less than £324,516. At the present moment the episcopal property of the diocese yielded about £20,000 a year, the capitular £35,000—making a total of £55,000 per annum, exclusive of the £324,516 to which he had already referred as the excess of income over expenditure for the eleven years ending in 1858, and the funds so acquired they claimed the right under the existing law to appropriate to the spiritual wants of any portion of the kingdom. It might have been contended that the diocese of Durham was very rich and possessed adequate funds to meet its own necessities. Now, that was a point to which he was anxious for a moment to advert. There was, he found, only one county in England and Wales—Glamorgan—in which the increase of population had of late years been as great as in Durham, and a Committee of the other House of Parliament had reported that no counties in the kingdom were so badly provided with church accommodation as both Durham and Northumberland. The hon. and learned Member the University has also alluded to the liberality of the Commissioners. Now, their rental was, he believed, £218,000, and his hon. and learned Friend admitted it to be £173,000. He found on inquiry that they had contributed to church and school funds the munificent sum of £404, or about a half-penny in the pound on their rental. What had they done in the formation of new church districts? The population of Newcastle, South Shields, Tynemouth, Sunderland, and Gateshead, amounted altogether to 264,000 souls, and yet they had created only eight new districts there, and but one district existed for every 11,200 of the population, instead of one for every 5,000, which was the rate in the large towns of Lancashire. He thought, then, it was time for Parliament to interfere, and place some check on their caprice. Now, as he found this Bill did so to some extent, he was prepared to give it his support. On the question of lessees there was as much need for legislation as on any other point. There had been Committees of both Houses on this matter—there had been communications from lessees in all parts of the kingdom. He believed that the proposition of the Bill in this respect was just and equitable; it embraced the Resolution of a Committee which was adopted after much discussion and by mutual consent in the Committee of 1856, and on this ground also he would support the Bill. The conclusion to which he came was this—that the Government had mixed up too many questions in the Bill and had got into difficulty against which it had been especially warned. He regretted that dealings with Deans and Chapters, the expensive management of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the questions connected with leases, had all been included in one Bill. It was very probable the whole Bill would be wrecked by the opposition raised to some parts of it. He hoped, therefore, that even now the Home Secretary would withdraw the Bill and recast it, dividing its provisions into three separate measures. The questions were very important, and legislation on them was imperatively demanded; but if the Government wished to have the credit of passing any measure this Session it must recast the present Bill.

Mr. Mowbray

LORD HARRY VANE said, he entertained grave doubts whether a Bill so complicated as the present could pass in the present Session. Yet he should be sorry by any vote of his to throw obstacles in its way. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary told them that he was not the absolute parent of this Bill, that it embodied the Resolutions of two Committees; but notwithstanding this he doubted whether he had acted wisely in embracing so many points in one Bill. It was a serious question whether the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had used the power now in their hands so wisely as to justify an extension of it. He could confirm the statements made by the right hon. Member for Durham, that there were great complaints in that diocese of the utter indifference shown by these Commissioners to the claims of those districts whence the greater portion of their revenues was derived. At present only a small portion of the large revenue derived from that county was given to the relief of districts there. It was true that some constraint was put upon the Commissioners by this Bill, but he feared it was so vague and undecided that in practice it would be found of little use. The Bill only gave the Commissioners a permissive power in respect of these claims, and hitherto such permissive powers had been but little regarded. He was grateful, however, for the recognition of the rights of localities made by this Bill as far as it went, and would therefore support the second reading. He also thought that the provisions in the Bill with respect to lessees possessed a certain value, though something more decided still was required. As it stood the Bill would place the lessees in a different position from that they had held for two centuries; and was prejudicial to interests that had been long recognized by the country and the Legislature. Then it was proposed to give compensation to certain officers. He should like to have some distinct statement of what that compensation was to be; he looked with great distrust on the subject of compensations. The case of the proctors and the immense compensations given to them must be in the recollection of the House. Before it assented to that proposal the House ought to know what was the amount of the compensation, or claims of an exaggerated character would be made, and then it would be too late to refuse them. He was the more in favour of being specific in the provisions of the Bill, because he had not such confidence in the Commissioners as to leave much to their discretion. He thought there was much that was censurable in their conduct; the expenses of their staff were out of all proportion to their services, and there was much in their conduct that required explanation. On the whole, as some legislation was necessary, he would support the second reading though he was far from giving his support to all its clauses. If time had permitted, he would have recommended that the Bill should be divided into distinct portions.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the great peculiarity of the debate had been that the objections to the Bill on principle had been urged with singular clearness, while all who supported the second reading did so with the hope that the measure would be cut to pieces in Committee. That was not a satisfactory mode of dealing with any Bill, but especially so with a measure that involved some of the deepest problems with respect to Church property. The noble Lord (Lord Harry Vane) rather undervalued the measure. He himself should be prepared to vote against it, even on the grounds urged in its support; but still more on the general principles it involved. The main principle of the Bill was, that the powers of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were not sufficient and ought to be greatly increased; and not only that, but that the Commission itself should be rendered perpetual and immortal, and ultimately have the whole management of the Church property of the country, which would be vested in the all but irresponsible Commission sitting in London. This was the principle of the Bill, and this would be its ultimate result. He thought that a Government Bill, only read for a second time on a Wednesday in the beginning of June, was not likely to get into Committee time enough for much Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Lewis) told them he washed his hands of all connection with the parentage of the Bill; and he believed the right hon. Gentleman knew very little of the ultimate objects of those who were its framers. But he said that some fifteen years ago great attacks were made on certain Bishops of the Church by Lord Llanover and the right hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman); that this Bill carried out the views of those Gentlemen, and that it would be a retrograde step if the House did not agree to the Bill.

Why, if there was wanting any proof that there was little or nothing in the denunciations of these Gentlemen, it would be found in the fact that the right hon. Member for Stroud had not, if he Lord John Manners could believe the evidence of his own eyes, been in the House during the debate. He denied, however, that the House was at all bound by the sentiments expressed by these Gentlemen fifteen years ago. Then the right hon. Gentleman said the Bill carried out the recommendations of the Committee of 1856. But was that so? He utterly denied that it was so; take, for instance, the 5th Clause: on July 8, 1856, it was proposed in the Select Committee, "that, upon the avoidance of any See, the sufficiency of the estates of such See shall be subject to revision;" and that Resolution was rejected by nine to four: yet the 5th Clause gives effect to that rejected proposal. Then the right hon. Gentleman took exception to the language of the hon. and learned Member for the University of Cambridge, who said this was a measure of confiscation. He (Lord John Manners) contended that it was nothing else. The 5th Clause enacted that on the avoidance of any See the property of that See should be revised by the Commission. That was perpetuating an expensive Commission just for the pleasure of ascertaining whether the Bishop should receive £5,000 or £5,100. His belief was that the object of the framers of the Bill was to render the personal holding of the Church property by Bishops and Chapters so odious that they would be forced to throw it into the hands of the Commission. Now, who were the parties into whose hands this enormous property was to be entrusted? How had they managed the property already entrusted to them? The right hon. Gentleman was too wise to commit himself to the defence of the way in which the Commissioners had kept their accounts. He only said that whatever they might have been in times past, he was informed they were now in a satisfactory condition. Who had given him the information? And if the information were true, if the accounts were satisfactory now, he asked were they audited? and if they were, who audited them? He believed they had not been audited, and that they never would be audited, and he asked the House if they would entrust further power and a larger amount of property into the hands of a body who had allowed their accounts to fall into such a discreditable condition? He had never heard a proposal of so extraordinary a character so weakly defended. The right hon. Gentleman, the reputed father of the Bill, had disowned its parentage, and upon the grounds stated he felt himself bound to give his most cordial support to the Amendment, and as the right hon. Gentleman said he would not press the measure against the wish of the House, he might bring in a Continuance Bill. [Sir GEORGE LEWIS: There is no need of a Continuance Bill.] He was very glad to hear that. He hoped, therefore, the Bill would be withdrawn, and that the right hon. Gentleman would take time to make himself acquainted with the wants of the diocese of Durham, as well as the other dioceses, and then next Session introduce a Bill that would meet the views of all parties.

MR. INGHAM said, he should be sorry if the House assented to the Amendment, as it would have the effect of defeating the only practicable mode of providing for the spiritual destitution of many populous places, while, at the same time, it offered abundant security for the endowments and dignity of ecclesiastical corporations and the stability of the Established Church. He admitted that many heavy charges had been brought against the Bill and against the Commissioners, but he thought these were altogether misplaced. The Commissioners were carrying out a system of confiscation with respect to the property of the Bishops. But where was the confiscation in relieving them of the trouble and unpopularity connected with the management of their estates, while, at the same time, the rents of these estates were reserved as the security of their revenues. When a landed gentleman improved the condition of his tenants, it was known that he did so out of his own income, while any improvement of the same kind by a Bishop was known to come from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; so that they gained no popularity by their concessions, while any pressure on their tenants brought them into an invidious collision with the persons amongst whom they lived. Again, many estates had been voluntarily resigned into the hands of the Commissioners. Four Bishops and four Chapters had done that of their own accord which the noble Lord described to be confiscation. That was the fourth Bill since 1851 which had dealt with the subject, and he thought the time had now arrived for legislation, in order that further agitation might be rendered unnecessary. As he had said, he believed the greater portion of the charges against it were unfounded, and for the rest he hoped the House would agree to meet them by Amendments in Committee.

MR. C. W. HOWARD said, he resided in a diocese where, out of 259 livings, 128 were less than £100 a year, and he could assure the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary that not only was there a feeling of opposition on the part of Deans and Chapters, so ably represented by the hon. and learned Member for the University of Cambridge, but throughout the country, particularly in the north of England, to the conduct of these Commissioners; and he, therefore, hoped the House would not consent to give them further powers. If, however, the Bill were committed, he should propose a clause for the augmentation of small livings.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he felt precluded, by the whole tone of the debate, from voting for the second reading of the Bill. Not a single Member of the House thoroughly approved of the measure, but as it was deemed necessary that something should be done, they seemed prepared to say—"Do something; no matter what it is you do." He protested against the adoption of such a principle, and he wished to express an opinion that the Bishops and Deans and Chapters would be greatly impeded in the performance of their duties if they were converted into stipendiaries of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The greatest doubts had been raised as to their administration; the House could not examine their accounts, and there was no solution of the difficulty, but the withdrawal or rejection of this Bill; because they did not believe that in its present form it could effect the object desired, and because investigation was necessary which the passing of such a measure would tend to bar.

MR. LIDDELL said, he was sorry he could not give his support to the Amendment. Session after Session a Bill analogous to the Bill before them had been brought in, but no legislation had been accomplished. Two great interests were at stake in the matter—that of the lessees and another class, which cultivated and produced the wealth of the Church—both of which were left in a state of doubt and uncertainty. Considering the vast amount of property which was already under the control and management of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, it was a question well deserving of the consideration of the House whether it would be expedient to increase the powers which were already possessed by the Commissioners. At the least Parliament should call on them to recognize and act on the obligations which attach to every landlord in the country, and which more especially attached to them as the trustees of Church Estates. A Committee of Inquiry on the whole subject of Church property sat in 1836, and that Committee recommended that local claims should be considered in the distribution of Church Revenues, but that had not yet been carried out. If the claims of the district were to be postponed until a large sum had been accumulated to endow the bishoprics, such a postponement was not justifiable. He believed, however, the difficulty arose not so much from the state of the law as from a rule which the Commission had made for themselves. What was that rule? As laid down by the Secretary himself it was this, that in making grants from the surplus fund in any given year, a sum not exceeding £1,000 might be given to meet an equal amount contributed in any particular locality, which just meant that the richest places should receive the grants, and the poorest be entirely overlooked. This was the principle on which the Educational Board acted; but it was altogether erroneous in reference to religious destitution. The rule worked disastrously in another way. Generally when a benefaction was sought, the first person applied to was the largest landed proprietor in the parish, and the proprietors were generally the donors in such cases, but in cases where the Commissioners were the landed proprietors they said that they were precluded from making any benefaction, and there being no benefaction from others, no grant from the tithes was made for that parish. To show how this worked, he might state that in the diocese in which he lived the Commissioners were the largest proprietors of land in every parish but two, and yet in case after case the Commissioners had not only not exercised their discretion, but had not made even the proper inquiries returning simply the answer, "no funds." He admitted that the Church Estates were well managed, that the drainage was good, and the farm buildings sufficient, but that was not the main function of the Commissioners, and they ought not to evade the responsibility which attached to all other owners of land. For these reasons he trusted that the House would legislate on this subject during the present Session.

MR. DEEDES said, that as a member of the Ecclesiastical Commission, and responsible, to a certain extent, for the management of the property committed to their care, he had thought it incumbent on him to listen attentively to the statements which might be made by the various hon. Members who might speak during the debate before he rose to address the House. He did not intend to go into a minute investigation of all the points which had been raised; nor did he think it incumbent on him to dictate to the House the course they ought to adopt in legislating on matters which might afterwards be placed in his hands to administer. He should, therefore, feel it his duty to confine his observations, in a great degree, to a notice of the comments which had been passed in the course of that discussion upon the conduct of the Commissioners. He did not complain of those comments; because he is well aware that as public men, intrusted with a very heavy responsibility, they must expect not to be able to give satisfaction alike to all. In many instances the interests were so different and complicated, it was almost impossible to reconcile them. It was most desirable that the House should point out the course they wished the Commissioners to follow in carrying out the law they were appointed to administer. His anxious desire had been to carry out the law as he believed it to exist, and as Parliament intended they should carry it out, guided at the same time by the indications of opinion given by Committees of both Houses of Parliament that sat on the subject. It had been said this Bill was not based on the recommendations of the different Committees. That there might be some slight variations, he did not deny; but it would be found those Committees did recommend that there should be a more decided declaration of opinion as to the law which the Commissioners had to carry out; and that declaration the measure before the House would supply. He should be sorry to continue a member of the Commission for one hour, if he did not carry out, to the best of his ability, those powers which the law gave; and in considering the various points, nothing was more painful than uncertainty as to the powers they possessed. It was in consequence of this, that the Commissioners were, to a certain extent, consenting parties to the introduction of this Bill, which would render their powers more definite, and their action less liable to be misconstrued. It was said by his hon. Friend (Mr. Liddell) that local claims had not been listened to or granted; but the rule laid down was not an arbitrary one. It was intended to effect the greatest amount of good with the funds the Commissioners had at their disposal. If they gave Durham all it wanted, other places must suffer; for their funds were limited. The principle was, as far as possible, to make a grant to meet the benefactions offered in any district which were all fairly registered and impartially considered, a Committee being appointed to look into the cases, and where it was possible grants were made. If they were to give without requiring local benefactions, they would at once stop that flow of public benevolence which was now so extraordinary. This year they had a surplus of £80,000 strictly to augment poor livings all over the country, under the direction of the Act of Parliament, and to meet that, there were offers of benefactions to no less than £247,000; so that they had to select cases, owing to the very limited extent of the funds available as compared with the benefactions offered. If the Legislature thought fit to say that, previous to considering applications in that way, a certain sum should be given to places where there were no means of offering benefactions, he should be very glad; but hitherto the Commissioners had felt themselves bound to act on the principle he had stated. With respect to the alleged confiscation of property, in three instances estates had already been made over to Sees, representing the actual sum of money to which they were entitled by Act of Parliament; and in the case of Durham, the Bishop had requested the Commissioners to assume the management, inasmuch as he did not wish to undertake any concern of that kind. With Chapter property they would deal in the same way. Indeed, it was not to the interest of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to keep the Chapter property, but to hand it back as soon as possible. He deprecated as much as possible the Commission having to manage a property so large, that it was impossible for them to manage it well. He was rather inclined to think that if the Commission had accepted the proposition of one or two Chapters, they should not have had the opposition of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Selwyn.) In the course of the discussion attempts had been made to throw the blame of any want of success which had attended the working of the system on the officials employed under the Commissioners. But he repudiated any such apology for himself and his colleagues. They did not shrink from responsibility. It was said that the subordinate officials managed everything. He recognized readily and freely the great assistance they had received from men in the office, who were exceedingly well acquainted with business; but he repudiated altogether placing on their shoulders the responsibility which ought to belong to the Commissioners in the execution of duties which were of a very complicated and ill-defined character. With regard to the accounts, they were now in a much more satisfactory state than they had been; but he thought them capable of being put in a still better condition. With this view, the attention of the Commissioners, and especially the Treasurers, of whom he was one, had been turned to this matter. An auditor had been appointed, having been named by the Treasury; and there was every reason to believe that his audit would be sufficient, and lead to a more clear and satisfactory state of accounts than hitherto. With regard to the Stapleton estate, a mistake had been committed. It turned out a bad purchase, and was re-sold at the loss mentioned; but he hoped that would not arise again. The greatest possible care was taken in every transaction relating to the sale or purchase of estates. The outlay of £3,000 included the official expenditure, commission of £4 per cent, and also the expenses attendant on the enfranchisement of large portions of the property. He trusted, with the continued confidence of the House, there would be no further cause of complaint; and that the whole of the immense business under the charge of the Commissioners would proceed more satisfactorily.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought the best course he could adopt was to move the adjournment of the Debate. Every one who heard the speech of the hon. and learned Member for the University of Cambridge must have felt that a very grave question had been raised. He himself had come down to the House with very different impressions than he entertained at the present moment, and he was bound to say he waited with great anxiety to hear what his hon. Friend near him (Mr. Deedes) would say; but he could not think he had answered the questions which had been raised in a manner that must be satisfactory to any one without further inquiry. It seemed therefore most advisable that the Debate should be adjourned, to give an opportunity to investigate the matter before coming to any decision which would have the effect of throwing a vast increase of power into the hands of Commissioners, whose accounts certainly did not appear to be satisfactory even to his hon. Friend himself.

Debate adjourned till Wednesday 20th June.

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.
